VIDAURRI, Santiago (ve-dah-oor'-ree), Mexican soldier, b. in the province of Nuevo Leon in 1803; d. in the city of Mexico, 8 July, 1867. He was descended from a wealthy family of Indian extraction, received a good education, and in 1826 was admitted to the bar, but he soon entered politics, and, after filling some minor offices, took part in the civil wars in Mexico. He had obtained the rank of colonel when, toward the close of 1852, he was elected governor of the state of Nuevo Leon, and when, in April, 1853, Santa-Anna returned to Mexico and declared himself dictator, Vidaurri protested. As he was gathering the militia, Santa-Anna appointed Gen. Pedro Ampudia military chief of the northern states; but Vidaurri refused to recognize his authority, and when the revolution of Ayutla began, in March, 1854, he joined in the campaign for the overthrow of Santa-Anna. While Juan Alvarez was contending against the latter in the south, he took the field in the north, acting independently as commanding general. After the downfall of Santa-Anna he was a candidate for the presidency in the junta of Cuernavaca, 4 Oct., 1855; but Alvarez having been preferred to him, he assumed a semi-independent position and decreed the confiscation of church property in the northern central states. He also refused to submit to Alvarez's successor, Ignacio Comonfort, and decreed, in February, 1856, the union of Coahuila and Nuevo Leon, proclaiming himself their governor. This union was disapproved by Comonfort, who ordered an army of observation under Gen. Parrodi to the north, when Vidaurri, under pretence of protesting against the tariff and the tobacco-privilege, recalled the deputies of Nuevo Leon from congress, and was accused of an intention to form the independent republic of Sierra-Madre, consisting of the north-western states. Being defeated by the government troops at Mier, he retired to Saltillo; but after resigning the executive of Coahuila, in September, 1856, he was re-elected by a packed legislature. Afterward he was more successful, and Comonfort signed a treaty, on 18 Nov., 1856, which left Vidaurri in undisputed possession of the two states, which position was sanctioned by the constituent congress of 1857. Vidaurri held the northern states against Zuloaga and Miramon during the war of reform. In the summer of 1861 he entered into friendly relations with the secessionists of Texas, and on the invasion of Mexico by the allied powers in December, 1861, he declared his adhesion to the national cause, and served for some time against the French. But when the Republican government abandoned the capital, on 31 May, 1863, and established itself in San Luis de Potosi, differences arose between Juarez and Vidaurri, and when Juarez, in December of that year, retreated before the advancing French toward Monterey, Vidaurri opposed his entry by force. Soon after the French forces occupied Monterey in 1864, Vidaurri was induced to give his adhesion to the empire, and he was rewarded with honors and appointed a member of the imperial council. In the latter capacity he assisted in the assembly of Orizaba, 26 Nov., 1866, where he was the leader of the party that opposed Maximilian's abdication, and by his flattering representations induced the emperor to return to Mexico. He accompanied Maximilian to Queretaro, but in March, 1867, was sent to Mexico with Leonardo Marquez as president of the ministry and lieutenant of the empire. Disapproving of Marquez's harsh measures, he resigned, and, unable to escape at the occupation of the capital by the Liberal forces, 21 June, 1867, he remained in hiding, but was discovered and arrested. He was tried by a court-martial, quickly sentenced to death as a traitor, and shot in the square of Santo Domingo.

VIEIRA, Antonio (ve-ay'-e-rah), Portuguese author, b. in Lisbon, 6 Feb., 1608; d. in Bahia, Brazil, 18 July, 1697. He went early to Brazil, studied with the Jesuits at Bahia, and entered their order in 1635. He learned the Indian dialects, but was refused by his superiors permission to engage in missionary work, and in 1641 accompanied to Lisbon Fernando de Mascarenhas, son of the viceroy of Brazil. He preached with remarkable success before the king, was appointed member of the privy council, and employed in several diplomatic missions. In 1652 he obtained the king's consent to return to Brazil, and on his arrival engaged immediately in missionary work among the Indians of the province of Para and of the basin of the Tocantins. He endeavored to free the Indians, and denounced the labor that they were compelled to perform for the Portuguese. The latter opposed him bitterly, and, being threatened with imprisonment by the local authorities, he sailed for Lisbon. There he justified himself before the king, who issued peremptory orders to the viceroy, and Vieira, on his return to Brazil in 1655, was henceforth supported by the governor of Maranhão. During the following six years the Indians enjoyed relative freedom, but at the death of João IV. the settlers obtained Vieira's arrest, and he was taken to Lisbon in 1661. The regent, Luisa de Gusman, approved his conduct, but for the sake of policy he was exiled to Coimbra by order of the state secretary, Castelménor. Vieira in his exile constructed an ideal Portuguese empire in a remarkable work, "O Quinto Imperio do Mundo," of which he circulated a few copies. They were seized by the tribunal of the Inquisition, and the author was imprisoned from 1665 till 1667, when he was released by order of Pope Alexander VII. and greatly honored in Rome. But he longed to return to Brazil, and in 1681 obtained permission to labor again among the Indians. He was appointed visitor and provincial of the Brazilian missions, which posts he retained till his death. Vieira was the most celebrated preacher of his age, and is considered as the purest and most eloquent of the Portuguese classic authors. His works include "Sermoes" (16 vols., Lisbon, 1683); "Historia do futuro" (1718); "Cartas" (3 vols., 1736); and "Ecco dos voces Saudosos" (1757). The original and only known copy of "O Quinto Imperio do Mundo," is preserved among the manuscripts in the National library of Paris. "Arte de furta" (Amsterdam, 1652), one of the most curious and popular works of the seventeenth century, is also attributed to him. Biographies of Vieira were written by Francisco de Fonseca (Lisbon, 1734) and Antonio de Barros (1746).

VIEIRA, João Fernandes, Brazilian patriot, b. in Olinda about 1600; d. in Pernambuco about 1660. He was one of the richest proprietors of the province of Olinda when that port was captured in February, 1630, but when the East India company sent out Prince Maurice, of Nassau, as governor-general, Vieira, with other proprietors, quietly submitted to the new government, as it was only a change in foreign masters, Portugal being then under Spanish rule. But Portugal recovered her independence in 1640, and after the recall of the Prince of Nassau in 1643, when the Dutch began to pursue the native owners with vexatious measures, discontent became general. Taking advantage of this sentiment, Vieira put himself at the head of a revolutionary movement, and in June, 1645, with a small army of badly equipped country people, attacked the outposts of Recife, but after a short struggle was defeated. The insurrection, however, spread over the whole country, Vieira employed his resources in procuring arms and ammunitions for the revolutionary forces, and with untiring energy and great natural talent harassed the Dutch forces in numerous encounters. He was not well supported by the home government and the governors of the other Brazilian colonies, and but for his unwavering resolution the province would have been conquered again. Amid great hardships he held out until he received succor from Andre Vidal de Negreiros. Soon he took the offensive, and after the two battles of Os Guarapes, in 1648-'9, the Dutch no longer dared show themselves outside the fortifications of Recife, which place, after the capture of Fort Milhon, capitulated, 26 Jan., 1654, thus ending the Dutch dominion in Brazil. Vieira, as the first instigator of the insurrection in the province of Pernambuco, was greatly honored by the people and court, but refused all recompense, retiring to private life. Lately a monument in honor of his memory and that of Negreiros's has been erected in Pernambuco.

VIEL, Étienne Bernard Alexandre, clergyman, b. in New Orleans, La., 31 Oct., 1736; d. in the College of Juilly, France, 16 Dec., 1821. He became a member of the Society of Jesus, and labored for many years at Attapakas, La. He translated Fénelon's "Telemaque" into Latin verse, and published "Miscellanea Latino-Gallica" (1816) and French translations of the "Ars Poetica" of Horace and of some of his epistles.

VIELE, Arnaud Cornelius, colonist, b. in Brabant, Netherlands, about 1620; d. in New York city about 1700. He came to this country with his father about 1630, and the latter erected an Indian trading-house at Fort Orange (now Albany, N. Y.). Arnaud grew up with the young Indians that accompanied their chiefs on the trading expeditions, and the friendships that he formed with them continued for half a century, and proved a lasting benefit to the colonists. His familiarity with the dialect and character of the Indians led to his becoming an interpreter between the government and the natives, and nearly all the treaties with the Indians for many years bear his signature. Gov. Thomas Dongan sent Viele as a special envoy to the Iroquois, and Gov. Jacob Leisler made him governor of the Six Nations. He was at the council of Onondaga when, at the instigation of the Canadian authorities, the Iroquois tribes were assembled to decide whether the English or French should have their allegiance. Upon the decision depended the fate of the colony, and had it not been for the long friendship of the Indians with Viele, they would have transferred their support to the French.—His kinsman, John Ludovickus, lawyer, b. in Washington county, N. Y., 6 June, 1788; d. in Albany, N. Y., 19 Oct., 1832, entered Union, but left to serve in the war of 1812, then studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1812, and practised in Washington, Rensselaer, Saratoga, and Albany counties. He was elected to the state senate, and was associated with De Witt Clinton in the legislation concerning the Erie canal. In 1821 he was made judge of the court of errors, and in the case of the Dutch church of Albany against John M. Bradford, then its minister, Samuel Jones, president of the court, whose decisions had never before been questioned, delivered an elaborate opinion with the confident expectation that, as usual, it would be concurred in. Several other judges gave long opinions to the same effect. Judge Viele, the youngest member of the court, differed from them and the chancellor, and, much to the surprise of the latter, who often referred to the case as his only legal defeat, the court decided with Judge Viele. He was appointed inspector of the New York state militia in 1819, and regent of the University of the state of New York in 1832. On the visit of Lafayette to America, Judge Viele was chosen as the orator to receive him on his visit to the battle-field of Saratoga. His judicial opinions are published in Cowan's reports.—John L.'s son, Egbert Ludovickus, engineer, b. in Waterford, N. Y., 17 June, 1825, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1847, assigned to the 2d infantry, and, joining his regiment in Mexico, served under Gen. Winfield Scott. He was then given duty on lower Rio Grande river, and was stationed at Ringgold barracks and afterward at Fort McIntosh. In 1853 he resigned, after attaining the rank of 1st lieutenant on 26 Oct., 1850. He then settled in New York city, where he entered on the practice of civil engineering, and in 1854-'6 was state engineer of New Jersey. In 1856 he was appointed chief engineer of Central park, New York, and prepared the original plan that was adopted. Four years later he became chief engineer of Prospect park, Brooklyn, for which he prepared the original plan, but resigned at the beginning of the civil war. He responded to the first call for volunteers, and conducted an expedition from New York to Washington, forcing a passage up Potomac river. After serving in the defences of Washington as captain of engineers in the 7th New York regiment, he was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers on 17 Aug.,

1861, and directed to form a camp of instruction in Scarsdale, N. Y. In April, 1862, he joined the South Atlantic expedition and had charge of the forces in Savannah river. Gen. Viele commanded the movement that resulted in the capture of Fort Pulaski, and also took Norfolk and its navy-yard, becoming military governor of that city from its capture in May, 1862, until October, 1863. After superintending the draft in northern Ohio, he resigned on 20 Oct., 1863, and resumed his engineering practice. In 1883 he was appointed commissioner of parks for New York city, and in 1884 he was president of the department. He was elected as a Democrat to congress in 1884, but he was defeated in his canvass for re-election in 1886. Gen. Viele is president of the Equitable home building association, for building houses in the vicinity of Prospect park, Brooklyn, to be sold to tenants who agree to use them as homes only. Besides papers on engineering, sanitation, and physical geography, he has published a "Hand-Book for Active Service" (New York, 1861), and a "Topographical Atlas of the City of New York" (1865).

VIGER, Denis Benjamin, Canadian member of parliament, b. in Montreal, 19 Aug., 1774; d. there, 13 Feb., 1861. He was a lawyer of good standing, was elected to the legislative chamber in 1808, took an active part in the controversy that led to the insurrection of 1837, and had been a delegate to London in 1828 and 1831 to lay the grievances of his countrymen before the imperial parliament. At the opening of the rebellion he was arrested on the charge of sedition, and imprisoned, but soon afterward was liberated without trial, and elected to parliament. After the dismissal of the Lafontaine-Baldwin cabinet in 1843, Lord Metcalfe asked Mr. Viger to become a member of the new cabinet, which he did, assuming the post of premier. He was afterward for several years a member of the legislative council of Canada. Mr. Viger gave the city of Montreal a piece of land now known as Viger square and garden.

VIGER, James, Canadian archæologist, b. in Montreal, Canada, in 1787; d. there in 1858. He was educated in the College of St. Raphael, Montreal, and served as an officer under De Salaberry in the war of 1812. In 1832 he was elected first mayor of Montreal, and recommended by Lord Gosford, the governor-general, for a seat in the executive council. As an antiquarian and archæologist he was devoted to the investigation of early Canadian history. He wrote twenty-eight volumes, entitled the "Sabertache," and formed an invaluable collection of manuscripts, having given years to the examination of historic monuments, the clearing up of obscure points, verifying dates, and restoring the correct orthography of names,

Egbert L. Viele

Parts of the "Sabertache" appeared in the "Bibliothèque Canadienne" and the "Encyclopédie Canadienne." The greater part is unpublished, but has been consulted by scholars interested in Canadian history, both in America and Europe. Mr. Viger was first president of the National society of St. John the Baptist, and was also for several years lieutenant-colonel of militia. His published works are "Relation de la mort de Louis XV., roi de France" (Montreal, 1812); "Observations en amélioration des lois des chemins telles qu'en force dans le Bas-Canada en 1825"; "Rapports sur les chemins, rues, ruelles, ponts de la cité et paroisse de Montréal, avec notes" (1841); "Archéologie religieuse du diocèse de Montréal"; and "Souvenirs historiques sur la seigneurie de Laprairie" (1857). His best writings have been for reviews.

VIGIER, George (ve-zhe-ay), Central American traveller, b. in Havana, Cuba, about 1710; d. in Bordeaux, France, in 1779. He was for several years a merchant in Havana, afterward founded a mercantile house in San Juan, Nicaragua, and, before returning to France, explored the province. He wrote "Notes et esquisses de voyage à travers le Nicaragua" (Bordeaux, 1768); "Description des antiquités et des ruines dans la province de Nicaragua" (1772); and "Manuel du commerçant dans les Antilles et l'Amérique Centrale" (1775).

VIGNAN, Nicolas, French soldier, b. in Saintonge about 1587; d. in Canada about 1630. He went to New France with Baron de Poutrincourt in 1606, participated in Samuel de Champlain's second voyage of discovery, and in 1610 volunteered to join the Indians on their homeward journey and winter among them. He embarked in the Algonquin canoes, passed up Ottawa river, and was seen no more for a twelvemonth. In 1612 he reappeared in Paris, bringing a tale of wonders, averring that at the sources of the Ottawa he had found a great lake; that he had crossed it, and discovered a river flowing northward; that he had descended this river and reached the shores of the sea; that there he had seen the wreck of an English ship, whose crew, escaping to land, had been killed by the Indians; and that this sea was distant from Montreal only seventeen days by canoe. The clearness, consistency, and apparent simplicity of his story convinced Champlain, who had heard of a voyage of the English to the northern seas, coupled with rumors of wreck and disaster (evidently the voyage of Henry Hudson in 1610-'12, when he discovered Hudson straits). The Maréchal de Brissac, the President Jeannin, and other persons of eminence about the court urged Champlain to pursue a discovery that promised such important results, and in consequence, early in the spring of 1613, Champlain crossed the Atlantic again and sailed up St. Lawrence river, accompanied by Vignan as a guide. On 27 May he left the island of St. Helen, opposite Montreal, with Vignan, three soldiers, and one Indian in two canoes. They crossed the Lake of Two Mountains, and advanced up Ottawa river as far as the rapids of Carrillon. Carrying their canoes across the rapids, they passed the cataracts of the Chaudière, the lake of the same name, left the river at the Fall of the Chats, and crossed to Lake Coulonge, up which they sailed to Tessouat, the village of a powerful Ottawa chief. Here Champlain learned that Vignan had remained the whole winter of 1610-'11 at Tessouat, and that the map he had made of his pretended discoveries was valueless. Vignan fell on his knees, owned his treachery, and begged for mercy. Vanity, the love of notoriety, and the hope of reward seem to have been his inducements, yet, but for this alleged discovery, Champlain would not have been given the means of returning to New France, and thus Vignan's treachery was greatly beneficial to the exploration and colonization of Canada. Champlain pardoned Vignan for these reasons, and the party returned to Montreal, where Vignan engaged in business and afterward rendered efficient services as an interpreter. He died among the Ottawas.

VIGNAUD, Jean Henry (veen-yo), author, b. in New Orleans, La., 27 Nov., 1830. He is descended from an ancient creole family, received his education in his native city, and was a teacher in the public schools of New Orleans in 1852-'56, being at the same time connected with "Le Courrier," of New Orleans, and other publications. In 1857 he established in the town of Thibodeaux, La., a daily entitled "L'Union de Lafourchu," which he edited till 1860, when he aided in founding in New Orleans a weekly review, "La renaissance Louisianaise," which did much to encourage the study of French literature in the state. In 1861 he published "L'Anthropologie," a work partly scientific but mainly philosophical. He became a captain in the 6th Louisiana regiment, Confederate army, in June, 1861, and was captured in New Orleans in April, 1862. In March, 1863, he was appointed assistant secretary of the Confederate diplomatic commission in Paris. At the same time he was a contributor to the "Mémorial diplomatique," and in charge of the theatrical criticisms in several dailies. In 1869 he became secretary of the Roumanian legation in Paris, and in 1872 he was officially connected with the Alabama commission in Geneva, for which he translated nearly all the papers presented to that tribunal in behalf of the United States. In 1873 he was U. S. delegate at the International diplomatic metric conference, received the appointment, 14 Dec., 1875, of second secretary of the U. S. legation in Paris, in 1882 was U. S. delegate at the International conference for the protection of sub-marine cables, and on 11 April, 1882, was promoted first secretary of legation at Paris. Mr. Vignaud has acted frequently as chargé d'affaires of this country. He contributed numerous memoirs to several learned societies of France, and has in preparation a "History of the Formation of the American Union" and a "History of the Discovery and Occupation of the Territory of the United States."

VIGNE, Charles de la (veen), French soldier, b. in southern France about 1530; d. in Fort Caroline, Fla., 20 Sept., 1565. He accompanied Jean de Ribaut in his expedition to Florida in 1562, and in 1564 returned thither with René de Laudonnière and assisted in building Fort Caroline. He afterward proved a staunch supporter of the governor during the mutinies that nearly brought about the ruin of the first colony in Florida. During the winter he made a voyage of discovery to Cape Cañaveral and induced the Indians of the coast to supply the colony with fish. After Ribaut's arrival in August, 1565, he was one of the few that supported Laudonnière in the council of war and opposed Ribaut's plan for attacking the Spaniards by sea. Ribaut having prevailed, La Vigne became chief of the night-watch that was charged to guard the fort, but through carelessness neglected to post sentries. When Menendez de Aviles approached at early dawn of 20 Sept., he easily carried the fort and slaughtered its defenders, La Vigne being among the first killed, and Laudonnière escaping with only a few men to the ships. La Vigne wrote an interesting account of the foundation of the French colony in Florida, which has been reprinted by Henry Ternaux-Compans in his "Recueil de pièces sur la Floride." It is entitled "Copie d'une lettre venant de la Floride" (Paris, 1565). It is the more valuable as, except Le Moyne's and Laudonnière's, it is the only narrative that exists of the colony that was destroyed by Menendez de Aviles.

VIGO, Francis, fur-trader, b. in Mondovi, Sardinia, in 1747; d. near Vincennes, Ind., 22 March, 1835. He entered the Spanish army as a private and served at Havana and New Orleans. He left the army and went to St. Louis when he was about twenty-five years old, and engaged in the fur-trade with the Indians, with whom he was on very friendly terms. When Col. George Rogers Clark, with his scantily supplied army, visited Kaskaskia, Vigo furnished them with food and clothing to the value of $20,000, taking his pay in Virginia Continental money. By the depreciation of the latter and the confiscation of his property by order of Gov. Hamilton, the British commandant, he became poor. When Col. Clark was at Kaskaskia, Gov. Hamilton left Detroit with the purpose of capturing him and his army. They proceeded as far as Vincennes and were quartered at Fort Sackville. Clark determined to capture Hamilton, and sent Vigo, accompanied by one man, to reconnoitre the fort. Vigo was arrested as a spy when he was within seven miles of it, but, being a Spanish subject, was discharged, returned to St. Louis, and rejoined Clark, who soon afterward took the fort. In 1786, Vigo employed Pierre Menard, afterward the first lieutenant-governor of Illinois, as an Indian-trader. They became great friends, and in 1789 both visited Gen. Washington at Carlisle, Pa., and consulted him in reference to the best means of defending the country.

VILAS, William Freeman (vy'-las), postmaster-general, b. in Chelsea, Vt., 9 July, 1840. He went to Wisconsin, when eleven years old, with his parents, who settled in Madison. He was graduated at the State university in 1858, and at the Albany law-school in 1860. He practised in Madison till the civil war began, when he entered the army as a captain in the 23d Wisconsin volunteers. He rapidly rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and commanded his regiment during the siege of Vicksburg and for two months afterward. Resigning his commission in August, 1863, he returned to the practice of his profession. He became a lecturer in the law department of the University of Wisconsin, and a regent of the institution. He was appointed by the supreme court in 1875 one of the board that for three years was engaged in revising the state constitution. He declined to be a candidate for governor in 1879. In 1884 he was elected to the legislature. The same year he attended the Democratic national convention as a delegate, and was chosen permanent chairman. On 5 March, 1885, President Cleveland made him postmaster-general, and in December, 1887, he was transferred to the portfolio of the interior to succeed Lucius Q. C. Lamar, appointed to the U. S. supreme court. In January, 1891, he was elected to the U. S. senate.

VILLADARIAS, Manoel Duarte Caldeiras Centenera de (veel-lah-dah-ree'-as), Portuguese administrator, b. in Alentejo, Portugal, in 1690; d. in Lisbon in 1759. He was appointed assistant governor of Maranhão, and in 1745 captain-general of the provinces of Itamaraca, Parahiba, and Rio Grande do Norte in Brazil, which greatly improved under his administration, as he developed agriculture and opened roads to facilitate commerce. He built the government palace in Parahiba, constructed a hospital, collected and classified all documents that relate to the discovery of those provinces, and wrote two valuable works, which were published after his death, "Relação das capitâneas de Itamaraca, Parahiba, e Rio Grande do Reino do Brazil" (Coimbra, 1761), and "Relação das Victorias que alcançaram as armas portuguezas contra as de Mauricio de Nassau" (1761).

VILLAFANE, Angel de (veel-yah-fahn'-yay), Spanish navigator, b. in the beginning of the 16th century; wrecked on the Florida coast in 1548. He was a skilful navigator, and had made voyages to Santo Domingo and to Mexico when he was appointed toward the end of 1547 commander of an expedition that sailed from San Juan de Ulua to explore the coast of Florida. He began the first Spanish settlement in that country, but had difficulties with the Indians, and, being short of provisions, re-embarked to find a more convenient place to plant a colony. During the voyage he was wrecked, and perished with most of his men, only a few of whom found their way to Santo Domingo. The papers relating to his expedition have been published by Henry Ternaux-Compans in his "Recueil de pièces sur la Floride." See also Francis Parkman's "Pioneers of France in the New World" (Boston, 1865).

VILLAGRA, Gaspar de (veel-yah'-grah), Spanish soldier, b. in Alcala about 1550; d. in Mexico about 1620. He served in Mexico, and as captain of infantry participated in the expedition that was sent by the viceroy, the Count de Monterey, in 1600, to conquer New Mexico, under command of Juan de Oñate. He was an educated man, and on his return to Mexico, where he lived after retiring from service, he wrote an account of the expedition in verse, under the title "Historia del Nuevo México" (Alcala, 1610).

VILLAGUTIERREZ Y SOTOMAYOR, Juan de (veel-yah-goo-te-air'-reth), Spanish soldier, lived in the end of the 17th and the beginning of the 18th centuries. Very little is known about his life except that he participated in 1697 as an officer in the expedition that, under Gen. Melchor de Mencos marched from Guatemala against the province of Peten, and conquered the capital of the Itzas, on an island of the Lake of Peten. Villagutierrez wrote a history of this expedition, under the title of "Historia de la Conquista de la Provincia del Itzá" (Madrid, 1701), which is valuable, and relates the interesting fact that in one of the temples were found the bones of Cortes's war-horse, which was left sick in the custody of one of the caciques, and after its death was worshipped by the natives. They also sculptured a colossal statue of the animal, which is still to be seen, partly submerged in the lake.

VILLALOBOS, Ruy Lopez de (veel-yah-lo'-bos), Spanish navigator, b. in Toledo about 1500; d. in Amboina, Moluccas, in 1544. Little is known of his early life, but in 1540 he was famous in Mexico as a skilful navigator, and therefore was chosen by the viceroy, Antonio de Mendoza, to command the expedition to discover Spice islands, that were still unoccupied by the Portuguese. He left Acapulco in 1542 in command of four vessels, discovered the Caroline and Pelew groups, and sighted a large island, which he called Casarea Caroli, and which is supposed to be Luzon. Finally he found an island which he called Antonio or Saragan, and there established a colony, notwithstanding the strenuous opposition of the natives. Soon his provisions and ammunition began to fail, and he despatched three of his vessels for a supply to Mexico; but they were wrecked in sight of the port of departure, and, driven by hunger, he abandoned the settlement and sought refuge in Amboina, where he and the survivors were imprisoned by the Portuguese. One of the number, Guido de Labezares, escaped in 1549 and carried to Mexico the report of the expedition.

VILLALPANDO, Luis de (veel-yal-pan-do), Spanish missionary, b. in New Castile about 1480; d. in Yucatan about 1560. He entered the Franciscan order, and going to Mexico in 1548 with the monks sent by order of Charles V. for the province of Yucatan, he was the first missionary to visit Campeachy, and founded the earliest mission among the Indians of Yucatan. He wrote a valuable grammar of the Maya dialect, which, according to Leon Pinelo in his "Epitome de la Biblioteca oriental y occidental," has been printed under the title "Arte y Vocabulario de la Lengua Maya," although no copy is known to exist. The original manuscript is still preserved among the archives of Simancas.

VILLARD, Henry, financier, b. in Spire, Bavaria, 11 April, 1835. His name was originally Gustavus Hilgard. He was educated at the universities of Munich and Würzburg, and came to the United States in 1853. He studied law for a time in Belleville and Peoria, Ill., then removed to Chicago, and wrote for papers. In 1859 he visited the newly discovered gold region of Colorado as correspondent of the Cincinnati "Commercial," and on his return published a volume entitled "The Pike's Peak Gold Regions" (1860). He also sent statistics to the New York "Herald" that were intended to influence the location of a Pacific railroad route. He then settled in Washington as political correspondent for eastern and western newspapers, and during the war was an army correspondent. He married Fanny, a daughter of William Lloyd Garrison, at Washington on 3 Jan., 1866, went to Europe as correspondent of the New York "Tribune," returned to the United States in June, 1868, and shortly afterward was elected secretary of the American social science association, to which he devoted his labors till 1870, when he went to Germany for his health. While living at Wiesbaden he engaged in the negotiation of American railroad securities; and, when many companies defaulted in the payment of interest, after the crash of 1873, he joined several committees of German bond-holders, doing the major part of their work, and in April, 1874, returned to the United States to represent his constituents, and especially to execute an arrangement with the Oregon and California railroad company. On visiting Oregon, he was impressed with the natural wealth of the region, and conceived the plan of gaining control of its few transportation routes. His clients, who were large creditors also of the Oregon steamship company, approved his scheme, and in 1875 Mr. Villard became president of both corporations. He was appointed in 1876 a receiver of the Kansas Pacific railroad as the representative of European creditors, and was removed in 1878, but continued the contest he had begun with Jay Gould and finally obtained better terms for the bond-holders than they had agreed to accept. The European investors in the Oregon and San Francisco steamship line, after building new vessels, became discouraged, and in 1879 Villard formed an American syndicate and purchased the property. He also acquired that of the Oregon steam navigation company, which operated fleets of steamers and portage railroads on the Columbia river. The three companies that he controlled were amalgamated, under the name of the Oregon railway and navigation company. He began the construction of a railroad up Columbia river, and failing in his effort to obtain a permanent engagement from the Northern Pacific company, which had begun its extension into Washington territory, to use the Columbia river line as its outlet to the Pacific ocean, he succeeded, with the aid of a syndicate which was called a "blind pool," in acquiring control of the Northern Pacific property, and organized a new corporation that was named the Oregon and Transcontinental company. After some contention with the old managers of the Northern Pacific road, Villard was elected president of a reorganized board of directors on 15 Sept., 1881. The main line to the Pacific ocean was completed, with the aid of the Oregon and Transcontinental company; but at the time when it was opened to traffic with festivities, in September, 1883, the "bears" of the stock market arranged an attack on the securities of the allied companies, and Villard, in the vain endeavor to support the properties, sacrificed his large fortune, and on 4 Jan., 1884, resigned the presidency of the Northern Pacific railroad. After spending the intervening time in Europe, he returned to New York city in 1886, and has since purchased for German capitalists large amounts of the securities of the transportation system that he was instrumental in creating, becoming again director of the Northern Pacific company, and on 21 June, 1888, again president of the Oregon and Transcontinental company. He has given a large fund for the State university of Oregon, liberally aided the University of Washington territory, founded a hospital and school for nurses in his native town, and devoted large sums to the Industrial art school of Rhenish Bavaria, and to the foundation of fifteen scholarships for the youth of that province.

VILLARET DE JOYEUSE, Louis Thomas, (veel-ah-ray) Count, better known as VILLARET-JOYEUSE, French naval officer, b. in Auch Gers in 1750; d. in Venice, Italy, 24 July, 1812. He early entered the life-guards, but in 1766 joined the navy as midshipman, and served in the West Indies and South America. He was promoted post-captain, was in Santo Domingo at the opening of the troubles of 1790, and aided in quieting the disturbance, taking part in the following year in the second expedition to Santo Domingo, after which he commanded the station of the Antilles. He was made rear-admiral in September, 1793, and sailed from Brest, 16 May, 1794, to escort a convoy of wheat-ships from the United States under Admiral Vanstabel. On 28 and 29 May and 1 June he engaged Admiral Howe's fleet, and, although both squadrons suffered heavily, the convoy passed safely and anchored at Brest, thus saving France from famine. In 1801 he was appointed commander-in-chief of the naval forces for Santo Domingo, and arriving, 6 Feb., 1802, off Cape Français, succeeded, by well-concerted measures, in extinguishing the conflagration that had been begun by the retreating rebels. On 3 April, 1802, he was appointed governor-general of Martinique and St. Lucia, which post he retained with great efficiency for seven years. After the battle of Trafalgar, in 1805, his communications with France were severed, but he held the English invaders at bay till 1809, when, after sustaining a terrible bombardment in Fort Bourbon, he was compelled to sign an honorable capitulation. In 1811 he was appointed governor-general of Venice, where he died.

VILLAROEL, Gaspar de (veel-yah-ro-a'il'), Peruvian R. C. bishop, b. in Quito, Ecuador, in 1587; d. in Arequipa in 1671. He became an Augustin-ian monk, going afterward to Europe on a mission of his order. While in Spain he wrote "Semana santa" (Lisbon, 1631, and Madrid, 1632 and 1633), and "Judices," another religious work (1636). He returned to America in 1638, as bishop of Santiago, Chili, and during the earthquake of May, 1647, although severely injured by the fall of his cathedral, he was transported to the public square, where he consoled the panic-stricken population during the night. He assisted the sufferers and rebuilt the cathedral out of his own resources. In 1651 he was promoted archbishop of Arequipa, in Peru. He was the author of "Gobierno eclesiástico pacífico" (Arequipa, 1650), and "Primera parte de las historias sagradas" (Madrid, 1670).

VILLARS, Charles, French surgeon, b. in Bayonne about 1760; d. in Mexico in 1814. He was a marine surgeon, served in Santo Domingo and several of the West Indies, afterward practised medicine with success in Porto Rico, and about 1800 began a journey through the West Indies and South America to popularize vaccination, visiting also Central America and Mexico, and meeting everywhere with great success. It may be said that he introduced vaccination where it was altogether unknown or distrusted. He wrote "Traité et art de la vaccination" (Havana, 1804); "Mémoire sur les propriétés antisypilitiques de certaines solanées de l'Amérique du Sud," addressed to the Paris academy of sciences in 1808; and "Traité du quina" (1814).

VILLASEÑOR Y SANCHEZ, José Antonio (veel-yah-sain'-yor), Mexican geographer, b. in Mexico about 1700; d. there about 1760. He studied in the College of San Ildefonso, and was employed successively as chief clerk of the comptroller of taxes and as comptroller of the quicksilver revenue. Later he was appointed cosmographer of New Spain, and as such commissioned in 1742, by the viceroy, Count de Fuenclara, to write a descriptive history and geography that had been ordered by King Philip V. He is the author of "Observación del Cometa, que apareció en el hemisferio de México en Febrero y Marzo" (Mexico, 1742); "Teatro Mexicano; descripción general de los Reinos y Provincias de la Nueva España" (1746); "Matemático Cómputo de los Astros" (1756); and of a geographic map of the Jesuit province of New Spain, from Honduras to California, designed in 1751, and engraved and published in Rome (1754).

VILLAVERDE, Cirilo (veel-yah-vair'-day), Cuban author, b. in San Diego de Nuñez in 1812. In 1823 his parents took him to Havana, where he was graduated in law in 1832, but he devoted himself to teaching and literature. On account of his liberal ideas in politics, and being implicated in a conspiracy to overthrow the Spanish government, he was arrested in 1849 and condemned to death, but escaped and fled to the United States. He fixed his residence in New York, where he published for some time a newspaper in aid of the revolutionary party of Cuba. Subsequently he was also the editor of literary magazines. In early life he had published in the papers short sketches of Cuban life and customs, and brief romantic narratives, and afterward he wrote the novels "El espetón de oro," "Los dos amores," and "La joven de la flecha de oro" (Havana, 1837); "El Guajiro" (1840); "El Penitente"; "La peineta calada"; "La tejedora de sombreros" (1840-5); and "Cecilia Valdés" (New York, 1881). The last is his masterpiece, a genuine Cuban novel, which has been deservedly praised by the most competent critics in Spain and Spanish America. Some of his works have been translated into German and French.

VILLEFRANCHE, Charles Pierre de (veal-frahns'h), historian, b. in Mobile, Ala., in 1756; d. in Havana, Cuba, in 1809. He was of French descent, received his education partly in New Orleans and in Havana, finished his studies at the University of Seville, and entered the colonial administration in 1778. He held posts successively in Venezuela, Cuba, Porto Rico, Jamaica, and Louisiana, but, having become nearly blind, he was retired on a pension and settled in Havana, devoting his time to historical researches and to classifying the notes and documents that he had collected in the colonial offices where he had been employed. He published several valuable works, among them "Historiadores primitivos de las Indias Occidentales" (Havana, 1797), which corrected and completed Barcia's history (Madrid, 1749), and for which Villefranche received a present from the secretary of state, and "Historia de la fundación de la ciudad de Santiago de Cuba" (1804).

VILLEGAIGNON, or VILLEGAGNON, Nicolas Durand (veel-gan-yong), Chevalier de, French naval officer, b. in the castle of Villegaignon, Seine et Marne, in 1510; d. in Beauvais, near Nemours, 9 Jan., 1571. In 1531 he entered the Order of Saint John, of which his uncle, the Marquis Villiers de l'Isle-Adam, was grand-master. He served against the Turks, Algiers, and Tripoli, and was made vice-admiral of Brittany. It has been asserted that he was then converted to the Reformed faith; but this is denied. In 1555 he obtained through Admiral Gaspard de Coligny the privilege of founding a French colony in Brazil as an asylum for the persecuted Huguenots, while he persuaded the king that the Spanish forces would thus be divided. On 12 July, 1555, he sailed from Havre with two ships, carrying a nearly equal number of Protestant and Roman Catholic emigrants, several young volunteers of noble families, and four Roman Catholic priests. On 13 Nov. he anchored in the Bay of Rio de Janeiro and took possession of an island near the shore, which he named Coligny island. He built a fort and opened negotiations with the Indians, who continued friendly to the last. A convoy of emigrants arrived on 10 March, 1557, among them four Protestant ministers, and Jean de Léry. Religious controversies began, and Villegaignon finally forbade the Protestants to celebrate divine service according to John Calvin's teachings. Some of them re-embarked on 4 Jan., 1558, and Villegaignon, fearing for his safety, transported the remaining Protestants to remote parts of the Brazilian coast. The colony being thus reduced to about 200 men, he sailed for France early in 1559 for the purpose of collecting re-enforcements, and take the command of a fleet that had been promised by Coligny, with which he intended to capture the Spanish treasure-vessels and destroy the Portuguese settlements along the Brazilian coast. But the French Protestants refused their support, charging him with treason to their cause, and named him the "Cain of America." His former relations with them procured him likewise a cool reception at court, and he retired to his commandery. Villegaignon's colony subsisted for a few years longer, but, being abandoned by the government, the French were finally expelled, 20 Jan., 1567, by Men de Saa (q. v.). Villegaignon was reputed one of the most skilful navigators of the 16th century, and he acquired distinction also as a historian and in his theological controversies with Calvin about his interference in religious matters in South America. His works include "Caroli V. imp. expeditio in Africam et Algieram" (Paris, 1542); "De bello melitensi et ejus eventu Francis imposito, ad Carolum V. commentarius" (1553); and "Ad Articulos Calvinianae, de sacramento Eucharistiae, traditionis, ab ejus ministris in Francia Antarctica evulgatae responsiones," which contains a relation of the foundation of the French colony in Brazil (1560).

VILLEGAS CORAS, José Antonio (veel-yay'-gas), Mexican sculptor, b. in Puebla in 1713; d. there, 14 July, 1785. He was graduated in philosophy at the Jesuit college, and devoted himself to sculpture and architecture. His works are distinguished for correct anatomy, good drapery, and the sweet sympathetic expression of the Virgin's face. The best known are "La Purísima," in the church of San Cristobal; the virgins of the convents of Carmen and Merced; and a "San José," in the convent of San Pablo—all in his native city.

VILLENEUVE, Alexandre Louis Ducrest de, French naval officer, b. in Theil, near Vitré, 7 March, 1777; d. in Paris, 22 March, 1852. He entered the naval service as a midshipman in 1791, took part in an expedition to the Pacific ocean, and in the following year joined a privateer and won reputation for his bravery. Re-entering the navy in 1796, he participated in 1802 in the expedition to Santo Domingo under Gen. Leclerc, and he was with Admiral Pierre de Villeneuve in the Antilles in 1805, and at Trafalgar. In 1806 he was sent by Napoleon on a special mission to carry the latter's orders to the French, Dutch, and Spanish colonies, and he was employed afterward in the Gulf of Mexico, and promoted to post-captain in 1814. From 1815 till 1818 he commanded the station of the Antilles, where he made valuable charts of those parts. He was sent in 1821 on a scientific mission to Havana and La Plata, assumed command of the station of the Gulf of Mexico in 1825, and prepared a chart of the Bay of Vera Cruz and the Isthmus of Panama. He was recalled in 1827, sent to the Mediterranean sea to chase the Tunisian and Algerian corsairs, was promoted rear-admiral in 1829, commanded the division that blockaded Anvers in 1832-'3, and was afterward maritime prefect at Lorient, retiring from active service in 1838. The charts of the American coast that Admiral Villeneuve prepared have long been standard authorities in the French navy.

VILLENEUVE, Jules Edmond François de, French author, b. in Paris, 27 Feb., 1804; d. there, 5 Aug., 1863. He emigrated with his parents to Brazil after the fall of Napoleon I., was admitted to the Brazilian naval school, and served afterward in the fleet, attaining the rank of lieutenant-commander, but he resigned in 1832 and devoted himself to literary labors. In the same year he bought the "Jornal do Commercio" at Rio Janeiro, which under his management became the chief periodical in the country. He was the first to publish reports of the deliberations of the Brazilian parliament, and to advocate the enfranchisement of the negroes. Villeneuve returned to Paris in 1844. He published articles on Brazil in the Paris magazines, and "Coup d'œil sur l'empire du Brésil" (Versailles, 1849); "La guerre civile dans l'Amérique du Sud" (1858); and an opera, "Paraguassú," represented at Paris in 1855.

VILLENEUVE, Pierre Charles Jean-Baptiste Silvestre de, French admiral, b. in Valensoles, Basses Alpes, 31 Dec., 1763; d. in Rennes, 22 April, 1806. He entered the navy in 1778 and served in the American Revolution with De Guichen off Dominica, with De Grasse at Yorktown, with Bouillé at Tobago, and afterward in Guiana. He rose rapidly in the service, and, after several scientific cruises in the Gulf of Mexico and along the coast of North America, was promoted rear-admiral in 1797. On 30 May, 1804, he was made vice-admiral, and through the protection of his old-time friend, Decrès, the secretary of the navy, was intrusted with the execution of Napoleon's plan for an invasion of England. The choice was unfortunate, as Villeneuve, although a reputed tactician, was more efficient when he acted as lieutenant. He was to sail with Gravina's Spanish division to the West Indies, rally Missiessy's and Magon's divisions and the forces at Cayenne, and, returning to Europe, unite with the Spanish fleet at Ferrol and Gautheau's division at Brest, and come to Boulogne to escort Napoleon's army of invasion, with 75 ships of the line and upward of 80 frigates. This well-concerted plan failed through Villeneuve's slow movements, and the most powerful naval armament that was ever collected was not utilized. After rallying Gravina's division at Cadiz, Villeneuve sailed, in April, 1805, to the West Indies, joined the Antilles squadron, under Admiral Magon, stormed Fort Diamant in Martinique, which was before considered impregnable, and obtained re-enforcements in Martinique and Guadeloupe. But he had lost precious time, and Missiessy had already left for France, for which reason he resolved to return to Europe, and on 23-24 July engaged successfully Sir Robert Calder's division off Cape Finisterre. But, instead of proceeding to Ferrol and Brest with his superior force, he entered Cadiz harbor on 20 Aug., and remained there till 20 Oct. Napoleon despatched Rosilly to supersede Villeneuve; but the latter, on hearing the report, resolved to give battle. On 21 Oct. he encountered Lord Nelson's British fleet off Trafalgar, and was defeated after ten hours' engagement and taken prisoner. On his release he went to Rennes, but, justly fearing Napoleon's resentment, committed suicide.

VILLEPIQUE, John Bordenave, soldier, b. in Camden, S. C., 2 July, 1830; d. in Port Hudson, La., 9 Nov., 1862. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1854, and served on the western border as a lieutenant of dragoons until the secession of South Carolina. Joining the Confederate army, he was made a captain of artillery, and soon afterward promoted colonel and placed in command of Fort McRae, Pensacola, Fla. At the bombardment of this post he was severely wounded. He was transferred to Mobile, and a few weeks later to Fort Pillow, which he strengthened for the ensuing bombardment of fifty-two days, which was sustained until he was ordered to evacuate. His brigade opened the attack and covered the retreat of the army at Corinth. He was ordered to Port Hudson soon afterward with a major-general's command and the assurance of promotion to that rank, but reached his post only to die of fever.

VILLERAYÉ, Charles Stanislas, Viscount de, French adventurer, b. in Provence about 1820; d. in Guaymas, Mexico, 13 July, 1854. He fought in Spain for the cause of Don Carlos, but squandered his inheritance, and, after taking part in the troubles in southern France during the revolution of 1848, emigrated in the following year to California, where he labored in the gold district with little success. He was among the first to join Count de Raousset-Boulbon, his kinsman, became his secretary, and wrote the articles of incorporation of the "Restauradora" company, founded in Mexico in 1852 with the aid of French bankers, which obtained from the Mexican authorities a grant of gold-mines that had been abandoned on account of their proximity to the territory of the warlike Apaches. While Raousset completed his preparations in Mexico,

Villeraye went to organize the expedition in San Francisco, where he was subsequently joined by Raousset, and on 1 June, 1852, they landed at Guaymas with 270 armed men, mostly Frenchmen, and two field-guns. Gen. Blanco, the Mexican commander in Sonora, prohibited their entrance into the country; but they marched to Hermosillo, stormed the place, and plundered stores and private houses, thus causing the whole country to rise in arms against them. Raousset sent Villeraye to negotiate the withdrawal of the expedition from Sonora, but Gen. Blanco demanded an unconditional surrender. The French attacked the Mexican lines at the rancho of San Jose, 4 Nov., but were driven back after a desperate action, and compelled to capitulate. Raousset, Villeraye, and a few officers returned to San Francisco, but afterward went back to Mexico, where they were well received by Santa-Anna. Villeraye sought to enter the Mexican military service, but the successful expedition of William Walker to Lower California induced him to join Raousset in San Francisco in November, 1853, where he took the command of the re-enforcements that were sent by the latter to Walker. He landed at Guaymas, where he was surrounded and compelled to capitulate to the Mexican forces; but his party was released through the intervention of the commander of the British sloop "Dido," on the plea that they had arrived in a British merchant vessel. Nearly the whole party was afterward shipped back to San Francisco, but Villeraye and a few others entered a battalion of foreigners that had been mustered by the Mexican authorities for the protection of the state. The strength of this battalion was afterward increased by recruits sent purposely by Raousset, and when the latter landed, 1 July, 1854, at Algodones, near Guaymas, Villeraye was commander of one of the companies of the foreign battalion. Being secretly devoted to the cause of his former commander, he went over to him with the foreign legion at his attack on Guaymas, 13 July, 1854, and was killed in the midst of the action.

VILLERÉ, Joseph Philippe Roy de (vil-ray'), soldier, b. in France; d. in Louisiana in 1769. He was an officer in a French regiment that was stationed in Canada, his father having come to Louisiana with Iberville's first expedition. Afterward he was naval secretary of Louisiana. In 1769 he headed an insurrection against the Spanish authorities, and was arrested, and killed.—His son, Jacques, governor of Louisiana, b. near New Orleans, La., 28 April, 1761; d. there in 1831, was a major-general of volunteers under Gen. Andrew Jackson in 1814-'15, and counseled him to accept the proffered services of Pierre Lafitte and his outlaws, and to flood the ground on which the British troops were encamped by cutting the dikes of the Mississippi. He was the second governor of Louisiana, succeeding William C. C. Claiborne in 1818, and continuing in office four years, and did much to diminish the friction between the French population and the U. S. authorities and English-speaking emigrants.—Jacques's son, Gabriel, soldier, b. in Louisiana, 15 March 1785; d. in New Orleans, La., 6 July, 1852, held a major's commission in the militia, and at the time of the British invasion was detailed to watch the Bayou Bienvenu. The enemy, landing at Fisherman's Village, captured him, but he escaped and reached New Orleans, giving Gen. Jackson warning of their approach.

VILLERMET, Jules Guillaume Ferdinand de (veel-air-may), French scientist, b. in Landerneau in 1802; d. in La Union, Salvador, in 1859. He held for several years an office in the colonial department at Paris, and in 1854 was given a mission to Mexico and Central America. After exploring southern Mexico and Lower California, where he suffered great hardships, he tried to enter Sonora, but was prevented by the political condition of the state. He visited Panama, Costa Rica, and Salvador, studied the volcanoes of Quezaltenango, Izalco, and San Miguel, and prepared a valuable geological chart of Central America. He died from yellow fever just before leaving for France. Villermet's explorations were continued by the scientific expedition of Auguste Dolfus and Eugène de Montserrat, and, from his notes and the materials he had collected, his brother published "Voyage dans le San Salvador, suivi d'une étude sur les volcans de l'Amérique Centrale" (2 vols., Geneva, 1860).

VILLIERS, Jean Pierre (veel-yair), French missionary, d. in Cayenne in 1672. He sailed in 1664 with Lefèvre de la Barre and established the first missions in Guiana. In 1669 he returned to France for supplies, and, arriving in the following year, he founded a convent in Cayenne, with seven missionaries, and built a church in that city. He came into collision with the French company by interfering in their transactions with the Indians, and was imprisoned, but obtained his release on promising not to offend again. Villiers wrote "Établissements de la foi fondés dans la Nouvelle France du Sud, des sauvages qui l'habitent, etc., avec un vocabulaire de la langue de ces peuples" (Beauvais, 1690).

VILMOT, Charles Stanislas (veel-mo), French author, b. in St. Nazaire in 1749; d. in Nantes in 1794. He held an office in the quartermaster's department of Count Rochambeau's army in 1780-'2, and when Marquis de Vaudreuil embarked the French contingent for Santo Domingo, he chose to remain in the United States, and afterward engaged in business in Philadelphia. He returned to France in 1786, and came again to this country to establish a ship-building yard at Philadelphia for French speculators, but the scheme failed, owing to the French revolution. During the reign of terror he was accused of being a party to the noted "pacte de famine," and was drowned in Nantes in one of the famous "noyades" organized by Jean Baptiste Carrier. He wrote "Observations sur les services administratifs du gouvernement des États-Unis de l'Amérique du Nord" (Nantes, 1786); "Journal de campagne, notes prises pendant la guerre de l'indépendance de l'Amérique" (1789); and "Notes et esquisses sur les États-Unis de l'Amérique du Nord" (1792).

VIN, Moyse Van, Flemish buccaneer, b. in Flanders about 1627; d. in Panama in 1678. He was a sailor on a Flemish vessel trading with Santo Domingo, but deserted about 1650, joined the buccaneers in Tortuga, and rose rapidly through his valor. But his total want of education prevented him from commanding large expeditions, and he acted as lieutenant of Grandmont, Van Graaf, Morgan, and Jacques Nau, with whom he was successively associated after 1660. He followed the last-named in all his expeditions after 1666, but early in 1670 abandoned him, when he was planning the attack on Guatemala, and, joining Henry Morgan, he served in the division which carried the fortress on Chagres river, and assisted in the capture of Panama. After Morgan's flight with the spoils, Van Vin mustered about 200 men and five vessels, made a raid on Puerto del Principe, and even attacked Porto Bello. He ravaged the coast of Campeachy, and acquired enormous riches; but he did not, however, enjoy them, as, having entered Panama in disguise, he was recognized, arrested, and, after a short trial, hanged before the palace of the audiencia.

VINCENNES, Jean Baptiste Bissot, Sieur de, Canadian explorer, b. in Quebec in January, 1688; d. in Illinois in 1736. He was the tenth son of François Bissot, a rich merchant of Quebec and owner of a Canadian seigniory, and a near relative to the explorer Louis Joliet—some say his nephew, others his brother-in-law. He fought against the Iroquois at Mackinaw at the age of ten, entered the Canadian army as ensign in 1701, and was employed in the west. In 1704 he was sent to the Miami country, where he rendered valuable services to the crown, rescuing some Iroquois pioneers from the Ottawas, and otherwise greatly befriending the Indians. In 1712 he saved Detroit from the invasion of the Fox Indians, but came afterward in collision with La Mothe Cadillac, the commander of that place, who asked for his recall. Vincennes's fault was overlooked, owing to his services, and, becoming reconciled with Cadillac, he became afterward the latter's most trusted lieutenant. He was employed successively in the Miami country, in Ohio, and in Michigan, but toward 1725 resided on the present site of the city of Vincennes, which is named in his honor, and built there an earth fort and a trading-post. Early in 1736 he was sent to assist in the expedition against the Chickasaws. Mustering about 100 Miami Indians, he joined D'Artaguet and they entered the territory of the Chickasaws by way of Illinois, and were to co-operate with an invading column from Louisiana. The latter expedition failed, but D'Artaguet and Vincennes, unaware of the danger, pushed forward. Meanwhile the Chickasaws collected all their forces and attacked, but were repelled with great loss, and the French captured several villages. But the Chickasaws brought about the desertion of the Miamis, and the invaders were finally defeated, nearly all being killed or taken prisoners. D'Artaguet, Vincennes, Father Sénat, and others were burned at the stake in the principal village of the Chickasaws.

VINCENT, Charles (van-song), Baron de Sr., West Indian soldier, b. in Jérémie, Hayti, in 1739; d. in Léogane in October, 1794. He entered the military service, fought in this country under Rochambeau in 1780-1, and after the conclusion of peace commanded a regiment in Tobago and Martinique. In 1787 he was appointed governor and commander-in-chief at Cape Français, where he took an active part in the civil wars that desolated the colony, put down the rebellion of Vincent Ogé and Chavannes, and checked the revolutionary movement that was led by Jean François and Jean Biassou. He sided afterward with Gov. Galband against Commissioner Étienne Polverel, and was taken prisoner at Cape Français, but pardoned by Polverel on account of his military talents. St. Vincent was sent to oppose the progress of the British, who had landed at Jérémie, 19 Sept., 1793, and drove them from Tiburon, but was defeated at Léogane, and killed in the action.

VINCENT, Francis, journalist, b. in Bristol, England, 17 March, 1822; d. in Wilmington, Del., 23 June, 1884. He was partly educated in England, emigrated at an early age to Dover, Del., where he acquired a knowledge of the classics, was apprenticed to the proprietor of the "Delaware Gazette" in 1839, and on 22 Aug., 1845, began the publication in Wilmington of a newspaper which he called the "Blue Hen's Chicken," from a designation that was given to the Delaware soldiers in the Revolution on account of their fighting qualities. He advocated representation according to population, election of all officers by the people, simplification of legal procedure, the abolition of the whipping-post and of lotteries, universal common-school education, the submission of important laws to the popular vote, exemption of household goods and tools from seizure for debt, the ten-hour working-day, and other changes in the constitution and statute law of Delaware. His projects met with opposition from the leaders of parties, but gained ground among the people. In 1850 the Democrats accepted his proposition for a constitutional convention, which met on 4 March, 1853, and adopted the elective principle and other reforms, but left representation disproportionate. Many who approved revision voted against the instrument, with the expectation of ultimately securing a better one, but after Vincent sold his paper in 1854 the agitation ceased until he temporarily revived the question in 1862, when he had purchased the "Commonwealth," and changed its name to the "Blue Hen's Chicken." He was a member of the Republican party from its first organization in Delaware, and strongly supported the government in his journal until he disposed of it in September, 1864. He began the publication of "Vincent's Semi-Annual Register" in 1860, but discontinued it at the beginning of the war. He addressed to the Cobden club an "Essay recommending the Union of Great Britain and her Colonies and the United States, and the Final Union of the World into One Great Nation" (Wilmington, 1868). This scheme he discussed further in a paper that he presented to the European league of peace at its meeting at Paris in 1870. In July, 1871, he published a plan for a railroad from New York to London by way of Bering strait, which he also laid before the New York chamber of commerce and the National board of trade in Baltimore. He wrote a "History of Delaware" (Philadelphia, 1870-1).

VINCENT, Frank, traveller, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 2 April, 1848. He was educated at Yale, from which college he received the honorary degree of A. M. in 1875, and was engaged during a period of eleven years in travel and exploration in all parts of the world. Mr. Vincent is a member of many geographical, ethnological, and archaeological societies, and has received decorations from the kings of Burmah, Cambodia, and Siam. His valuable collection of Siamese and Cambodian antiquities and art and industrial objects he presented in 1884 to the Metropolitan museum of art, New York city. The ruined temples and palaces of Cambodia and Cochin China were described for the first time in his book entitled "The Land of the White Elephant" (New York, 1874). Among his other works are "Through and Through the Tropics" (1876); "Two Months in Burmah" (1877); "The Wonderful Ruins of Cambodia" (1878); "Norsk, Lapp, and Finn" (1881); "Around and about South America" (1888); and "The Republics of Central America" (1889).

VINCENT, John, British soldier, b. in England in 1765; d. in London, England, 21 June, 1848. He entered the British army as ensign in July, 1781, was made a lieutenant in August of the following year, and became a captain in October, 1786. He attained the grade of major in May, 1795, in January, 1800, that of lieutenant-colonel, in July, 1810, that of colonel, and in June, 1813, was made a major-general. He was one of the ablest British officers in Canada during the war of 1812-15. He was commandant of Fort George, and when compelled to evacuate that post, in 1813, took position at Stony Creek, where he was overtaken by Gen. John Chandler. He attempted to surprise the American camp at night, but was unsuccessful. He was made a lieutenant-general in May, 1825, and a full general in November, 1841.

VINCENT, John Heyl, M. E. bishop, b. in Tuscaloosa, Ala., 23 Feb., 1832. He was educated at academies in Milton and Lewisburg, Pa., began to preach at the age of eighteen, completed his training for the ministry at Wesleyan institute, Newark, N. J., and in the four years' theological course of the New Jersey conference, into which he was received in 1853. He was ordained deacon in 1855 and elder in 1857, when he was transferred to the Rock River conference, serving as pastor in Galena, Chicago, and elsewhere till 1865. In that year he established the "Northwest Sunday-School Quarterly," and in 1866 the "Sunday-School Teacher." He was appointed general agent of the Methodist Episcopal Sunday-school union, and in 1868 was elected by the general conference corresponding secretary both of the union and of the tract society, in which posts he was continued till 1884. He was the editor of the Sunday-school publications of his denomination, conducting the "Sunday-School Journal," published in New York city, with such success that its circulation rose from 16,500 to 160,000, while that of his lesson-books has been nearly 2,500,000 copies. In 1873, with Lewis Miller, of Akron, Ohio, he projected a Sunday-school teachers' institute for the purpose of preparing teachers for their work by means of lectures and drills. The institute first met at Chautauqua, N. Y., in August, 1874, and has since assembled each year in the same place. It has extended beyond the limits of its original design, and given rise to allied institutions, which, as well as the Sunday-school assemblies and the international lessons, extend their benefits to members of all Christian bodies. The Chautauqua literary and scientific circle, which prescribes courses of reading for all classes of people, was founded in 1878, and within a few years had 100,000 students on its rolls. In connection with this the Chautauqua university was established, a summer school in which lectures on most of the arts and sciences are given, and of which Dr. Vincent, who received the degree of D. D. from Ohio Wesleyan university in 1870, and that of LL. D. from Washington and Jefferson in 1885, has been chancellor from the beginning. At the general conference of 1888 he was elected a bishop. Among his published works are "Little Footprints in Bible Lands" (New York, 1861); "The Chautauqua Movement" (1886); "The Home Book" (1886); "The Modern Sunday-School" (1887); and "Better Not" (1887).—His cousin, Strong, soldier, b. in Waterford, Erie co., Pa., 17 June, 1837; d. near Gettysburg, Pa., 7 July, 1863, after passing through Erie academy and working for two years in his father's iron-foundry, entered the scientific school at Hartford, Conn., next became a student of Trinity college, and, leaving that, was graduated at Harvard in 1859.

He then studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1860, and began practice in Erie. When the civil war began he enlisted as a private for three months in the volunteer army, was chosen 2d lieutenant, and soon afterward was appointed adjutant. He re-enlisted for three years, was made major, and promoted lieutenant-colonel of the 83d Pennsylvania infantry in September, 1861. He was engaged in the construction of siege-works at Yorktown, and soon after the battle of Hanover Court-House was prostrated with swamp fever. He returned to his regiment in October, 1862, as its colonel, and at Fredericksburg temporarily commanded a brigade in a difficult retreat. He declined the appointment of judge-advocate of the Army of the Potomac, in April, 1863, took command of his brigade as ranking colonel, and effectively supported Gen. Alfred Pleasonton's cavalry at Aldie. At Gettysburg, orders having come from the front from Gen. George Sykes, at the suggestion of Gen. Gouverneur K. Warren, for a brigade to occupy Little Round Top, Vincent, in the absence of the division commander, assumed the responsibility of taking up his own brigade. On reaching the hill, he quickly selected a position, posting his men on the left-hand crest of Little Round Top, and in the hollow between it and Round Top, where the Confederates made their first attempt to ascend the ravine and turn the left flank of the National army, in withstanding which his force was supported by the command of Gen. Stephen H. Weed and the battery of Capt. Charles E. Hazlett on the middle crest of Little Round Top, and by the regiment of Col. Patrick H. O'Rourke, which was sent up by Gen. Warren just in time to frustrate the flank movement of the enemy. Vincent was shot while cheering on this regiment as it faltered before the fire of the Confederate infantry.—Strong's brother, Boyd, P. E. bishop, b. in Erie, Pa., 18 May, 1845, was graduated at Yale in 1867, studied theology, and after serving in 1871-'2 as assistant minister of St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal church in Erie, Pa., became rector of a new church in that town, which he left in 1874 to assume charge of Calvary church in Pittsburg, Pa. He was elected bishop of Delaware in 1887 by the clergy, but was not confirmed by the laity, and in October, 1888, was chosen assistant bishop of southern Ohio.

VINCENT, Marvin Richardson, clergyman, b. in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 11 Sept., 1834. He is the son of a Methodist clergyman, and was graduated at Columbia in 1854, and for the ensuing four years was associated with Charles Anthon in the direction of Columbia college grammar-school. In 1858 he went to Troy, N. Y., as professor of languages in the Methodist university, where he remained four years. He studied theology privately, entered the Methodist Episcopal ministry in 1860, and in 1862 became pastor of a church in Brooklyn, N. Y. His religious views having changed, he attached himself to the Presbyterian church, and on 18 June, 1863, he was installed as pastor of a church of that denomination in Troy. This he left in May, 1873, to enter upon the pastorate of the Church of the Covenant in New York city, which he left in 1888 to accept a professorship in the Union theological seminary, New York city. He received the degree of D. D. from Union college in 1868. Dr. Vincent, while in Troy university, in collaboration with his colleague, Charlton T. Lewis, translated into English Johann Albrecht Bengel's "Gnomon of the New Testament" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1860-'2). He has since published, besides single sermons, tracts, and review articles, "Amusement a Force in Christian Training" (1867); "The Two Prodigals" (1876); "Gates into the Psalm-Country," a series of discourses (1878); "Stranger and Guest," a book of tracts (1879); "Faith and Character" (1880); "The Minister's Handbook" (1882); "In the Shadow of the Pyrenees," a volume of travels (1883); "God and Bread," sermons (1884); "The Expositor in the Pulpit" (1884); "Christ as a Teacher" (1886); and "Word-Studies in the New Testament" (3 vols., 1887-'9).

VINCENT, Mary Anne, actress, b. in Portsmouth, England, 18 Aug., 1818; d. in Boston, Mass., 4 Sept., 1887. She made her first appearance on the stage, under her maiden name of Mary Farley, at Cowes, England, on 25 April, 1835, as Lucy in George Colman's farce of "The Review," and in August of the same year married James R. Vincent, a comedian, with whom she appeared in England, Scotland, and Ireland, till 1846, when they came to the United States, first playing in the National theatre, Boston, on 11 Nov., in "Popping the Question." After her husband's suicide, 10 June, 1850, she played in the same theatre till it was burned in 1852, and then joined the company of the Boston museum, with which she remained connected thenceforth. She played a great variety of comedy characters, and till the close of her life was a favorite with the audiences of Boston, and did much to elevate and dignify her profession in the eyes of the public. Her best-known rôles were Mrs. Harcastle, Lady Duberly, the Widow Green, and Mrs. Malaprop.

VINCENT, Philip, English clergyman, b. near Conisbrough, Yorkshire, England, 20 Nov., 1600; d. probably in England after 1638. He studied at the University of Cambridge, receiving the degree of A. M., was ordained in 1625, and was rector at Stoke d'Abernon, Surrey, till 1629, when he resigned his living. After the death in 1630 of his wife, who was a daughter of Sir Christopher Heydon, a writer on astrology, he began a wandering life, and about 1632 sailed for Guiana. He subsequently travelled in Germany, and in 1637 was in Massachusetts. He published "The True Relation of the Late Battle fought in New England between the English and the Pequot Salvages" (London, 1638), which has been reprinted in the "Collections" of the Massachusetts historical society, 3d series, vol. vi.

VINCENT, Thomas McCurdy, soldier, b. near Cadiz, Harrison co., Ohio, 15 Nov., 1832. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1853, and on 8 Oct., 1853, became 2d lieutenant in the 2d artillery. During the three years that followed he served with his company in Florida during active operations in the field against hostile Indians, and from severe exposure in the line of duty became dangerously ill in May, 1855. During his convalescence Lieut. Vincent compiled a "Sketch of South Florida," which was used by troops in the final operations pending the removal of the Indians, and for which he received the thanks of the general-in-chief. During the years 1855-'6 he performed the duties of assistant adjutant-general and quartermaster and commissary of subsistence. He served with his company at Fort Hamilton and Plattsburg, N. Y., until August, 1859, when he was detailed as principal assistant professor of chemistry at the military academy. Declining the appointment of captain in the 18th infantry, he was appointed assistant adjutant-general in July, 1861, and assigned to the Army of Northwestern Virginia, being engaged in the battle of Bull Run. In August, 1861, he became captain, and in July, 1862, major of staff. From 1861 till 1865 he was constantly on duty in the adjutant-general's office at Washington, particularly in charge of the "organization and miscellaneous business of the volunteer armies of the United States," persistent applications for service in the field being disapproved by Sec. Stanton for the reason that "the public interests demanded his presence in the war department." Not only did the responsibility for framing all the rolls and instructions issued for the government of the volunteer forces in service during the war, and the charge connected with a personnel of more than 90,000 commissioned officers, devolve upon Gen. Vincent, but the preparation of the plan (of which he was also the sole author), and the immediate general direction of the work under it, for the muster-out and disbandment of the volunteer armies, numbering 1,034,064 officers and men, distributed to 1,274 regiments, 316 independent companies, and 192 batteries. This plan was prepared in advance of any notification from the secretary of war, and was put into execution immediately upon submission to that officer and Gen. Grant. Since the war Gen. Vincent has been identified with all important changes in the methods of transacting the business of the war department, the revision of army regulations, and he has served as adjutant-general of various departments, and in September, 1888, was ordered to Washington on duty. He became lieutenant-colonel and assistant adjutant-general in July, 1881, and was brevetted to the grade of brigadier-general, U. S. army, "for faithful and meritorious services during the rebellion." Gen. Vincent has made several reports to congress on "army organization," and is the author of "The Military Power of the United States during the War of the Rebellion" (New York, 1881).—His brother, Albert Oliver, soldier, b. in Cadiz, Ohio, 7 Feb., 1842; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 9 Dec., 1882, was educated at common schools, and at the age of nineteen was about to establish himself as a printer, when, at the opening of the civil war, he was tendered by Sec. Cameron a commission as 2d lieutenant in the 2d artillery. From 1861 till 1866 he served with his battery, part of the time commanding it during all the operations of the Army of the Potomac, principally with horse artillery in conjunction with the cavalry, comprising thirty-five battles and minor affairs, besides continuous and rapid marches. He was commissary of musters and superintendent of volunteer recruiting service in 1865, and served with his regiment in California and Washington territory in 1865-'7. He was brevetted captain for Antietam, major for Gettysburg, and lieutenant-colonel for faithful and meritorious services, 13 Nov., 1865, and declined the appointment of captain, 38th infantry, in July, 1866. He served as major of the 4th Arkansas cavalry in 1864-'5, and was retired from active service in 1869.

VINES, Richard, colonist, b. near Bideford, Devonshire, England, about 1585; d. on the island of Barbadoes 19 April, 1651. He was educated as a physician, and was sent, with others, to Maine in 1609, to explore the country and effect a settlement, by Sir Ferdinando Gorges, who appointed him his confidential agent and steward-general of the province. The settlement was established at Winter Harbor, near the mouth of Saco river, in 1616-'17. In 1629 Vines and John Oldham received a patent of lands, that are now occupied by the town of Biddeford, Me., from the council of Plymouth, England. He was the principal superintendent of the plantation until the arrival in 1635 of William Gorges, who appointed him a councillor, and left the government in his hands once more on returning to England in 1643. In 1645 the general court, not having heard from the proprietor for more than a year, constituted a provisional government, making Vines deputy-governor, with authority to take possession of the property of Gorges and to pay his debts. The rival claims to the proprietorship of the province raised by Alexander Rigby, a lawyer from England, who belonged to the party of parliament, caused Vines such trouble that before the close of 1645 he resigned his office and returned to England. Soon afterward he settled in Barbadoes, where he became a planter and practised his profession.

VINGUT, Francisco Javier, educator, b. in Cuba in 1823. He came to the United States about 1848, and for many years was professor of the Spanish language and literature in the University of the city of New York. He edited papers called "La Aurora" and "La Indiana" in Spanish and English, and published grammars and phrase-books for learning the Spanish, English, and French languages.—His wife, Gertrude, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., about 1830, was a daughter of Sumner L. Fairfield, the poet. Her first work was "Irene, or the Autobiography of an Artist's Daughter" (Boston, 1854). She edited "Gems of Spanish Poetry," in conjunction with her husband (New York, 1855), and afterward published two novels entitled "Madeline" and "Naomi Torrente: the History of a Woman" (1864).

VINING, John, senator, b. in Dover, Del., 23 Dec., 1758; d. there in February, 1802. He was a member of the Continental congress from 1784 till 1786, and was elected to the 1st Federal congress as the only representative from Delaware, and re-elected for another term, serving from 6 May, 1789, till 2 March, 1793. He was then sent to the U. S. senate, taking his seat on 2 Dec., 1793, and serving till 6 March, 1798, when he resigned.

VINTON, Frederic, bibliographer, b. in Boston, Mass., 9 Oct., 1817; d. in Princeton, N. J., 1 Jan., 1890. He was graduated at Amherst in 1837, and studied theology at Andover. Having trained himself in a private library during five years, he entered the service of the Boston public library in 1856 as first assistant. He entered the new building on Boylston street, with the 30,000 volumes that had been given by Joshua Bates, and organized the arrangement that now exists. He assisted in preparing the "Index to the Catalogue of Books in the Bates Hall" (1861) and the "First Supplement" to it (1866). He removed to Washington, in January, 1865, to become first assistant in the library of congress, and held the post eight years. He there prepared six annual supplements to the "Alphabetical Catalogue of the Library of Congress" and the "Index of Subjects" (2 vols., Washington, 1869). In 1873 he became librarian of Princeton college, of whose library he printed the "Subject Catalogue" (New York, 1884).

VINTON, Frederick Porter, painter, b. in Bangor, Me., 29 Jan., 1846. He went abroad in 1875, studied for some time under Léon Bonnat in Paris, and thence went, in 1877, to Munich, where he studied for a year in the academy under Ferdinand Wagner and Wilhelm Diez. Returning to Paris, he became a pupil in the school of Jean Paul Laurens. At the salon of 1878 he exhibited "Italian Girl," and in the Paris exposition of the same year he also had two paintings. In 1878 he returned to the United States and opened a studio in Boston. He was elected an associate of the National academy in 1882. His works painted since he settled in Boston are mostly portraits, including those of Sir Lyon Playfair and Alexander

H. Vinton (1880); Wendell Phillips (1881); William Warren (1882); Francis Parkman (1883); Andrew P. Peabody and Gen. Charles Devens (1884); and George F. Choate and George F. Hoar (1885).

VINTON, John Adams, genealogist, b. in Boston, Mass., 5 Feb., 1801; d. in Winchester, Mass., 13 Nov., 1877. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1828, and at Andover theological seminary in 1831, ordained as a Congregational minister, 16 May, 1832, and held various pastorates in Maine, Vermont, and Massachusetts. In 1846-'7 he was agent of the American society for ameliorating the condition of the Jews, and in 1859-'60 he was chaplain to the state almshouse at Monson, Mass. After the latter date he held no charge, but resided at South Boston and then at Winchester, and devoted himself to genealogical researches. He contributed many articles to periodicals, including "Reminiscences of the Park Street Church" in the Boston "Recorder" (1849), and was the author of "The Vinton Memorial" (Boston, 1858; abridged ed., entitled "Sketches of the Vinton and other Families," 1858); "The Giles Memorial" (1864); "The Sampson Family in America" (1864); "Deborah Sampson, the Female Soldier of the Revolution," a reprint, with introduction and notes, of a rare work that was published at Dedham in 1797 (1866); "The Symmes Memorial," containing an autobiography of the author (1873); "The Upton Memorial" (printed privately, Bath, Me., 1874); and "The Richardson Memorial" (Portland, 1876).

VINTON, John Rogers, soldier, b. in Providence, R. I., 16 June, 1801; d. near Vera Cruz, Mexico, 22 March, 1847. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1817, served in Florida and Mexico, and was killed by the windage of a cannon-ball, at the siege of Vera Cruz. He had become captain in the 3d artillery on 28 Dec., 1835. He was brevetted major on 23 Sept., 1846, for gallantry at Monterey, and the degree of A. M. was given him by Brown in 1837.—His brother, David Hammond, soldier, b. in Providence, R. I., 4 May, 1803; d. in Stamford, Conn., 21 Feb., 1873, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1822, was commissioned to the 4th artillery, and in 1823 transferred to the infantry. After a term of garrison and special duty, he was sent to Florida in 1836, where he was employed on quartermaster duty, and in 1837 was made quartermaster-general of Florida. He continued in this service until 1846, in which year he was made chief quartermaster on the staff of Gen. John E. Wool, with the rank of major, and served in Mexico. He was chief quartermaster of the Department of the West in 1852-'6, of the Department of Texas in 1857-'61, and was taken prisoner upon the surrender of Gen. Twiggs to the Confederates in February, 1861. Being exchanged after a few months, in August, 1861, he was made deputy quartermaster-general and chief quartermaster at New York, where until 1866 he rendered valuable services. In 1864 he was brevetted, for faithful and meritorious services, colonel and brigadier-general. In 1866 he became assistant quartermaster-general, and in the same year was placed upon the retired list.—Another brother, Alexander Hamilton, clergyman, b. in Providence, R. I., 2 May, 1807; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 26 April, 1881, studied at Brown and was graduated at the medical department of Yale in 1828. He settled in Pomfret, Conn., and there practised his profession for three years. Then entering the General theological seminary of the Protestant Episcopal church he was graduated in 1835 and ordained deacon on 28 June, 1835, by Bishop Benjamin T. Onderdonk. He had charge of St. Paul's in Portland, Me., in 1835, and was made priest by Bishop Griswold on 5 Oct., 1836. His successive parishes thereafter were Grace church, Providence, R. I. (1836-'42); St. Paul's, Boston (1842-'58); Holy Trinity, Philadelphia (1858-'61); St. Mark's, New York city (1861-'9); and Emmanuel church, Boston (1869-'77). Returning to Pomfret, where he had retained his home, he continued during the winters to lecture on systematic divinity at the Episcopal divinity-school in Cambridge, Mass. The degree of S. T. D. was conferred on him by the University of the city of New York in 1843, and by Harvard in 1853. Dr. Vinton was a candidate for the bishopric of Pennsylvania in 1845, but was defeated by Alonzo Potter. He was among the most active of the "low church" party of the Protestant Episcopal church. Dr. Vinton was the author of a volume of "Sermons" (Philadelphia, 1855); "Lectures on Evidences of Christianity" (1855); and "Sermons" (Boston, 1867); besides which he published single sermons and contributed to reviews and magazines.—Another brother, Francis, soldier and clergyman, b. in Providence, R. I., 29 Aug., 1809; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 29 Sept., 1872, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1830, and commissioned 2d lieutenant in the 3d artillery. Shortly afterward he was placed in charge of a detachment of troops destined to form part of the garrison of Fort Snelling, Minn., near where the city of St. Paul now stands. He served against the Indians in Georgia and Alabama, receiving with other officers the thanks of congress and a grant of land in Indiana. He was next stationed at Fort Independence, Boston harbor, occupied his leisure in studying at the Cambridge law-school, and was admitted to the bar at Portsmouth, N. H., in 1834. In 1836 he resigned from the army and entered the General theological seminary of the Protestant Episcopal church. On 30 Sept., 1838, he was ordained deacon, and on 8 March, 1839, priest, by Bishop Griswold. The chief churches of which he was successively in charge were St. Stephen's, Providence, R. I. (1840-'2); Trinity, Newport, R. I. (1842-'4); Emanuel, and Grace, Brooklyn, N. Y. (1844-'6); and Trinity, New York city (1855-'72).

(See accompanying illustration.) He was repeatedly called to other parishes, and in 1848 was elected bishop of Indiana; but to none of these invitations did he yield assent. In 1852 he was a candidate for the provisional bishopric of New York, but was defeated by one vote. In 1869 he was elected professor of ecclesiastical law and polity in the General theological seminary. In all the parishes of which he had charge his oratory attracted large congregations. He was also widely known as a lecturer, and during the civil war was a frequent public speaker. He received the degree of S. T. D. from Columbia in 1848, that of D. C. L. from William and Mary in 1869. Dr. Vinton published "Arthur Tremaine, or Annals of Cadet Life" (New York, 1830); "Evidences of Christianity" (Philadelphia, 1855); "Oration on the Annals of Rhode Island and Providence Plantation" (New York, 1863); "Manual Commentary on the General Canon Law of the Protestant Episcopal Church" (New York, 1870); and many pamphlets and sermons.—Francis's son, Arthur Dudley, lawyer, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 23 Dec., 1852, was educated at the Brooklyn polytechnic institute, was graduated at Columbia college law-school in 1873, and entered the law-office of Evarts, Southmayd and Choate, where he remained six years. In 1879 he formed a law partnership with Perry Belmont and George G. Frelinghuysen, under the firm-name of Vinton, Belmont and Frelinghuysen. In 1881 Mr. Frelinghuysen withdrew and in 1884 Mr. Belmont was elected to congress, and Mr. Vinton retired with a fortune; but he had become an investor in railroads, which proved insolvent, and for which he had indorsed largely. He is now assistant to the editor of the "North American Review," and has published two novels, "The Pomfret Mystery" (New York, 1886), and "The Unpardonable Sin" (1888).—John Rogers's son, Francis Laurens, engineer, b. in Fort Preble, Me., 1 June, 1835; d. in Leadville, Col., 6 Oct., 1879, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1856, and assigned to the 1st cavalry, but did not join his regiment, and on the expiration of his graduating leave of absence resigned on 30 Sept., and entered the École des mines at Paris, where he received the degree of engineer of mines in 1860. He was then an instructor in Cooper union, New York city, and afterward in charge of explorations in Honduras till 5 Aug., 1861, when he was commissioned captain in the 16th infantry. On 31 Oct. he became colonel of the 43d New York regiment, with which he served in the peninsular campaign, and after a month's leave of absence he took command of a brigade on 25 Sept., 1862, having been commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers on the 19th, and led it in the Maryland and Rappahannock campaigns till the battle of Fredericksburg, 13 Dec., 1862, where, his men being reluctant to advance, he himself headed the charge, and received a disabling wound that forced him to resign from the army on 5 May, 1863. His appointment as brigadier-general had expired on 3 March, 1863, but had been renewed ten days later. On 14 Sept., 1864, on the organization of Columbia school of mines, Gen. Vinton became professor of mining engineering there, and in 1870 the duties of his chair were extended so as to include civil engineering; but he was retired on 15 Aug., 1877, and from that time till his death acted as a consulting mining engineer at Denver, Col. He was not only an accomplished mathematician, but a good draughtsman and musician. Many of his contributions to mining journals, notably those to the "Engineering and Mining Journal," of which he was staff correspondent after he went to the west, and his professional reports, were illustrated by his own hand. He was the author of "The Guardian," a poem (New York, 1869); also "Lectures on Machines," lithographed from notes (1869); and "Theory of the Strength of Materials" (1874).

VINTON, Justus Hatch, missionary, b. in Willington, Conn., in 1806; d. in Kemendine, Burmah, 31 March, 1858. He was graduated in 1833 at Hamilton literary and theological institution (now Madison university), and in July, 1834, sailed as a missionary of the American Baptist board to Burmah, where he labored among the Karens till his death, being stationed successively at Chummerah, Newville, Maulmain, where he had charge of the Karen theological seminary in 1851-'2, and finally at Kemendine, a suburb of Rangoon. At one time eighteen stations, with fifteen churches, were under his care.—His wife, Calesta Holman, missionary, b. in Union, Conn., in 1809; d. in Rangoon, Burmah, 20 Dec., 1864, was educated at Wesleyan academy, Wilbraham, Mass., and married Mr. Vinton in 1834. She was successful in teaching the Karen women, and was the author of several hymn-books in their language.

VINTON, Samuel Finley, congressman, b. in South Hadley, Mass., 25 Sept., 1792; d. in Washington, D. C., 11 May, 1862. He was graduated at Williams in 1814, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1816, and began to practise in Gallipolis, Ohio. He was chosen to congress as a Whig, serving from 1 Dec., 1823, till 3 March, 1837, was a presidential elector on the Harrison ticket, and served again in congress in 1843-'51. His last public service was in 1862, when he was appointed by President Lincoln to appraise the slaves that had been emancipated in the District of Columbia by act of congress. He published numerous congressional and other speeches, including "Argument for Defendants in the Case of Virginia vs. Garner and Others for an Alleged Abduction of Slaves" (1865). His daughter, Madeleine, married Admiral John A. Dahlgren.

Samuel F. Vinton

VIOMÉNIL, Antoine Charles du Houx (ve-o-may-neel), Baron de, French soldier, b. in Fauconcourt, Vosges, 30 Nov., 1728; d. in Paris, 9 Nov., 1792. He was descended from an ancient family of Lorraine, entered the army when he was twelve years of age as sub-lieutenant in the regiment Limousin, was promoted captain in 1747, and was severely wounded at the capture of Bergen-op-Zoom. During the seven years' war in 1756-'63 he served with credit as colonel of the Dauphinois volunteers, and he was commander of the light troops in Condé's army in the campaign of Hanover. He was promoted brigadier-general in 1762, commanded the Hainaut regiment during the Corsican campaign in 1768-'9, and assisted in the pacification of the island. He was made major-general, 3 Jan., 1770, and sent to Poland, where he captured for the confederation of Bar the fortress of Cracow. In 1780 he was appointed second in command of the army that was sent under Count de Rochambeau to assist the American colonists in their struggle for independence. He was promoted lieutenant-general, 13 June, 1781, and for his gallant conduct at the siege of Yorktown in October, 1781, where he led his troops in the storming of the redoubt, was given the grand cross of St. Louis. After the conclusion of peace he was governor of La Rochelle in 1783-'9, and at the time of Louis XVI.'s flight in 1791 was named to accompany the royal family. At the attack on the Tuileries palace, 10 Aug., 1792, he was so severely wounded in defending the king that he died a few weeks later. See "Lettres particulières du Baron de Vioménil sur les affaires de Pologne en 1771-'2" (Paris, 1808).—His brother, Charles Joseph Hyacinthe du Houx, Marquis de, French soldier, b. in the castle of Ruppes, Vosges, 22 Aug., 1734; d. in Paris, 5 March, 1827, entered the military service in 1747, was present at the battle of Lawfeld and at the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom, and in 1757, as aide-de-camp to Gen. Chevert, assisted in the taking of Prague. He commanded a brigade in Corsica in 1768-'9, and was promoted brigadier-general in 1770 and major-general, 4 March, 1780. He came with Rochambeau to this country as commander of the French artillery, took a commendable part in the capture of Yorktown, and was granted a pension of 5,000 francs for his valor in the siege. From February, 1789, till November, 1790, he was governor-general of Martinique, where he vigorously repressed the revolutionary uprisings. He emigrated in 1791, served in the army of Condé in 1792-'7, and went afterward to Russia, where he became general of cavalry and commander-in-chief of the army of Samogitia. In 1801 he went to Portugal at the invitation of King João VI., and was commander-in-chief of the Portuguese army till 1808, when he removed to England. After the restoration of Louis XVIII. he was made a peer of France and lieutenant-general, 4 June, 1814; field-marshal, 3 July, 1816; and a marquis, 31 Aug., 1817. Before this he had been known as the Chevalier de Vioménil.—His cousin, Antoine Louis du Houx, Chevalier de, French soldier, b. in Fauconcourt in 1745; d. in Dijon in 1788, entered the army in 1760, served with distinction in Germany and Poland as colonel, accompanied in 1780 his cousin Antoine to this country as his first aide-de-camp, and was severely wounded at the capture of Yorktown in October, 1781. For his services during the war he was made a knight of St. Louis, and granted a pension and a petty government in Burgundy.

VIROT, Claude Francis (ve-ro), French missionary, b. in France, 16 Feb., 1721; d. near Fort Niagara in July, 1759. He became a Jesuit in 1738, and in 1750 was sent to Canada, where he labored for several years among the Abnaki Indians with great success. He was then sent to Ohio river, where he founded a mission among the Delawares at Sakunk on the mouth of the Big Beaver. The influence that he was gaining over the tribe excited the jealousy of Pakanke, chief of the Wolf tribe, and he was forced to leave. He afterward acted as chaplain to a body of French soldiers, and was killed when he participated in an attempt to relieve Fort Niagara.

VIVANCO, Manuel Ignacio de (ve-vahn'-co), Peruvian soldier, b. in Lima in 1806; d. in Santiago, Chili, in 1873. He was destined by his parents for a literary career, and was a student in the College of San Carlos, of Lima, when San Martin landed with the liberating army. Leaving college, he entered the patriotic ranks, and after 1821 took part in all the campaigns for independence, being present in the battles of Junin and Ayacucho. After the war he continued in the army, and was appointed director of the military college. At different times he was prefect of several of the departments of the republic, including Arequipa, where he was idolized by the people. After the death of Gamarra and the strife between Gen. Torrico and Gen. Vidal, Vivanco proclaimed himself, on 20 April, 1843, supreme director of the nation. But the anarchy and intestine strife continued; Castilla overthrew Vivanco's government in 1845, and the latter was exiled. In 1851 he was proclaimed presidential candidate by a military rising in Arequipa, but his followers were soon defeated. In 1856 he returned secretly from exile, and the whole population of Arequipa rose under his banner against the dictator. Castillo marched against Arequipa, and, although Lizardo Montero, who had mutinied with the frigate "Apurimac" and declared for Vivanco, occupied Islay and in 1857 Arica, thus cutting off the dictator's communications, Vivanco was besieged, and in 1858 defeated at Arequipa and again sought exile. After Castillo's fall in 1862 Vivanco returned to his country, and was appointed by San Roman minister to Chili, whence he was recalled by Gen. Pezet to negotiate with Spain the treaty of 27 Jan., 1865. When the government of Pezet was overthrown in November, 1865, Prado exiled Vivanco again; but he returned in 1868 and was elected senator for the department of Arequipa. The Spanish academy appointed him a corresponding member. In 1873 he went to Chili for the restoration of his health, and died there. He was a brilliant and accomplished statesman, but his turbulent spirit kept him in continuous strife, and by his repeated revolutions he contributed to the demoralization of his country.

VIVIER, Jacques du (veev-yay), French naturalist, b. in Lorient, France, in 1720; d. there in 1793. He studied botany in Paris, held an office in the laboratory of the Academy of sciences, and sailed as secretary of a commission that was sent to South America to measure an arc of the meridian under Charles Marie de la Condamine. When the authorities of Lima induced some of the mathematicians to stay in South America, Vivier remained with Jean Godin, was employed in opening sulphur-mines at Cochabamba, and held for some time the chair of botany and mathematics in the College of Lima. In 1781 he obtained permission to return, and he embarked at Cayenne in 1782. On his arrival at Paris he vainly sought to recover his former place in the laboratory of the Academy of sciences, and for some time lived in poverty, until he obtained a place in the library of the Duke of Penthièvre. His published works include "Nova genera et species plantarum quas in America, Jac. Vivierus collegit" (3 vols., Paris, 1788-'90) and "Sertum Peruanum" (2 vols., 1792); and his manuscripts contain a "Flora chilensis," which has never been published.

VIZCAINO, Sebastian (veeth-cah-ee'-no), Spanish navigator, b. in Huelva about 1550; d. in Acapulco in 1615. He followed the sea early in life, and, acquiring a great reputation, was made chief pilot of New Spain. Toward the close of the 16th century the general impression in Spain was that California contained great riches, especially in pearls, and orders were given in 1595 to the viceroy of Mexico to arm an expedition for the purpose of exploring that country. Vizcaino was chosen commander, and leaving Acapulco in 1596 with three ships, accompanied by missionaries, he entered the Gulf of California, establishing his headquarters in the port of La Paz, where he built barracks and a church. He despatched expeditions to the interior; but the resistance of the natives, lack of provisions, and the burning of the barracks disheartened his men, and in October of that year he returned to Acapulco. In 1602 he was appointed captain-general of a new expedition that was despatched by the Count de Monterey, by order of Philip III., to explore the Pacific coast north of Cape Mendocino, and to establish in the neighborhood a suitable harbor of refuge for vessels from Manila. He sailed from Acapulco, 5 May, 1602, with three vessels, accompanied by the cosmographer Geronimo Martin, and in June discovered in latitude 36° 40' N. a bay, which he named Monterey, in honor of the viceroy. He began to survey the coast, taking observations of every notable point and inlet with such care that Alexander von Humboldt, in his "Essai sur le royaume de la Nouvelle Espagne," said that "no pilot had ever performed his duty with such zeal." After passing Cape Mendocino he arrived at Cape Blanco de San Sebastian (now Cape Orford), and from that point despatched the frigate "Tres Reyes," under Lieut. Martin Aguilar, to the north, who reported on his return that he had reached 46° N., where he discovered the mouth of a large river, probably the Columbia, which foggy weather had prevented him from entering for any distance. Having lost many of his crew by sickness, Vizcaino resolved to return, and entered Acapulco in March, 1603. His report was forwarded to Madrid; but, although he urged upon the council of the Indies the advantage of colonizing the countries that he had discovered, as he had failed to find precious metals, little attention was paid to his advice. In 1610 he commanded an expedition to Manila, and, being carried out of his course, discovered near Japan a group of islands which he called Islas Ricas. At last his representations about colonizing California were heeded, and a new expedition under his command was preparing in Acapulco when he died. From the observations that were taken by Vizcaino and his staff, thirty-two charts were designed in Mexico by the cosmographer Enrique Martinez, which are preserved in the archives of the council of Indies, and are remarkably exact for the time in which they were made. Vizcaino's reports of his two voyages to California were published by Torquemada in his "Monarquía Indiana" (Madrid, 1615), and that of the second voyage appeared as an appendix to the French edition of Miguel Venegas's "Histoire de la Californie" (Paris, 1767). Leon Pinelo, in his "Biblioteca Oriental y Occidental" (Madrid, 1629), gives extracts of a manuscript of Vizcaino's report of his voyage to Manila, dated 1611, under the title of "Relación del viaje y descubrimiento de las Islas Ricas, que están cerca del Japón," which was discovered in the library of Barcia, the author of "Historiadores primitivos de las Indias." Hubert H. Bancroft often quotes from him, in his historical works. The greater part of Vizcaino's narratives has been published by Martin Fernandez de Navarrete in his "Colección de Viajes y Descubrimientos, etc." (Madrid, 1625-'9), and by Capt. James Burney in his "Collection of Voyages to the South Sea" (London, 1811).

VOGDÉS, Israel, soldier, b. in Willistown, Chester co., Pa., 4 Aug., 1816; d. in New York, 7 Dec., 1889. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, and promoted 1 July, 1837. For the next twelve years he was assistant professor and principal assistant professor of mathematics in the academy, being promoted 1st lieutenant in 1838, and captain in 1847. He was stationed in Florida from 1849 till 1856, and took part there in the hostilities against the Seminole Indians. After being in command at Fort Moultrie, S. C., and connected with the artillery-school for practice at Fortress Monroe, Va., in 1858-'61, he was ordered to re-enforce Fort Pickens, Fla., but he was virtually interdicted from carrying out his orders by instructions received from Washington subsequent to his arrival, and it was not until after the inauguration of President Lincoln that he was finally allowed to proceed with the work. He was promoted major, 14

May, 1861. On 9 Oct. he was engaged in repelling the Confederate attack on Santa Rosa island, Fla., during which he was captured. After his release in August, 1862, he served on the staff of Gen. John F. Reynolds in the Maryland campaign of that year. He was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers in the following November, and was in command of Folly island, S. C., from April till July, 1863, when he took part in the construction of the batteries on Lighthouse inlet for the proposed attack on Morris island. He took part in that engagement, and also in the one on Folly island. From August, 1863, till July, 1864, he was occupied in the operations against Fort Sumter and the city of Charleston. On 1 June, 1864, he was made lieutenant-colonel, and on 1 Aug. he became colonel. After seeing further service in Florida, he had charge of the defences of Norfolk and Portsmouth, Va., from May, 1864, till April, 1865, in which month he was brevetted brigadier-general in the regular army for gallant and meritorious services in the field during the civil war. On 15 Jan., 1866, he was mustered out of the volunteer service, and from that date until 2 Jan., 1881, when he was retired at his own request, after forty-three years of active service, he was in command of the 1st regiment of artillery.

VOGDÉS, William, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 29 Dec., 1802; d. there, 29 Jan., 1886. He began life as a teacher, but, after studying law in Philadelphia, was admitted to the bar in 1832, and in 1836 was auditor of Philadelphia county. In 1838 he was appointed professor of mathematics in the Central high-school, Philadelphia, where he remained till he resumed his law-practice in 1861. In his later years he became widely known by his decisions of legal points in insanity cases. He published "United States Arithmetic" (Philadelphia, 1845), and "Elementary Treatise on Mensuration and Practical Arithmetic" (1847).

VOGUÉ, Jean Pierre de, Flemish adventurer, b. in Malines in 1570; d. in Brazil in 1630. He was a captain in the Spanish army when, hearing the fabulous description of the country of the Esmeraldas, he went to Espiritu Santo, in Brazil, and succeeded to the command of the colony that had been founded there. The establishment soon dissolved, as the adventurers were only anxious for riches; and Vogué, having announced that he knew the location of the Mountain of Wealth, was soon at the head of a host, and led an expedition to the interior of the Mamalucos country, wandering for several years through central and south Brazil, and suffering many misfortunes. His confidence in ultimate success was never shaken, but he was abandoned by his followers, and fell at last into the hands of the Charcas Indians. It is supposed that he died during his captivity, although the "Colleção de alguns manuscritos curiosos" credits to him the work "Jornada por el descubrimiento de las Serras Esmeraldas" (Seville, 1690).

VOISIN, Charles Antoine (vwah-zang), Spanish missionary, b. in Charlevoix, Belgium, in 1698; d. in Panama in 1764. He early became a Jesuit, and was attached to the South American missions, laboring in Venezuela, Central America, Peru, and Chili. In 1749 he was rector of the College of Quito, and later he was superior of the Convent of Panama. His works include "Antigüedades del Perú" (Anvers, 1762); "Información á la Real Audiencia de Quito sobre el descubrimiento de muchos y grandes rios, é infinitas naciones bárbaras que los habitan" (2 vols., 1764); and "Propagación del Evangelio en la América meridional" (1766).

VOISIN, Pierre Joseph, French naturalist, b. in Toulouse, Languedoc, in 1759; d. in Cayenne, Guiana, in 1821. He early entered the colonial service, and was assistant treasurer of Guiana in 1792, when he was ordered to France to answer for his administration before the convention, but he went instead to Dutch Guiana, and began farming on Essequibo river. Later he removed to Paramaribo, and was commissioned to survey the south-eastern counties of the colony, where he experienced difficulties of all kinds, being once detained as hostage by maroon negroes. After the surrender of French Guiana to the Portuguese he returned to Cayenne in 1812, and was employed in the central administration till he was pensioned in 1818. His works include "Statistique des parties basses de la Guiane Hollandaise, suivie d'un relevé du cours du fleuve Essequibo" (2 vols., Demerara, 1806); "Petite histoire naturelle pittoresque de la Guiane Française" (1808); "Traité des légumineuses de la Guiane Hollandaise" (1810); and "Monographie de la Goyave" (Cayenne, 1814).

VOITURE, Nicolas Auguste (vwah-tewr), South American explorer, b. in Santiago, Chili, about 1764; d. in Lima, Peru, in 1821. He was the son of a French merchant of Santiago, received his early education in Chili, and finished his studies in Paris, where he was a journalist during the revolution, but in 1794, after the fall of the Girondists, returned to South America. Inheriting an independent fortune by the death of his father, he began to travel, and at the suggestion of a German hunter, who had travelled through Patagonia and could speak some of the Indian dialects, resolved to visit that country. He left Montevideo in December, 1801, but, after frequent landings on the desolate coast of Patagonia, abandoned his idea of visiting the interior. He made valuable nautical observations on the coast and at the entrance to the Strait of Magellan, visited Tierra del Fuego, doubled Cape Horn, and anchored at Valparaiso in October, 1803. Soon afterward he removed to Lima, and devoted his later years to literature and science. He published "Ensayo sobre el arte de navegar" (Lima, 1809); "Journal d'un voyage aux côtes de Patagonie, dans le détroit de Magellan, à la Terre de Feu, et à la côte de Chili" (3 vols., Paris, 1812); "Ensayo sobre la Patagonia" (Lima, 1814); and "Histoire littéraire de l'Amérique du Sud" (2 vols., Paris, 1818).

VOLK, Leonard Wells, sculptor, b. in Wellstown (now Wells), Hamilton co., N. Y., 7 Nov., 1828. At the age of sixteen he began the trade of marble-cutting in his father's shop at Pittsfield, Mass. In 1848 he went to St. Louis, Mo., and in the following year he undertook modelling in clay and drawing without instructors. He was subsequently engaged in business. In 1855 Stephen A. Douglas, who was his wife's cousin, aided him to go to Italy for study. Volk remained there until 1857, when he settled in Chicago. His first sitter for a portrait-bust—the first that was ever modelled in that city—was his patron, and he subsequently, in 1858, made a life-size statue of Mr. Douglas in marble. In 1860 he executed a portrait-bust of Abraham Lincoln, the original marble of which was burnt in the Historical society building during the great fire of 1871. He revisited Italy for study in 1868-'9 and 1871-'2. He was elected an academician of the Chicago academy in 1867, and was for eight years its president. His principal works are the Douglas monument in Chicago, several soldiers' monuments, the statuary for the Henry Keep mausoleum at Watertown, N. Y., life-size statues of Lincoln and Douglas in the state-house, Springfield, Ill. (1876), and portrait-busts of Henry Clay, Zachariah Chandler, Dr. Daniel Brainard, Bishop Charles H. Fowler, David Davis, Thomas B. Bryan, Leonard Swett, Elihu B. Washburne, and many others.—His son, Stephen Arnold Douglas (known as DOUGLAS), artist, b. in Pittsfield Mass., 23 Feb., 1856, studied in Italy during 1871-'3, and was the pupil of Jean L. Gérôme, in Paris, in 1873-'5 and again in 1876-'8. In 1875 he exhibited at the salon "In Brittany," and his "Vanity" was at the Philadelphia centennial exhibition of 1876. His other important works are "In the Studio" (1880); "The Puritan Maiden" (1881); "The Puritan Captives" (1882); "Accused of Witchcraft" (1884); and "The Bride" (1886). In 1880 he was elected a member of the Society of American artists, and he is organizing the Minneapolis school of fine arts, of which he is director.

VOLLMERING, Joseph, artist, b. in Anholt, Westphalia, 27 Aug., 1810; d. in New York city, 24 Sept., 1887. He was a pupil of the academy in Amsterdam in 1826-'30, after which he travelled for several years in Germany. During 1835-'44 he studied with Barend Cornelis Koekkoek, and in 1847 he removed to the United States. He opened a studio in New York and was elected an associate member of the National academy in 1853. Among his works are "Indian Falls, near Cold Spring, N. Y." (1848); "View on the Hudson"; "Holy Shrine at Sunset" (1852); "Study of Trees" (1865); "Sunset Landscape and Adirondack Mountains" (1869); "The Hudson from Garrison's"; and "New York from Weehawken Heights" (1872).

VOLNEY, Constantin François Chassebœuf Boisgirais, Count de, French author, b. in Craon, Maine-et-Loire, 3 Feb., 1757; d. in Paris, 25 April, 1820. He was the son of François Chassebœuf, a barrister of Craon, and was known until the age of twenty-five by the name of Boisgirais, but in 1782 he adopted that of Volney. After receiving his education at the colleges of Ancenis and Angers he was given his inheritance at the age of seventeen. He then went to Paris, where he studied medicine, philosophy, and chronology, and became a frequenter of the philosophical salons of Baron Holbach and Madame Helvétius, where he made the acquaintance of Voltaire, Diderot, D'Alembert, and Benjamin Franklin, with whom he maintained a long correspondence. After travelling in the East and writing accounts of his journeys, he founded in 1788, at Rennes, the journal "La Sentinelle," was elected to the states-general in 1789, and in 1792 accompanied Pozzo-di-Borgo to Corsica. Being driven away by the revolution, he returned to France and published "La loi naturelle" (Paris, 1793), in which he advocated those theories by which he is now best known. During the reign of terror he was imprisoned for ten months, and on his release in 1794 he became professor of history in the Normal college at Paris. That same year he dissuaded Bonaparte from entering the Russian service, and obtained his reinstatement in the French army. In 1795 he came to the United States with the intention of settling in this country, and was welcomed by George Washington. He visited Pennsylvania, Virginia, Kentucky, and Louisiana, engaged in a controversy with John Adams concerning the latter's work on the constitution of the United States, and afterward answered Dr. Joseph Priestley, who had attacked Volney's infidel theories. Volney's letter was published in English (Philadelphia, 1797). While in this country Volney predicted, day after day, the operations of Bonaparte's campaign in Italy, pointing out the places where the Austrians were to be defeated. This astonished every one, while many looked on Volney as a French general in disguise. Washington asked Volney for an explanation, and he replied: "In 1792 I met at Marseilles and in Corsica a young lieutenant of artillery, and, being much struck by his conversation, invited him to my house. I was soon satisfied that he was a man of extraordinary genius. . . . The conversation fell on the war. Bonaparte developed a whole plan of operations to be pursued either in Italy or in Germany. I took down his words, and he now follows the plan of campaign that he explained to me years before." Volney showed his notes to Washington, who became also convinced of the great future of the new commander. He returned to Paris early in 1799, refused, after the coup d'état, to be consul with Bonaparte or secretary of the interior, and was created senator. He was made commander of the Legion of honor in 1804, count of the empire in 1808, and a peer of France by Louis XVIII. in 1814. Volney, who was a member of the French institute after 1800 and of the Académie Française after 1803, founded the Volney prize of $240 to be awarded every year by the academy to the author of the best work on the foundation of the study of language. He had intended to write his impressions of the United States and a work on democratic institutions as they are understood here, but he was dissuaded on political and private considerations, among them being his friendship for Franklin and his respect for Washington, whom he did not care to criticize, but he wrote "Tableau du climat et du sol des États-Unis d'Amérique" (2 vols., Paris, 1803; English translation by Charles Brockden Brown, Philadelphia, 1804). His other works include "Sur la chronologie d'Hérodote" (Paris, 1781); "Voyage en Egypte et en Syrie" (Paris, 1787; revised ed., 1822); "Considérations sur la guerre des Turcs et des Russes" (London, 1788); "Chronologie des douze siècles antérieurs au passage de Xerxes en Grèce" (Paris, 1790); "Les ruines, méditations sur les révolutions des empires" (Geneva, 1791), a philosophical work that gave Volney a great reputation; "Précis de l'état actuel de la Corse" (1793); "Leçons d'histoire ancienne" (1799); "Recherches nouvelles sur l'histoire ancienne" (3 vols., 1814); "L'alphabet Européen appliqué aux langues Asiatiques" (1819); "Histoire de Samuel, inventeur du sacre des rois" (1819); and "Discours sur l'étude philosophique des langues" (1820). Adolphe Bosange edited "Œuvres complètes de Volney," with a biography (8 vols., Paris, 1820-'6).

VON SCHRADER, Alexander, soldier, b. in Germany about 1821; d. in New Orleans, La., 6 Aug., 1867. He was graduated at the military academy in Berlin, and became 2d lieutenant in the army of the duke of Brunswick, in which his father was a lieutenant-general. After twenty years' service in Europe he came to this country

sica. Being driven away by the revolution, he returned to France and published "La loi naturelle" (Paris, 1793), in which he advocated those theories by which he is now best known. During the reign of terror he was imprisoned for ten months, and on his release in 1794 he became professor of history in the Normal college at Paris. That same at the opening of the civil war, and was made lieutenant-colonel of the 74th Ohio regiment. He was soon afterward made assistant inspector-general on the staff of Gen. George H. Thomas, and served with credit at Chickamauga, Stone river, Chattanooga, the Atlanta campaign, and Nashville. On 13 March, 1865, he was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers. In 1867 he was commissioned major of the 23d regular infantry and assigned to duty as acting assistant inspector-general of the district of Louisiana.

VOORHEES, Daniel Wolsey, senator, b. in Butler county, Ohio, 26 Sept., 1827. He was taken to Indiana in infancy by his parents, was graduated at Indiana Asbury (now De Pauw) university in 1849, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1851, and began to practise in Covington, Ind., in the same year. He was an unsuccessful Democratic candidate for congress in 1856, and in 1858 was appointed U. S. district attorney for Indiana, which office he held until 1861. In 1859 he went to Virginia, at the request of Gov. Ashbel P. Willard, of Indiana, to defend John E. Cook, the governor's brother-in-law, who had been put on trial for participation in John Brown's raid. He was then chosen to congress and served from 1861 till 23 Feb., 1866, when his seat was contested successfully by Henry D. Washburn, but he sat in that body again in 1869-'73. During his service in the house he was a member of the committees on elections, appropriations, the judiciary, the revision of laws, and the Pacific railroad. On the death of Oliver P. Morton, Mr. Voorhees was appointed to fill his seat in the U. S. senate, serving from 12 Nov., 1877, and he was elected for a full term in 1879, and re-elected in 1885. In early life Mr. Voorhees obtained the name of "The Tall Sycamore of the Wabash," by which he is still frequently called. He has made a reputation as an orator.

D. W. Voorhees

VOORHEES, Philip Falkerson, naval officer, b. in New Brunswick, N. J., in 1792; d. in Annapolis, Md., 26 Feb., 1862. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 15 Nov., 1809, and was engaged in the second war with Great Britain, taking part in the capture of the "Macedonian" by the "United States," and of the "Epervier" by the "Peacock," for which he received a medal from congress. He was promoted to commander, 24 April, 1828, and to captain, 28 Feb., 1838, and in 1842-'5 was assigned the frigate "Congress" on her first cruise, during which he assisted in rescuing the stranded British steamer "Gorgon" in La Plata river. In 1844 Capt. Voorhees captured an armed Argentine squadron and an allied cruiser which had fired into his convoy, a Boston bark, where some fishermen, chased by the cruiser, had taken refuge. Capt. Voorhees released this squadron after an apology had been made, but detained the cruiser, which had aggravated the assault by firing under a false flag. Com. Daniel Turner afterward released the cruiser, but justified Capt. Voorhees's action in a letter to the Argentine commander, and Voorhees was also highly praised by U. S. diplomatic and consular representatives and foreign naval officers in South America. Yet this capture was made the occasion for a series of charges on which he was tried by courts-martial in 1845. The sentences of these courts were not approved, and after a few months' suspension President Polk, in 1847, restored Capt. Voorhees to his full rank in the navy, and gave him command of the East India squadron—the post of an admiral at the present day, that grade not having been established at that time, "in manifestation of his complete rehabilitation in honor as well as in rank in the judgment of the government" as declared in the official opinion of Attorney-General Caleb Cushing, which also declared the proceedings of the courts-martial "null and void." He returned in 1851 in his flag-ship, the "Plymouth," and in 1855 was placed on the reserved list. He regarded this as an injustice, and appealed to congress for reinstatement, but a court of inquiry reaffirmed the decision of the board. On a second appeal President Buchanan referred the whole matter to Attorney-General Jeremiah S. Black, who, in an opinion dated 15 Oct., 1858, said: "The history, even of the American navy, hardly contains another instance where one man has been the victim of so many blunders." President Buchanan, with the consent of the senate, therefore restored him to the leave pay-list, and at the opening of the civil war Capt. Voorhees urged his assignment to active duty, but he died a few months afterward.

VOORHIES, John Stevens, publisher, b. in New York city, 9 May, 1809; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 19 Nov., 1865. He was a clerk for Oliver Halsted, who had established a law-book store in New York city in 1820, became his partner, and finally succeeded him in 1842, becoming well known as a publisher of legal works. He was specially kind to young lawyers in furnishing books on liberal terms, and great reliance was placed on his judgment and knowledge in the selection of law libraries. After his death his business was continued by the firm of Baker, Voorhies, and Co. He projected and published "Sedgwick on Damages" (New York, 1848); "Voorhies's Code of Civil Procedure" (New York, 1851); "Burrill's Voluntary Assignments" (1853); "Greenleaf's Overruled Cases" (1856); "Burrill's Circumstantial Evidence" (1856); "Abbott's Digest" (5 vols., 1860); "Cleveland's Banking Laws" (1860); and many other works.

VOSE, George Leonard, civil engineer, b. in Augusta, Me., 19 April, 1831. He was educated in Augusta and in Salem, Mass. During 1849-'50 he studied at the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard, then began his career as assistant engineer on the Kennebec and Portland railroad, and until 1859 was engaged on various railroads. From 1859 till 1863 he was associate editor of "The American Railway Times" in Boston, and then for three years he resided in Salem, Mass. In 1866 he removed to Paris, Me., and was occupied with projects in Maine and New Hampshire. He was professor of civil engineering in Bowdoin college from 1872 till 1881, and held a similar chair in the Massachusetts institute of technology from 1881 till 1886. His larger works include "Handbook of Railroad Construction" (Boston, 1857); "Orographic Geology, or the Origin and Structure of Mountains" (1866); "Manual for Railroad Engineers and Engineering Students" (1873); "A Graphic Method for solving Algebraic Problems" (New York, 1875); "Elementary Course of Geometric Drawing" (Boston, 1878); "Memoir of George W. Whistler" (1887); and "Bridge Disasters in America: the Cause and the Remedy" (1887).

VOSE, Joseph, soldier, b. in Milton, Mass., 26 Nov., 1738; d. there, 22 May, 1816. He was chosen colonel of militia in 1774, in 1776 went to Canada, and in 1777, as colonel of the 1st Massachusetts regiment, joined the main army in New Jersey, serving at Monmouth and in Gen. John Sullivan's campaign in Rhode Island. He closed his services in Lafayette's corps at Yorktown, when he was brevetted brigadier-general. His brothers, Elijah, Moses, and William, also served through the Revolutionary war.—His son, Col. JOSIAH HOWE, rendered important service in the war of 1812 at Portsmouth, at Sackett's Harbor, and in Canada.

VOSTEY, or VÔTEY, Gabriel Henry (vo-tay), Count de, Haytian historian, b. in Cape François about 1768; d. there in 1831. He was a mulatto, son of a French officer, and was first known under the name of Gabriel Henry. After receiving his education in France, he returned to Hayti and became lieutenant in the colonial militia, but subsequently he joined the national army and fought under Jean François and Toussaint l'Ouverture. The latter gave him his father's estates in 1800, after which he took the name of Count de Vostey. In 1802 he was among the first to submit to Gen. Victor Leclerc, but afterward he joined Dessalines with a regiment that he raised among his laborers, and assisted in the campaign that terminated in November, 1804. Afterward quarrelling with Dessalines, he took refuge in the Spanish part of the island till the elevation of Henry Christophe, when he returned to Hayti and became a courtier and the historian of the negro king. He published "Essai sur l'invasion Française de 1802" (2 vols., Cape François, 1811); "Le système colonial dévoilé" (1814); "Réflexions politiques sur l'état présent des noirs et des blancs" (1817); "Essai sur les causes des révolutions de Hayti" (2 vols., 1819); and "Mémoires pour servir à l'administration de Toussaint l'Ouverture" (2 vols., 1824).

VOTÁN, founder of the empire of Xibalbay. He lived, according to Ramon de Ordoñez y Aguiar, in his manuscript "Historia del cielo y de la tierra," about 955 B. C., or, according to Francisco Nuñez de la Vega, in his "Constituciones Diocesanas para el Obispado de Chiapas" (Rome, 1702), about 600 B. C. Votan appears to have been a generic name for sovereigns of the valley of Chiapas. According to Ordoñez, Votan sailed from Cuba with his people, and, after coasting Yucatan, entered the Laguna de Terminos, went up Usumasinta river, and on one of its branches, the Chacamas, founded the city of Nachan or Culhuacan, near the present site of the ruins of Palenque. He conquered the country with little difficulty, and became its legislator, building at Nachan a temple, where he deposited the archives of the nation, which were guarded by priests and nuns, and established also religious mysteries, which were celebrated with great pomp and splendor in the spring and autumn. Votan founded also the cities of Zacatlan or Ciudad Real, Matlan or Quiche, and Huehuetlan or Soconusco. It is also asserted that he promulgated a code of laws for his empire, which attained great prosperity, but it is generally conceded that the legislator of Xibalbay was BALUM-VOTÁN, who lived about four centuries after the founder of the empire. He is said to have written the national code of the Quiches, "Popol-Vuh," the original of the "Teomaxtli," or divine book of the Toltecs. The "Popol-Vuh" was first translated into Spanish about 1650 by Friar Francisco Ximenes (q. v.), and Brasseur de Bourbourg published the original text and French translations (Paris, 1861). The traditions of the Tzendales in regard to the Votans are confirmed by Francisco de Burgoa, in his "Palestra Historica: ó Historia de la provincia de San Hipólito de Guaxaca" (Mexico, 1670); by Bernardino de Sahagun, in his "Historia de las cosas de la Nueva España"; by an anonymous Mexican author of Cuahutitlan, a contemporary of Montezuma II., in "Historia de los reynos de Culhuacan y México," a manuscript in the Nahuatl language, which was discovered in 1850 by Brasseur de Bourbourg in the library of the convent of San Gregorio; and by many other authors. Ordoñez asserts that he possessed a manuscript history of the reign of Balum-Votan in the original language; but it is now lost.

VREDENBURGH, Peter, jurist, b. in Readington, N. J., 31 Oct., 1805; d. in St. Augustine, Fla., 24 March, 1873. He was graduated at Rutgers in 1828, admitted to the bar as counsellor in 1832, and began practice in Freehold, N. J. Subsequently he was a member of the legislative council under the old state constitution. In 1837-'52 he was prosecuting attorney of Monmouth county, and in 1855-'69 he was associate justice of the supreme court of New Jersey. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him in 1866 by Rutgers, of which he was a trustee for twenty-four years. Judge Vredenburgh's opinions are contained in the New Jersey reports between 1855 and 1870. One of the most notable was delivered in the case of Proprietors of Bridges vs. the Hoboken land company.

VROOM, Peter Dumont, governor of New Jersey, b. in Hillsborough township, N. J., 12 Dec., 1791; d. in Trenton, N. J., 18 Nov., 1873. He was the son of Col. Peter D. Vroom, a Revolutionary officer. He was graduated at Columbia in 1808, admitted to the bar in 1813, and practised in various counties of New Jersey. He was a member of the legislature in 1826-'9, and in the latter year was elected governor of New Jersey as a Jackson Democrat by joint ballot of the two houses, which was the method of election at that time. He was re-elected in 1830-'1 and 1833-'6, and in 1837 was appointed by President Van Buren a commissioner to adjust the claims of the Indians in Mississippi, was a member of congress in 1839-'41, having been chosen as a Democrat, and a member of the State constitutional convention in 1844. In 1852 he was a presidential elector, and in 1853-'7 was minister to Prussia. He was appointed reporter of the supreme court of New Jersey in 1865, and in 1868 was again a presidential elector. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Columbia in 1837 and by Princeton in 1850. He published "Reports of the Supreme Court of New Jersey" (6 vols., Trenton, 1866-'73).—His son, Peter Dumont, soldier, b. in Trenton, N. J., 18 April, 1842, was graduated at Rensselaer polytechnic institute, Troy, N. Y., in 1862. He served in the civil war, being wounded at South Mountain, was promoted major of the 2d New Jersey cavalry in 1863, and brevetted lieutenant-colonel and colonel of volunteers for meritorious services during the war. He became 1st lieutenant in the 3d U. S. cavalry in July, 1866.—Another son, Garret Dorset Wall, lawyer, b. in Trenton, N. J., 17 Dec., 1843, was graduated at Rutgers in 1862, admitted to the bar in 1865, appointed district attorney in 1870, and reporter of the supreme court of New Jersey in 1873. He was elected mayor of Trenton in 1881, and re-elected for the two succeeding terms. Mr. Vroom possesses one of the finest libraries in New Jersey, and is an authority on questions of national and state political history. He has published "Supreme Court Reports" (15 vols., Trenton, N. J., 1873-88).

W

WACKERHAGEN, Augustus, clergyman, b. in the electorate of Hanover, Germany, 22 May, 1774; d. in Clermont, N. Y., 1 Nov., 1865. He was educated at the University of Göttingen, Germany, and, after the completion of his theological course; was for some time employed as an instructor in a seminary for young ladies, and later as private tutor in a nobleman's family. In 1801 he came to this country, where for three years he was private tutor to the only son of a merchant of Philadelphia. He was pastor of Lutheran congregations at Schoharie and Cobleskill, N. Y., in 1805-'15, and at Germantown and Livingston Manor, Columbia county, N. Y., from 1816 till his death. During this time he also preached at Ghent, Athens, West Camp, Pine Plains, Green Bush, Ancram and other distant places, doing pioneer work from which resulted the establishment of numerous flourishing congregations in the state of New York. In addition to his pastoral duties, he also had charge for several years of the academy at Clermont, N. Y., where he resided, midway between his two principal congregations. He was a finished classical scholar and a diligent and critical student of the Bible. In 1825 he received the degree of D. D. from Union college. Dr. Wackerhagen was for many years the recognized leader of the Lutheran church in New York, and occupied many posts of honor and trust, being president of the New York ministerium for twelve years and trustee of Hartwick seminary for thirty years. Though he was one of the most learned men of his time, his retiring modesty prevented him from publishing the results of his studies. Except an occasional sermon, he issued only one work, "Inbegriff des Glaubens und Sittenlehre" (Philadelphia, 1804).

WADDEL, James, preacher, b. in Newry, Ireland, in July, 1739; d. in Louisa county, Va., 17 Sept., 1805. His parents emigrated to this country in the son's infancy, settling in southwestern Pennsylvania. James was educated at Nottingham, under Rev. Samuel Finley, became an assistant teacher in Rev. Robert Smith's academy in Pequea, Lancaster co., afterward emigrated to Virginia, and, under the influence of Samuel Davies, decided to study for the ministry. He was licensed to preach in 1761, the next year became pastor of Presbyterian churches in the northern neck of Virginia, removed to the Tinkling Spring church, Augusta county, in 1775, also preached in Staunton, and in 1785 settled on an estate in Louisa county, where he supplied vacant pulpits and was principal of a classical school. He became blind about 1787, but continued his labors without interruption, writing as well as preaching with great industry, and was known as "the blind preacher." Before his death he ordered that all his manuscripts be burned, so that his eloquence has become a matter of tradition. The best idea of him as a pulpit orator is to be gathered from the sketch of Dr. Waddel as the blind preacher in William Wirt's "British Spy." This was written in 1803, when Dr. Waddel was old and infirm. It has been questioned how far the author gave himself the license of fiction in his description, but Dr. Waddel's biographer, Dr. James W. Alexander, says: "Mr. Wirt stated to me that, so far from adding colors to the picture of Dr. Waddel's eloquence, he had fallen below the truth. In person he was tall and erect, his mien was unusually dignified, and his manners graceful and eloquent. Under his preaching, audiences were irresistibly and simultaneously moved, like the wind-shaken forest." James Madison, who had been his pupil, said: "He has spoiled me for all other preaching," and Patrick Henry classed him with Samuel Davies as one of the two greatest orators he had ever heard. Dickinson gave him the degree of D. D. in 1792. One of his daughters married the Rev. Archibald Alexander. See a "Memoir" of him by the Rev. James W. Alexander, in the "Watchman of the South" (1846).

WADDELL, Hugh, soldier, b. in Lisburn, County Down, Ireland, in 1734; d. in Castle Haynes, New Hanover co., N. C., 9 April, 1773. He emigrated to North Carolina in 1753, was clerk of the council in 1754-'5, lieutenant in Col. James Innes's regiment in the Virginia campaign of 1754, became captain in 1755, built Fort Dobbs, and commanded there in 1756-'7. He led the North Carolina detachment with the rank of major in the expedition to Fort Du Quesne in 1758, and became colonel the next year. In November, 1765, he led the armed resistance to the landing at Brunswick of the English sloop-of-war "Diligence," which contained the government stamps, seized the ship's boat, and forced Gov. Tryon to deliver to the people William Houston, the stamp-master, from whom they exacted a pledge, which he signed in the market-place, that he would "never receive any stamped paper which might arrive from England, nor officiate in any way in the distribution of stamps in the province of North Carolina." This act of patriotism was of not less importance in the history of pre-Revolutionary movements in North Carolina than the Boston tea-party in Massachusetts. In 1771 he commanded the expedition against the Regulators with the rank of major-general. During the intervals of his military career he frequently served in the legislature.—His grandson, Hugh, lawyer, b. in Newfields, Bladen co., N. C., in 1799; d. in Wilmington, N. C., 1 Nov., 1878, was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1818, and studied medicine, but abandoned it for law, attaining high rank in that profession. He represented Orange county in the legislature in 1828, was speaker of the state senate in 1836-'7, and again a member of that body in 1844-'6. He was an eloquent debater and an accomplished man of letters.—His son, Alfred Moore, lawyer, b. in Hillsborough, N. C., 16 Sept., 1834, was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1853, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He became clerk of the court of equity of New Hanover county, N. C., edited the "Wilmington Herald" in 1860, and the same year was a delegate to the Conservative-Union convention which nominated John Bell for president. During the civil war he served in the Confederate army as lieutenant-colonel of cavalry. He was chosen to congress as a Democrat in 1870, served by reelection till 1879, and was chairman of the committee on post-offices and post-roads in the 44th congress. He was defeated in the next election, and resumed the practice of law. He has in manuscript "A Colonial Officer and his Times."—The second Hugh's nephew, James Iredell, naval officer, b. in Pittsboro', Chatham co., N. C., in 1824; d. in Annapolis, Md., 15 March, 1886, on 10 Sept., 1841, was appointed a midshipman in the U. S.

navy, and in May, 1842, he received a wound in a duel which incapacitated him from service for eleven months and lamed him for life. He did good service in the war with Mexico, was graduated at the naval academy at Annapolis in 1847, and while on a cruise on the Brazilian station in September, 1855, was promoted from passed midshipman to 2d lieutenant and navigator of the "Germantown." He was detached and served on the store-ship "Release" at Aspinwall during the building of the Panama railroad, where he contracted the yellow fever. The ship went to sea and day by day the officers and crew were stricken down by the disease, until Lieut. Waddell was the only officer left to command her with a few convalescent seamen. The vessel finally reached Boston. He afterward was on duty at the naval academy, as assistant professor of navigation, until 11 July, 1859. In the spring of 1860 he sailed in the "Saginaw" for the China station, where he led a successful expedition. On 20 Nov., 1861, he forwarded his resignation to the secretary of the navy, but on 11 Jan., 1862, when he arrived in New York, he was offered a command in the U. S. bomb-fleet, then being fitted out for an attack on New Orleans, which he declined. In February, 1862, he ran the blockade from Annapolis to Richmond, where he entered the Confederate navy, his commission as lieutenant being dated 27 March, 1862. He was assigned to duty on board the ram "Louisiana" at New Orleans, and when the Confederate fleet at that port was dispersed by Farragut, Lieut. Waddell was sent back to destroy the "Louisiana," which he did by blowing her up. He then served at Drewry's Bluff, on James river, as ordnance officer, and afterward at Charleston, S. C., and subsequently was ordered to England to take command of one of the cruisers that was fitting out at Liverpool. He arrived there in May, 1863, and on 5 Oct., 1864, was ordered to the command of the "Shenandoah" for a cruise in the Pacific ocean. She was originally a British merchant steamer. The "Shenandoah" was commissioned off Madeira, 19 Oct., 1864, and steered for Australia. Before arriving at Melbourne, 25 Jan., 1865, Commander Waddell made nine captures. The "Shenandoah" left that port, 8 Feb., 1865, and in three months began her destructive work among the whalers in the Okhotsk sea, Bering sea, and the Arctic ocean. Long after the fall of the Confederate government he captured and sank or burned vessels until 2 Aug., 1865, more than three months after the surrender of Gen. Lee, when he met with the British bark "Barracouta," from whose captain he heard of the close of the war. After this he stowed away his guns in the hold and at once sailed for Liverpool, where he surrendered the ship to the British government. He and his crew were liberated, and on 10 Nov., 1865, the "Shenandoah" was delivered to the U. S. consul at Liverpool. The sultan of Zanzibar afterward bought her, and several years later she went down in a gale with all on board. The "Shenandoah," while under Commander Waddell, captured thirty-eight vessels, of which she released six on bond and destroyed thirty-two. She was the only vessel that carried the flag of the Confederacy around the world. After the release of Waddell he remained in Liverpool, and then went to Paris to reside. He afterward returned to the United States, and in 1875 was made commander of the "San Francisco," of the Pacific mail line between Yokohama and San Francisco. On 16 May, 1877, his steamer struck on a rock and sank. All the passengers were saved, and the captain was the last to leave the ship.

WADDELL, Moses, clergyman, b. in Rowan county, N. C., 29 July, 1770; d. in Athens, Ga., 21 July, 1840. His father, William, emigrated from the vicinity of Belfast, Ireland, about 1764, settling in Charleston, S. C., and subsequently in North Carolina. Moses taught to obtain means to enter college, was graduated at Hampden Sidney in 1791, and ordained to the ministry of the Presbyterian church, and subsequently taught in South Carolina. He established a classical school in Willington, S. C., in 1804, where among his pupils were Hugh S. Legaré, John C. Calhoun, and James L. Petigru. In 1819-'29 he was president of the University of Georgia. The College of South Carolina gave him the degree of D. D. in 1807. As an instructor of youth, Dr. Waddell was one of the most popular and successful men of his day. Alexander H. Stephens says of him: "In his insight into the character of boys, the constitution of their minds, their capacities and aptitudes, and in drawing out and developing their faculties by proper training, discipline, and government, he had few, if any, superiors in the United States." He published "Memoirs of Miss Catherine Elizabeth Smelt" (Augusta, Ga., 1819).—His first wife, CATHERINE, was a sister of John C. Calhoun, and his second wife was Elizabeth W. Pleasants, of Virginia.—Their son, James Pleasants, educator, b. in Willington, S. C., 5 Jan., 1801; d. in Athens, Ga., 28 May, 1867, was graduated at the University of Georgia in 1822, became principal of Richmond academy, taught belles-lettres and oratory in the University of Georgia in 1836-'40, and at the same time filled the chairs of Latin and Greek, which he held till 1856.—Another son, John Newton, educator, b. in Willington, S. C., 2 April, 1812, was graduated at the University of Georgia in 1829, entered the ministry of the Presbyterian church in 1841, was professor of Latin and Greek in the University of Mississippi in 1848-'57, and from the latter date till 1860 occupied a similar chair in La Grange college, Tenn. He was then president of that institution till 1862, when, the town being occupied by the National army, the college was disbanded, and he became general superintendent of Presbyterian missions in the Western Confederate army, and was chiefly instrumental in founding the asylum for the orphans of Confederate soldiers in Tuskegee, Ala. In 1865-'74 he was chancellor of the University of Mississippi, and in 1879-'88 he occupied the same post in the Southwestern Presbyterian university, Clarksville, Tenn. The University of Nashville gave him the degree of D. D. in 1851, and the University of Georgia that of LL. D. in 1873. Since 1874 he has been secretary of the board of ministerial education of the Southern Presbyterian church.

WADE, Benjamin Franklin, senator, b. in Feeding Hills, near Springfield, Mass., 27 Oct., 1800; d. in Jefferson, Ohio, 2 March, 1878. His ancestor, Jonathan, came from Norfolk, England, to Massachusetts in 1632. His father, James, a soldier of the Revolution, removed to Andover, Ohio, in 1821. The son's education was received chiefly from his mother. He shared in the pioneer work of his new home, and in 1823, after aiding in driving a herd of cattle to Philadelphia, went to Albany, N. Y., where he spent two years in teaching, also beginning the study of medicine with his brother, and at one time working as a common laborer on the Erie canal to obtain funds. On his return to Ohio he began the study of law, was admitted to the bar in 1827, and began practice in Jefferson. He formed a partnership with Joshua R. Giddings in 1831, and in 1835 was elected prosecuting attorney of Ashtabula county, which office he held till 1837. In that year he was chosen as a Whig to the state senate, where, as a member of the judiciary committee, he presented a report that put an end to the granting of divorces by the legislature. In 1839 he was active in opposition to the passage of a more stringent fugitive-slave law, which commissioners from Kentucky were urging on the legislature. The law passed, but his forcible speech against it did much to arouse state pride on the subject and to make it a dead letter. His action cost him his re-election to the senate, but he was chosen again in 1841. In February, 1847, he was elected by the legislature president-judge of the 3d judicial district, and while on the bench he was chosen, on 15 March, 1851, to the U. S. senate, where he remained till 1869. He soon became known as a leader of the small anti-slavery minority, advocated the homestead bill and the repeal of the fugitive-slave law, and opposed the Kansas-Nebraska bill of 1854, the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution of 1858, and the purchase of Cuba. After the assault on Charles Sumner, Robert Toombs avowed in the senate that he had witnessed the attack, and approved it, whereupon Mr. Wade, in a speech of great vehemence, threw down the gage of personal combat to the southern senators. It was expected that there would be an immediate challenge from Toombs, but the latter soon made peace. Subsequently Mr. Wade, Zachariah Chandler, and Simon Cameron made a compact to resent any insult from a southerner by a challenge to fight. This agreement was made public many years afterward. Wade was present at the battle of Bull Run with other congressmen in a carriage, and it is related that after the defeat seven of them alighted, at Wade's proposal, being armed with revolvers, and for a quarter of an hour kept back the stream of fugitives near Fairfax Court-House. This incident, as narrated in the journals, made a sensation at the time. Mr. Wade labored earnestly for a vigorous prosecution of the war, was the chairman and foremost spirit of the joint committee on the conduct of the war in 1861-'2, and was active in urging the passage of a confiscation bill. As chairman of the committee on territories, he reported a bill in 1862 to abolish slavery in all the territories. He was instrumental in the advancement to the portfolio of war of Edwin M. Stanton, whom he recommended strongly to President Lincoln. Though he cordially supported the administration, he did not hesitate to criticize many of its acts, and after the adjournment of the 38th congress he issued, with Henry Winter Davis, what became known as the Wade-Davis manifesto, condemning the president's proposed reconstruction policy. Mr. Wade became president pro tempore of the senate, and thus acting vice-president of the United States, on 2 March, 1867, succeeding Lafayette S. Foster. He advised President Johnson to put on trial for treason a few of the Confederate leaders and pardon the rest, and was radical in his ideas of reconstruction. In the impeachment of President Johnson he voted for conviction. In 1869, at the close of his second term, he was succeeded in the senate by Allen G. Thurman, and he then returned to his home in Jefferson, Ohio. He was one of the chief members of the Santo Domingo commission in 1871, and then became attorney for the Northern Pacific railroad. He was chairman of the Ohio delegation in the Cincinnati national convention of 1876, and earnestly advocated the nomination of Rutherford B. Hayes, but after his accession to the presidency Mr. Wade bitterly condemned his course in relation to the southern states. Though Mr. Wade had been called "Frank Wade" in Ohio, from his middle name, he was known in congress and throughout the country as Ben or "Old Ben" Wade. He was popularly looked upon as one of the bulwarks of the National cause in the darkest hours of the civil war, and was widely admired and respected for his fearlessness, independence, and honesty. His rugged and forcible style of oratory always commanded attention. See his "Life," by Albert G. Riddle (Cleveland, Ohio, 1888).—His son, JAMES FRANKLIN, entered the army on 14 May, 1861, as 1st lieutenant of the 6th U. S. cavalry, and rose in rank till at the close of the war he was major and brevet brigadier-general of volunteers. He became lieutenant-colonel on 20 March, 1879, and colonel of the 5th cavalry on 21 April, 1887.

WADE, Melancthon Smith, merchant, b. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 2 Dec., 1802; d. in Avondale, near Cincinnati, Ohio, 11 Aug., 1868. His father, David E. Wade, removed to Ohio from New Jersey in 1789. The son was educated in his native place, and became a dry-goods merchant, but retired from business in 1840. He was active in militia matters, holding successively the offices of captain, colonel; and brigadier-general, and on 1 Oct., 1861, was commissioned a brigadier-general of U. S. volunteers. He was the first post-commander of Camp Dennison, Ohio, but resigned from the army, 18 March, 1862, on account of feeble health. He devoted his leisure to the cultivation of fruit, and was an active member of the Cincinnati horticultural society.

WADHAMS, Edgar Philip, R. C. bishop, b. in Lewis, Essex co., N. Y., 21 May, 1817. His parents were Protestants, and destined him for the ministry of the Episcopal church. After studying at Middlebury college, Vt., he was graduated at the General theological seminary, New York city, received deacon's orders, and was stationed for some time near Port Henry. He was received into the Roman Catholic church in June, 1846, entered St. Mary's seminary, Baltimore, immediately afterward, to prepare for the priesthood, and was ordained on 15 Jan., 1850. He was appointed assistant at the cathedral of Albany, and continued in this post till 1865, when he was appointed pastor of the cathedral and vicar-general of the diocese. In 1872 he was nominated to the new see of Ogdensburg, and on 5 May he was consecrated bishop. He was installed in his diocese on 16 May, and at once began an energetic administration, building many churches and about twenty chapels for the smaller missions. The numerous and heavy debts that were incurred for these buildings were paid after a few years. He founded schools in Ogdensburg, which he placed in charge of the Clerks of St. Viator. Franciscan sisters opened others in Croghan and Mohawk Hill, a boys' college was established at Watertown by the Fathers of the Sacred Heart, and other schools were established in various places. The improvement of the clergy has also been an object with Bishop Wadhams, and with this view he established annual retreats and conferences, with periodical examinations for the younger priests. In 1888 there were 98 churches in the diocese and 58 stations, 77 priests, 5 religious communities of men, and 13 of women.

WADLEIGH, Bainbridge, senator, b. in Bradford, N. H., 4 Jan., 1831. He received a limited education, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1850, and practised in Milford. For eight terms, between 1855 and 1872, he served in the legislature, where he was conspicuous as a debater. He was elected to the U. S. senate, as a Republican, to succeed James W. Patterson, serving from 4 March, 1873, till 3 March, 1879. In that body he was a member of the committees on patents, military affairs, and elections. After his retirement from the senate, he resumed the practice of law.

WADSWORTH, Benjamin, educator, b. in Milton, Mass., in 1669; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 16 March, 1737. He was the son of Capt. Samuel Wadsworth, who fell in battle with the Indians at Sudbury, Mass., on 18 April, 1676, and the spot where he fell is designated by a monument that this son erected to his memory. After graduation at Harvard in 1690 he studied theology, was licensed to preach, became assistant teacher in the First church in Boston in November, 1693, and on 8 Sept., 1696, was made its colleague pastor. On 7 July, 1725, he was inaugurated president of Harvard college, and he held this post until his death. John Eliot says: "The general opinion, however, was that he was better fitted for the pastor of a church than to be master of the school of the prophets. He had confined his studies to theology, and was not a man of extensive erudition, or much acquainted with the sciences." He published numerous essays and sermons, which include "An Artillery Election Sermon" (1700) and "Five Sermons" (1711), the first, dated 30 Sept., being the last sermon that he delivered in the old meeting-house, which was burned on 2 Oct., 1711, and the last a "Thanksgiving Sermon for God's Goodness in providing a New Meeting-House for the Old Church," an account of the fire.

WADSWORTH, Charles, clergyman, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 8 May, 1814; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1 April, 1882. After graduation at Union college in 1837 he was pastor of the 2d Presbyterian church in Troy, N. Y., in 1842-'50; of the Arch street Presbyterian church, Philadelphia, in 1850-'62; of a Presbyterian church in San Francisco in 1862-'9; of the 3d Reformed Dutch church, Philadelphia, in 1869-'73; of the Clinton street Presbyterian church, Philadelphia, in 1873-'9; and of the Clinton street Immanuel church, Philadelphia, in 1879-'82. Dr. Wadsworth was among the most eloquent divines of his day. The University of the city of New York gave him the degree of D. D. in 1857. His sermons were published, with a memoir (3 vols., Philadelphia, 1882-'4).

WADSWORTH, James, soldier, b. in Durham, Conn., 6 July, 1730; d. there, 22 Sept., 1817. He was graduated at Yale in 1748. From 1756 till 1786 he was town-clerk of Durham, and at the beginning of the Revolution he became a member of the committee of safety. In 1776 he was colonel and brigadier-general of Connecticut militia, and in 1777 he was appointed 2d major-general. In the latter year he was ordered to New Haven to defend the towns on the coast. Subsequently he was a justice, and afterward presiding justice of the New Haven county court of common pleas, was a delegate from Connecticut to the Continental congress in 1783-'6, and from 1785 till 1790 a member of the executive council.—His nephew, James, philanthropist, b. in Durham, Conn., 20 April, 1768; d. in Geneseo, N. Y., 8 June, 1844, was graduated at Yale in 1787, and in 1790 removed with his brother, William, to Genesee river, purchasing a large tract of land in what is now the town of Geneseo, and becoming one of the most wealthy land-proprietors in the state. At his personal expense he printed and circulated publications on education, employed lecturers on this subject, and offered premiums to the towns that should be the first to establish libraries. In 1811 he proposed the establishment of normal schools, and in 1838 he procured the enactment of a school-library law, and founded a library and institution for scientific lectures at Geneseo, which he endowed with $10,000. In his sales of land he always stipulated that a tract of 125 acres in each township should be granted free for a church, and another of the same size for a school.—James's brother, William, soldier, b. in Durham, Conn., in 1732; d. in Geneseo, N. Y., in February, 1833, was also an early settler in western New York. At the beginning of the war of 1812 he was brigadier-general of New York militia, and he served in the U. S. army from 26 June till 15 Nov., 1812, took part in the assault on Queenston Heights, 13 Oct., 1812, where he was in command when the Americans surrendered, and gave up his sword in person to Sir Roger Sheaffe.—James's son, James Samuel, soldier, b. in Geneseo, N. Y., 30 Oct., 1807; d. near Chancellorsville, Va., 8 May, 1864, was educated at Harvard and Yale and studied law in Albany, completing his course with Daniel Webster. Although he was admitted to the bar in 1833, he never practised his profession, but devoted himself to the management of the family estate in western New York, which amounted to 15,000 acres. In 1852 he was elected president of the State agricultural society, in which he was interested during his life. He promoted education and the interests of the community in which he lived. He founded a public library in Geneseo, was a subscriber to the endowment of Geneseo college, aided in establishing the school-district library system, and was active in philanthropical labors. Although a Federalist by education and a Democrat by conviction, he supported the Free-soil party in 1848, and continued to act in defence of the anti-slavery movement. He was a presidential elector on the Republican ticket in 1856 and 1860. In 1861 he was a delegate to the Peace convention in Washington, and at the beginning of the civil war he was among the first to offer his services to the government. In April, 1861, he was commissioned a major-general by Gov. Edwin D. Morgan, but the appointment was subsequently revoked. When communication with the capital was cut off, he chartered two ships upon his own responsibility, loaded them with provisions, and went with them to Annapolis, where he superintended the delivery of the supplies. He was volunteer aide to Gen. Irvin McDowell at the first battle of Bull Run, where he was commended for bravery and humanity. Afterward he was made brigadier-general of volunteers, 9 Aug., 1861, assigned to a command in the advance under Gen. George B. McClellan, and guarded the city of Washington. On 15 March, 1862, he became military governor of the District of Columbia. In the autumn of 1862 he was the Republican candidate for governor of New York, but was defeated by Horatio Seymour. In the following December he was assigned to the command of a division in the Army of the Potomac under Gen. Ambrose E. Burnside, and participated in the battle of Fredericksburg, 13 Dec., 1862. He displayed great military skill in the command of the 1st division of the 1st army corps under Gen. John F. Reynolds. At Gettysburg his division was the first to engage the enemy on 1 July, 1863, and on that day lost 2,400 out of 4,000 men. During the second and third days' fighting he rendered good service in maintaining the heights on the right of the line. At the council of war held after the victory he was one of the three that favored pursuit of the enemy. Early in 1864 he was sent on special service to the Mississippi valley, and made an extensive tour of inspection through the southern and western states. On the reorganization of the Army of the Potomac in 1864, he was assigned to the command of the 4th division of the 5th corps, composed in part of his old command. While endeavoring to rally his troops during the battle of the Wilderness, 6 May, 1864, he was struck in the head by a bullet, and before he could be removed the enemy had gained possession of the ground where he lay. Although unconscious, he lingered for two days. It is said that his troops were inspired by his heroic bearing continually to renew the contest, when but for him they would have yielded. He was brevetted major-general of volunteers on 6 May, 1864. Horace Greeley, in his "American Conflict" (Hartford, 1864-'6), says: "The country's salvation claimed no nobler sacrifice than that of James S. Wadsworth, of New York. . . . No one surrendered more for his country's sake, or gave his life more joyfully for her deliverance." In 1888 a movement was in progress for the erection in Washington of a monument to his memory.

WADSWORTH, Jeremiah, congressman, b. in Hartford, Conn., in 1743; d. there, 30 April, 1804. He was the originator of numerous plans for the improvement of his native town, and held several local offices. During the war of the Revolution he was commissary-general of the Continental army. In 1786-'8 he was a delegate to the Continental congress, and he was elected a representative from Connecticut to the 1st congress as a Federalist, serving by successive elections from 4 March, 1789, till 3 March, 1795.

WADSWORTH, Marshman Edward, geologist, b. in Livermore Falls, Me., 6 May, 1847. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1869, and then taught in Minnesota and Wisconsin. In 1873 he was elected professor of chemistry in the Boston dental college, and in 1874 he became instructor in mathematics and mineralogy in Harvard. He held an assistantship in lithology at the Museum of comparative zoölogy, Cambridge, Mass., in 1877-'85, and was professor of mineralogy and geology in Colby university in 1885-'7. Prof. Wadsworth was called in 1887 to the directorship of the Michigan mining-school, with the chair of mineralogy, petrography, and geology, and in 1888 he was appointed state geologist of Michigan. The degree of Ph. D. was conferred on him by Harvard in 1879 for post-graduate studies, and he is a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science, and a member of the Boston society of natural history and other scientific bodies. His bibliography embraces nearly 100 titles of papers on geology, lithology, and similar subjects, including the following books, "Geology of the Iron and Copper Districts of Lake Superior" (Cambridge, 1880); "The Azoid System and its proposed Subdivisions," with Josiah D. Whitney (1884); "Lithological Studies" (1884); and "Preliminary Description of the Peridotites, Gabbros, Diabases, and Andesites of Minnesota" (St. Paul, 1887).

WADSWORTH, Peleg, soldier, b. in Duxbury, Mass., in 1748; d. in Hiram, Oxford co., Me., 18 Nov., 1829. He was graduated at Harvard in 1769, taught in Plymouth with Alexander Scammell, and then engaged in commercial pursuits. Early in the Revolutionary struggle he entered the army as a captain of minute-men in Roxbury and became aide to Gen. Artemas Ward. Afterward he was made adjutant-general for Massachusetts, and was present at the battle of Long Island, 1 Aug., 1776. He became brigadier-general of militia in 1777, and was second in command of the Penobscot expedition in 1779, on which occasion he displayed great courage and was taken prisoner. He was again captured in his house by a party of British soldiers in February, 1781, and imprisoned in the fort at Castine, whence he escaped in June. In 1784 he established himself in business in Portland, Me., where he was much employed in surveying. In 1792 he was in the state senate, and was elected to congress, serving from 2 Dec., 1793, till 3 March, 1807. In the last-named year he removed to Oxford county, Me., to improve a large tract of land that had been granted to him by the government for his services. He developed the resources of that region, and was appointed major-general of Maine militia.—His son, Henry, naval officer, b. about 1783; d. in Tripoli harbor, 4 Sept., 1804, entered the navy as a midshipman, 28 Aug., 1799. He was attached to the frigate "Constitution," which sailed from Boston as Preble's flag-ship in August, 1803, to the Mediterranean for the Tripolitan war. He was appointed an acting lieutenant in that ship, and took part in the engagements with the Tripolitan fleet and forts. When the ketch "Intrepid" was fitted out as a floating mine to explode in the harbor among the Tripolitan vessels, he volunteered to serve in that enterprise (see SOMERS, RICHARD), and perished with his companions. His sister became the mother of the poet Longfellow, who was named for him.—Another son, Alexander Scammell, naval officer, b. in Portland, Me., in 1790; d. in Washington, D. C., 5 April, 1851, entered the navy as a midshipman, 2 April, 1804, and was promoted to lieutenant, 21 April, 1810. He was 2d lieutenant of the frigate "Constitution" during her memorable escape from the British fleet, and also took part in the engagement with the frigate "Guerrière," 19 Aug., 1812, for which he received a silver medal and was included in the vote of thanks to Hull and his officers. He was 1st lieutenant of the corvette "Adams" during her cruise in 1814 when she captured ten prizes, but was chased by a British fleet into Penobscot bay. There she ran ashore, and, to prevent capture, was destroyed by her crew, who erected a fort armed with the guns from the ship, and drove the enemy away. He was promoted for his services during the war to master-commandant, 27 April, 1816, and commanded the brig "Prometheus" in the Mediterranean squadron after the Algerine war in 1816-'17, and then the sloop "John Adams" in the West Indies, suppressing piracy in two cruises—in 1818-'19 and 1821-'2. He served at the Washington navy-yard in 1823-'5, and as inspector of ordnance in 1825-'9. He was promoted to captain, 3 March, 1825, surveyed Narragansett bay, R. I., and commanded the frigate "Constellation," of the Mediterranean squadron, in 1829-'32. He was commodore commanding the Pacific squadron in 1834-'6, a member of the board of navy commissioners in 1837-'40, and inspector of ordnance from 1841 till 1850.

WAFER, Lionel, British surgeon, b. in Wales about 1640; d. in London, England, about 1705. He made several voyages to the South sea as surgeon on board merchant vessels, and in 1676 visited the Malay archipelago. In 1677 he settled in Jamaica, where he practised his profession for some time, but in 1679 he accepted the appointment of surgeon on the fleet of two noted buccaneers, named Cook and Linen, who were joined by others while cruising along the coast of South America. They met, in Cartagena, William Dampier, who induced Wafer to enter his service. The latter participated in Dampier's raids in the West Indies and on the Atlantic coast, and accompanied him in the expedition across the Isthmus of Darien in 1680. But they quarrelled, and Wafer was abandoned on the road with four mutineers. They were surrounded by hostile Indians; but one of the soldiers, who understood their language, told the natives that Wafer was a great magician, and he lived with the Indians for several years, till he obtained permission to visit his own country, on promising to return and marry the chief's sister and to bring with him some dogs from England. He sailed away in 1684 on board a French buccaneer. He afterward was reconciled with Dampier, and sailed with him till 1685, when he became surgeon on board Capt. Nathaniel Davis's ship, and continued to lead a privateer's life in the South sea. In 1688 he came to North America and was among the first settlers of Philadelphia, where he resided in 1688-'90, returning in the latter year to London. He wrote "A New Voyage and Description of the Isthmus of America" (London, 1699), which was translated into French (Paris, 1706), and German (Halle, 1759). It contained the fullest description that had been published of the Isthmus of Darien, the Indians that inhabited it, and its natural productions, and also interesting facts regarding Mexico, communicated to him by a Spanish captain. The Swedish version (Upsala, 1789) contains also an interesting description of New Spain that is attributed to Wafer.

WAGGAMANN, George Augustus, senator, b. in Somerset county, Md., in 1782; d. in New Orleans, La., 22 March, 1843. He was educated in Maryland, and practised law in New Orleans, was interested in sugar-planting, and held various offices, including that of secretary of state of Louisiana in 1830-'3. He was elected U. S. senator in place of Edward Livingston, resigned, and served as a Whig from 3 Jan., 1832, till 3 March, 1835. He died from the effects of a wound that he received in a duel.

WAGNER, Daniel Christian, Alsatian navigator, b. in Mulhouse about 1501; d. in Patagonia in 1552. He early entered the Spanish service, and acted as chief pilot in Mexico and Peru. In 1539 Gutierrez de Vargas, bishop of Placencia, sent Admiral Camargo to explore the Strait of Magellan. The fleet sailed from Seville in August, 1539, Wagner acting as chief pilot, anchored on 20 Jan., 1540, near Cape Virgins, and, after entering the strait, stopped at Port Famine, but was forced out by a hurricane and two vessels sank, the crew seeking refuge on shore. A few days later Admiral Camargo returned to search for the shipwrecked, and Wagner went in a boat to reconnoitre; but a new tempest carried Camargo out to sea, and he entered Islay, in Peru. Wagner, thus abandoned on the shore, met a part of the shipwrecked crews, and with their help built barracks in which they wintered, suffering greatly from cold and famine. In the summer they built a boat and they arrived in Islay in December, 1541. In 1552 Wagner was appointed to the command of a new expedition to explore the strait, but died during the journey. The "Collection des grands et petits voyages" (50 vols., Paris, 1750-'75) attributes to Wagner a narrative entitled "Relation de l'expédition de l'Amiral Camargo au détroit de Magellan en 1539-'40, du naufrage de deux navires de la flotte, et des souffrances, aventures, et miraculeuse échappe des naufragés."

WAGNER, John, surgeon, b. in Charleston, S. C., 7 July, 1791; d. there, 22 May, 1841. He was graduated at Yale in 1812, studied medicine in New York, went to England in 1815, where he became the pupil of Sir. Astley P. Cooper for three years, and, while attending his lectures, was employed as a dresser in Guy's hospital, London. Two large manuscript volumes on surgery and anatomy remain as a register of the important cases that he studied during this period. He received a degree from the Royal college of surgeons, and also studied in Paris under Dupuytren. On his return he settled in Charleston, S. C., where he soon rose to eminence as a surgeon. He successfully performed the third operation for osteosarcoma of the lower jaw. In 1826 he began a course of dissections and demonstrations in practical anatomy. In the art of making and preserving anatomical preparations he was rarely excelled, and his specimens, which still remain, are models. In 1829 he was elected professor of pathological and surgical anatomy in South Carolina medical college, which is said to have been the first college to establish this department. In 1832 he succeeded Dr. James Ramsey in the chair of surgery.

WAGNER, Moritz Friedrich, German explorer, b. in Baireuth, Bavaria, 3 Oct., 1813. He received his education at the University of Augsburg, was afterward clerk in a mercantile house in Marseilles, and in 1834 went to Paris, Erlangen, and Munich, to study natural science. He visited Algiers in 1836-'8, studied geology at Göttingen in 1838-'42, explored the Caucasus and Armenia in 1842-'6, at the expense of the Berlin academy of sciences, and visited Italy in 1846-'9, and Asia Minor, Persia, and Kurdistan in 1850-'1. In 1852-'5, with Karl von Scherzer, he visited the United States, Central America, and the West Indies, and he went again to America in 1857, at the invitation of King Maximilian II. of Bavaria.

He explored the province of Chiriqui, on the Isthmus of Panama, till 1858, visiting in 1859 the western Andes of Ecuador, and forming rich collections in natural history. On his return to Germany in 1860 he was appointed professor of geography in the University of Munich, elected an associate member of the Munich and Berlin academies of sciences, founded and became director of the Ethnographical museum of Munich, and discovered prehistoric habitations in some of the lakes in Bavaria, principally that of Starnberg. Wagner has since devoted his labors exclusively to science. His works, besides those that describe his travels in the Old World, include "Reisen in Nordamerika" (3 vols., Leipsic, 1854), "Die Republik von Costa Rica in Central-Amerika" (1856), both written with Scherzer; "Ueber das Vorkommen von Pfahlbauten" (Munich, 1867); and "Ueber Topographie, Zweck und Alter der Pfahlbauten" (1867). He contributed also many papers describing his travels to Petermann's monthly collection and to the journal of the Geographical society of Berlin.

WAGNER, Webster, inventor, b. near Palatine Bridge, N. Y., 2 Oct., 1817; d. near Spuyten Duyvil, N. Y., 13 Jan., 1882. He received a common-school education and became a wagon-maker. Subsequently he received the appointment of freight agent on the New York Central railroad, and then invented the sleeping-car. In 1858 he had four of these cars in operation, and their use gradually extended until they were adopted on all the lines of the Vanderbilt system. In 1867 he manufactured the first drawing-room car, and founded the Wagner palace-car company, of which he was president until his death. He also invented the oval car-roof, and patented the elevated panel. Mr. Wagner was elected as a Republican to the New York assembly in 1870, and from 1871 till 1882 he was state senator. In 1880 he was a delegate to the Republican national convention. He was killed in a railroad disaster on the Hudson river road.

WAGNER, William, philanthropist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 15 Jan., 1796; d. there, 17 Jan., 1885. He received an academic education, and was desirous of studying medicine, but his parents decided otherwise, and he entered the counting-room of Stephen Girard. In 1816 he was sent as an assistant supercargo on a trading voyage that lasted nearly two years. On this voyage he made large collections of shells, plants, and fossils, which formed the beginnings of his museum. Subsequently he engaged in various business enterprises, but finally retired in 1840. After a residence abroad of two years in 1841-'2 he returned to Philadelphia and devoted himself to arranging his collections. In 1847 he began to deliver scientific lectures to those that were interested, and in 1852 his audiences had grown so large that he was compelled to secure the use of a hall. The Wagner free institute of science was inaugurated on 21 May, 1855, with a corps of lecturers. Ten years later an edifice was dedicated, and Mr. Wagner transferred the building and its collections, cabinets, apparatus, and library to trustees on condition that the property shall forever be used for instruction in natural science. It is estimated that his entire benefaction for this purpose was not less than half a million dollars. He continued president of the institute until his death, and was a member of learned societies, to whose proceedings he contributed scientific papers.

WAINWRIGHT, Jonathan Mayhew, P. E. bishop, b. in Liverpool, England, 24 Feb., 1793; d. in New York city, 21 Sept., 1854. He was of American parentage, his mother being a daughter of Rev. Jonathan Mayhew, of Boston. He was graduated at Harvard in 1812, where he was afterward tutor, ordered deacon in the Protestant Episcopal church in Trinity church, Boston, 13 April, 1817, ordained priest in Christ church, Hartford, Conn., 29 May, 1818, and became rector of the latter. In November, 1819, he removed to New York, and became assistant minister in Trinity church. He was made rector of Grace church in 1821, and remained in that charge until 1834, when he became rector of Trinity church, Boston. In 1837 he returned to Trinity parish, New York, as assistant in charge of St. John's chapel, which post he retained until he was elevated to the episcopate. He received the degree of D. D. from Union college in 1823, and from Harvard in 1835. The degree of D. C. L. was conferred upon him by the University of Oxford, England, in 1852.

J. M. Wainwright

Dr. Wainwright was consecrated provisional bishop of New York in Trinity church, New York, on 10 Nov., 1852. He was for many years secretary of the house of bishops, aided in the establishment of the University of New York, and was considered one of the first pulpit orators of his day. Bishop Wainwright wielded great social influence, was a ripe scholar, and was a devoted lover of music, contributing toward its improvement in the churches of his denomination. He was secretary of the board of trustees of the General theological seminary in 1823-'34, and a trustee or officer of many other institutions and societies. In 1844 he engaged in a controversy with his friend Rev. Dr. George Potts, which grew out of an assertion that Rufus Choate made at a celebration of the New England society. The orator said that the Pilgrim fathers had founded a "state without a king and a church without a bishop." At the dinner that followed, Dr. Wainwright, in responding to a sentiment, said in reply that "there is no church without a bishop." The subsequent discussion with Dr. Potts, which was carried on in nineteen letters in the New York "Commercial Advertiser," was afterward published in pamphlet-form (1844). His other works include "Four Sermons on Religious Education" (New York, 1829); "Lessons on the Church" (1835); "Order of Family Prayer" (1845); "Short Family Prayers" (1850); "The Pathway and Abiding-Places of our Lord, illustrated in the Journal of a Tour through the Land of Promise" (1851); "The Land of Bondage: being the Journal of a Tour in Egypt" (1852); single sermons; and papers in periodicals. He also prepared three books of music: a "Book of Chants," adapted to services of the Episcopal church (1819); "Music of the Church" (1828); and "The Choir and Family Psalter," in connection with Rev. Dr. William A. Muhlenberg (1851); and edited Bishop Ravenscroft's "Sermons," with a memoir (2 vols., 1830), and "Life of Bishop Heber," by his widow (2 vols., 1830). See a "Memorial Volume," containing thirty-four of his sermons and a memoir by Bishop Doane (1856), and "Life of Bishop Wainwright," by Rev. John N. Norton (1858). After his death a church was erected to his memory in New York city.—His son, Jonathan Mayhew, naval officer, b. in New York city, 27 July, 1821; d. near Galveston, Tex., 1 Jan., 1863, entered the navy as a midshipman, 30 June, 1837, attended the naval school at Philadelphia in 1842-'3, and became a passed midshipman, 29 June, 1843. He was appointed acting master, 10 Nov., 1849, and commissioned lieutenant, 17 Sept., 1850. He was on special duty at Washington in 1861, and commanded the steamer "Harriet Lane," which was Admiral Porter's flag-ship in Farragut's fleet during the engagements with Fort Jackson and Fort St. Philip and the capture of New Orleans in April, 1862. He took part in the operations of the fleet below Vicksburg, and in October, 1862, commanded the "Harriet Lane" in Commander Renshaw's squadron at the capture of Galveston. While he was holding possession of Galveston, Gen. Magruder attacked the "Harriet Lane," then lying above the city. Wainwright was killed while gallantly leading his men to repel the Confederate boarders, and in ten minutes after half the crew of the "Harriet Lane" were shot down and the vessel was captured by the Confederates.—The second Jonathan Mayhew's son, Jonathan Mayhew, naval officer, b. in New York city, 29 Jan., 1849; d. at sea, 19 June, 1870, was graduated at the U. S. naval academy in 1867, was promoted to master, 21 March, 1870, and while serving in the "Mohican" he had command of the boat expedition to cut out the pirate steamer "Forward," which was operating on the coast of Mexico, manned by a crew of filibusters. The "Forward" was lying alongside of the beach in the lagoon at San Blas when Wainwright attacked and attempted to capture the ship by boarding. The pirates fired on the boat's crew, and shot Wainwright. The crew burned the steamer, and Wainwright was carried on board ship, where he died the next day.—The second Jonathan's daughter, MARIE, now Mrs. Louis James, has attained some reputation as an actress.

WAINWRIGHT, Richard, naval officer, b. in Charlestown, Mass., 5 Jan., 1817; d. near New Orleans, 10 Aug., 1862. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 11 May, 1831, attended the naval school at Norfolk in 1837-'8, and became a passed midshipman, 15 June, 1837. In 1838-'41 he served on the coast survey in the brig "Consort." He was commissioned lieutenant, 8 Sept., 1841, commanded the steamer "Water-Witch" on the home station in 1848-'9, served again on coast survey in 1851-'7, and cruised in the steam frigate "Merrimack" in 1857-'60. He was stationed at the Washington navy-yard on ordnance duty in 1860-'1, promoted to commander, 24 April of the latter year, and given the flag-ship "Hartford" of Admiral Farragut's fleet, fitted out for the capture of New Orleans. During the passage of the forts the Confederate tug "Mosher" pushed a fire-raft alongside of the "Hartford," which threatened the destruction of the ship. Wainwright distinguished himself in this conflict with the flames and continued to fight the forts on 24-25 April. He participated in the operations of Farragut's fleet below Vicksburg, and was highly commended by the admiral. At the time of his death he still commanded the "Hartford."

WAIT, Benjamin, patriot, b. in Markham township, Upper Canada, 7 Sept., 1813. He engaged in the Canadian rebellion, and was appointed a colonel in the insurgent forces that had their headquarters on Navy island. On a raid into Upper Canada he was captured, brought to trial for high treason, and condemned to be hanged on 25 Aug., 1838. Only a fortnight intervened between his sentence and its intended execution; but in that short time his wife, MARIA Wait (née Smith), surmounting almost impossible difficulties and the strong opposition of Sir George Arthur, governor of Upper Canada, obtained from Lord Durham, the governor-general, a commutation of his sentence from death to transportation for life to Van Dieman's Land. She then went alone and almost penniless to London to obtain his pardon. The case was laid before the queen's council, but they opposed any clemency so long as the disturbances continued to exist in Canada. Mrs. Wait supported herself at first by acting as companion to a wealthy lady, and then as teacher in an infant-school, meanwhile making constant efforts for the release of her husband. After two years, her health broken by long-continued suspense and privation, she decided to join her husband in his banishment. She was about to embark for Van Dieman's Land when the ministry had decided to grant a pardon to her husband and his six surviving companions in exile if it should be recommended by the governor-general of Canada. She set out at once for Toronto; but she received from the governor only a kindly refusal. Not disheartened by this, she besought the members of the legislature to exercise their influence, and succeeded at the end of a year in securing the signatures of fifty of the number to her petition. With this she again waited upon the governor, who again declined her request. She then induced her friends in the legislature to introduce a resolution recommending the governor to urge upon the queen a pardon to Wait and his associate exiles. The resolution was passed, and then the governor yielded. In March, 1842, an order was issued for their absolute release. Meanwhile Wait had been allowed unusual freedom in Van Dieman's Land, and at the very time when the British ministry were signing the order for his release, he succeeded in escaping from Hobart Town. He had arranged with an American whaler to take him and a single companion up at sea from a small boat; but they were missed in the darkness, and then for thirteen days they were tossed about with no food but raw fish. At last they were seen by an American vessel homeward bound. The ship was wrecked on the coast of Brazil, but none perished. Seven months afterward, ragged and penniless, Wait reached the United States, and rejoined his devoted wife, who was teaching at Niagara Falls. But, worn out with her efforts in her husband's behalf, Mrs. Wait's health had given way, and soon after his return she died. Wait is still living in Grand Rapids, Mich.

WAIT, Samuel, educator, b. in Washington county, N. Y., 19 Dec., 1789; d. in Wake Forest, N. C., 28 July, 1867. He was graduated at Columbian college, Washington, D. C., and served there for a short time as tutor. In 1827, having already been ordained to the Baptist ministry, he removed to North Carolina, and became pastor at New Berne. The remainder of his life was devoted to the promotion of the educational and religious interests of that state, and few men have accomplished more for these interests, especially as connected with the Baptist denomination. Mainly by his exertions the Baptist state convention of North Carolina was organized in 1830. The first Baptist newspaper published in the state owed its existence to his labors. He was active in establishing Wake Forest school, which subsequently became Wake Forest college, and was president of it from its foundation to 1846, a period of fourteen years. In 1851-'6 he had charge of a school for girls in Oxford, N. C. He has received the degree of D. D. from Wake Forest in 1849.

WAIT, William, lawyer, b. in Ephratah, N. Y., 2 Feb., 1821; d. in Johnstown, N. Y., 29 Dec., 1880. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1846, and became district attorney of Fulton county, N. Y., in 1848. In 1856 he held the office of school commissioner. As a law-writer Mr. Wait was painstaking and accurate. Few legal works have been more widely known or more generally cited as authority than his. He was the author of "The Law and Practice in Civil Actions and Proceedings in Justices' Courts and on Appeals to the County Courts in the State of New York" (2 vols., Albany, 1865); "New York Annotated Code of Procedure" (1871); "A Table of Cases affirmed, revised, or cited in the Reports of the State of New York" (1872); "The Practice in Courts of Record of the State of New York" (1872); and "Wait's Actions and Defences at Law and in Equity" (7 vols., 1876-'9). Mr. Wait also edited an American edition of Herbert Broom and Edward A. Hadley's "Commentaries on the Law of England" (2 vols., Albany, 1875), and prepared a continuation of Clinton's "Digest of New York Reports," which was published as "Clinton and Wait's Digest of New York Reports" (1876).

WAITE, Carlos Adolphus, soldier, b. in 1800; d. in Plattsburg, N. Y., 7 May, 1866. He entered the U. S. army as 2d lieutenant of infantry, 28 Jan., 1820, became 1st lieutenant, 1 May, 1828, and captain, 3 July, 1836. From 7 July, 1838, till 8 May, 1845, he was captain and assistant quartermaster. He was appointed major of the 8th infantry, 16 Feb., 1847, and served in the Mexican war, receiving the brevets of lieutenant-colonel, 20 Aug., 1847, for gallant and meritorious conduct at Contreras and Churubusco, and colonel, 8 Sept., 1847, for gallant and meritorious conduct at Molino del Rey, where he was severely wounded. He was made lieutenant-colonel of the 5th infantry on 10 Nov., 1851, and colonel of the 15th infantry on 5 June, 1860. In 1864 he was placed on the retired list, owing to impaired health, and he resided in Plattsburg until his death. He was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers on 13 March, 1865, for long and faithful service in the army.

WAITE, Charles Burlingame, jurist, b. in Wayne county, N. Y., 29 Jan., 1824. He was educated at Knox college, Ill., studied law at Galesburg and Rock Island, and was admitted to the bar in 1847. After fifteen years' successful practice, chiefly in Chicago, he was appointed by President Lincoln in 1862 associate justice of the supreme court of Utah. In 1865 he resigned this post and became district attorney of Idaho, and a year later he returned to Chicago, since which time he has devoted himself to literary pursuits. Judge Waite has published a "History of the Christian Religion to the Year A. D. 200" (Chicago, 1881), and made numerous contributions to the press on suffrage and other politico-legal questions.—His wife, Catharine Van Valkenburg, author, b. in Dumfries, Canada West, in 1829, was graduated at Oberlin in 1853, and married Mr. Waite the next year. In 1859 she established Hyde Park seminary. She is a graduate of the Union college of law and a member of the Illinois bar. In 1886 she founded the "Chicago Law Times," a quarterly magazine, of which she is the editor. Mrs. Waite is active in all movements for the advancement of her sex. At the International council of women at Washington she was elected president of the Woman's international bar association, 26 March, 1888. She is chief manager of the publishing-firm of C. V. Waite and Co., and has published "The Mormon Prophet and his Harem" (Cambridge, 1865).

WAITE, Henry Matson, jurist, b. in Lyme, Conn., 9 Feb., 1787; d. there, 14 Dec., 1869. His ancestor, Thomas, who came from England to Massachusetts about 1663, is believed to have been a son of Thomas Waite, one of the judges that signed the death-warrant of Charles I. Henry was graduated at Yale in 1809, studied law with Judge Matthew Griswold and his brother, Gov. Roger Griswold, was admitted to the bar in 1812, and practised law in Lyme. In 1815 he was elected to the legislature, serving several years as representative and as state senator in 1832-'3. He was appointed a judge of the supreme court of errors of Connecticut in 1834, and held that place and that of judge of the superior court for twenty years. In 1854 he was made chief justice of the state by the unanimous vote of the legislature. In 1855 Yale gave him the degree of LL. D.—His son, Morrison Remick, jurist, b. in Lyme, Conn., 29 Nov., 1816; d. in Washington, D. C., 23 March, 1888. He was graduated at Yale in 1837, where he was a classmate of William M. Evarts, Benjamin Silliman, and Samuel J. Tilden, and began the study of law in his father's office, but in 1838 travelled extensively, and then completed his legal education with Samuel M. Young in Maumee City, Ohio. In 1839 he was admitted to the bar, and formed a partnership with Mr. Young. He proved himself capable of grasping all the minute details of legal controversies and rose rapidly. The firm removed to Toledo in 1850, and continued until his youngest brother, Richard, came to the bar, when the two brothers formed a partnership. Mr. Waite in the mean time had become widely known for his successful management of difficult cases, and his studious habits and upright character. Opposing counsel often said that his assertion on any question of law was unanswerable. During more than three decades he was the acknowledged leader of the Ohio bar. Politically he was a Whig until the disbandment of that party, after which he was a Republican. But he took no part in political affairs, although repeatedly solicited to accept a nomination to congress, and he declined a seat on the bench of the supreme court of Ohio. In 1849 he was a member of the Ohio legislature. He first attracted national attention as counsel for the United States before the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva, Switzerland, in 1871-'2, his associates being Caleb Cushing and William M. Evarts. He assisted in the preparation of the case, and was chosen to argue the liability of the English government for permitting Confederate steamers to be supplied with coal in British ports during the civil war, the robust clearness and directness of his logic carrying conviction on all the points he raised. His argument was published (Geneva, 1872). When he returned in 1872, the degree of LL. D. was conferred upon him by Yale. In 1874 he was the choice of both political parties as a delegate to the Ohio constitutional convention, and on its assembling in Cincinnati he was unanimously elected its president. When the death of Chief-Justice Chase had created a vacancy in the highest judicial office of the United States, two or three eminent jurists were successively nominated for the post, but their names were withdrawn. On 19 Jan., 1874, the president sent to the senate the name of Mr. Waite. The nomination met with general approval, and the nominee received every vote that was cast. Mr. Waite took the oath of office on 4 March, 1874, and immediately entered upon its duties. He rigidly enforced the rules and precedents of the court in all matters of practice, watched the docket, and pushed the business rapidly. The second great period of constitutional interpretation began with his first year on the bench. The amendments were coming up for judicial exposition, and questions were to be settled as to the powers of congress, the rights of states, and the privileges of citizens. Some of the most important corporation cases that were ever argued in the United States came before him, involving the most intricate questions of interstate commerce. One of his associates on the bench says: "His administrative ability was remarkable. None of his predecessors more steadily or more wisely superintended the court or more carefully observed all that is necessary to its workings. He has written many of the most important opinions of the court—too many to be particularized." Among these opinions are the decision on the head-money-tax cases in 1876, on the polygamy cases in 1879, on the election laws in 1880, on the powers of removal by the president, and the Virginia land cases in 1881, on the civil-rights act in 1883, on the Alabama claims, the legal-tender act, and the Virginia coupon-tax cases in 1885, on the express companies and the extradition cases in 1886, and on the Kansas prohibition cases, the Virginia debt cases, the national banks, and the affair of the Chicago anarchists in 1887. A marked feature of Chief-Justice Waite's judicial career was the pronounced advocacy of the doctrine of state rights in his opinions. His conception of our novel and complex theory of government, and his independence of political considerations, are clearly shown in the Ku-klux, civil rights, and other decisions, in which he did not hesitate to set aside Republican legislation if he deemed it necessary; nor was he deterred, by fear of being accused of friendliness to large corporations, from pronouncing decisions in their favor—for example, his decision on the validity of the Bell telephone patents, which was his last official action. He was assigned to the 4th circuit, which included Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, and the Carolinas, and also acted as circuit judge in New York in consequence of the disability of Justice Ward Hunt. He often was known to hurry away from a state dinner, to bestow conscientious labor upon some important opinion, working late into the night. It will be remembered to his honor that he never allowed any whisperings of ambition to divert his attention from his duties. He made it clear to the country in the most emphatic language in 1876 that he would not be considered a possible candidate for president. He also declined to serve on the electoral commission. Judge Waite was from 1874 till his death one of the Peabody trustees of southern education, continuously served on one of the standing committees of that body, and was also on the special committee of three that urged on congress the bestowal of national aid for the education of the southern negroes. Robert C. Winthrop, chairman of the trustees, at their annual meeting in 1888, in the course of remarks on Judge Waite's life and character, said of him: "Coming to the office without the prestige of many, or perhaps of any, of those whom he followed, he had won year by year, and every year, the increasing respect and confidence of the whole country, and the warm regard and affection of all who knew him." Services were held in the capitol by the two houses of congress before the removal of his remains to Toledo. In the U. S. circuit court in Charleston, S. C., where he had often presided, members of the bar of that city spoke in his praise, especially alluding to his kindness of manner and impartiality during the reconstruction period. "Fortunate, indeed," said one of the speakers, "that there was a man who, amidst the furious passions which rent the country and shook the land, could hold in his steady and equal hand the balances of justice undisturbed." The degree of LL. D. was given him by Kenyon in 1874, and by the University of Ohio in 1879. Chief-Justice Waite was of medium height, broad-shouldered, compactly built, and erect. His step was light and firm, and all his movements were quick and decisive. His well-poised, classically shaped head was massive and thickly covered with handsome grayish hair. His manners were graceful and winning, but unassuming. He was one of the most genial of men, and his whole bearing commanded instant respect. His private character was singularly pure and noble. Judge Waite was a member of the Protestant Episcopal church, and a regular attendant on its services. Mrs. Waite, four sons, and one daughter survive him.

WAITE, Henry Randall, editor, b. in Copenhagen, Lewis co., N. Y., 16 Dec., 1845. After graduation at Hamilton in 1868, he was on the staff of the Utica "Herald" in 1869-'70. In 1873 he was graduated at Union theological seminary, New York city, where he had edited the "University Quarterly Review." In 1871-'4 he was pastor of the American church in Rome, Italy, and he was on the staff of the New Haven "Journal" in 1875. In 1876-'7 he edited the "International Review," and in 1876-'80 was pastor of the Presbyterian church in Pelham, N. Y. In 1876 he organized the National reform league, and in 1876-'7 was president of the Political science association of New York. In 1880-'3 he was a special officer of the U. S. census. In 1885-'6 he edited "The Citizen" in Boston, and he afterward became editor of "Civics" in New York. In 1885 he founded the American institute of civics, of which he has since been president. He was the first to employ the term "civics" to designate those branches of science that pertain to the elevation of citizenship. He has published "The Motive of St. Paul's Life" (Rome, 1873) and "Illiteracy and the Mormon Problem" (Boston, 1885).

WAKEFIELD, Cyrus, manufacturer, b. in Roxbury, Cheshire co., N. H., 7 Feb., 1811; d. in Boston, Mass., 26 Oct., 1873. About 1827 he went to Boston, where he engaged in trade. He originated the rattan business in this country, and discovered several methods of utilizing the rattan waste, while of the split rattans he made furniture and carriage-bodies. He established a large factory for these manufactures in South Reading, Mass., where his rattan-works cover seven acres of ground. In 1868 South Reading voted to change its name to Wakefield, in recognition of his benefactions, particularly the gift of a town-hall that cost $100,000. He also gave $100,000 to Harvard, and left large bequests to benevolent objects.

WAKEFIELD, Nancy Amelia Woodbury Priest, poet, b. in Royalton, Mass., 7 Dec., 1836; d. in Winchendon, Mass., 21 Sept., 1870. Her maiden name was Priest, and in 1865 she married Lieut. Arlington C. Wakefield. Her fame rests on the popular poem "Over the River," which first appeared in the Springfield, Mass., "Republican" in 1857. A collection of her poems was published by her mother, Mrs. Francis D. Priest, with a memoir by the Rev. Abijah P. Marvin, of Lancaster, Mass. (Boston, 1871).

WAKELEY, Joseph B., clergyman, b. in Danbury, Conn., in 1804; d. in New York city, 27 April, 1876. At an early age he was apprenticed to a hat-manufacturer in his native town, but studied for the ministry, and was admitted to the Methodist Episcopal conference of New York in 1828. In 1857 he settled in Poughkeepsie, but he was subsequently appointed pastor of a church in Lexington avenue, New York. He was the author of "The Heroes of Methodism" (New York, 1856) and "Lost Chapters recovered from the Early History of American Methodism" (1858); edited "Reminiscences," by the Rev. Henry Boehm, Bishop Asbury's travelling companion (1865); and also published "Anecdotes of the Wesleys," with an introduction by John McClintock (1869).

WALBACH, John Baptiste de Barth, Baron DE WALBACH, soldier, b. in Münster, valley of St. Gregory, upper Rhine, Germany, 3 Oct., 1766; d. in Baltimore, Md., 10 June, 1857. He was the third son of Count Joseph de Barth, and received his military education at Strasburg. In 1786-'92 he was a lieutenant in the Lauzun hussars. He returned to his native land to join the army of the Comte d'Artois, brother of Louis XVI. He was present during the campaign of 1792 in Champagne in the advance of the Prussian army until it was disbanded at Maestricht, on 6 Jan., 1793, participated in the attack on Frankfort, and subsequently served during the campaign of 1793 in attacks on the French lines at Germersheim, Langenkandel, and Weissenburg. In October, 1793, he accepted a captaincy in the Hussars de Rohan in the German service, and took part in covering the retreat of the Duke of York upon Holland and Germany. In 1798 he obtained a six months' leave of absence, with a view of visiting his father, who had come to the United States at the opening of the French revolution. But the father had died in Philadelphia, and his estate had been sold by the sheriff. Resigning his commission in the Hussars de Rohan, in April, 1798, he was appointed aide-de-camp to Gen. William Macpherson. He became 1st lieutenant of U. S. cavalry and adjutant on 10 Jan., 1799, was aide-de-camp to Gen. Alexander Hamilton in May, assistant adjutant-general to Gen. William North in September, and in December was assigned to the staff of Gen. Charles C. Pinckney, whom he assisted in preparing regulations for the cavalry. In February, 1801, he was made 1st lieutenant in the regiment of artillerists and engineers, and on 25 Oct. following he was appointed aide-de-camp to Gen. James Wilkinson. He was retained in April, 1802, as 1st lieutenant of artillery, and became adjutant, 1 Dec., 1804. He was promoted captain, 31 Jan., 1806, made assistant deputy quartermaster-general in March, 1812, assistant adjutant-general, with the rank of major, in June, 1813, and on 6 Aug., 1813, adjutant-general. He took part in the battle of Chryslers Field, Canada, 11 Nov., 1813. Gen. George W. Cullum, in his "Campaigns and Engineers of the War of 1812-'15," says that the enemy, "discovering our disorder and slackened fire, pushed vigorously forward and endeavored by a flank movement to capture our cannon, when Adjutant-General Walbach, a German veteran in our army who had seen much foreign service, gave the order to 'charge mit de dragoons,' and thus saved the pieces." On 1 May, 1815, he received the brevet of lieutenant-colonel "for meritorious services." He became major of artillery, 25 April, 1818, brevet colonel for "ten years' favorable service," 1 May, 1825, lieutenant-colonel in the 1st regiment of artillery, 30 May, 1832, and colonel of the 4th artillery, 19 March, 1842. In May, 1850, he received the brevet of brigadier-general, to date from 11 Nov., 1823. Gen. Walbach possessed mental and physical vigor till an advanced age. He married in Philadelphia in 1807, and had two sons, John de Barth, who entered the navy, and Louis Augustus de Barth, who was graduated at West Point in 1834, and died a captain of ordnance, 26 June, 1853.

WALBRIDGE, Arthur Dewey, musical composer, b. in Gaines, Orleans co., N. Y., 10 April, 1843; d. in Rochester, N. Y., 14 Dec., 1872. After graduation at Princeton in 1867 he studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1871, and practised in Rochester. He was the author of the words and music of several popular songs, including "Now I lay me down to Sleep" (1866); "Sleeping where the Daisies grow" (1870); "Baby meets me on the Stairs" (1871); and college songs.

WALBRIDGE, Hiram, lawyer, b. in Ithaca, N. Y., 2 Feb., 1821; d. in New York city, 6 Dec., 1870. He removed to Ohio with his parents at an early age, was educated at the university of that state, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1842, was elected colonel of militia the same year, and in 1843 he was appointed brigadier-general. With others he formed a plan to establish four newspapers in Texas, to advocate the independence of that country, and to create an anti-annexation sentiment; but the annexation of Texas rendered their enterprise futile, and Walbridge returned to Toledo, whence he removed to New York in 1847 to engage in commercial transactions. He was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving from 5 Dec., 1853, till 3 March, 1855, and advocating a Pacific railroad bill and the introduction of a bill to regulate the militia of the seas, which attracted public attention. He was a personal friend of President Lincoln, and during the war he frequently addressed the boards of trade in western cities, advocating a support of the government. He was vice-president of the National commercial convention at Chicago, and subsequently presided at similar conventions in Detroit and Louisville. At these meetings he advocated free banking, a reduction of taxation, and the development of the resources of the west.—His brother, HENRY S. (1809-1869), served in congress as a Whig from 1 Dec., 1851, till 3 March, 1853, and was a judge of the supreme court of New York. He was killed in a railroad accident in the Bergen tunnel, near Hoboken, N. J.

WALCOT, Charles Melton, actor, b. in London, England, in 1815; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 10 May, 1868. He was educated at Eton, and became an architect, but left his profession for the stage, came to this country, made his first appearance in 1839 in Charleston, S. C., and acquired popularity. He frequently played at the old Olympic theatre and at Wallack's, but in 1866 removed to Philadelphia. He was particularly excellent in eccentric comedy, and was also a prolific playwright. Among his original and arranged plays are "The Course of True Love" (1839); "Washington, or Valley Forge" (1842); "The Custom of the Country" (1848); "The Haunted Man" (1848); "David Copperfield" (1848); "Hoboken" (1849); "Edith" (1849); "One Cast for Two Suits" (1854); "Hiawatha" (1855); and "A Good Fellow" (1857). His songs include "My Love is a Sailor Boy" and "My own Little Rose."—His son, Charles Melton, actor, b. in Boston, Mass., 1 July, 1840, was graduated at St. John's college, Fordham, N. Y., in 1858, and in that year made his début in Charleston. He is successful in light comedy and is a member of the Lyceum theatre company of New York.

WALCOTT, Charles Doolittle, palæontologist, b. in New York Mills, N. Y., 31 March, 1850. He was educated in public schools in Utica, N. Y., and in 1870 turned his attention to geological work in the central part of the state. In 1876 he became assistant to James Hall, the state geologist, and in 1879 he was appointed assistant geologist on the U. S. geological survey. His first work was in southern Utah, and in 1882 he was engaged in the survey of the Eureka district in Nevada. In 1883 he investigated the geology of the Grand cañon of the Colorado, and in 1884 devoted his attention to the Cambrian geology of New York and eastern Vermont. Subsequently he was engaged in examining the deposits of Deer creek coal-field in Arizona and the palæozoic area in central Texas. In June, 1883, he was appointed palæontologist in charge of the palæozoic division of invertebrate palæontology of the U. S. geological survey. He is a member of scientific societies, and since 1882 has been a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science. His bibliography includes papers in scientific journals, the transactions of learned societies, and the volumes of the U. S. geological survey.

WALDECK, Jean Frédéric de, archæologist, b. in Paris, France, 16 March, 1766; d. there, 30 April, 1875. When nineteen years of age he went with Levaillant to the Cape of Good Hope, and made explorations in South Africa. On his return to Paris in 1788 he began to study art under the guidance of David and Prud'hon, and this experience enabled him to make authentic records of his travels, especially those in Central America. He was present at the siege of Toulon in 1793, and in 1794 joined the army in Italy. In 1798 he followed the expedition to Egypt, but did not serve, and, when Napoleon's plans failed, he decided to travel in Africa. With four companions, he left Assouan, crossed the desert of Dongola, and passed the Dji bel-el-Eumery. The four travellers, however, succumbed to fatigue and sickness, and De Waldeck alone lived to reach the coast, after four months of weary travel, danger, and privation. He returned to France, and subsequently embarked for the Mauritius, going from there to the Indian ocean. In 1819 he visited Chili with Lord Cochrane, and went upon an archæological expedition to Guatemala. He returned to England in 1822 and settled in London, where he was engaged in making the lithographs to illustrate a work by Capt. del Rio on the ruins of Palenque and Chiapas. From his own observations he was led to believe that these designs were incorrect, and he determined to visit the ruins. He left England for Mexico, as engineer for the silver-mines of Tlalpujahua, and, after remaining there a short time, visited the Toltec and Aztec ruins. The French government had granted him a pension of 2,000 francs in 1826, and with this encouragement he spent several years in studying the details of the Palenque ruins, making drawings of them and maps of the country, and collecting specimens of the flora and fauna. Having lost the greater part of his sketches and note-books, he was obliged to give up his researches, and returned to Europe after twelve years spent in America. On his return he pursued his archæological studies, and sold his drawings of the Palenque ruins to the French government. They were published in 1863, and De Waldeck was engaged to make the lithographs, though he had passed his hundredth year. Two of his Mexican pictures were exhibited in 1869, under the title of "Loisir du centenaire." In the same year he sent the senior editor of this work the original picture from which the accompanying portrait and autograph are taken. In 1870 he exhibited "Ruins of the Province of Tzendales." While in Mexico he discovered in a convent of nuns the unique copy of a work of Aretino, with illustrations by Jules Romain and Marc Antonio Raimondi, which had caused the banishment of the two artists, and had been confiscated and destroyed by the Inquisition, the copy deposited in the archives being afterward abstracted and finding its way to Mexico. M. de Waldeck was made a member of the Council of American archæology. He spent the last forty years of his life in Paris, retaining his faculties to the end. He published "Voyage archæologique et pittoresque dans la Yucatan" (Paris, 1837), and, with Brasseur de Bourbourg, "Monuments anciens du Mexique, Palenque, et autres ruines de l'ancienne civilisation" (1866).

WALDEN, John Morgan, M. E. bishop, b. in Lebanon, Warren co., Ohio, 11 Feb., 1831. He was graduated at Farmers' (now Belmont) college, near Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1852, and engaged in educational work for two years and in editorial work for four years, during the last year and a half of which he was editor and publisher of a free-state paper in Kansas. He was also a member of the Topeka legislature, and of the Leavenworth constitutional convention at the time of its adoption of a constitution in 1858, under which he was elected superintendent of public instruction. In September of that year he left Kansas and entered, as a minister, the Cincinnati conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, where he occupied several important posts. After a few years he was elected corresponding secretary of the Freedmen's aid commission, an undenominational society. He remained in this office until August, 1866, when, on the organization of the Freedmen's aid society of the Methodist Episcopal church, he was chosen its first corresponding secretary, and he has been officially connected with it ever since, being its president at the present time. In 1868 he was elected one of the publishing agents of the Western Methodist book concern, and he held that post sixteen years. He was a member of every general conference from 1868 till 1884, when he was elected bishop. He is a man of great industry and capacity for business, giving attention to everything that is committed to his care.

Count de Waldeck

John M. Walden

WALDERSEE, Mary, Countess von, b. in New York city, 3 Oct., 1837. She is the daughter of David Lee, a New York merchant, who left his widow and five children a large fortune. The second daughter, Blanche, married Augustus Charles Murray, a commander in the British navy, and the third, Josephine, married Baron August von Waechter, ambassador of the king of Würtemberg to the French court. The baroness sent for her youngest sister, Mary, to live with her in Paris, where she met and married Prince Frederick of Schleswig-Holstein-Sonderburg-

Augustenburg-Noër, who had been driven into exile by the Austro-Prussian army in 1864. Miss Lee, however, not wishing to be trammelled by the exacting etiquette that attaches to high rank, induced the prince to renounce his rights and titles as a member of the royal house of Denmark. He subsequently accepted from the emperor of Austria the title of Prince of Noër, the name of his principal estate. The prince died shortly after his marriage while on a visit to the Holy Land, 2 July, 1865, and the princess then returned to Paris, where she resided with the Baroness Waechter until the beginning of the Franco-Prussian war, when she accompanied the latter to Würtemberg. In 1871 she married Count von Waldersee, the successor of Field-Marshal von Moltke, and lived with him for some time at Hanover. There she soon became widely known through her interest in local charities. Since she has resided in Berlin she has been equally zealous in good works. She was for years the friend of Emperor Frederick William, of Germany, and of the Empress Victoria.

WALDO, Albigenice, surgeon, b. in Pomfret, Conn., 27 Feb., 1750; d. in Windham county, Conn., 29 Jan., 1794. He was educated by the clergyman of his native town, studied medicine, and acquired an extensive practice. On 1 July, 1775, he was appointed surgeon's mate of the 8th regiment, under Col. Jedediah Huntington, which was then stationed in Roxbury, but, owing to impaired health, he was discharged on 6 Sept., 1775. On 14 Dec., 1776, he was appointed by the committee of war of Connecticut chief surgeon of the ship "Oliver Cromwel," and on 3 April, 1777, he joined Col. Huntington's newly raised regiment as surgeon, and served in the campaigns in New Jersey and Pennsylvania. At Monmouth and Valley Forge his professional service in the inoculation for small-pox gained him much reputation. He was a friend of David Humphreys, who in his "Life of General Putnam," acknowledges Dr. Waldo's aid in its compilation. He was a founder of the Medical society in Windham county, which was the first society in Connecticut. Dr. Waldo left numerous medical and surgical treatises in manuscript, illustrated by well-executed drawings, and also a large collection of valuable historical documents. His diary at Valley Forge was published in the "Historical Magazine" (New York, 1861).

WALDO, Daniel, clergyman, b. in Windham, Conn., 10 Sept., 1762; d. in Syracuse, N. Y., 30 July, 1864. His early years were spent on his father's farm, and in 1778 he entered the Revolutionary army for a month's service during a time of imminent peril in New London. Afterward he enlisted as a volunteer in the service of the state. He was captured at the battle of Horseneck, and imprisoned in the sugar-house in New York, where he endured many hardships, but after two months he was exchanged, and then resumed his labors on the farm. After graduation at Yale in 1788 he studied theology, was licensed to preach by the association of Windham county, and from 1792 till 1809 was pastor of the Congregational church in West Suffolk, Conn., with the interval of a few months of missionary labor in Pennsylvania and New York. He then preached in Colchester, Salem, and Cambridgeport, Mass., and went to Rhode Island to labor in the cause of education under the protection of the Society for promoting Christian knowledge. He was also pastor in Harvard, Mass., and at Exeter, R. I., where he labored twelve years, after which he retired. In 1855, at the age of ninety-three, he was made chaplain of the house of representatives. He was familiarly known as "Father Waldo," and is one of several undoubted centenarians mentioned in this work.

WALDO, Leonard, astronomer, b. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 4 March, 1853. He was graduated at Marietta in 1873, and, after spending a few months at the Cincinnati observatory, entered the Columbia college school of mines and became assistant in astronomy in 1873. In the following year he was appointed assistant astronomer on the expedition that was sent to Hobart Town, Tasmania, to observe the transit of Venus. He was appointed assistant at the Harvard observatory in 1875, and continued there until 1880, after which, until 1887, he was astronomer in charge of the horological bureau of the Winchester observatory of Yale, where his work included the comparison of thermometers with standard instruments. He was also active in causing the introduction of a uniform time system in Connecticut. The degree of S. D. was conferred on him by Harvard for original investigations in 1879, and he received the degree of A. M. from Yale in 1880. He has contributed reports of his astronomical researches to scientific journals, and is the author of cyclopædia articles and popular papers on technical subjects.

WALDO, Samuel, soldier, b. in Boston, Mass., in 1696; d. on Penobscot river, Me., 23 May, 1759. His father, Jonathan, was a wealthy merchant of Boston, and was a brigadier-general at the capture of Louisburg. The son was a landed proprietor, resided at Falmouth, Me., and commanded a regiment at Louisburg. There were remarkable coincidences between his life and that of his friend, Sir William Pepperell. They lived in Maine, were councillors together, commanded regiments, and were together at Louisburg, passed a year together in England, were born the same year, and died nearly at the same time. His family exercised much influence in Maine on account of their immense estate. — His son, Samuel, jurist, b. in Maine in 1721; d. there, 16 April, 1770, was graduated at Harvard in 1743, and settled in Falmouth, where he was elected a member of the general court in 1744. In that year he was also commissioned a colonel in the British army. In 1753 he went to Europe with authority from his father to procure emigrants to settle the Waldo patent, and was successful in this mission. In 1760 he was appointed judge of probate for Cumberland county, retaining this office until his death, and thus holding the first probate courts in Maine. For eight years he was a member of the legislature.—Another son, Francis, b. in Falmouth, Me., in 1723; d. in London, England, in 1784, was graduated at Harvard in 1747. He was appointed collector of the first custom-house in Maine in 1758, his authority extending from Cape Porpus to the Kennebec, and held this post until 1770. In 1763 he issued, "in pursuance of strict orders from the surveyor-general, a proclamation against smuggling rum, sugar, and molasses, which had previously been winked at, and the officers were directed to execute the law with rigor." In 1762-'3 he was a representative to the general court from Falmouth, but, forfeiting the favor of the popular party, he was not re-elected. After the burning of Falmouth he went to England, and never returned, for in 1778 he was proscribed and banished as a loyalist, and his property, which passed to the state under the confiscation act, was sold in 1782.

WALDO, Samuel Lovett, artist, b. in Windham, Conn., 6 April, 1783; d. in New York city, 16 Feb., 1861. He had art instruction in his native state, and painted in Charleston, S. C. He went to London in 1806, and three years later opened a studio in New York, where he remained until his death. He was successful as a portrait-painter, and was elected an associate of the National academy in 1847. His likeness of Peter Reimsen is owned by the New York historical society, and several of his portraits are in the city-hall, New York. About 1812 William Jewett came to him for instruction, but proved so useful that they formed a partnership. They jointly executed several works, in which they were successful. Among these is one of John Trumbull, the painter, and another of Chief-Justice Andrew Kirkpatrick, of New Jersey.

WALDO, Samuel Putnam, author, b. in Connecticut in 1780; d. in Hartford, Conn., in March, 1826. He was the author of "Narrative of a Tour of Observation made during the Summer of 1817, by James Monroe, President of the United States, with Sketch of his Life" (Philadelphia, 1818; Hartford, 1820); "Memoirs of Gen. Andrew Jackson" (Hartford, 1820); "Life and Character of Stephen Decatur" (2d ed., Middletown, Conn., 1821); and "Biographical Sketches of Com. Nicholas Biddle, Paul Jones, Edward Preble, and Alexander Murray" (Hartford, 1823). He also prepared for publication Archibald Robbins's "Journal of the Loss of the Brig 'Commerce' upon the Western Coast of Africa." (See RILEY, JAMES.)

WALDRON, Richard, soldier, b. in Alcester, England, 2 Sept., 1615; d. in Dover, N. H., 27 June, 1689. He came to this country first in 1635, and, remaining two years, made some land purchases and returned to England. There he married, and came in 1640 to reside permanently at Coheco (now Dover), N. H. He was elected a representative to the general court at Boston in 1654-'76, and in 1666-'8 was speaker of the house, also in 1673, 1674, and 1679. In 1672 he was given commission as captain, and in 1674 he was made sergeant-major in the military forces of the province. In 1680 he became major-general. In January, 1680, he was elected one of the first councillors of the province. In 1681, upon the death of President John Cutts, Waldron was chosen as deputy president to fill the place made vacant. His command over the military forces threw him into constant association with the Indians. Owing to trouble in 1676, they treasured up a grudge against him, which culminated in his death thirteen years later in a barbarous manner.—His son, Richard, b.

in Dover, N. H., in 1650; d. there, 30 Nov., 1730, was deputy to the first assembly in 1680, a councillor in 1681, chief justice of the court of common pleas, judge of probate, and for many years chief military officer of New Hampshire. He represented Portsmouth, N. H., at Boston in 1691. In 1681 he married Hannah Cutts, a daughter of President Cutts, who died with her infant son the following year. In 1693 he married Eleanor, a daughter of Richard Vaughan, and grandniece of John Cutts.—Their son, Richard, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 21 Feb., 1694; d. there in 1753, was graduated at Harvard in 1712, was a judge and councillor and secretary of the province in 1737. He was for many years widely known as Secretary Waldron. He married Elizabeth Westbrook, daughter of Col. Thomas Westbrook, 31 Dec., 1718.—Their great-grandson, Edmund Quincy Sheafe, clergyman, b. in Dover, N. H., 6 July, 1812; d. in Pikesville, Md., 16 April, 1888, was graduated at Dartmouth in 1833, and was for many years a professor in New York and Philadelphia. Later he read law, and went into practice in Cincinnati in 1842. On 15 Dec., 1847, after becoming a convert to the Roman Catholic faith, and studying divinity under Bishop Kenrick, he was ordained priest. Before his ordination he was professor of belles-lettres in the University of St. Louis. His first pastorate was the southern half of New Jersey, and next the Cathedral church of Philadelphia, where he remained eight years, founding a Magdalen home, and St. Vincent's asylum for the care of infants. From 1857 till 1860 he had charge of St. Matthew's church at Washington, D. C. From 1860 till 1869 he was president of Borromeo college, Pikesville, Md. He resigned his office in 1869, and the last nine years of his life were spent in the seclusion of a home for aged and infirm clergymen in Pikesville.

WALDSEEMÜLLER, Martin (valt'-zay-muel'-ler). German geographer, b. in Freiburg about 1470; d. after 1522. He published an "Introduction to Cosmography, with the Four Voyages of Americus Vesputius" (1507), in which he advocated the application of the name America to the New World.

WALDSTEIN, Charles, archæologist, b. in New York city, 30 March, 1856. He studied at Columbia in 1871-'3 and at the University of Heidelberg in 1873-'5, where he received the degree of Ph. D. on completing his course. In 1876 he was at Leipsic, but in October of that year he went to London, where he studied in the British museum. He delivered a course of art lectures in the museum during that winter, then spent the greater part of the years 1878-'9 in Italy and Greece, and was present at the German excavation at Olympia. On his return to England in 1880 he delivered lectures in various places, becoming university lecturer in classical archæology in Cambridge in that year. His influence was soon felt by the art students there, and in 1882 he was made "reader" in Greek art in the university (a new form of professorship). He turned his attention toward founding a new archæological school, and for its purposes a museum of art has been created in connection with the Fitzwilliam museum, of which latter institution he has since 1883 been a director. In 1888, while still holding his appointments in Cambridge, he was called to the directorship of the American school of archæology at Athens. His reputation has been gained chiefly by his discoveries, among which are that the so-called "Apollos" are simply athletes, the identification of a head found in the Louvre as the work of Pheidias, and that of a Hermes in Ephesian silver-work on a paterna from Bernay in France. In April, 1883, he delivered a course of lectures before the Royal institute of Great Britain, and in 1886 he lectured at Columbia college, New York city. The honorary degrees of A. M. in 1882 and of L. H. D. in 1887 were conferred on him by Columbia, and those of A. M. in 1882 and Litt. D. in 1887 by Cambridge. Dr. Waldstein is one of the foreign editors of the "American Journal of Archaeology," and he has contributed on his specialties to journals on both sides of the Atlantic. He has also published "The Balance of Emotion and Intellect" (London, 1878) and "Essays on the Art of Pheidias" (1885).

WALES, James Albert, caricaturist, b. in Clyde, Ohio, 30 Aug., 1852; d. in New York, 6 Dec., 1886. After leaving school, he apprenticed himself to a wood-engraver in Toledo, but soon afterward went to Cincinnati, and thence to Cleveland, where he drew cartoons for the "Leader" during the presidential canvass of 1872. After working for some time in Chicago and Cleveland, he went to New York in 1873, and two years later secured an engagement on an illustrated newspaper. Afterward he was employed on "Puck," in which some of his best works appeared. In 1881 he went abroad, and after his return he became one of the founders of "The Judge," and was for some time its chief cartoonist. He returned to "Puck" in 1885. Wales was the only prominent caricaturist of the newer school who was a native American. He was clever at portraiture, and produced some excellent cartoons.

WALES, Philip Skinner, surgeon, b. in Annapolis, Md., 27 Feb., 1837. He was educated at the University of Maryland, and, after a course of study in the medical department there, settled in Baltimore, and finally in Washington. He entered the navy as an assistant surgeon, 7 Aug., 1856, was commissioned surgeon, 12 Oct., 1861, and served in the steamer "Fort Jackson," of the North Atlantic and Western Gulf squadrons, in 1862-'5. He was a member of the board of examiners in 1873-'4, commissioned medical inspector, 30 June, 1873, and appointed surgeon-general of the navy and chief of the bureau of medicine and surgery on 26 Jan., 1880, serving until 27 March, 1884. When President Garfield was shot he assisted in attendance for a short time. While he was chief of the bureau of medicine, unscrupulous clerks in his office contrived to defraud the government, and he was tried by a court-martial and suspended for five years for neglect of duty, though acquitted of all real responsibility for the acts of his subordinates. He is a member of various medical societies, and the author of "Mechanical Therapeutics" (Philadelphia, 1867); "A New Method of controlling the Velum Palati" in the New York "Medical Record" for November, 1875; "A New Rectal Dilator and Explorer" (Washington, 1877); and papers in the "American Journal of Medical Science" and in the "Philadelphia Medical and Surgical Reporter." He has in preparation a large work on medical science.

WALES, Salem Howe, journalist, b. in Wales, Hampden co., Mass., 4 Oct., 1825. He was educated at common schools and in Utica (N. Y.) academy, engaged in journalism, and was associated in the publication of the "Scientific American." He was president of the department of parks, New York city, in 1873, the Republican candidate for mayor of New York in 1874, president of the department of docks in 1876, and of the park commission in 1880-'5. He wrote a series of letters on European travel in 1855 and 1867 for the New York "Sun" and "Scientific American."

WALES, Samuel, educator, b. in Raynham, Mass., 2 March, 1748; d. in New Haven, Conn., 18 Feb., 1794. He was descended from Nathaniel Wales, an emigrant from England, who landed at Boston, Mass., in 1635. Samuel was graduated at Yale in 1767, was minister of Milford in 1770-'82, and in the latter year received the degree of D. D. from Yale, where he was professor of divinity from 12 June, 1782, till his death. He published "Dangers of Our National Prosperity," an election sermon (Hartford, 1785).—His son, John, senator, b. in New Haven, Conn., 31 July, 1783; d. in Wilmington, Del., 3 Dec., 1863, was graduated at Yale in 1801, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began practice in his native state. After practising for two years in Baltimore, he removed in 1815 to Wilmington, Del., where he continued to follow his profession for about thirty years. He was one of the original promoters of Delaware college, president of one of the oldest banks in Wilmington, and bore a principal part in obtaining the city charter, and in the earlier steps to construct the railway between Philadelphia and Baltimore by way of Wilmington. In 1845 Mr. Wales was appointed secretary of state of Delaware, and in March, 1849, he was elected to the U. S. senate to fill the unexpired term of John M. Clayton, who had entered the cabinet of President Taylor. Mr. Wales served in the senate till 3 March, 1851, when he was succeeded by James A. Bayard.

WALES, William, English astronomer, b. about 1734; d. in London, England, in 1798. He was sent by the British government to Hudson bay to observe the transit of Venus in 1769, and afterward accompanied Capt. James Cook on his second and third voyages, becoming on his return to England mathematical master of Christ's hospital and secretary to the board of longitude. Besides other works, he published "General Observations made at Hudson's Bay" (London, 1772).

WALKE, Henry, naval officer, b. in Princess Ann county, Va., 24 Dec., 1808. He was appointed from Ohio a midshipman in the navy, 1 Feb., 1827, became a passed midshipman, 10 June, 1833, and a lieutenant, 9 Feb., 1839, and during the Mexican war served in the Gulf squadron as executive of the bomb brig "Vesuvius," was present at the capture of Vera Cruz and participated in the expeditions to Alvarado, Tobasco, and Tuspan. He was promoted to commander, 14 Sept., 1855, and during the secession excitement in the southern states he was at Pensacola navy-yard, where he assisted in the removal of Lieut. Adam J. Slemmer's command to Fort Pickens, by which that fort was saved to the Union. In January, 1861, he was ordered to Vera Cruz, but took the responsibility of conveying the loyal officers, seamen, and marines, with their families, to New York, when the navy-yard was seized by the secessionists.

Henry Walke

He was court-martialed for this disobedience of orders, and reprimanded by the secretary of the navy; but as this reprimand was published by Sec. Gideon Welles, it was more of a compliment to him for his good judgment than a censure for the disobedience of orders. He commanded the steamer "Mount Vernon" from May till September, 1861, after which he was assigned to duty in the Mississippi river flotilla, where he served with ability until September, 1863. He commanded the gunboat "Taylor" and the squadron of gun-boats at the battle of Belmont in co-operation with Gen. Grant, by whom he was complimented for his services in protecting the retreat. He had the gunboat "Carondelet" in the engagement and capture of Fort Henry, 6 Feb., 1862, for which he, with other officers of Flag-Officer Foote's squadron, received a vote of thanks from congress and the state of Ohio. With the same vessel he was in the capture of Fort Donelson, 13-16 Feb., 1862, during which he bore the brunt of the engagement. In this ship he ran the batteries of Island No. 10, 17 March, 1862, a feat that had never been performed before by the Mississippi river flotilla. It was done at night during a violent storm with only the lightning and the flashes of the enemy's guns to indicate the course down the river. After this he led in the "Carondelet" at the battle at Fort Pillow, 11 May, 1862, and at Memphis, 6 June, 1862, when the Confederate gun-boats were captured and sunk, during which contest he chiefly engaged the ram "Arkansas." He was commissioned a captain, 16 July, 1862, and took command of the iron-clad ram "Lafayette," in which he ran the batteries at Vicksburg, and served in the battle of Grand Gulf, Miss., 29 April, 1863. He dispersed Gen. Richard Taylor's army at Simmsport, La., and blockaded the mouth of Red river, 4 June, 1863. He was transferred to the steamer "Fort Jackson," 24 July, 1863, and continued to render valuable services on the Mississippi river until 24 Sept., 1863, when he was detached and placed in command of the steamer "Sacramento" to chase the "Alabama." He was promoted to commodore, 25 July, 1866, and to rear-admiral, 13 July, 1870, and voluntarily went on the retired list, 26 April, 1871. He is the author of "Naval Scenes in the Civil War" (New York, 1877). He is a good artist, and his sketches of the scenes in the civil war are valuable additions to the above-mentioned work.

WALKEM, George Anthony, Canadian jurist, b. in Newry, Ireland, 14 Nov., 1834, and came to Canada with his father, Charles, who was on the Royal engineer staff in Canada. He was educated at McGill college, studied law, and was admitted to the bar of Lower Canada in 1855. He settled in British Columbia in 1862, was a member of the legislature for several years preceding the union in 1867, appointed a member of the executive council, 12 Jan., 1872, and was chief commissioner of lands and works from that date till 23 Dec., of the same year, when he became attorney-general. He held this portfolio till 11 Feb., 1874, when he became premier. He occupied the latter office again in 1878, was appointed puisne judge of the supreme court of British Columbia in 1882, and became revising-officer in 1885. In June, 1874, he was a delegate from British Columbia to England to present the case of that province on the subject of the differences between it and the Dominion government relative to the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway, which differences were amicably settled by the friendly intervention of Lord Carnarvon. Mr. Walkem is president of the Law society of British Columbia, a fellow of the Royal geographical society, and a member of the British association for the advancement of science.—His brother, Richard Thomas, lawyer, b. in Waterford, Ireland, 30 Sept., 1840, was educated at McGill college, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1865, and began practice in Kingston. He became queen's counsel in 1880, the same year was appointed professor of equity in Queen's university, Kingston, which chair he still fills, and since 1884 has been vice-president of the art-school. He has been a delegate to the synod of the diocese of Ontario for twenty years, and for fifteen years to the provincial synod. He published a work on "Wills" (Toronto, 1874), and "The Married Women's Property Acts" (1875).

WALKER, Abraham Joseph, jurist, b. near Nashville, Tenn., in 1818; d. in Montgomery, Ala., 25 April, 1872. He was graduated at Nashville university in 1838, admitted to the bar in 1841, and began practice at Jacksonville, Ala., in 1842. He became a successful lawyer and Democratic legislator, and in 1852 removed to Talladega. He was appointed one of the state chancellors in 1854, was judge of the state supreme court in 1856-'9, and its chief justice in 1859-'68.

WALKER, Alexander, journalist, b. in Fredericksburg, Va., 13 Oct., 1819. He received a good education, taught while pursuing legal studies, was graduated at the law department of the University of Virginia, and removed to New Orleans, La., where he practised law and became a journalist at the same time. He was the editor of the "Jeffersonian," which was established as the organ of the Louisiana Democracy, and afterward of the "Delta," the "Times," the "Herald," the "Picayune," and for some time of the Cincinnati "Enquirer." He was appointed judge of the city court of New Orleans by the governor, and in January, 1861, was a member of the secession convention of Louisiana. He has published "Jackson and New Orleans" (New York, 1856); "Life of Andrew Jackson"; and, during the civil war, "History of the Battle of Shiloh" (New Orleans) and "Butler at New Orleans."

WALKER, Amasa, political economist, b. in Woodstock, Conn., 4 May, 1799; d. in Brookfield, Mass., 29 Oct., 1875. He received a district-school education in North Brookfield, where among his fellow-students was William C. Bryant. In 1814 he entered commercial life, and in 1820 formed a partnership with Allen Newell in North Brookfield, but three years later withdrew to become the agent of the Methuen manufacturing company. In 1825 he formed with Charles G. Carleton the firm of Carleton and Walker, of Boston, Mass., but in 1827 he went into business independently. In 1840 he withdrew permanently from commercial affairs, and in 1842 he went to Oberlin, Ohio, on account of his great interest in the college

there, and gave lectures on political economy at that institution until 1848. After serving in the legislature, he became the Free-soil and Democratic candidate for speaker, and in 1849 was chosen to the Massachusetts senate, where he introduced a plan for a sealed-ballot law, which was enacted in 1851, and carried a bill providing that Webster's Dictionary should be introduced into the common schools of Massachusetts. He was elected secretary of state in 1851, re-elected in 1852, and in 1853 was chosen a member of the convention for revising the state constitution, becoming the chairman of the committee on suffrage. He was appointed in 1853 one of the examiners in political economy in Harvard, and held that office until 1860, and in 1859 he began an annual course of lectures on that subject in Amherst, which he continued until 1869. Meanwhile, in 1859, he was again elected to the Massachusetts legislature, and in 1860 he was chosen a member of the electoral college of that state, casting his ballot for Abraham Lincoln. He was also elected as a Republican to congress, and served from 1 Dec., 1862, till 3 March, 1863. Mr. Walker is best known for his work in advocating new and reformatory measures. In 1839 he urged a continuous all-rail route of communication between Boston and Mississippi river, and during the same year he became president of the Boston temperance society, the first total abstinence association in that city. He was active in the anti-slavery movement, though not to the extent of recommending unconstitutional methods for its abolition, and in 1848 he was one of the founders of the Free-soil party. Mr. Walker was a member of the first International peace congress in London in 1843, and was one of its vice-presidents, and in 1849 he held the same office in the congress in Paris. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Amherst in 1867. In 1857 he began the publication of a series of articles on political economy in "Hunt's Merchant's Magazine," and he was accepted as an authority on questions of finance. Besides other contributions to magazines, he published "Nature and Uses of Money and Mixed Currency" (Boston, 1857), and "Science of Wealth, a Manual of Political Economy" (1866), of which eight editions have been sold, and it has been translated into Italian. With William B. Calhoun and Charles L. Flint he issued "Transactions of the Agricultural Societies of Massachusetts" (7 vols., 1848-'54).—His son, Francis Amasa, statistician, b. in Boston, Mass., 2 July, 1840, was graduated at Amherst in 1860, and began the study of law under Charles Devens, and George F. Hoar in Worcester. He joined the 15th Massachusetts volunteers, commanded by Col. Devens, on 1 Aug., 1861, as sergeant-major, and became assistant adjutant-general of the brigade under Gen. Darius N. Couch on 14 Sept., 1861, with the rank of captain. On 11 Aug., 1862, he was made adjutant-general of Gen. Couch's division, with the rank of major, and he was promoted colonel on the staff of the 2d army corps, 23 Dec., 1862. Thereafter he continued with that corps as adjutant-general, serving successively on the staffs of Gen. Gouverneur K. Warren and Gen. Winfield S. Hancock, and was severely wounded at Chancellorsville, 1 May, 1863, and captured at Ream's Station, 25 Aug., 1864. He was confined in Libby prison, in consequence of which his health was impaired, so that he resigned on 12 Jan., 1865. The brevet of brigadier-general of volunteers was conferred on him on 13 March, 1865. He taught Latin and Greek at Williston seminary during 1865-'7, and then was assistant editor of the

"Springfield Republican." In 1869 he became chief of the bureau of statistics in the treasury department at Washington, and in 1870-'2 he held the office of superintendent of the 9th census. During 1871-'2 he was also commissioner of Indian affairs. He was called to the professorship of political economy and history in the Sheffield scientific school of Yale in 1873, and held that chair till 1881, when he was elected to the presidency of the Massachusetts institute of technology. Meanwhile, from May till November, 1876, he was chief of the bureau of awards at the World's fair in Philadelphia, and during 1879-'81 he was superintendent of the 10th census while on leave of absence from Yale. He held the lectureship on tenure of land at Harvard in 1883. While residing in New Haven he was a member of the city and state boards of education, and on his removal to Boston, Mass., he was called on to serve similarly in that state. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Amherst in 1863 and by Yale in 1873, that of Ph. D. by Amherst in 1875, and that of LL. D. by Amherst and Yale in 1881, by Harvard in 1883, by Columbia in 1887, and by St. Andrews, Scotland, in 1888. He was U. S. commissioner to the International monetary conference in Paris in 1878, and was elected in 1878 to the National academy of sciences. He is president of the American statistical society and of the American economic association, and is an honorary fellow of the Royal statistical society of London. His writings include annual reports as superintendent of the 9th census (3 vols., Washington, 1870-'2), as commissioner of Indian affairs (1872), as superintendent of the 10th census (3 vols., 1879-'81), and as president of the Massachusetts institute of technology (5 vols., Boston, 1883-'8); and he has compiled "Commerce and Navigation of the United States" (2 vols., Washington, 1868-'9); "Ninth Census" (4 vols., 1872-'3); "Statistical Atlas of the United States" (1874); "Judges' Reports on Awards" (8 vols., Philadelphia, 1878); and "Tenth Census" (24 vols., Washington, 1883 et seq.). President Walker is the author of "The Indian Question" (Boston, 1874); "The Wages Question" (1876); "Money" (1878); "Money, Trade, and Industry" (1879); "Land and its Rent" (1883); "Political Economy" (New York, 1883); and "History of the Second Army Corps" (1886).

WALKER, Benjamin, soldier, b. in England in 1753; d. in Utica, N. Y., 13 Jan., 1818. He settled in New York at an early age, became a merchant, served in the Revolution as captain in the 2d New York regiment, and was aide-de-camp to Baron Steuben, and in 1781-'2 to Gen. Washington. After the war he was secretary to the governor of New York, and then became a broker in New York city. He was naval officer of New York under Washington's administration, and was a representative in congress from New York in 1801-'3. In 1797 he became agent of the vast estates of the Earl of Bute in central New York, and he was identified with the progress and growth of Utica.

WALKER, Charles Manning, journalist, b. in Athens, Ohio, 25 Dec., 1834. He was graduated at the University of Ohio in 1854, was clerk in the U. S. treasury department from May, 1861, till November, 1862; 5th auditor U. S. treasury from November, 1862, till July, 1869; and chief clerk in the post-office department from July, 1883, till July, 1885. He has been for many years an editorial writer on the Indianapolis "Journal," and has published "History of Athens County, Ohio, and incidentally of the Ohio Land Company," and the "First Settlement of the State at Marietta, with Personal and Biographical Sketches of the Early Settlers" (2 vols., Cincinnati, 1869); "Life of Oliver P. Morton" (Indianapolis, 1877); "Life of Alvin P. Hovey" (1888).

WALKER, Cornelius, clergyman, b. near Richmond, Va., 12 June, 1819. His education and training were obtained at the Episcopal high-school at Richmond. He was ordained deacon in St. Paul's church, Alexandria, 12 July, 1845, by Bishop Meade, and priest in Grace church, Lexington, 23 Sept., 1846, by the same prelate. He was minister in Amherst county, Va., in 1845-'7, assistant minister in St. Paul's church, Richmond, in 1847-'8, rector of Christ church, Winchester, in 1848-'60, of Christ church, Alexandria, in 1860-'1, and of Emmanuel church, Henrico, in 1862-'6. He was appointed professor of church history in the Theological seminary of Virginia in 1866, and served for ten years, when he was made professor of systematic divinity and homiletics. The degree of D. D. was given him by William and Mary college in 1859. Dr. Walker has been a frequent contributor to reviews and magazines, and has furnished articles on "Liturgies," "Evidences of Christianity," "Ecclesiastical History," and other similar subjects for religious cyclopædias. He has published "Biography of Rev. William Duval, City Missionary" (Richmond, 1854); "Life and Correspondence of Rev. William Sparrow, D. D., Professor in the Theological Seminary, Va." (Philadelphia, 1876); "Biography of the Rev. Charles W. Andrews, D. D." (1877); and "Sorrowing not without Hope" (New York, 1887).

WALKER, Freeman, senator, b. in Charles City county, Va., 25 Oct., 1780; d. in Richmond county, Ga., 23 Sept., 1827. He removed to Georgia in 1797, was admitted to the bar, and began practice in 1802 in Augusta, soon becoming eminent in his profession. In 1807 he was a member of the legislature, and in 1819 he was elected United States senator from Georgia, but in 1821 he resigned. His speech on the Missouri compromise question attracted general attention.

WALKER, George, senator, b. in Culpepper county, Va., in 1768; d. in Nicholasville, Ky., in 1819. He was an early settler in Kentucky, where he held a leading place at the bar, and was a member of the legislature. He was appointed U. S. senator from Kentucky in place of George M. Bibb, resigned, serving from 10 Oct., 1814, till 2 Feb., 1815.

WALKER, George, diplomatist, b. in Peterborough, N. H., in 1824; d. in Washington, D. C., 15 Jan., 1888. He was educated at Yale and at Dartmouth, where he was graduated in 1842, and studied law at Harvard, where he received his degree in 1845. He was admitted to the bar at Springfield, Mass., practising law there from 1847 till 1875, was elected to the Massachusetts senate in 1857, was re-elected, and in 1868 was a member of the lower house. He was instrumental in introducing the national system of banking into the state, engaged in business in Springfield, Mass., and became president of the Third national bank of that city. In 1865 he was sent to Europe on a confidential mission by Sec. Hugh McCulloch, and wrote an article on the public debt and resources of the United States, which was published in the "Revue des deux mondes" and republished in German papers. In 1869 he visited Europe on business connected with the state of Massachusetts, and on his return settled in New York city, engaged in banking, and was elected vice-president of the Gold and stock telegraph company. In 1879 he was sent to Europe on a confidential mission by Sec. William M. Evarts, visited England, France, and Germany, and made investigations with special reference to the question of a bimetallic monetary standard. He was consul-general in Paris from 1880 till 1887, when he resigned, returned to this country, and resided in Washington, D. C., till his death.

WALKER, Gilbert Carlton, congressman, b. in Binghamton, N. Y., 1 Aug., 1832; d. in New York city, 11 May, 1885. He was graduated at Hamilton college in 1854, admitted to the bar in 1855, and settled in Oswego, N. Y. He removed to Chicago, Ill., in 1859, and engaged in politics while practising his profession. In 1864 he settled in Norfolk, Va., where he became president of the Exchange national bank, and in July, 1869, he was elected governor of Virginia by a majority of 18,000 over Henry H. Wells, who was at that time military governor of the state. At the expiration of his service he was chosen to congress as a Conservative, serving from 1875 till 1879. He resumed his profession in 1879, and removed to New York city.

WALKER, Henderson, governor of North Carolina, b. in North Carolina in 1660; d. near Edenton, N. C., 14 April, 1704. He adopted the profession of law, and became a judge of the supreme court and president of the council, introducing many judicial reforms. From 1699 until his death he was governor of North Carolina, assuming that post by virtue of his office as president of the council, and not under any appointment as deputy by the governor-general at Charleston. George Bancroft says of his rule, "While England was engaged in world-wide wars, here the inhabitants multiplied and spread in the enjoyment of peace and liberty." The stone that marks Walker's grave also records that "North Carolina, during his administration, enjoyed tranquillity."

WALKER, Sir Hovenden, British officer, b. in Somersetshire, England, about 1660; d. in Dublin, Ireland, in January, 1726. He entered the navy in his youth, became a captain in 1692, and rear-admiral of the white in 1710, and in 1711 was knighted by Queen Anne. In the last-named year he commanded the fleet that sailed from Boston on 30 July, for the conquest of Canada. Delays, a badly organized method of supplies, and the incompetency of its leaders made the expedition a failure. Half of Walker's ships were wrecked in a storm on Isle aux Œufs, on St. Lawrence river, and Walker returned to England, where he charged that his troubles had been due to want of proper co-operation on the part of the New-Englanders. These charges were answered by Jeremiah Dummer in a "Letter to a Noble Lord concerning the Late Expedition to Canada" (London, 1712). In 1715 Walker's ship, the "Edgar," of seventy-four guns, blew up at Spithead, and nearly all the crew perished. He was blamed for negligence in the matter, and, his Canadian experience being still fresh in the public mind, he was dismissed the service. He then settled on a plantation in South Carolina. Admiral Walker published in his vindication "A Journal or Full Account of the Late Expedition to Canada" (London, 1720).

WALKER, Isaac P., senator, b. in Virginia in 1813; d. in Milwaukee, Wis., 1 April, 1872. He adopted the profession of law, removed to Wisconsin in 1841, practised in Milwaukee, and took an active part in early political events in the state. He served in the territorial congress in 1847-'8, and in the latter year was chosen to the U. S. senate as an Anti-slavery Democrat. His policy in that body was deemed timid by his constituents, for, although he wished to preserve the Union, he did not properly represent their attitude on the Wilmot proviso. He was not returned in the next election, retired from politics, and resumed the practice of law in Milwaukee.

WALKER, James, president of Harvard, b. in Burlington, Mass., 16 Aug., 1794; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 23 Dec., 1874. He was graduated at Harvard in 1814, studied theology at Cambridge, and was pastor of the Unitarian church in Charlestown for twenty-one years. During this period he was active in his parochial duties and in advocating the cause of school and college education, lectured extensively and with success, and was a close student of literature and philosophy. In 1831-'9 he was an editor of the "Christian Examiner." He resigned his pastorate in July, 1839, the following September became professor of moral and intellectual philosophy in Harvard, was elected its president in 1853, and held office till his resignation in 1860. He devoted the remainder of his life to scholarly pursuits, and left his valuable library and $15,000 to Harvard. That college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1835, and Yale that of LL. D. in 1860. He published numerous sermons, addresses, and lectures, including three series of lectures on "Natural Religion," and a course of Lowell institute lectures on "The Philosophy of Religion"; "Sermons preached in the Chapel of Harvard College" (Boston, 1861); a "Memorial of Daniel Appleton White" (1863); and a "Memoir of Josiah Quincy" (1867). After his death a volume of his "Discourses" appeared (1876). He also edited, as college text-books, Dugald Stewart's "Philosophy of the Active and Moral Powers" (1849), and Dr. Thomas Reid's "Essays on the Intellectual Powers, Abridged, with Notes and Illustrations from Sir William Hamilton and Others" (1850). See "Memorial" (Cambridge, 1875), and "Services at the Dedication of a Mural Monument to James Walker in the Harvard Church in Charlestown" (1884).

WALKER, James Barr, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 29 July, 1805; d. in Wheaton, Ill., 6 March, 1887. His father died when the son was a child, and he and his widowed mother resided near Pittsburg, where James worked in a factory, was errand-boy in a country store, and then labored four years in a printing-office. At the age of twenty he walked to New York, where he became clerk in the office of Mordecai M. Noah, and he was afterward a teacher in New Durham, N. J. He then studied law in Ravenna, Ohio, was graduated at Western Reserve college in 1831, and then edited successively the "Ohio Observer" at Hudson, the "Watchman of the Valley" at Cincinnati, and the "Watchman of the Prairies" at Chicago (now the "Advance")—all religious newspapers. He also engaged in the publication and sale of books, but abandoned it for the ministry, and in 1841 was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Chicago. He then resided in Mansfield, Ohio, where he established a private asylum for orphans, and he was for some time acting pastor of a church in Sandusky. He was lecturer on the harmony between science and revealed religion at Oberlin college and Chicago theological seminary. Western Reserve college gave him the degree of D. D. Dr. Walker was the author of "The Philosophy of the Plan of Salvation," published anonymously under the editorship of Prof. Calvin E. Stowe (Boston, 1855), which went through several editions in England, and has been translated into five foreign languages, including Hindustanee; "God revealed in Nature and in Christ," in opposition to theories of development (1855); "Philosophy of Scepticism and Ultraism" (1857); "Philosophy of the Divine Operation in the Redemption of Man" (London, 1862); "Poems" (1862); "Living Questions of the Age" (Chicago, 1869); and "Doctrine of the Holy Spirit" (1870).

WALKER, James Bradford Richmond, clergyman, b. in Taunton, Mass., 15 April, 1821. He was graduated at Brown in 1841, and at Andover theological seminary in 1846, was ordained the next year, and in 1847-'53 served as pastor of a Congregational church in Bucksport, Me. He occupied a charge in Holyoke, Mass., in 1855-'64, in Hartford in 1864-'7, and subsequently has devoted himself to literary pursuits there, and in Boston, where he now resides. He has published "Memorial of the Walkers of the Old Plymouth Colony" (Northampton, Mass., 1861); and "The Genealogy of John Richmond" (1866).

WALKER, James Daniel, senator, b. in Logan county, Ky., 13 Dec., 1830. He removed to Arkansas in 1847, was educated in private schools and at Ozark institute, Ark., studied law, and was admitted to practice in Fayetteville, Ark., in 1850. During the civil war he served as colonel of an Arkansas regiment in the Confederate army. After the war he resumed the practice of his profession, was solicitor-general of the state of Arkansas, a presidential elector in 1876 on the Tilden and Hendricks ticket, and in 1878 was chosen to the U. S. senate as a Democrat, serving till 3 March, 1885.

WALKER, James Murdock, lawyer, b. in Charleston, S. C., 10 Jan., 1813; d. there, 18 Sept., 1854. He was graduated at the College of South Carolina in 1830, studied law under Mitchell King, and in 1834 was admitted to the bar, where he attained high reputation. He served several terms in the legislature, and was active in benevolent and educational enterprises. Mr. Walker published "The State vs. The Bank of South Carolina" (Charleston, 1836); "An Inquiry concerning the Use and Authority of Roman Jurisprudence in the Law concerning Real Estate" (1850); "The Theory of Common Law" (1852); and a "Tract on Government" (1853).

WALKER, James Perkins, publisher, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., in 1829; d. in Boston, Mass., 10 May, 1868. He engaged in literary pursuits at an early age, becoming a contributor to the religious press, and editing the "Oriental Annual" in New York in 1857, the "Religious Educator" in 1860-'1, "The Altar at Home," and subsequently was a member of the publishing-house of Walker, Wise, and Co. in Boston, Mass. He published "Faith and Patience," a story for boys (Boston, 1860); "Book of Raphael's Madonnas" (1860); and "Sunny-Eyed Tim" (1861). See a "Memoir" of him, with selections from his writings (1869).

WALKER, Jesse, missionary, b. in North Carolina about 1760; d. in Cook county, Ill., 5 Oct., 1835. He emigrated to Tennessee about 1800, became a travelling preacher in the western conference of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1802, and served in Tennessee and Kentucky till 1806, when he was appointed a missionary to Illinois. He engaged in revival work in that state with great success, erected churches, and established congregations. He was then appointed to Missouri, where his lessons of temperance and industry exercised a beneficial influence on the pioneer community. He became presiding elder of the Illinois district in 1812, conference missionary in 1819, and in 1820 built the first Methodist Episcopal church and formed the first Methodist Episcopal congregation in St. Louis, Mo. At that time there were only three persons of that denomination in the town.

He went on a mission to the Mississippi river Indians in 1823, established several schools, and is credited with many converts. "Father Walker," as he was called, was without early advantages of education, but by his shrewd common sense, and by ignoring all personal needs, as well as difficulties, did efficient work in the pioneer ministry.

WALKER, John, Canadian manufacturer, b. in Inverary, Argyllshire, Scotland, 24 Jan., 1832. He was educated at his native place and at Stirling academy, and came to Canada in 1864. He served in the Fort Erie Fenian affair of 1866, and afterward was attached to the militia, from which he retired in 1884 with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. Mr. Walker was vice-president of the first Canada Pacific railway company, and president of the School of art and design, is active in various financial and industrial societies, and was one of the founders of the London, Ont., Protestant orphans' home. In 1865 he purchased for Scotch capitalists the large tract of oil-producing land that belonged to George Brown, and afterward he erected chemical works and an oil-refinery at London, Ont. In 1874 he was chosen to the Canadian parliament; but his election was contested in the courts, he was unseated, and in the second appeal to the constituency failed of election. He was afterward registrar of deeds for Middlesex county, Ontario.

WALKER, John Grimes, naval officer, b. in Hillsborough, N. H., 20 March, 1835. He was graduated at the U. S. naval academy in 1856, promoted to master, 22 Jan., 1858, and became lieutenant, 23 Jan., 1858. During the civil war he served on the Atlantic coast blockade in the steamer "Connecticut" in 1861, and was transferred to the steamer "Winona" of the Western Gulf blockading squadron in 1862. In this vessel he participated in the engagements that ended in the capture of New Orleans, with the subsequent operations against Vicksburg in 1862. He was promoted to lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, and had command of the river iron-clad "Baron de Kalb" of the Mississippi squadron in 1862-'3, in which he participated in the attacks on Vicksburg and operations in Yazoo river in the winter of 1862-'3, co-operating with Gen. William T. Sherman and the army. He participated in both attacks on Haines's Bluff, in the Yazoo river expedition against the Confederate gun-boats, in the capture of Fort Hindman and Yazoo City, and in the attack on Fort Pemberton. For these services he was highly commended by Admiral Porter in his report, and also in his "Naval History of the Civil War." After he had forced a passage through Yazoo pass, he took command of the naval battery with cannon from the gun-boats in the bombardment of Vicksburg from the rear, which contributed greatly to the final surrender. After the fall of that place he had command of the naval expedition against Yazoo river in co-operation with 5,000 troops in transports. Walker led in the "De Kalb," and while engaging the batteries his vessel ran foul of a torpedo, which exploded and caused the vessel to sink almost instantly, a second torpedo exploding under her stern as she went down. He commanded the steamer "Saco" on the North Atlantic blockade in 1864, and the "Shawmut" in 1865, in which he participated in the capture of forts near Wilmington. He was promoted and advanced over others for his services during the war to the grade of commander on 25 July, 1866, served at the naval academy in 1866-'9, and commanded the frigate "Sabine" on a special cruise in 1869-'70. He was promoted to captain, 25 June, 1877, appointed chief of the bureau of navigation and office of detail, 22 Oct., 1881, for four years, and reappointed in 1885 for a second term. He is the senior captain on the list, and is entitled to be promoted to commodore upon the first occurrence of a vacancy.

WALKER, John Williams, senator, b. in Virginia in 1789; d. in Huntsville, Ala., 23 April, 1823. He was graduated at Princeton in 1806 with the valedictory, and studied law. In 1810 he settled in Huntsville, Ala., where he followed his profession, and was several times elected to the legislatures of Mississippi and Alabama. He presided over the convention that framed the first constitution of Alabama, and was elected its first U. S. senator, but resigned after a year on account of the failure of his health.—His son, Leroy Pope, lawyer, b. near Huntsville, Ala., 8 July, 1817; d. there, 22 Aug., 1884, studied law, attained a high place at the bar of northern Alabama, early entered public life, was speaker of the Alabama house of representatives in 1847-'50, and served as judge of the state circuit court in 1850-'3. He became well known as an advocate of the policy of internal improvement and of secession, and in 1861-'2 was Confederate secretary of war, directing the military operations by which the civil war was begun. He was also commissioned brigadier-general in the Confederate army, but resigned, 1 March, 1862. After the war he resumed the practice of law at Huntsville.

WALKER, Jonathan, reformer, b. on Cape Cod, Mass., in 1799; d. near Muskegon, Mich., 1 May, 1878. He was captain of a fishing vessel, in his youth, but about 1840 he went to Florida, where he became a railroad-contractor. He was interested in the condition of the slaves, and in 1844 aided several of them in an attempt to make their escape in an open boat from the coast of Florida to the British West Indies. After doubling the capes, he was prostrated by illness, and the crew being ignorant of navigation, they would all have been drowned had they not been rescued by a wrecking-sloop that took Walker to Key West, whence he was sent in irons to Pensacola. On his arrival there he was put in prison, chained to the floor, and deprived of light and proper food. Upon his trial in a U. S. court, he was convicted, sentenced to be heavily fined, put on the pillory, and branded on his right hand with a hot iron with the letters "S. S.," for "slave-stealer," a U. S. marshal executing the sentence. He was then remanded to jail, where he was confined eleven months, and released only after the payment of his fine by northern Abolitionists. For the subsequent five years he lectured on slavery in the northern and western states. He removed to Michigan about 1850, where he resided near Muskegon until his death. A monument was erected to his memory on 1 Aug., 1878. He was the subject of John G. Whittier's poem "The Man with the Branded Hand." See "Rise and Fall of the Slave Power in America," by Henry Wilson (Boston, 1874).

WALKER, Joseph Reddeford, guide, b. in Knoxville, Tenn., in 1798; d. in Ignacio valley, Contra Costa co., Cal., 27 Oct., 1876. He removed to Jackson county, Mo., in 1818, began his career as a guide on the frontier in 1822, served in that capacity with Capt. Bonneville's expedition to the Rocky mountains in 1832, conducted a party from Great Salt Lake to California in 1833, when he discovered the Yosemite lake and valley and the river that bears his name, found Walker's pass in 1834, and made many subsequent trips across the plains. He resided in Contra Costa county, Cal., during his later life.

WALKER, Katherine Kent Child, author, b. in Pittsford, Vt., about 1840. She is a daughter of the Rev. Willard Child, D. D., and in 1863 married the Rev. Edward Ashley Walker, who was graduated at Yale in 1856, and died in 1866 after a brief pastorate at the Old South church, Worcester, Mass. She wrote a famous article on the "Total Depravity of Inanimate Things," which appeared originally in the "Atlantic Monthly" for September, 1864, has contributed to various magazines, and published a version of Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," for children (New York, 1869); "From the Crib to the Cross" (1869); and a "Life of Christ" (1869). She has also made translations from the German.

WALKER, Robert John, statesman, b. at Northumberland, Pa., 23 July, 1801; d. in Washington, D. C., 11 Nov., 1869. His father was a soldier of the Revolution, and a judge of the common pleas, of the high court of errors and appeals of Pennsylvania, and of the U. S. district court. After his graduation in August, 1819, at the state university at Philadelphia, with the first honor of a large class, he began the practice of law at Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1822, with great success. In 1826 he removed to Mississippi, where he entered vigorously into law and politics, taking an active part in 1832 and 1833 against nullification and secession. In January, 1833, in the Natchez "Journal," he made an extended argument against the doctrine of disunion and in favor of coercion against rebellious states, which was highly extolled by James Madison. In January, 1836, he was Union candidate for the U. S. senate in opposition to George Poindexter, and was elected, and at this time he influenced the legislature of Mississippi to adopt resolutions denouncing nullification and secession as treason. In 1840 he was re-elected to the U. S. senate by a two-to-one majority over the orator Sergeant S. Prentiss. During his service in the senate he took an active part in its debates, especially in opposition to John C. Calhoun. He supported the administrations of Andrew Jackson and Martin Van Buren; but when the latter disapproved of the annexation of Texas, Walker opposed him, and in the Baltimore convention of 1844 labored for the nomination of James K. Polk to the presidency. By Mr. Polk he was appointed secretary of the treasury, which office he held till 5 March, 1849. In his course in the senate Mr. Walker opposed the Bank of the United States and the distribution of the surplus revenue among the states, advocating, instead, its application to the public defences. He opposed a protective tariff, and in a speech on 3 March, 1836, proposed the celebrated Homestead bill. He sustained with much energy the treaty for suppressing the African slave-trade, and throughout his political career always and consistently advocated gradual emancipation, exhibiting his sincerity in 1838 by manumitting all his own slaves. He sustained New York in the McLeod case, and introduced and carried the resolution of 1837 recognizing the independence of Texas. He was the first to propose the annexation of Texas by a letter in the public prints in January, 1844, recommending, as a condition, a scheme for gradual emancipation and colonization, which was fiercely attacked by John C. Calhoun. While secretary of the treasury he prepared and carried the tariff of 1846, various loan bills, the warehousing system, the Mexican tariff, and the bill to organize the department of the interior. After leaving the treasury, he was offered by President Pierce in 1853 the post of commissioner to China, which he declined. The part that he took in the events that immediately preceded the civil war was active. He opposed the repeal of the Missouri compromise, though after it became a law he supported it on the ground that was assumed by Stephen A. Douglas. In 1857 he accepted the post of governor of Kansas on the pledge of President Buchanan that the state constitution should be submitted to the vote of the people; but after rejecting the forged and fraudulent returns in Kansas, and opposing the Lecompton constitution, Mr. Walker resigned, and, going before congress, defeated the attempt to force the corrupt measure on the territory. After Abraham Lincoln's election Mr. Walker took ground, earnestly and immediately, in favor of re-enforcing the southern forts and of sustaining the Union by force if necessary. In April, 1861, he addressed a great meeting in Union square, New York, advocating prompt and vigorous measures, and he did this when many of the best men of both parties deprecated a resort to extremities. His decided course had great influence in shaping the policy of the government. Early in 1863 he joined James R. Gilmore in the conduct of the "Continental Monthly," which the latter had established the year before to advocate emancipation as a political necessity, and he wrote for it some of its ablest political articles. In the same year he was appointed by the government financial agent of the United States in Europe, and succeeded in negotiating $250,000,000 of the 5-20 bonds. Returning to the United States in November, 1864, he devoted himself thereafter to a large law-practice in Washington, and to writing for the "Continental Monthly" articles on financial and political topics, in which he was understood to present the views of the state and treasury departments. During this period he was influential in procuring the ratification of the Alaska treaty and in securing the passage of the bill for a railroad to the Pacific. During his public life of nearly forty years Mr. Walker exercised a strong and often controlling influence on affairs. He had a broad and comprehensive mind, and a patriotism that embraced the whole country. As a financier he takes high rank.

WALKER, Thomas, planter, b. in Gloucester county, Va., 25 Jan., 1715; d. at Castle Hill, Albemarle co., Va., 9 Nov., 1794. His progenitor, Thomas, was an early settler of Virginia, and a member of the Provincial council in 1662. The younger Thomas was educated at William and Mary, adopted the profession of medicine, and settled in Fredericksburg, Va. In 1750 he went on an expedition to the west, and was probably the first white man that entered Kentucky, preceding Daniel Boone by thirteen years. His hatchet with which he marked the trees that divided the lands that he had bought from the Indians was discovered a few years ago, and is preserved in the Louisville, Ky., museum. Walker mountains in southwestern Virginia are named in his honor. He was commissary-general of Virginia troops under George Washington in Braddock's army, and was at that general's defeat in 1755. In 1768 he was a commissioner with Andrew Lewis on the part of Virginia to treat with the Six Nations of Indians at Fort Stanwix, N. Y. He was a member of the Virginia house of burgesses in 1775, organized a plan of defence, and served on the second general committee of safety. With his son, Col. John Walker, he was commissioned to treat with the Pittsburg, Pa., Indians in 1777, in order to conciliate them toward the colonists during the Revolution, and in 1778 he was president of the board of commissioners to determine the boundary-line between Virginia and North Carolina. Gen. Walker was the intimate friend of Gen. Washington, both his wives being near kinswomen of the latter, and he was the guardian of Thomas Jefferson. By his marriage with the widow of Nicholas Merriwether he came into possession of one of the most valuable landed properties in Virginia, known as the Castle Hill estate, which subsequently became the property of his relative, William C. Rives.—His son, John, senator, b. at Castle Hill, Albemarle co., Va., 13 Feb., 1744; d. in Orange county, Va., 2 Dec., 1809, was carefully educated, settled on his estate, Belvoir, Albemarle co., and engaged in planting. During the Revolution he was extra aide to Gen. Washington, who, in a letter addressed to Patrick Henry, dated Morristown, N. J., 24 Feb., 1777, explains his post as one of great trust and importance, and recommends him for "ability, honor, and prudence." In 1790 he was appointed by the governor U. S. senator in place of William Grayson, deceased, serving from 4 May, 1790, to 6 Dec. of the same year, when the senator that was chosen by the legislature took his seat. He married Elizabeth Moore, granddaughter of Gov. Alexander Spotswood. See the "Page Family in Virginia," by Richard C. M. Page (New York, 1883).

WALKER, Timothy, clergyman, b. in Woburn, Mass., 27 July, 1705; d. in Concord, N. H., 1 Sept., 1782. He was graduated at Harvard in 1725, studied theology, and was settled on 18 Nov., 1730, as first minister of the plantation of Penacook (now Concord, N. H.). He was soon called to lead his parishioners in a legal defence of the title to their farms, which they had paid for and wrested from the wilderness. Penacook, twenty-five miles beyond its nearest white neighbor at the time of its settlement, had been granted in 1726 by Massachusetts to 100 carefully selected settlers from her towns of Bradford, Andover, and Haverhill, who had at once improved their grant. The boundary-line between that province and New Hampshire was then undetermined, and the latter, claiming the same territory, granted it in 1727 to "the Proprietors of Bow," among whom were influential members of its government, who took no possession and made no improvements. When, in 1740, the settlement of this line threw the township into New Hampshire, the Bow claimants sought possession of it through suits brought in interested courts, which were uniformly decided in their favor, leaving, as their only hope, to the defendants of retaining their homes an appeal to the king in council. Mr. Walker, to prosecute an appeal, went to England three times, first in 1753, a second time in 1755, and a third in 1762, urging his cause as best he could until December, 1762, when the king in council decided that a change of provincial boundaries did not affect the title to private property that had been acquired in good faith. This decision substantially ended a controversy which had distressed his people for thirty years. Until the treaty of Paris in 1763 the situation of the town had exposed its inhabitants to the atrocities of the French and Indian wars. At times they lived in garrisons, and went armed to church, where their pastor preached to them with his gun in the pulpit. In his religious views Mr. Walker was a moderate Calvinist, approving the "half-way covenant" then in use, and opposing George Whitefield, against whom he preached a sermon (Boston, 1743). His scholarship was more than respectable, and his sermons and diaries show that he retained through life his early acquaintance with the classics. He acquired from necessity some knowledge of the law, and many of the early legal papers of his people are in his handwriting. He was an ardent patriot in the Revolution, and it was one of his greatest griefs that his son-in-law, Benjamin Thompson (afterward Count Rumford), embraced the Tory cause. He was the sole minister of Concord for fifty-two years.—His son, Timothy, jurist, b. in Concord, N. H., 26 June, 1737; d. there, 5 May, 1822, was graduated at Harvard in 1756, studied theology, and preached several years, but was never settled. At the opening of the Revolution he became an active participant in the resistance to British rule. He was a member of the 4th and 5th New Hampshire provincial congresses and of the first house of representatives in 1776 under the state constitution, and was one of the committee of the council and house to draft a declaration of independence. He was a member of the committee of safety from July, 1776, till January, 1777, a state councillor in 1777, and a senator in 1784. In 1788 he did his utmost to render operative the constitution of the United States by its ratification by New Hampshire as the ninth state. Upon the reorganization of the state courts in 1777 he was made a justice of the court of common pleas for Rockingham county, which office he held for twenty-three years. He took an active part in the conventions of 1778, 1781, and 1791, for amending the state constitution, and was four times elected a delegate to the Continental congress, but never took his seat. He was an early member of the Republican party, and its first candidate for governor. As his judicial duties permitted, he shared the business activities of his town, serving twenty-one years as moderator of its annual meetings, twenty-four years as chairman of its board of select-men, and forty-three years as clerk of its proprietary. He loved agriculture, and was continually improving his paternal estate.—The first Timothy's great-grandson, Joseph Burbeen, agriculturist, b. in Concord, N. H., 12 June, 1822, was graduated at Yale in 1844, studied law at Harvard, and was admitted to the New Hampshire bar in 1847. Subsequently he left the profession and devoted himself to the care of inherited estates, an extensive farm, and general business. Mr. Walker has been a director in various financial companies, and in 1847 was appointed a member of the board of trustees of the New Hampshire asylum for the insane, and subsequently became its secretary and financial agent. He has been vice-president of the New England historic-genealogical society, and took deep interest in founding the New Hampshire college of agriculture and the mechanic arts. He represented his city in the legislatures of 1866-'7. As chairman of a special committee, he drew and reported the bill that established the college, and he has been a trustee and lecturer before the students on drainage and irrigation, to which subjects he gave observation and study during extended travel in Europe. He has contributed much to historical research and to the agricultural interests of the state, and has published "Land Drainage"

(Nashua, 1871); "Forests of New Hampshire" (Concord, 1872); "Ezekiel Webster Dimond" (1877); "History of Town Meeting-House" (1881); "Prospective Agriculture in New Hampshire" (1883); "Rogers, the Ranger" (1885); "Oats" (Manchester, 1887); and other monographs.

WALKER, Timothy, jurist, b. in Wilmington, Mass., 1 Dec., 1806; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 15 Jan., 1856. He was graduated at Harvard in 1826, taught mathematics at the Round Hill school, Northampton, Mass., in 1826-'9, studied at Harvard law-school in the latter year and in 1830, and removed to Cincinnati in 1831, where he was admitted to the bar and settled in practice. With Judge John C. Wright he established the Cincinnati law-school in 1833, and when in 1835 it was united with Cincinnati college he assumed entire charge of that department, and was professor of law there till 1844. He was president-judge of Hamilton county court of common pleas in 1842-'3, founded the "Western Law Journal" in 1843, and was its editor for several years, at the same time practising his profession. Harvard gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1854. He translated Fischer's "Elements of Natural Philosophy" (Boston, 1827); was the author of "Elements of Geometry" (1828) and "An Introduction to American Law," for students (Philadelphia, Pa., 1837: revised ed., by J. Bryant Walker, 1869); and delivered several discourses, including "The Dignity of Law as a Profession" (Cincinnati, Ohio, 1837); "On the History and General Character of the State of Ohio" (1838); "John Quincy Adams" (1848); "The Reform Spirit of the Day," delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa society of Harvard (Boston, 1850); and "Daniel Webster," a memorial (1852).—His brother, Sears Cook, mathematician, b. in Wilmington, Mass., 28 March, 1805; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 30 Jan., 1853, was graduated at Harvard in 1825, and taught near Boston, and subsequently in Philadelphia, whither he removed in 1827. He built an observatory for the Philadelphia high-school in 1837, which was the first of importance in this country except that at Hudson, Ohio, and introduced a superior class of instruments. From its equipment in 1840 until 1852 he published in the "Proceedings" of the Philosophical society and in the "American Journal of Science" the astronomical observations and investigations that he made there. He was employed in the Washington observatory in 1845-'7, where, on 2 Feb., 1847, four months after the discovery of the planet Neptune, he identified it with a star that had been observed by Lalande in May, 1795. From 1847 until his death Mr. Walker had charge of the longitude computations of the U. S. coast survey. With Prof. Alexander D. Bache he developed the method of determining differences of longitude by telegraph, which was put in successful operation in 1849, and introduced the chronographic method of recording observations. His parallax tables, first prepared in 1834, greatly reduced the time in computing the phases of an occultation. He published various astronomical and mathematical papers of value, including "A Memoir on the Periodical Meteors of August and November" (Philadelphia, 1841); "Researches relative to the Planet Neptune" (1850); and "Ephemeris of the Planet Neptune for 1848-'52" (1852). See an "Address in Commemoration of Sears Cook Walker, delivered before the American Association for the Advancement of Science, 19 April, 1854," by Benjamin A. Gould, Jr. (Cambridge, Mass., 1854).

WALKER, William, Canadian merchant, b. in Scotland in 1793; d. in Quebec, Canada, 18 May, 1863. He went to Canada in 1815, engaged in business, and was a partner in the firms of Forsyth, Richardson and Co., Montreal, and of Forsyth, Walker and Co., Quebec. He was part owner and one of the building committee of the ocean steamer "Royal William," which was constructed at Quebec and was the first steam vessel that crossed the Atlantic from British America. In 1848 he retired from business. In 1839 Mr. Walker was appointed a member of the special council of Canada, and in 1842 he became a life member of the legislative council by royal mandamus. He raised and commanded the Quebec volunteer rifle corps, was the first president of the Quebec and Rivière du Loup railway company, president of the Quebec board of trade, and deputy master of Trinity house. He was the first chancellor of the University of Bishop's college, Lennoxville, Canada East, which conferred on him the honorary degree of D. C. L.

WALKER, William, adventurer, b. in Nashville, Tenn., 8 May, 1824; d. in Trujillo, Honduras, 12 Sept., 1860. He studied law in Nashville and medicine in Heidelberg, Germany, was a journalist in New Orleans and San Francisco, and finally settled in the practice of law in Marysville, Cal. In July, 1853, he organized an expedition for the conquest of the state of Sonora, Mexico, and, eluding the vigilance of the authorities of the port of San Francisco, early in November landed at La Paz, Lower California, with 170 men and three field-guns. He then issued a manifesto to the people, proclaimed himself president of the Pacific republic, and, having received re-enforcements, set out in January, 1854, for Sonora. He was pursued by a strong force of Mexicans, and, as he was near the frontier, he surrendered to the U. S. commander at San Diego, Cal. In May, 1854, he was tried at San Francisco for violating the neutrality laws, and was acquitted. He continued to plan expeditions against Sonora, but was compelled to abandon them, and in 1855 he was induced by American speculators in Nicaragua to interfere in the intestine troubles in that country, ostensibly in aid of the Democratic party there. He landed at Realejo on 11 June, with sixty-two followers, was joined by a small native force, and endeavored to take possession of the southern transit route. He was defeated at Rivas, but, being re-enforced with 170 native soldiers, routed the Nicaraguan army of 540 men at La Virgen on 1 Sept., took possession of the city of Granada on 15 Oct., and by a treaty with Gen. Ponciano Corral, the opposing leader, was made secretary of war and commander-in-chief. Recruits rapidly arrived from the United States, and on 1 March, 1856, Walker had 1,200 men. In the mean time he charged Corral with conspiracy, presided over a court-martial for his trial, and sentenced him to be shot on 8 Nov., 1855. War began with Costa Rica, and Walker was defeated at Guanacaste on 20 March, 1856, but routed the enemy at Rivas on 11 April, and hostilities ceased. He was then in undisputed control of Nicaragua, but to replenish his treasury he broke up the inter-oceanic transit route by confiscating the property and revoking the charter of the Vanderbilt steamship company. He caused himself to be elected president, and in September, 1856, annulled the existing prohibition of slavery. His minister, whom he sent to Washington, was recognized by President Pierce. Walker's arbitrary acts soon provoked an insurrection, which was assisted by several surrounding states and by agents of the Vanderbilt company. He was defeated in several encounters, burned the city of Grenada, which he was unable to hold, and on 1 May, 1857, surrendered with sixteen officers, at San Juan del Sur, to Com. Charles H. Davis, of the U. S. sloop-of-war "Mary," which conveyed him to Panama. Thence he went to New Orleans and was put under bonds to keep the peace, but returned to Nicaragua in November. He soon organized a new force, but in December Com. Hiram Paulding, of the U. S. navy, compelled him and his 132 men to surrender, and took them to New York. President Buchanan declined to recognize Walker as a prisoner, on the ground that his arrest on foreign soil was illegal. He sailed with a new expedition from Mobile, Ala., in October, 1858, but was arrested at the mouth of Mississippi river and tried at New Orleans and acquitted. In June, 1860, he again set out with a small force from that city, intending to create a revolution in Honduras. He reached Trujillo and issued a proclamation against the government; but his arrest was demanded by the commander of the British man-of-war "Icarus," and he was forced to retreat to Tinto river, where he surrendered on 3 Sept., 1860. The commander of the "Icarus" delivered him to the Honduras authorities on their demand, and he was tried by court-martial and shot. He published "The War in Nicaragua" (Mobile, 1860). See also "Walker's Expedition to Nicaragua" by William Vincent Wells (New York, 1856) and "Reminiscences of the Filibuster War in Nicaragua," by Col. Charles W. Doubleday (1886).

WALKER, William David, P. E. bishop, b. in New York city, 29 June, 1839. He was graduated at Columbia in 1859, and at the General theological seminary, New York, in 1862, was ordered deacon by Bishop Horatio Potter in the Church of the Transfiguration, 29 June, 1862, and ordained priest in Calvary church, 29 June, 1863, by the same prelate. He passed the entire term of his priesthood as assistant minister of Calvary church in special charge of the chapel connected with that church. He was consecrated missionary bishop of northern Dakota in Calvary church, 20 Dec., 1883. The degree of S. T. D. was conferred upon him by Racine college in 1884. He is the author of several published addresses.

WALKER, William H. T., soldier, b. in Georgia in October, 1816; d. near Decatur, Ga., 26 July, 1864. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1837, served in the Florida war, was wounded three times at the battle of Okeechobee, 25 Dec., 1837, and was brevetted 1st lieutenant for services in that action. He resigned from the army in 1838, was reappointed in 1840 as 1st lieutenant of infantry, served in the Florida war of 1840-'2, and became captain in 1845. During the Mexican war he participated in all the important battles, and was brevetted major in the U. S. army for gallant conduct at Contreras and Churubusco, and lieutenant-colonel for Molino del Rey, where he was severely wounded. He was on recruiting service in 1849-'52, became deputy governor of the East Pascagoula branch military asylum in the latter year, and in 1854-'6 was commandant of cadets, and instructor in military tactics at the U. S. military academy. He became major in 1855, served on the frontier, and in 1860 resigned. He entered the Confederate army in 1861, became a major-general, served principally in the west, and was killed at the battle of Decatur.

WALKER, William Johnson, benefactor, b. in Charlestown, Mass., 15 March, 1790; d. in Newport, R. I., 2 April, 1865. He was graduated at Harvard in 1810, studied medicine, and successfully practised his profession in his native town. Late in life he came into possession of a large fortune, of which he gave to benevolent objects about $400,000 during his life-time, and by his will left nearly $1,000,000 to institutions of learning.

WALKER, William McCreary, naval officer, b. in Baltimore, Md., 2 Sept., 1813; d. in New York city, 19 Nov., 1866. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 1 Nov., 1827, became a passed midshipman, 10 June, 1833, and was promoted to lieutenant, 8 Dec., 1838, serving in Lieut. Charles Wilkes's exploring expedition in command of the "Flying Fish," in which he participated in the discovery of the Antarctic continent in 1838-'42. He commanded the steamer "Union" on the home station in 1843-'4, and cruised in the Mediterranean squadron as aide in 1844-'6. He was promoted 14 Sept., 1855, and commanded the frigate "Constellation" in 1856. He served on special duty on boards and inspecting duty until the beginning of the civil war, was commissioned a captain, 16 July, 1862, and commanded the steamer "De Soto" throughout the civil war. He was one of the most successful blockaders during the war, and captured more prizes than any other vessel. Capt. Walker died of heart disease at the naval hospital in New York. He was the author of a work on "Screw Propulsion" (New York, 1861).

WALKER, William S., naval officer, b. in New Hampshire, 6 Dec., 1793; d. in Boston, Mass., 24 Nov., 1863. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 30 Nov., 1814, was promoted to lieutenant, 13 Jan., 1825, and to master-commandant, 8 Sept., 1841, and commanded the sloop "Concord" on the coast of Africa in 1841-'2, and the receiving-ship at Boston in 1843-'6. He saw no service during the Mexican war. He commanded the sloop "Saratoga," on the Asiatic station, in 1850-'4, was promoted to captain, 14 Sept., 1855, and served at the receiving-ship at Boston in 1854-'5, after which he was on leave until the civil war began, when he was ordered to command the steam sloop "Brooklyn," but his failing health compelled him to decline to go to sea. He was placed on the retired list, and promoted to commodore, 16 July, 1862.

WALKER-MARTINEZ, Carlos, Chilean poet, b. in Valparaiso in 1842. In September, 1865, he was studying law at the University of Chili, when war with Spain began, and he enlisted in the navy, participating in the engagement of Abtao, 7 Feb., 1866. In the same year he founded the literary magazine "La República Literaria," at the head of which he remained while he was in Chili. He was appointed in 1867 secretary of the legation in Bolivia, was graduated in law in 1868, and travelled through Europe and the United States. On his return in 1870 he was elected to congress for the department of Vallenar, and became secretary of the chamber of deputies. In 1873 he was appointed chargé d'affaires of Chili in Bolivia, and in 1874 he became minister in the same republic. During the war of 1879-'80 he was president of the "Sociedad Protectora," and in 1880-'2 he was an editor of the journal "El Nuevo Ferrocarril." During the cholera epidemic of 1886-'7 he was founder and president of the Red Cross society. He is still a member of congress, where he is well known as a parliamentary orator. He has written "Páginas de viage" (Santiago, 1871); "Poesías líricas" (3 vols., 1872); "Romances Americanos" (2 vols., 1874); "Manuel Rodriguez," a historic drama in verse (1874); "El Proscrito" (1875); and "Diego Portales" (1877).

WALK-IN-THE-WATER, or MY-EE-RAH, Indian chief, d. about 1817. He was a Huron of the Wyandot tribe, and at the beginning of the war of 1812 offered his services to Gen. William Hull; but they were declined, owing to the unwillingness of that officer to employ savages. He was afterward forced by circumstances to join the British at Malden, but he was instrumental in persuading several tribes to remain neutral, and in a council at that place he vindicated his course in a speech that was called by his enemies "American talk." After this Walk-in-the-Water and his associates, openly breaking with Tecumseh and the Prophet, declined to remain with the British, and deserted from Gen. Henry Proctor at Chatham, Canada. At the battle of the Thames he offered his services, with those of sixty warriors, conditionally, to Gen. William Henry Harrison, who declined them, and the Indians returned to Detroit river.

WALL, Garret Dorset, senator, b. in Middletown, Monmouth co., N. J., 10 March, 1783; d. in Burlington, N. J., 22 Nov., 1850. He received an academical education, studied law at Trenton, and was licensed in 1804 as an attorney, and in 1807 as a counsellor at law. At one time during the war of 1812 he commanded a volunteer company from Trenton at Sandy Hook. He was clerk of the state supreme court in 1812-'17, and quartermaster-general of New Jersey in 1815-'37. In 1827 he was chosen to the legislature and in 1829 he was elected governor, but declined the office to accept that of U. S. district attorney. From 1835 till 1841 he sat in the U. S. senate, and from 1849 till his death he was a judge of the court of errors and appeals.—His son James Walter, senator, b. in Trenton, N. J., 26 May, 1820; d. in Elizabeth, N. J., 9 June, 1872, was graduated at Princeton in 1838, studied law with Daniel Haines; was admitted to the bar in 1841, and began to practise in his native place, holding the office of commissioner in bankruptcy. He removed to Burlington, N. J., in 1847, and devoted himself to literary pursuits, becoming mayor of the city in 1854. During the early part of the civil war he attacked the administration for interfering with the liberty of the press, writing a severe letter to Montgomery Blair, and he was imprisoned for several weeks in Fort Lafayette. It is said that he offered to furnish 20,000 Belgian rifles to the so-called "Knights of the Golden Circle" for use against the U. S. government. He was chosen to the U. S. senate in 1863 to fill the unexpired term of John R. Thomson, deceased, and served from 21 Jan. till 3 March of that year. In 1869 he removed to Elizabeth. Mr. Wall's publications include "Foreign Etchings" (Burlington, 1856); "Essays on the Early English Poets," which appeared in the "Knickerbocker Magazine"; and various essays and addresses.

WALLACE, Alfred Russel, English naturalist, b. in Usk, Monmouth, 8 Jan., 1822. He received his education at the grammar-school of Hertford, was for some time a land-surveyor, and assistant to his elder brother, an architect, engaging afterward in the study of natural sciences. In 1848 he visited South America, explored the basin of Amazon and Rio Negro rivers, and resided for several months in Para. He formed extensive collections in ornithology and botany, and, through a long sojourn among the Indians of the Upper Amazon, obtained valuable information concerning their dialects, habits, and manners. Most of those collections were lost at sea when he returned to England in 1852. From 1854 till 1862 he visited the Malay archipelago, studied the flora and fauna of Molucca, Celebes, and New Guinea, and arrived, independently of Charles R. Darwin's researches, at a theory of natural selection, which he developed in a paper that he sent to Sir Charles Lyell entitled "On the Tendencies of Varieties to depart Indefinitely from the Original Type" (London, 1858). Besides works on his eastern travels and the theory of natural selection, Wallace is the author of "Travels on the Amazon and Rio Negro, with Remarks on the Vocabularies of the Amazonian Languages" (London, 1853); "Palm-Trees of the Amazon and their Uses" (1853); "On the Geographical Distribution of Animals," which was issued simultaneously in English, French, and German (2 vols., 1876); "Island Life" (1880); and "Land Nationalization" (1882).

WALLACE, David, congressman, b. in Lancaster county, Pa., 4 April, 1799; d. in Indianapolis, Ind., 3 Sept., 1859. He removed with his father's family to Brookville, Ind., in 1817, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1821, and was assistant professor of mathematics there for two years, but resigned from the army, studied law, and established a lucrative practice in Franklin county, Ind. He served several terms in the legislature, was a member of the Constitutional convention, lieutenant-governor in 1831-'4, and governor in 1837-'40. During that service he was active as an advocate of internal improvements and in establishing a school system. He was chosen to congress as a Whig in 1840, served one term, and, as a member of the committee on commerce, gave the casting-vote in favor of an appropriation to develop Samuel F. B. Morse's magnetic telegraph, which vote cost him his re-election. He returned to practice in 1842, and from 1856 until his death was judge of the Marion county court of common pleas. He was a popular political speaker and a laborious and impartial jurist.—His son, Lewis, soldier, b. in Brookville, Franklin co., Ind., 10 April, 1827, received a common-school education, and at the beginning of the Mexican war was a law-student in Indiana. At the call for volunteers he entered the army as a 1st lieutenant in company H, 1st Indiana infantry. He resumed his profession in 1848, which he practised in Covington and subsequently in Crawfordsville, Ind., and served four years in the state senate. At the beginning of the civil war he was appointed adjutant-general of Indiana, soon afterward becoming colonel of the 11th Indiana volunteers, with which he served in West Virginia, participating in the capture of Romney and the ejection of the enemy from Harper's Ferry. He became brigadier-general of volunteers, 3 Sept., 1861, led a division and the centre of the Union lines at the capture of Fort Donelson, and displayed such ability that his commission of major-general of volunteers followed on 21 March, 1862. The day before the battle of Shiloh, his division was placed on the north side of Snake creek, on a road leading from Savannah or Crump's landing, to Purdy. He was ordered by Gen. Grant, on the morning of 6 April (the first day of the battle), to cross the creek and come up to Gen. William T. Sherman's right, which covered the bridge over that stream, that general depending on him for support; but he lost his way, and did not arrive until the night. He rendered efficient service in the second day's fight, and in the subsequent advance on Corinth. In November, 1862, he was president of the court of inquiry on the military conduct of Gen. Don Carlos Buell in the operations in Tennessee and Kentucky. In 1863 he prepared the defences of Cincinnati, which he saved from capture by Gen. Edmund Kirby Smith, and was subsequently assigned to the command of the middle department and the 8th army corps, with headquarters in Baltimore, Md. With 5,800 men he intercepted the march of Gen. Jubal A. Early with 28,000 men on Washington, D. C., and on 9 July, 1864, fought the battle of the Monocacy. Although he was defeated, he gained sufficient time to enable Gen. Grant to send re-enforcements to the capital from City Point. By order of Gen. Henry W. Halleck, he was removed from his command, and superseded by Gen. Edward O. C. Ord; but when Gen. Grant learned the particulars of the action, he immediately reinstated Wallace, and in his official report in 1865 says: "On 6 July the enemy (Early) occupied Hagerstown, moving a strong column toward Frederick city. Gen. Wallace, with Ricketts's division and his own command, the latter new and mostly undisciplined troops, pushed out from Baltimore with great promptness and met the enemy in force on the Monocacy, near the crossing of the railroad bridge. His force was not sufficient to insure success, but he fought the enemy nevertheless, and, although it resulted in a defeat to our arms, yet he detained the enemy and thereby served to enable Wright to reach Washington before him." Returning to his command, Gen. Wallace was second member of the court that tried the assassins of President Lincoln, and president of that which tried and convicted Capt. Henry Wirz, commandant of Andersonville prison. Gen. Wallace was mustered out of volunteer service in 1865, returned to the practice of law in Crawfordsville, was governor of Utah in 1878-'81, and in 1881 became U. S. minister to Turkey, serving till 1885, when he again resumed practice in Crawfordsville. He has lectured extensively in this country, and is the author of two successful novels, entitled "The Fair God," a story of the conquest of Mexico (Boston, 1873), "Ben-Hur, a Tale of the Christ," of which 290,000 copies have been sold (New York, 1880); a "Life of Benjamin Harrison" (1888); and "The Boyhood of Christ" (1888).—His wife, Susan Arnold Elston, author, b. in Crawfordsville, Ind., 25 Dec., 1830, was educated there, and married Gen. Wallace in 1852. Her maiden name was Elston. She has written many articles for newspapers and magazines, her short poem, "The Patter of Little Feet," attaining wide popularity. Her other publications are "The Storied Sea" (Boston, 1884); "Genevra, or the Old Oak Chest" (New York, 1887); the "Land of the Pueblos," with other papers (1888); and "The Repose in Egypt" (1888).

WALLACE, Sir James, British naval officer, d. in London, England, 6 March, 1803. He became a lieutenant in the royal navy, 11 March, 1755, was promoted commander in 1762, and was made post-captain in 1771. He was stationed at Newport, R. I., in 1774-'5, in command of the "Rose," a twenty-gun frigate, and greatly annoyed the people of Rhode Island by the detention of their shipping and attempts to carry off their property. On this account there was a spirited correspondence between Wallace and Gov. Nicholas Cooke. To Com. Abraham Whipple, whose leadership in the attack on the "Gaspee" was now avowed, Wallace wrote: "You, Abraham Whipple, on the 10th of June, 1772, burned his Majesty's vessel, the 'Gaspee,' and I will hang you at the yard-arm"; to which Whipple replied: "To Sir James Wallace, Sir: Always catch a man before you hang him." Not long afterward he bombarded Bristol, R. I. In 1777 he had the "Experiment," of fifty guns, and he afterward served in the "Nonesuch," of sixty-four guns. In October, 1777, he ascended Hudson river on a marauding expedition, burned the town of Kingston, where the legislature was then in session, and plundered other places, wantonly destroying private property. At Livingston Manor they heard of Burgoyne's surrender, and returned to New York. He saw much service on the coast during the war, and was detested for his severity. On 24 Sept., 1779, he was captured in the "Experiment" by Count D'Estaing. He commanded the "Warrior" in Rodney's victory over De Grasse. Sir James became a rear-admiral, 12 April, 1794, vice-admiral, 1 Jan., 1795, and admiral of the blue, 1 Jan., 1801. In 1793-'5 he was governor of Newfoundland.

WALLACE, James Hope, British officer, b. in Rankellour, Fifeshire, Scotland, 7 June, 1807; d. in Featherstone Castle, Northumberland, England, 7 Jan., 1854. He was the second son of Gen. John Hope, fourth Earl of Hopetoun, entered the Coldstream guards in 1821, and served in that regiment till 1844, when he retired with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He went to Canada with his regiment in 1838, and in November of the same year was selected by the governor-general, Lord Seaton, to raise volunteers for service in the province. In less than a week after receiving the commission he had succeeded in organizing the "Queen's volunteers," a regiment of 1,000 men, ready to perform garrison duties in Quebec, which enabled the Grenadier guards to be moved up the country. Soon after leaving Canada, Col. Hope succeeded to the estates of his uncle, Lord Wallace, whose name he took, but not the title.

WALLACE, John Bradford, lawyer, b. in Somerset county, N. J., 17 Aug., 1778; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 7 Jan., 1837. He was graduated at Princeton in 1794, adopted the profession of law, and in 1797 was admitted to the bar of Philadelphia, where he practised with eminent success. He wrote ably in defence of the Federal party. His publications include "Remarks on the Law of Bailment" (Philadelphia, 1840) and editions of "Reports of Cases of the Third Circuit Court" (1801), and "Abbot on Shipping" (1802). See a "Memoir" by his wife (printed privately, 1848).—His son, John William, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 17 Feb., 1815; d. there, 12 Jan., 1884, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1833, studied law in Philadelphia and in the Temple, London, became the standing master in chancery in the supreme court of Pennsylvania in 1844, was reporter of the 3d circuit of the U. S. circuit court in 1842-'53, and in 1863-'76 was reporter of the supreme court of the United States. In 1860-'84 he was president of the historical society of Pennsylvania. He published "Reporters, chronologically arranged, with Occasional

John H. Wallace

Remarks upon their Respective Merits" (Philadelphia, 1843); "Cases in the Circuit Court of the United States for the 3d District" (2 vols., 1849-'53); "Cases argued and abridged in the U. S. Supreme Court" (23 vols., 1864-'76); and "An Old Philadelphian, Colonel William Bradford, of 1776" (1884). He also edited "British Crown Cases Reserved" (6 vols., 1839-'53); an address delivered at the celebration of the New York historical society, 3 May, 1863, of the 200th anniversary of the death of William Bradford (Albany, N. Y., 1863); and, after the death of Horace Binney Wallace, revised the 4th edition of John William Smith's "Leading Cases" (2 vols., 1857); and "American Leading Cases" (2 vols., 1857).—Another son, Horace Binney, scholar, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 26 Feb., 1817; d. in Paris, France, 16 Dec., 1856, was graduated at Princeton in 1835, studied medicine, chemistry, and law, the latter under his father and Charles Chauncey, but never adopted a profession, devoting himself to literary pursuits. He travelled in Europe in 1849-'50 and in 1852, giving assiduous study to philosophical subjects. In a fit of insanity, produced by overwork, he committed suicide. Auguste Comte said of him: "In him heart, intellect, and character united in so rare combination and harmony that, had he lived, he would have aided powerfully in advancing the difficult transition through which the 19th century has to pass." He was the author of a novel entitled "Stanley, or the Recollections of a Man of the World" (Philadelphia, 1838); aided Rufus W. Griswold in the preparation of his "Napoleon and the Marshals of the Empire" (2 vols., 1847); and also wrote "Art, Scenery, and Philosophy in Europe, with other Papers" (1855); and "Literary Criticism, and other Papers" (1856). With J. I. Clarke Hare he edited "American Leading Cases in Law" (2 vols., 1847); John William Smith's "Leading Cases" (2 vols., 1852); and White and Tudor's "Leading Cases in Equity" (2 vols., 1852).

WALLACE, William, Canadian member of parliament, b. near Galston, Ayrshire, Scotland, 4 Feb., 1820. He was educated at the parish school, emigrated to Canada in 1840, founded the "British-Canadian" newspaper at Simcoe in 1861, and has been its editor and proprietor ever since. He was elected for South Norfolk to the Canadian parliament in 1872, re-elected in 1874 and 1878, and retired in 1882. He has been reeve of Simcoe, a member of the county council, and was elected mayor of Simcoe in 1884. He favors imperial federation, and introduced to the Canadian parliament in 1873 resolutions bearing on that question.

WALLACE, William A., senator, b. in Clearfield, Pa., 28 Nov., 1827. He received an academic education, was admitted to the bar in 1847, and devoted himself to his profession till his entrance into politics in 1862 as a member of the state senate. He served five successive terms in that body, was its speaker in 1871, senatorial delegate and chairman of the Pennsylvania delegation to the National Democratic convention in 1872, chairman of the Democratic state committee of Pennsylvania for five years, and a member of the commission to suggest amendments to the state constitution in 1874. In 1875-'81 he was U. S. senator, having been chosen as a Democrat. He was returned to the state senate in 1882, and was the author of the arbitration statute and several amendments to the Pennsylvania railroad laws. He became interested in developing the mineral resources of central Pennsylvania in 1881, and was president of the Beech Creek railroad.

WALLACE, William Harvey Lamb, soldier, b. in Urbana, Ohio, 8 July, 1821; d. in Savannah, Tenn., 10 April, 1862. He removed with his father to Illinois in 1832, and adopted the profession of law, which he was licensed to practise in 1846, but the same year volunteered as a private in the 1st Illinois regiment for the Mexican war. He rose to the rank of adjutant, participated in the battle of Buena Vista and other engagements, and after the peace resumed his profession, becoming district attorney in 1853. In May, 1861, he was appointed colonel of the 11th Illinois volunteers, and at the battle of Fort Donelson, in February, 1862, he commanded a brigade in Gen. John A. McClernand's division, with ability that led to his appointment as brigadier-general of volunteers. In the succeeding battle of Shiloh he commanded Gen. Charles F. Smith's brigade, which for six hours withstood the assault of the enemy, and was the last to leave the field. Wallace fell, mortally wounded, in an ineffectual attempt to resist the enemy. See James Grant Wilson's "Sketches of Illinois Officers" (Chicago, 1862).

WALLACE, William James, jurist, b. in Syracuse, N. Y., 14 April, 1839. He was educated under private tutors, studied law in Hamilton college, and was admitted to the bar in 1859. He was mayor of Syracuse in 1873-'4, United States district judge for northern New York from 1874 till 1882, and since the last-named year has been United States circuit judge for the 2d judicial circuit, which includes the states of New York, Vermont, and Connecticut. Syracuse university gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1882.

WALLACE, William Ross, poet, b. in Lexington, Ky., in 1819; d. in New York city, 5 May, 1881. He was educated at Bloomington and South Hanover college, Ind., studied law in Lexington, Ky., and in 1841 removed to New York city, where he practised his profession, and at the same time engaged in literary pursuits. His first work that attracted favorable criticism, a poem entitled "Perdita," published in the "Union Magazine," was followed by "Alban," a poetical romance (New York, 1848), and "Meditations in America, and other Poems" (1851). Other fugitive verses that attained popularity include "The Sword of Bunker Hill," a national hymn (1861); "Keep Step with the Music of the Union" (1861); and "The Liberty Bell" (1862). William Cullen Bryant said of his writings: "They are marked by a splendor of imagination and an affluence of diction which show him the born poet."

WALLACE, William Vincent, musician, b. in Waterford, Ireland, 1 June, 1814; d. in Haute Garonne, France, 12 Oct., 1865. Under the tuition of his father he early wrote pieces for the bands and orchestras of his native place. When eighteen years of age, for the purpose of recovering his health by a voyage, he sailed for Sydney, Australia, remaining during several years and leading a life of adventure. From Australia he went to New Zealand, made a whaling-voyage in the South seas, and finally landed in the East Indies. He visited most of the interior provinces of Hindostan and spent some time in tiger-hunting. From Hindostan, Wallace sailed for Chili, and in turn visited Peru and Buenos Ayres, giving concerts in the large cities of those countries. This musical progress was gradually extended to Mexico and the West Indies. His earliest appearance in the United States as a virtuoso was in New Orleans. Thence he travelled through the Union for several years, giving entertainments in the large cities. Later Wallace went to England, turning his attention to the composition of operas. In London he produced in succession "Maritana" and "Matilda of Hungary." The first named readily found its way to the chief opera-houses of the European continent. Later the composer brought out "Lurline," "The Maid of Zurich," "The Amber Witch," "Love's Triumph," and "The Desert Flower." After a short stay in Paris, for the restoration of his health, he again crossed the Atlantic, landing at Rio Janeiro. Thence he sailed for New Orleans, whence he continued a prolonged concert tour in the principal cities of the Union. As a performer on the violin and piano-forte Wallace was more than respectable, and free from sensationalism. His compositions for the piano-forte are melodious and effective. As an opera-composer he was deficient in the science of instrumentation, but he well understood how to write for the voice, and many of his melodies combine fluency and grace with the charms of originality. This is particularly the case with his first two lyric dramas. His earliest works continue to hold the stage.

WALLACK, James William, actor, b. in Lambeth, England, 24 Aug., 1794; d. in New York city, 25 Dec., 1864. His parents were comedians, who performed at the London minor play-houses and in the British provinces. His first appearance on the stage was as a child at the Surrey theatre in London. Soon afterward he performed in juvenile characters at Drury Lane, and at the age of eighteen entered on a permanent career at the same house as Laertes in "Hamlet." He also acted in the British provinces and in Ireland, gradually winning his way to popularity as a useful representative of drama and comedy. In 1824 Wallack became stage-manager at Drury Lane, and rose to the performance of secondary rôles in tragedy. Later he played at the Haymarket, and officiated as stage-manager at the Princess's theatre. For about twenty years his attention was divided between the theatres of the United States and those of his native land. He made numerous voyages to this country, where he was always received with favor. On the occasion of his first visit to the United States, in 1818, he boldly advanced himself to the interpretation of Macbeth, Romeo, Shylock, Coriolanus, Hamlet, and Richard III., without making any favorable impression. But in the principal rôles in "The Stranger," "Pizarro," and "The Gamester," closely copied in the manner of Kemble, he attracted favorable consideration. From 1818 until 1845 Wallack performed at intervals in all the principal cities of the Union. Among his best renderings were the chief characters in "The Brigand," "The Rent-Day," "The Wonder," "Don Cæsar de Bazan," "Wild Oats," and the refined comedy parts of Mercutio, Jaques, and Benedick. "Love's Ritor-nello," as sung by him in "The Brigand," was hummed from one end of the land to the other. In 1822 Wallack met with an accident, in which his leg was fractured by the overturning of a stage-coach between New York and Philadelphia. This mishap retired him from active life for about eighteen months; from its effect he never entirely recovered. From 1837 until its destruction by fire Wallack conducted the New York National theatre. There he presented a repertory of the best plays in the English language, rendered by a company such as never before had been seen in this country. In 1852 he assumed the management of Wallack's lyceum, and in 1861 established Wallack's theatre. As a performer he was endowed with a fine personality; his voice was highly melodious, set off by flexibility and careful elocution, and his knowledge of stage-effect was unexcelled. In refined and eccentric comedy Wallack had few superiors. Some of his rôles in the romantic dramas of his own creation were entirely unequalled, and have passed away with him. —His son, John Lester, actor, b. in New York city, 1 Jan., 1820; d. in Stamford, Conn., 6 Sept., 1888, spent his infancy and boyhood in England. At the age of twenty he was entered as lieutenant in the British army, but after two years' service he abandoned his military career. Ambitious of following in the footsteps of his father, he began his new experience on the Dublin stage in the part of Don Pedro in "Much Ado about Nothing." He remained there two seasons, which were followed by an engagement at Edinburgh and a brief connection with the Haymarket theatre in London. In this country Mr. Wallack at first became known as John W. Lester, making his first appearance as such at the New York Broadway theatre, 27 Sept., 1847, as Sir Charles Coldstream in Dion Boucicault's adaptation of "Used Up." After two years' connection with this establishment he appeared in succession at several other houses—the Bowery, Burton's, Niblo's, and Brougham's lyceum. In 1852 he joined the company at his father's theatre, where he acted as stage-manager and played leading parts. On the death of the elder Wallack, in 1864, he succeeded him as proprietor of Wallack's theatre, which he conducted with more or less success for twenty-four years. On 21 May, 1888, after his managerial retirement, Mr. Wallack was the recipient of a brilliant dramatic testimonial that netted the beneficiary the unexampled proceeds of $20,000. Among the actor's best performances were Don Felix in "The Wonder," St. Pierre in "The Wife," Alfred Evelyn in "Money," Charles Surface in "The School for Scandal," Young Marlowe in "She Stoops to Conquer," Harry Dornton in "The Road to Ruin," and Claude Melnotte in "The Lady of Lyons." In his youth Mr. Wallack had a pleasing tenor voice, which he often used to advantage. In many respects his abilities were similar to his father's. But, unlike him, he never aspired to the leading rôles in tragedy.

dy or those of the heavy sentimental drama, but wisely confined his efforts to genteel comedy and romantic youthful characters. He wrote for the stage "The Veteran" and "Rosedale," both of which were deservedly popular, and prepared three papers that were published in "Scribner's Magazine" in October and following months after his death.

WALLBRIDGE, Lewis, Canadian jurist, b. in Belleville, Ont., 27 Nov., 1816. He studied law, was admitted as a barrister in 1839, and became queen's counsel in 1856. He was elected to the Canadian parliament in 1857, became a member of the executive council in 1863, and speaker of the Canadian assembly the same year. In 1882 he was appointed chief justice of Manitoba.

WALLEN, Henry Davies, soldier, b. in Savannah, Ga., 19 April, 1819; d. in New York city, 2 Dec., 1886. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1840 in the class with William T. Sherman and George H. Thomas, and was assigned to the 4th infantry. His first service was in the Florida war in 1840-'2, and, after garrison duty during 1842-'5, he was engaged in the military occupation of Texas and in the war with Mexico, being wounded at Palo Alto. After five years of frontier duty at Detroit and Plattsburg, he was sent to the Pacific coast, where he remained until the beginning of the civil war, serving in various forts, with the Yakima expedition in 1855, and in command of the exploring expedition to Salt Lake in 1859. Meanwhile he had been promoted captain on 31 Jan., 1850, and major on 25 Nov., 1861. He was acting assistant inspector-general of the Department of New Mexico from June, 1862, till June, 1864, and in command of a regiment at Fort Schuyler, N. Y., thereafter until May, 1865. The brevets of lieutenant-colonel and colonel were given him on 23 Feb., 1865, and that of brigadier-general on 13 March, 1865, while the actual rank of lieutenant-colonel was conferred on him, 30 July, 1865. For a year he served in the west, and commanded successively the district of the Gila and the district of Arizona, but in 1867 he was given command of Governor's island, New York harbor, which post he held until 1869. In 1872 he was on the Yellowstone expedition, and on 19 Feb., 1873, he was made colonel of the 2d infantry. He was retired from active service on 18 Feb., 1874, and subsequently resided in New York city.

WALLER, Frank, artist, b. in New York city, 12 June, 1842. During 1863-'8 he was engaged in business in New York. In 1870-'1 he studied under John G. Chapman in Rome. The following year he travelled in Egypt with Edwin White, making many studies and sketches for future works. He was one of the founders in 1875 of the Art-students' league, of which he was also the first president, and for which he wrote "Report on Art Schools" (New York, 1879). His paintings include "Tombs of the Caliphs" (1874); "Interior of my Studio"; "Caravan on the Desert" (1878); "Interior of Metropolitan Museum of Art" (1879); "Temple of Kom Ombos" (1881); "Eventide, Venice" (1883); "Testing his Toledo" (1884); and "Hop-Picking" (1885). Of the last three he has also made etchings. He has adopted architecture as a profession, and now devotes his attention principally to that art.—His brother, Elwyn, chemist, b. in New York city, 22 March, 1846, was graduated at Harvard in 1867, and at the Columbia school of mines in 1870, with the degree of engineer of mines. In 1871 he became an assistant in the department of analytical chemistry in the School of mines, in 1871 he became an instructor, and since 1885 he has been professor of analytical chemistry. He was appointed assistant sanitary inspector on the New York health board in May, 1872, and in 1875 became its chemist, which place he filled until 1885. The degree of Ph. D. was conferred on him for post-graduate researches by Columbia in 1875. He is a member of various scientific bodies and a fellow of the London chemical society. Dr. Waller was connected editorially with "The American Chemist," and has contributed articles on water, food, and sanitary and analytical chemistry to scientific journals. The chapter on "Disinfection" in Buck's "Treatise on Hygiene" (New York, 1879), and that on "Water" in Parkes's "Manual of Practical Hygiene" (1883), were written by him. He has edited Cairns's "Manual of Quantitative Analysis" (New York, 1879), and has contributed a "Report on Butter" to the New York state dairy commissioners' report published in 1885.

WALLER, John, clergyman, b. in Spottsylvania county, Va., 23 Dec., 1741; d. in Abbeville, S. C., 4 July, 1802. By reason of his notorious wickedness in early life, he was styled "Swearing Jack Waller" and "The Devil's Adjutant." He was especially hostile to the Baptists, and was one of the grand jury that prosecuted the Rev. Lewis Craig, of that denomination, for preaching. Craig's address to the jury deeply impressed him, and was the means of his conversion. He soon became a Baptist preacher, travelling extensively, and attracting crowds of hearers to his zealous ministrations. But the intolerant spirit that he had once shared now made him its victim. He lay 113 days in four different jails of Virginia, and was repeatedly scourged. He was one of the most laborious and useful of the pioneer preachers of the south.

WALLER, John Lightfoot, clergyman, b. in Woodford county, Ky., 23 Nov., 1809; d. in Louisville, Ky., 10 Oct., 1854. He was educated under private tutors, and became an accomplished scholar. After teaching for several years, he took in 1835 editorial charge of the "Baptist Banner," and subsequently he edited that paper when it was combined with the "Western Pioneer" in Louisville, Ky. In 1840 he was ordained to the Christian ministry, and he was for a time pastor of a church in Woodford county. In 1845 he established the "Western Baptist Review," afterward called the "Christian Repository," of which he remained editor until his death. He was a member of the convention that in 1849 formed the present constitution of Kentucky, and in that body displayed debating talent of a high order. In 1842 he engaged in a celebrated debate with the Rev. Nathan L. Rice on the subject of baptism. He resumed in 1850 editorial charge of the "Baptist Banner and Western Pioneer." The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Madison university in 1852.

WALLER, Thomas McDonald, governor of Connecticut, b. in New York city about 1840. He was left an orphan at the age of nine, and was a newsboy for some time, but he attracted the attention of a citizen of New London, Conn., who adopted him, and whose name he assumed. He studied law, was admitted to the Connecticut bar in 1861, and attained note as an advocate. He early entered politics, became well known as a public speaker, and served in the legislature in 1867, 1868, 1872, and 1876, being chosen as a Democrat. During his last term he was speaker of the house. In 1870 he was secretary of state, and in 1873 he became mayor of New London. He served as state's attorney in 1876-'83, and in 1882 was elected governor of Connecticut, after canvassing the state in his own behalf, contrary to custom. On the expiration of his term he was appointed, in 1885, U. S. consul-general at London, England.

WALLERTON, Charles Louis Auguste, French naturalist, b. in Sainte-Ménéhould in 1721; d. in Nancy in 1788. He was sent to Mexico in 1759 to study the botany of that country, at the suggestion of the Academy of sciences of Paris, and obtained a special privilege to enter the Spanish dominions. Landing in Vera Cruz in October, 1760, he explored the province of Michoacan, where he formed a rich herbarium of medicinal plants, and afterward he searched the public libraries and the convents for information about the remedies that were formerly used by the Aztecs. He then visited the Isthmus of Panama, Santo Domingo, and Cuba, and made a thorough exploration of the latter island. On his return to France in 1765, with an herbarium of 1,500 medicinal plants, he was elected corresponding member of the Academy of sciences, and secretary of the Academy of Nancy, where he settled. He wrote "Traité explicatif d'un herbier de plantes médicinales recueillies dans un voyage à la Nouvelle Espagne, dans l'isthme de Darien et à l'île de Cuba" (3 vols., Nancy, 1767-'70); "Monographie des maladies syphilitiques et des simples en usage chez les anciens Indiens du Mexique" (1770); and "Tableau de la flore du royaume de la Nouvelle Espagne, et en particulier de la province de Mechoacan" (2 vols., 1775-'9).

WALLEY, John, soldier, b. probably in London, England, in 1644; d. in Boston, Mass., 11 Jan., 1712. He was a son of the Rev. Thomas Walley. On 12 Feb., 1689, he commanded the first expedition against the French and Indians in Canada, and in August, 1690, he sailed from Boston as the lieutenant of Sir William Phips in a second expedition. He landed near Quebec with about 1,200 men, and after some courageous but ineffectual fighting, and an unsuccessful bombardment by Phips's fleet, he re-embarked. Walley was one of the principal founders of the town and church of Bristol, became a member of the council in 1687, and was captain of the Ancient and honorable artillery of Boston. His journal of the Canadian expedition is printed in Thomas Hutchinson's "History of Massachusetts."

WALLING, Henry Francis, cartographer, b. in Burrillville, R. I., 11 June, 1825; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 8 April, 1888. He was educated at public schools and was fitted for college, but became assistant librarian in the Providence atheneum. While so engaged he studied mathematics and surveying, and entered the office of Barrett Cushing, a civil engineer in Providence, whose partner he became in 1846. He began topographic work in 1849, and prepared atlases containing full maps and scientific descriptions of most of the northern states and the Dominion of Canada. In 1867 he was called to the chair of civil engineering in Lafayette, which he filled for three years, and then resigned to accept an appointment as assistant on the U. S. coast survey. Subsequently he became connected with the U. S. geological survey, and in 1884 was assigned to duty in connection with the geodetic survey of Massachusetts, on the preparation of the state maps, on which work he was engaged at the time of his death. He was a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science, and of the American society of civil engineers, to whose proceedings he contributed papers of value. It was said that "to him more than to any one else is due the better appreciation of good maps, which is now bearing fruit in the work of the national survey."

WALLIS, Gustav, German botanist, b. in Luneburg, Prussia, 1 May, 1830; d. in Cuenca, Ecuador, 20 July, 1878. Little is known of his early life. In 1860 he began his search for botanical rarities in tropical America for a horticultural house in Brussels. His explorations were confined chiefly to Amazon river and its tributaries, the mountainous coast-line, and the Isthmus of Panama. He also visited the Philippine islands for a London house, and before his death began to explore the Pacific coast of Ecuador at his own expense. He enriched horticulture with 1,000 new species.

WALLIS, Samuel, English navigator, b. about 1720; d. in London in 1795. He entered the navy, commanded a division of cutters in Canada in 1760, and after the conclusion of peace was charged with the completion of the discoveries of Capt. John Byron in the Pacific. Sailing from Plymouth, 22 Aug., 1766, he anchored in the following November near Cape Virgins on the coast of Patagonia, where he had intercourse with the natives, and discovered that they were not giants, as had been asserted by former navigators. On 17 Sept. he entered the Strait of Magellan, which he explored for four months. Leaving the strait on 11 April, Wallis discovered Pentecost island on 3 June, 1767, and later Queen Charlotte island. He returned to Dover, 19 May, 1768, and in 1780 was appointed commissioner of the admiralty, which post he retained till his death. Wallis's narrative was published in John Hawkesworth's collection, entitled "An Account of the Voyages undertaken for making Discoveries in the Southern Hemisphere" (3 vols., London, 1773).

WALLIS, Severn Teackle, lawyer, b. in Baltimore, Md., 8 Sept., 1816. He was graduated at St. Mary's college, Baltimore, in 1832, studied law with William Wirt and John Glenn, and in 1837 was admitted to the bar. Mr. Wallis early developed a taste for literature and contributed to periodicals many articles of literary and historical criticism, also occasional verses. He became a proficient in Spanish literature and history and was elected a corresponding member of the Royal academy of history of Madrid in 1843. In 1846 he was chosen a fellow of the Royal society of northern antiquaries of Copenhagen. In 1847 he visited Spain and in 1849 the U. S. government sent him on a special mission to that country to examine the title to the public lands in east Florida, as affected by royal grants during the negotiations for the treaty of 1819. From 1859 till 1861 he contributed largely to the editorial columns of the Baltimore "Exchange," and he has also written for other journals. He was a Whig till the organization of the American or Know-Nothing party, after which he was a Democrat. In 1861 he was sent to the house of delegates of Maryland, and took an active part in the proceedings of the legislature of that year at Frederick. He was chairman of the committee on Federal relations, and made himself obnoxious to the Federal authorities by his reports, which were adopted by the legislature, and which took strong ground against the civil war, as well as against the then prevailing doctrine of military necessity. In September of that year Mr. Wallis was arrested with many members of the legislature and other citizens of the state, and imprisoned for more than fourteen months in various forts. He was released in November, 1862, without conditions and without being informed of the cause of his arrest. He then returned to the practice of the law in Baltimore. In 1870, on the death of John P. Kennedy, he was elected provost of the University of Maryland. In December, 1872, as chairman of the art committee of private citizens appointed by the Maryland legislature, he delivered the address upon the unveiling of William H. Rinehart's statue of Chief-Justice Taney. He has contributed to periodicals, and has published "Glimpses of Spain" (New York, 1849); "Spain: her Institutions, Politics, and Public Men" (Boston, 1853); a "Discourse on the Life and Character of George Peabody" (Baltimore, 1870); and numerous pamphlets on legal and literary subjects.

WALLON, Louis Florentin (vol-long), missionary, b. in Bourges, France, about 1670; d. in Peru in 1725. After serving in the army he became a Jesuit at Saint-Acheul, and went to Peru in 1714, after visiting Paraguay, Chili, and the West Indies. He intended to take charge of a mission in the Philippine islands, but remained in Peru instead, and founded a prosperous mission in the plateau of Quito, where he died. He wrote several interesting accounts of his travels, which were printed in the "Collection des lettres édifiantes et curieuses, envoyées des missions étrangères" (Paris, 1715-'80). Among them are "Voyage aux Indes Orientales, par le Paraguay, le Chili et le Pérou, fait en 1712, '13-'14," which describes the condition of the Indians in South America at the beginning of the 18th century; and "État des missions de la Compagnie de Jésus dans le Pérou."

WALN, Robert, merchant, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 22 Feb., 1765; d. there, 24 Jan., 1836. His great-great-grandfather, Nicholas, an English Quaker, came to this country with William Penn in 1682, and bought a tract of land in what is now the city of Philadelphia. He took an active part in public affairs, was a member of the first grand jury that was called in 1683, and represented Bucks county in the first legislature of Pennsylvania from that year till 1695, when he removed to Philadelphia, and in 1711 became a director in the first public school of that city. He died there in 1721. Robert was educated at the Friends' academy in his native city. He inherited a large estate, and with his brother Jesse continued the business that had been established by his father, which became widely known in the East India and China trade, and almost equalled that of Stephen Girard in the comprehensive character of its enterprises. He served in the legislature several years, and in congress from 1798 till 1801 as a Federalist, and was a member of the common council of Philadelphia. During the war of 1812 he built one of the first cotton-factories in the country, and, being also largely interested in iron-works, he became a strong protectionist. He was the author of an "Answer to the Anti-Protective Report of Henry Lee," while the excitement on the tariff question was at its height, and of "Seven Letters to Elias Hicks," which attracted great attention.—His son, Robert, poet, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 25 Oct., 1794; d. in Providence, R. I., 4 July, 1825, was liberally educated, and devoted himself to literature. He published "The Hermit in America on a Visit to Philadelphia" (Philadelphia, 1819; 2d series, 1821); "American Bards," a satire (1820); "Sisyphi Opus, or Touches at the Times, with other Poems" (1820); "Life of Lafayette" (1825-'6); "History of China" (1825); and numerous contributions to periodicals. He edited John Sanderson's "Biography of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence" from the third volume, contributing several of the subsequent lives (7 vols., 1820-'7).

WALSH, Benjamin Dann, entomologist, b. in Frome, Worcestershire, England, 21 Sept., 1808; d. in Rock Island, Ill., 18 Nov., 1869. He was graduated at Cambridge, and it was the desire of his parents that he should study for the ministry. His own inclinations led him into literary work, and he wrote extensively for periodicals, including a pamphlet on university reforms, almost all the suggestions in which he lived to see practically carried out. In 1838 he came to the United States and settled in Henry county, Ill., where for thirteen years he led a secluded life, devoted to the care of his farm. His health becoming impaired, he removed to Rock Island in 1851, and there followed the lumber business for seven years. His active entomological career began after his retirement from business, and thereafter he contributed regularly from his observations and experience to various journals and proceedings of societies. In October, 1865, the "Practical Entomologist" was founded in Philadelphia, his name appeared as its associate editor from the west, and ultimately the editorial management passed entirely into his hands. During the session of 1866-'7 the legislature of Illinois authorized the appointment of a state entomologist, and Mr. Walsh's name was presented for confirmation. Although final action was deferred by the state senate until its next session, he discharged the duties of the office, and as acting state entomologist issued his first annual report for 1867. He was a member of various scientific societies, and was regarded as a standard authority on his specialty. His more important entomological works were published in the "Proceedings of the Philadelphia Entomological Society." Mr. Walsh was associated with Charles V. Riley in founding the "American Entomologist" in 1868, and was its senior editor until his death. In addition to the works that have been mentioned, he published "Walsh's Comedies of Aristophanes" (London, 1837).

WALSH, John, Canadian R. C. bishop, b. in Mooncoin, County Kilkenny, Ireland, 24 May, 1830. After completing his classical studies he entered St. John's college, Waterford, where he took a course of theology. Resolving to devote himself to foreign missions, he went to Canada in 1852, entered the Seminary of St. Sulpice, Montreal, and was ordained a priest on 1 Nov., 1854. He was stationed for two years at Brock, and was then appointed pastor of St. Mary's parish, Toronto. He was afterward transferred to St. Paul's, and subsequently was made rector of the cathedral, but was reappointed pastor of St. Mary's. He was then nominated to the see of Sandwich, and consecrated bishop on 10 Nov., 1867. In 1868 he removed his episcopal residence from Sandwich to London, and in 1869 he procured from the Propaganda a decree that made London the titular diocese. He at once entered on the task of removing the enormous debt that weighed on his flock, and in a few months succeeded in paying $40,000. He began with zeal to build churches and found schools, academics, and convents, but at the end of two years his health failed, and he was not able to attend the Vatican council. In 1875 he published a work on the questions that were discussed in that body. In 1876 he paid his first visit to Rome, and, after his return in the following year, the tenth anniversary of his consecration was appropriately celebrated. In 1881 he laid the corner-stone of the new cathedral of London, which is now nearly finished, and is unequalled among Canadian churches. In 1882 he visited Ireland, returning the same year. In 1884 he took part in the deliberations of the third plenary council of Baltimore at the special invitation of the American bishops. During Bishop Walsh's episcopate twenty-eight churches were built and five were enlarged, and more than $500,000 were spent on church improvement. Three convents were built, and a new orphanage was founded and placed under the care of the Sisters of St. Joseph. The College of Sandwich was opened by the Basilian Fathers, and nine academies and nine convents were established. The number of priests have increased to seventy-seven, and the Roman Catholic population to about 70,000.

WALSH, John Johnson, missionary, b. in Newburg, N. Y., 4 April, 1820; d. in Amenias, N. Y., 7 Feb., 1884. He was graduated at Union college in 1839, and at Princeton theological seminary in 1843, was ordained, and sailed the same year as a missionary under the American board for India, where he occupied stations at Futtehghur, Mynpoorie, and Allahabad till 1873. Returning home in 1874, he was pastor at Millerton, N. Y., for two years, and subsequently lived in Amenias. Mr. Walsh had just left India for the United States, and thus escaped the massacre of the mission at Futtehghur by the Sepoys in 1857. He published "A Memorial of the Futtehghur Mission and her Martyred Missionaries" (Philadelphia, 1859).

WALSH, Michael, educator, b. in Ireland in 1763; d. in Amesbury, Mass., 20 Aug., 1840. He came to America when a youth and became a teacher in Marblehead academy about the time of its organization in 1792, where Judge Joseph Story was one of his pupils. Harvard gave him the degree of A. M. in 1803. He was the author of a "Mercantile Arithmetic" (Newburyport, 1801), and a "New System of Book-keeping" (1826).

WALSH, Michael, politician, b. in Youghal, Ireland, 7 March, 1810; d. in New York city, 17 March, 1859. He went to Baltimore in his youth, received a good education, and became a lithographer. Removing to New York, he entered the assembly in 1839, and continued for many years to be a leader of the Democratic party. He established in 1840 "The Knickerbocker," which was stopped after two years' existence by his conviction and imprisonment for the publication of a libel. On his release he began "The Subterranean," an abusive and scurrilous sheet, that came to an end in a few years. On his release he served in congress, having been elected in 1853-'5 as a Democrat, and was then sent on a confidential mission to England and to Mexico by the government. Mr. Walsh visited the camps of the great contending powers in the Crimea, and was for a time the guest of Carroll Spence, then U. S. minister in Constantinople, having reached there from Sebastopol penniless and without suitable clothing. He had great talents, independence, and honesty, and was a keen satirist, and his letters from abroad were unrivalled in their vein. He was found dead in the area of a house in New York city. He published his "Speeches, Poems, and other Writings" (New York, 1843).

WALSH, Robert, author, b. in Baltimore, Md., in 1784; d. in Paris, 7 Feb., 1859. His father, a native of Ireland, was a merchant of Baltimore.

He was educated at the Roman Catholic college at Baltimore and at the Jesuit college at Georgetown, D. C., where in 1796 he delivered a poetical address before Gen. Washington, who was then president. He afterward spent a number of years in Europe, and, returning to this country in 1809, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began practice in Philadelphia. In consequence of deafness he abandoned law and engaged in journalism. In 1811 he began the publication of the first quarterly that was issued in the United States, "The American Review of History and Politics," which he continued two years, and in 1817-'18 edited the "American Register." In 1819 he established the "National Gazette" at Philadelphia, and remained connected with it till 1836, when he sold it to William Fry. He also edited the "Magazine of Foreign Literature," and resuscitated the "American Review" in March, 1827, which he continued to edit with much ability for ten years. About 1836 he went to reside in Paris, where he was U. S. consul in 1845-'51, and remained there till his death. He was at one time a writer for Dennie's "Portfolio," wrote biographical prefaces to an edition of the English poets in fifty small volumes, and biographical sketches for "Delaplane's Repository" and for the "Encyclopædia Americana," and while in Europe he corresponded with the "Journal of Commerce" and the "National Intelligencer." He was a member of the American philosophical society and the Royal Spanish academy of history. His "Letter on the Genius and Disposition of the French Government" (Philadelphia, 1810) was republished in England, where it was very popular, and passed through four editions. Mr. Walsh's other books include "Correspondence respecting Russia," with Robert Goodloe Harper (1813); "Essay on the Future State of Europe" (1813); "Appeal from the Judgment of Great Britain respecting the United States" (1819); "The Museum of Foreign Literature and Science" (1822); and "Didactics: Social, Literary, and Political" (2 vols., 1836). He also issued "The Select Speeches of George Canning" (Philadelphia, 1835) and "The Select Speeches of Windham and William Huskisson" (1841), for both of which he wrote biographical sketches.—His grandson, William Shepard, author, b. in Paris, France, 1 Feb., 1854, is the son of Robert M. Walsh, who was secretary of legation in France, and held various other diplomatic posts in Europe and in South America. He spent his boyhood in Italy. In 1867 he came with his family to this country, studied at Georgetown college, D. C., was graduated at the law department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1876, and in the same year accepted a post as reader and critic with J. B. Lippincott and Co., during which connection he has compiled, edited, or written about twenty juvenile, historical, and scientific books, under various pen-names, chiefly under that of "William Shepard." In 1886 he became editor of "Lippincott's Magazine." He has published under his own name "Faust: the Legend and the Poem," a critical commentary (Philadelphia, 1887), and "Paradoxes of a Philistine" (1888).

WALSH, William, Canadian R. C. archbishop, b. in Waterford, Ireland, in November, 1804; d. in Halifax, Nova Scotia, 10 Aug., 1858. He was educated in theology and philosophy in St. John's college, Waterford, and was ordained a priest on 25 March, 1828. He exercised his ministry for the following ten years in the archdiocese of Dublin, where he was nominated bishop of Calcutta. He was permitted to decline the appointment, but in 1834, in obedience to the command of his superiors, he consented to become coadjutor vicar apostolic of Nova Scotia. On the creation of the see of Halifax in 1845 he became bishop, and in 1852 he was made archbishop of the same diocese. He not only contributed to the advancement of the Roman Catholic church in Nova Scotia, but did much to increase the general well-being of the province. He labored to create a Roman Catholic literature, and for this purpose published translations of the works of St. Alphonsus Liguori, Grifet's "Meditations," Berthier's "God and I," and the "Spiritual Maxims" of St. Vincent de Paul. His original works are "Lenten Manual" (New York, 1855); "Catholic Offering" (1855); and "Eucharistica" (1856).

WALTER, Nehemiah, clergyman, b. in Ireland in December, 1663; d. in Roxbury, Mass., 17 Sept., 1750. He was of English parentage, and came with his father, Thomas, to this country in 1679, settling in Boston. He was graduated at Harvard in 1684, and, after living for a time in Nova Scotia, became colleague to John Eliot, the apostle to the Indians. He was minister of Roxbury, Mass., from 17 Oct., 1688, till his death. Mr. Walter married a daughter of Increase Mather. He published "An Essay on the Sense of Indwelling Sin in the Regenerate" (Boston, 1707); "Practical Discourses on the Holiness of Heaven" (1726); and a posthumous volume of "Sermons on Isaiah LV." (1755).—His son, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 13 Dec., 1696; d. there, 10 Jan., 1725, was graduated at Harvard in 1713, and ordained as his father's colleague, 19 Oct., 1718. He published "Grounds and Rules of Music Explained" (Boston, 1721); "A Sermon at the Boston Lecture" (1723); and "Infallibility may Sometimes Mistake," an essay (1724).—Thomas's nephew, William, clergyman, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 7 Oct., 1737; d. in Boston, 5 Dec., 1800, was graduated at Harvard in 1756, ordained by the bishop of London in 1764 as a minister of the Anglican church, and on 22 July of the same year installed rector of Trinity church, Boston. He sympathized with the loyalists, and, resigning the rectorship of Trinity church, 17 March, 1776, accompanied Gen. Howe to Halifax, Nova Scotia, with his family and many others. He afterward went to New York, acted for some time as chaplain of a British regiment, and, returning to Nova Scotia, received a grant of land from the crown as compensation for his losses, which amounted to £7,000. He returned to Boston in 1791, and the next year became rector of Christ church in that city, where he ministered till his death. In 1796 he was invited to deliver the Duddleian lecture at Harvard college, and in 1798 he pronounced the anniversary discourse before the Massachusetts humane society, which was published. The degree of D. D.

was conferred on him by King's college, Aberdeen, in 1784.—William's grandson, LYNDE MINSHALL, journalist (1799—1842), was graduated at Harvard in 1817, established the "Boston Transcript" in 1830, and was editor till 1842.—Another grandson of William, William Bicker, author, b. in Boston, 19 April, 1796; d. in Charleston, S. C., 23 April, 1822, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1818, and studied divinity at Cambridge, but did not preach. He possessed an active fancy and great facility of versification. Mr. Walter contributed odes, sonnets, and translations to the newspapers and magazines, and in 1822 went to the southern states to give lectures on poetry. He published "Poems" (Boston, 1821), and "Sukey" a poem (1821). The latter was suggested by Fitz-Greene Halleck's "Fanny," which appeared in 1819.

WALTER, Thomas, botanist, b. in Hampshire, England, about 1745; d. near Charleston, S. C., about 1800. He received a liberal education in England, but, emigrating to this country, settled on a plantation in St. Stephen's parish, S. C. There he followed the business of a planter and devoted his leisure to botany. In his garden he cultivated the plants that he subsequently described, and several species have since been named after him. His principal publication is "Flora Caroliniana, secundum Systema Vegetabilium perillustris Linnæi digesta" (London, 1788).

WALTER, Thomas Ustick, architect, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 4 Sept., 1804; d. there, 30 Oct., 1887. His early education was liberal but not collegiate, and at the age of fifteen he entered the office of William Strickland, the architect of the mint and the custom-house, Philadelphia. After acquiring a knowledge of linear drawing and a general acquaintance with the professional practice of architects, he resumed his general studies, prosecuted them for seven years, and after two more years with Mr. Strickland he began practice as an architect in 1830. His first important work was the new county prison (1831), which is now generally known as Moyamensing jail, and in 1833 he made the original designs for Girard college, and was sent to Europe by the building committee of that institution, that he might study there. On his return he took charge of the college building, which was completed in 1847, and which it is claimed is the finest specimen of classic architecture on this continent. Mr. Walter's next great work was the breakwater at Laguayra for the Venezuelan government; in 1851 his design for the extension of the capitol at Washington was adopted. Having been appointed government architect, he removed to Washington, and remained there till the completion of the work in 1865. (See illustration.) While in Washington he also designed the extensions of the patent-office, treasury, and post-office buildings, the dome on the old capitol, the congressional library, and the government hospital for the insane. Among the works of his private practice in Philadelphia were the designs for St. George's hall, the Preston retreat, and the Biddle and Cowperthwaite places on Delaware river. He assisted the architect of the new Public buildings at Philadelphia in their erection, and was so engaged till his death. He was a member of the Franklin institute after 1829, held its professorship of architecture, and in 1860 delivered a course of lectures on that subject in Columbia college, New York. He was a member of the American philosophical society after 1841, and was one of the original members of the American institute of architects, of which he was president at the time of his death. He received the degree of D. C. L. from the University of Lewisburg, Pa., in 1853, and that of LL. D. from Harvard in 1857.

WALTER, William Henry, musician, b. in Newark, N. J., 1 July, 1825. He removed to New York in 1842, was appointed organist in Trinity parish in 1847, and placed successively in charge of the music at St. John's chapel, St. Paul's, Trinity church, and Trinity chapel, where he remained until 1869. He studied composition under Dr. Edward Hodges, was appointed organist at Columbia college, New York, in 1856, and in 1865 received the honorary degree of Mus. Doc. from that institution, with which he is still connected. His published works are "Manual of Church Music" (New York, 1860); "Chorals and Hymns" (1866); "Common Prayer with Ritual Song" (1868); "Lessons in Music" (1882); and "Mass in C," with Latin and English text (1886).—His son, George William, organist, b. in New York city, 16 Dec., 1851, at the age of eleven was placed under the musical instruction of John K. Paine, of Boston, and subsequently under Samuel P. Warren, of New York. In 1869 he went to Washington, D. C., and was given the degree of Mus. Doc. by Columbian university of that city. His compositions are rather for the virtuoso than for the popular ear. As an organist he is known for his powers in extemporaneous performance and novelty in registration. His musical library contains more than 8,000 works.

WALTER, William Joseph, author, b. in England; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 9 Oct., 1846. He was a professor in St. Edmund's college, Ware, England, till 1839, when he emigrated to this country, and settled in Philadelphia, where, at the time of his death, he acted as secretary to the British consul. His chief publications were "Account of a Manuscript of Ancient English Poetry, entitled 'Clavis Scientiæ, or Bretayne's Skyl-Kay of Knawing,' by John de Wageby" (London, 1816); editions of "Marie Magdalen's Funerall Teares" and others of Robert Southwell's poems; "Sir Thomas More: his Life and Times" (Philadelphia, 1839); "Beauties of Sir Thomas More" (Baltimore, 1840); "Mary, Queen of Scots: a Journal of her Twenty Years' Captivity, Trial, and Execution" (Philadelphia, 1840); "St. John Chrysostom" (1841); and "The New Following of Christ" (1841).

WALTERS, William Thompson, merchant, b. on the Juniata river, Pa., 23 May, 1820. He is of Scotch-Irish ancestry, and his father, Henry Walters, a banker of Pennsylvania, sent him to Philadelphia to be educated as a civil engineer. He was placed in charge of a large smelting establishment in Lycoming county, Pa., where under his management the first iron that was manufactured in the United States from mineral coal was made. In 1841 he removed to Baltimore, Md., and engaged in the general commission business, and in 1847 he established the firm of W. T. Walters and Co., wine-merchants. When the first line of steamers between Baltimore and Savannah was established he was chosen its president, and from that time he has been a director in every line from Baltimore to the south. After the civil war he aided in the reorganization of the southern steamship lines. For many years he has been a director of the Northern Central railway company, and he is also interested in many southern lines. From 1861 till 1865 he resided in Europe, where he became the personal friend of many prominent continental artists, and travelled extensively to study the history and development of art and to purchase pictures for the collection that he had begun at an early period. He was art commissioner from the United States to the Paris exposition of 1867, that in Vienna in 1873, and that in Paris in 1878. He is one of the permanent trustees of the Corcoran art gallery in Washington, D. C., and is also chairman of the purchasing committee, a trustee of the Peabody institute, and chairman of its committee on art. He is also a trustee of the estate left for art uses by the sculptor William H. Rinehart, who was enabled to procure his art education largely through the generosity of Mr. Walters. Albert Wolff, the French critic, says that Mr. Walters's private collection is the most complete gallery of French pictures in the world with a single exception. He owns a large and rare collection of Bonvin's water-colors, and many Barye bronzes. His collection of Oriental porcelain, and ceramics numbers 3,000 pieces. For many years Mr. Walters has annually opened his gallery to the public, and the proceeds are devoted to the Poor association of Baltimore. He has given to the city of Baltimore several bronzes, which adorn the four public squares adjoining the Washington monument. They are the great lion, a masterpiece made by Antoine Louis Barye, in 1847, for the Tuileries; four groups—"War," "Peace," "Strength," and "Order"—productions of the models made by Barye for the exterior decoration of the Louvre; and a reproduction in bronze by Barbedienne of "Military Courage," made by Paul Dubois for the Lamoricière monument in Nantes. He has also given to the city a reproduction in bronze of the statue of Chief-Justice Taney in Annapolis, Md., made by Rinehart. During his visit to Europe, Mr. Walters became interested in the Percheron horses; he brought eighteen of them to the United States in 1866, and extended the importation of this stock. To increase an intelligent interest on this subject, he published "The Percheron Horse," from the French of Charles Du Haÿs, with artistic etchings (printed privately, New York, 1886). He has also published "Antoine Louis Barye, from the French of Various Critics" (Baltimore, 1885), and "Notes upon Certain Masters of the XIX. Century" (New York, 1886).

WALTHALL, Edward Cary, senator, b. in Richmond, Va., 4 April, 1831. He was educated at Holly Springs, Miss., studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1852, and practised at Coffeeville, Miss. In 1856 he was elected district attorney of the 10th judicial district of Mississippi, and he was re-elected in 1859, but resigned in 1861 and entered the Confederate army as a lieutenant in the 15th Mississippi infantry. He was promoted to lieutenant-colonel, and commanded the regiment in the battle of Fishing Creek, or Mill Springs, Ky., 19 Jan., 1862. Subsequently he became colonel of the 29th Mississippi regiment, and he was promoted brigadier, 13 Dec., 1862, and major-general, 6 June, 1864. His service was in the western army. At the battle of Mission Ridge, after the National forces had penetrated the Confederate lines, Gen. Walthall, under direction of Gen. Benjamin F. Cheatham, threw his brigade across the ridge and held the advancing troops in check until darkness enabled the Confederates to make their escape. He commanded the rear-guard of General John B. Hood's army after that general's disastrous defeat at Nashville, and protected them from capture by the pursuing forces of General George H. Thomas. In January, 1871, Gen. Walthall resumed the practice of law at Grenada, Miss., which he continued until March, 1885. He was delegate at large to the National Democratic conventions of 1868, 1876, 1880, and 1884. He was appointed to the U. S. senate as a Democrat to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Lucius Q. C. Lamar, took his seat on 12 March, 1885, and was elected by the legislature in January, 1886, for the unexpired term, without opposition. He was unanimously chosen in January, 1888, for the term that will end in 1895.

WALTHER, Carl Ferdinand Wilhelm, theologian, b. in Langenchursdorf, Saxony, 25 Oct., 1811; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 7 May, 1887. He was the youngest son of Rev. Gottlieb Heinrich Wilhelm Walther and a descendant of a long line of Lutheran clergymen. He received his classical education in the gymnasium at Schneeberg, in the Harz mountain, and his theological training at the University of Leipsic, where he was graduated in 1833. In the same year he became tutor in the family of a councilman at Kahla, and in 1837 became pastor at Bräunsdorf. During his residence at Kahla he was acquainted with Rev. Martin Stephan in Dresden, who was at that time at the height of his popularity, but with whom Walther could not always agree. When, in 1838, Stephan gave the signal for emigration to this country, Walther, with a number of his members, decided to accompany them, and they arrived at New Orleans, La., on 5 Jan., 1839. On the way Stephan disclosed his true nature as a religious fanatic, and Walther separated from him. Some of the emigrants settled in St. Louis, while others went to the interior of the state, especially in Perry county. Among the latter was Walther, who located at Altenburg, as a Lutheran pastor, and after the deposition of Stephan became the deliverer of his deluded followers. In 1841, after the death of his brother Herman, he accepted the pastorate of the Lutheran congregation of Saxons in St. Louis, Mo., where he restored harmony among the people and gave them a proper form of government. His labors were so successful that in the fall of 1842 he dedicated the first Lutheran church of the Holy Trinity in St. Louis. He became the recognized leader among his countrymen, who settled in large numbers in Missouri, and was chief in the movement that resulted in 1847 in the organization of the synod of Missouri, Ohio, and other states, of which he was the first president, and which is now the largest Lutheran synod in the country. In 1849 the theological seminary that was organized at Altenburg in a log-hut, 9 Oct., 1839, was removed to St. Louis, and Mr. Walther was elected its president, which post he held until his death. He was pre-eminently the leader of the so-called Missouri Lutherans. In 1872 the synodical conference of the Evangelical Lutheran church in North America was organized, of which he was also the recognized leader and in which he exercised a controlling influence throughout his life. He was an earnest and faithful student of the writings of Luther and the confession of the Evangelical Lutheran church, a fine classical scholar, a profound theologian, an able leader and organizer, and a prolific author. In 1844 he began the publication of "Der Lutheraner," a semi-monthly, in St. Louis, Mo., of which he was the editor until 1887, and in 1855 he established there "Lehre und Wehre," a monthly, which he conducted until his death. He published a large number of sermons, addresses, and criticisms, many of which appeared in German and English, and which are widely circulated in the United States and Europe. He has also issued several works, among which are "Dr. M. Luther's kleiner Katechismus ausgelegt von Dr. J. C. Dietrich, mit Zusätzen" (St. Louis, 1858); "Amerikanisch-Lutherische Evangelien-Postille" (1871; 9th ed., 1883); "Amerikanisch-Lutherische Epistel-Postille" (1871); "Amerikanisch-Lutherische Pastoral Theologie" (1872); "Baieri, J. G., Compendium Theologiæ Positivæ: Editio auctior et emendatior" (3 vols., 1879).

WALTON, George, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Frederick county, Va., in 1740; d. in Augusta, Ga., 2 Feb., 1804. He was entirely self-taught, and was early apprenticed to a carpenter. His employer would not permit him the use of a candle to read at night, but in his zeal for knowledge he found a substitute in pine-knots. At the expiration of his apprenticeship he removed to Georgia, studied law with Henry Young, was admitted to the bar in 1774, and began practice at Augusta. He was one of four persons that called a public meeting at Savannah, Ga., 27 July, 1774, for the consideration of public grievances, and was one of a committee that was appointed on that occasion to institute a correspondence with the different parishes, inviting them to co-operate with the other provinces in North America in opposition to the arbitrary exercise of power by the British government. On 12 Jan., 1775, another meeting of the citizens was convened, but the majority were opposed to taking any decisive measures against the mother country, though Mr. Walton eloquently urged such action. He was one of the committee that prepared a petition to the king, and drew up the patriotic resolutions that were adopted on that occasion; was active in promoting the Revolution in Georgia, and from February, 1776, till October, 1781, was a delegate to the Continental congress, signing the Declaration of Independence in the former year. In December, 1778, he was appointed a colonel of militia, commanded a battalion on the right of Gen. Robert Howe's army when Savannah was taken by the British, was severely wounded in the thigh, and, having been taken prisoner, was not liberated till September, 1779. In October of the same year, and again in 1789, he was chosen governor of Georgia. He was appointed chief justice of the state in 1783, and in 1787 was elected a delegate to the convention for framing the constitution of the United States, but did not take his seat. In 1793 he was again a judge of the supreme court, and in 1795-'6 he was U. S. senator. He was also one of the U. S. commissioners to negotiate a treaty with the Cherokee Indians in Tennessee, and was several times a member of the legislature of Georgia. Gen. McIntosh, then in command of the militia in Georgia, accused Mr. Walton of indirect participation in the production of a forged letter, dated 30 Nov., 1779, which was transmitted to the president of congress, requesting his removal from the command of the troops in the state. This accusation was considered by the legislature of Georgia in January, 1783. A vote of censure was passed on Mr. Walton, and the attorney-general was recommended to institute such proceedings against him as the case required. This action of the legislature seems strangely inconsistent with Mr. Walton's appointment by the same body as chief justice of Georgia on the preceding day.—His son, GEORGE, held the office of secretary of state for West Florida under the administration of Andrew Jackson.

WALTON, George Edward, physician, b. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 25 Dec., 1839. He was graduated at Bellevue hospital medical college, New York, in 1864, and, after serving as acting assistant surgeon in the National army, visited Europe for study in 1865, and, returning in 1866, began practice in Cincinnati. He afterward became professor of the principles and practice of medicine in Cincinnati college, took the chair of medicine and surgery in 1880, and was president of the Cincinnati academy of medicine in 1880-'1. In addition to monographs on European and American climatic resorts, and contributions to periodicals, he has published "Mineral Springs of the United States and Canada" (New York, 1872).

WALTON, William, British author, b. in England in 1784; d. at Oxford in 1857. He was British resident at Santo Domingo, and, in addition to articles for reviews and magazines, published "Present State of the Spanish Colonies" (2 vols., London, 1810); "Historical Account of Peruvian Sheep" (1811); "Sketch of the United States of America, 1800-1810, by Le C. F. de Beaujour," translated (1814); "Exposé of the Dissensions of Spanish America" (1814); "Reports on Mines in Hayti" (1825); "Mémorial on Slavery in Brazil," translated (1826); and "Spain; or Who is the Lawful Successor to the Throne?" (1834).

WALTON, William Claiborne, clergyman, b. in Hanover county, Va., 4 Nov., 1793; d. in Hartford, Conn., 18 Feb., 1834. He was the son of a blacksmith, and received but few advantages of early education, but afterward studied at Hampden Sidney college, and was licensed as a preacher of the Presbyterian church, 22 Oct., 1814, at Fredericksburg. He afterward preached at Smithfield and Berryville, Va., at Washington, D. C., for a short period in 1821, and in February, 1823, became pastor of the 3d Presbyterian church, Baltimore. In May, 1827, he was installed as pastor of the 2d

Presbyterian church at Alexandria, which charge he retained till 1832. In November, 1830, he was deputed by the presbytery of the District of Columbia to attend the annual meeting of the synod of Virginia, and in 1832 he was chosen missionary agent and evangelist for the presbyteries of East and West Hanover. Subsequently he became pastor of the Free church, Hartford, Conn. He was remarkably successful as an evangelist, and contributed in a considerable degree to the revival of religion in the Presbyterian, Congregational, and other churches during 1831, whereby more than 100,000 persons were brought into church communion. He published a small volume of sermons, besides separate discourses, and a sketch of the life of his daughter, Margaret Ann. A poem commemorative of him was written by Mrs. Lydia H. Sigourney after his death, and his life was published by Joshua N. Danforth (New York, 1837).

WALWORTH, Jeannette Ritchie Hadermann, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 22 Feb., 1837. She removed to Natchez, Miss., while a child, with her father, Charles Julius Hadermann, a German baron, who was afterward president of Jefferson college. On his death the family removed to Louisiana, and when she was sixteen years old Miss Hadermann became a governess. Having married Maj. Douglas Walworth, of Natchez, she accompanied him to his plantation in southern Arkansas, thence removed to Memphis, Tenn., and finally to New York city, where she now resides. In addition to contributions to the periodical press, the "Continent," and other magazines, she has published "Forgiven at Last" (Philadelphia, 1870); "The Silent Witness" (1871); "Dead Men's Shoes" (1872); "Heavy Yokes" (Boston, 1874); "Nobody's Business" (New York, 1878); "The Bar Sinister" (1885); "Without Blemish" (1885); "Alice and Scruples" (1886); "At Bay" (New York, 1887); "The New Man at Rossmere" (1887); "Southern Silhouettes" (New York, 1887); "True to Herself" (New York, 1888); "That Girl from Texas" (New York, 1888).

WALWORTH, John, pioneer, b. in Groton, Conn., in 1765; d. in Cleveland, Ohio, 10 Sept., 1812. He settled at Painesville, Ohio, in 1800, and in 1802 was made justice of the peace for Trumbull county. In 1803 Gov. Tiffin appointed him associate judge of the superior court. In 1806 he held simultaneously four distinct offices—those of inspector of the port of Cuyahoga, collector of the district of Erie, associate judge of Geauga county, and postmaster at Cleveland, to which place he had removed in 1805. The post-office at Cleveland was kept in the upper story of a small building on Superior street, and the total receipts of the office for the first quarter were only $2.83. The place had then a population of less than fifty, and a mail came to it only twice a week. When it arrived Mr. Walworth delivered the letters personally, carrying them around in his hat; and that duty performed, it is said that he would lock up his office and "go a-fishing with the boys." He held the offices of associate judge and collector of customs till his death, and was much esteemed.—His wife, Juliana Morgan, b. in Groton, Conn., 31 Dec., 1769; d. in Cleveland, 2 March, 1853, was one of the three women that refused to leave their homes when the stampede occurred at Cleveland on the occasion of Gen. William Hull's surrender. She was an accomplished horsewoman, and often took long horseback journeys with her husband, once crossing the Alleghanies with him, and going in this manner to the eastern states by way of Pittsburg and Philadelphia.

WALWORTH, Reuben Hyde, jurist and the last of the chancellors of New York state, b. in Bozrah, Conn., 26 Oct., 1788; d. in Saratoga Springs, N. Y., 27 Nov., 1867. He was the third son of

R. H. Walworth

Benjamin Walworth, who in the early part of the Revolutionary war was quartermaster of Col. Nicholl's New York regiment, and acted as adjutant at the battle of White Plains. The family was originally of London, England, the American branch descending from William Walworth, who emigrated from that city in 1671 and settled on Fisher's island, and afterward in New London, Conn. His father removed to Hoosick, N. Y., during the son's early childhood, where the latter acquired the mere rudiments of an education by great industry, and at the age of sixteen taught in a school. At seventeen he began the study of law at Troy, N. Y., and in 1809 he was admitted to the bar. In January, 1810, he settled at Plattsburg, N. Y., where he speedily rose to eminence in his profession, and in 1811 he was appointed a master in chancery, and one of the county judges. At the invasion of Plattsburg by the British army in September, 1814, Mr. Walworth, who since 1812 had held the post of adjutant-general of the New York militia, was aide to Gen. Benjamin Mooers, and witnessed Com. McDonough's battle and victory on the lake, having been deputed to watch the contest from the shore and report the result to his chief. He was a member of congress in 1821-'3, and in April of the latter year was appointed judge of the 4th judicial district of New York state, which office he held for five years. In October of the same year he removed to Saratoga Springs. He presided in his circuit until 1828, when he was appointed chancellor of the state of New York. This office he held for twenty years, when the new constitution of 1848 abolished the court of chancery. In 1828 he removed to Albany, but in the spring of 1833 he returned to Saratoga Springs and to his residence at Pine Grove, where he remained until his death. Pine Grove (seen in the accompanying illustration) was for many years a much-frequented place, few residences in the land seeing more of the great celebrities of the country, especially jurists and statesmen, among them De Witt Clinton, Martin Van Buren, Silas Wright, Daniel D. Tompkins, William L. Marcy, Francis Granger, William H. Seward, Stephen A. Douglas, Millard Fillmore, James Buchanan, Chancellor Kent, Judge Story, Washington Irving, Fenimore Cooper, and Gen. Winfield Scott. Chancellor Walworth may justly be regarded as the great artisan of our equity laws. In some sense he was the Bentham of America, without the bold speculations and fantastical theories which, to a certain extent, characterized the great British jurist. What Bentham did in removing defects in English jurisprudence Walworth did in renovating and simplifying the equity laws of the United States. Justice Story pronounced him "the greatest equity jurist living." Before his day the court of chancery in New York state was a tribunal of ill-defined powers and uncertain jurisdiction, in a measure subservient to the English court of chancery in its procedure. Chancellor Walworth abolished much of that subtlety, many of those prolix and bewildering formalities which had their origin in the middle ages. He reduced the practice of his court to standard rules, which he prepared with great industry. These rules greatly improved the old system of equity practice, and though he has been charged with thus complicating the court of chancery with expensive machinery, it cannot be gainsaid that with Chancellor Walworth equity was the soul and spirit of law, "creating positive and defining rational law, flexible in its nature, and suited to the fortunes, cases, and reciprocal obligations of men." The contents of fourteen volumes of Paige and Barbour's "Chancery Reports," containing the adjudications in his own court, and a large part of the matter of the thirty-eight volumes of Wendell, Hill, and Denio's "Reports," consisting of the opinions he pronounced in the court of errors, attest his vast judicial labors. All widows and orphans in the state were wards of the court of chancery. The chancellor construed this tutelage in the most simple sense and acted accordingly. His wards had easy access to him without any formalities of red tape. He listened to their stories patiently, instituted inquiries after his own fashion, and often made some prompt order in their favor upon such informal application. Chancellor Walworth was of such a genial, winning manner that whoever came in contact with him was at once placed at ease. He was also very benevolent, and was constantly looking about him for some deserving object upon whom to exercise his kindness. He was for many years an elder in the Presbyterian church, and took it upon himself to care especially for the poor of the congregation. He was an early and stanch friend of temperance, and for a long period was president of the American temperance union. He was also vice-president of the Bible society and the Tract society. Princeton gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1835. He was the author of "Rules and Orders of the New York Court of Chancery" (Albany, 1829; several revised eds.), and "Hyde Genealogy" (2 vols., 1864).—His son, Clarence Alphonsus, author, b. in Plattsburg, N. Y., 30 May, 1820, was graduated at Union college in 1838, and studied law, first at Canandaigua, N. Y., and afterward at Albany. He was admitted to the bar in July, 1841, and practised one year at Rochester. Afterward he was a student at the General theological seminary of the Protestant Episcopal church, New York city, for three years, and then, uniting with the Roman Catholic church, went to Belgium, spending three years with the Redemptionists, and at the College of Wittenberg, where he was ordained priest. He was then sent to England, taking charge, while there, of a new church at Upton on Severn, and acting as a missionary in London, Liverpool, and Manchester. He returned in March, 1850, and was a travelling missionary throughout the United States for fifteen years. He was also one of the five founders of the order of Paulists in the United States. (See HECKER, ISAAC T.) In 1864 his health compelled him to relinquish his work as a missionary and return to his home at Saratoga Springs, and he was afterward made rector of St. Mary's parish, Albany, N. Y., in which post he has since remained. Father Walworth has ever been an advocate of the cause of temperance, and has for several years been vice-president of the Law and order league of the state of New York. He is the author of "The Gentle Skeptic," a work on the authorship and inspiration of the Old Testament (New York, 1860); "The Doctrine of Hell, ventilated in a Discussion between Rev. C. A. Walworth and William H. Burr, Esq." (1874); and "Andiatarocte, or the Eve of Lady Day on Lake George, and other Poems, Hymns, and Meditations in Verse" (1888). He has also contributed to "Brownson's Review" and to "The Catholic World," and is well known as a lecturer.—Another son, Mansfield Tracy, novelist, b. in Albany, N. Y., 3 Dec., 1830; d. in New York city, 3 June, 1873, was graduated at Union college in 1849 and at Harvard law-school in 1852, and admitted to the bar in 1855. After practising in Albany with his father for some time, he abandoned his profession for that of literature, began writing for the "Home Journal," and subsequently composed many sensational romances. He was intentionally shot and killed by his son, whose trial for the crime is celebrated in American law annals. The son was acquitted on the ground of mental aberration, and placed in an insane asylum. Mr. Walworth's books, which at one time had a large circulation, include "Mission of Death" (New York, 1853); "Lulu" (1860); "Hotspur" (1861); "Stormcliff" (1865); "Warwick" (1868); "Delaplane, or the Sacrifice of Irene" (1872); and "Beverly, or the White Mask" (1873). At the time of his death he was engaged on the "Lives of the Chancellors of New York State," and had just completed a "Life of Chancellor Livingston." After his death two works were published from his manuscripts: "Married in Mask" (1888), and "Tahara, a Leaf from Empire" (1888).—His wife, Ellen Hardin, author, b. in Jacksonville, Ill., 20 Oct., 1832, is the daughter of Col. John J. Hardin, who was killed at Buena Vista. She has been a member of the board of education for three years in Saratoga Springs, and principal, for six years, of a school for young ladies. She is an active trustee of the Saratoga monument association, and through her instrumentality about twenty spots of historic interest on the battle-fields have been recently marked by granite tablets. Mrs. Walworth has published an account of the Burgoyne campaign, with several original maps (New York, 1877), and has contributed to the "Magazine of American History" an account of the battle of Buena Vista—a chapter of the work on which she is now engaged, "The Life of Col. John J. Hardin, and a History of the Hardin Family." She has also written several patriotic and other poems, and has ready a volume of essays on literary, artistic, scientific, and educational topics.—Their daughter, Ellen Hardin, author, b. in Saratoga Springs, 2 Oct., 1858, has published "An Old World, as seen through Young Eyes" (New York, 1875), and has now ready a work entitled "The Lily of the Mohawks, or the Life and Times of Katarie Tegokwithi," the first Iroquois convert to the Christian faith.—Another daughter, Reubena Hyde, b. in Louisville, Ky., 21 Feb., 1867, has published poems in magazines, and is the author of a comediette entitled "Where was Elsie? or the Saratoga Fairies" (New York, 1888).

WANAMAKER, John, merchant, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1838. He was educated in the common schools, and engaged early in business. In 1861 he established a clothing-house, to which he afterward added other branches of business, and he now has one of the largest retail stores in the United States. In 1887 Mr. Wanamaker adopted the system of co-operation in his store, and during the first year of its operation over $100,000 was paid to employes in excess of salaries. He has also organized a savings-bank for employes, a building association, classes for instruction, and a library. In 1858 he began a Sunday-school in southwest Philadelphia, out of which has grown Bethany Presbyterian church, and he was one of the founders of the Christian commission, and president of the Young men's Christian association of Philadelphia in 1870-'83. Mr. Wanamaker was chairman of the bureau of revenue and of the press committee, which rendered efficient service in aid of the Centennial exposition in Philadelphia in 1876.

WANGENHEIM, Frederick Adam Julius (vong'-en-hime), Baron von, German scientist, b. in the castle of Wangenheim, near Waltershausen, duchy of Coburg-Gotha, in 1747; d. in Gumbinnen, Prussia, 25 March, 1800. He received his education at Waltershausen, and in 1766 entered the service of the duke of Coburg as lieutenant. He passed afterward to the Prussian army and attained the rank of captain. He came to the United States in 1777 in the Hessian contingent in the British service, commanded a squadron of light cavalry in New York and Pennsylvania in 1778-'83, and won a reputation for his successful raids. On his return to Germany he was given the cross of the Hessian military order, and later re-entered the Prussian service. He had studied while in North America the natural history of the country, and especially the trees and shrubs, and in 1785, in a memoir to the Berlin academy, showed the immense advantages that would be derived from the naturalization of several species of American trees. On request of the academy he was then sent to Gumbinnen as director-general of the waters and forests of eastern Prussia, where he carried on experiments on a large scale and planted a great number of American trees. His works include "Beschreibung einiger Arten von Bäumen die in Nordamerika wachsen, mit Bezug auf ihren Gebrauch in den deutschen Wäldern, nach den Beobachtungen in den nordamerikanischen Provinzen von 1778-1783" (Göttingen, 1781); "Supplement zur Wälder-Kultur-Wissenschaft, mit Anwendung auf die Umpflanzung der Baumarten die in Nordamerika wachsen" (1787); "Beschreibung der verschiedenen Holzarten die in Nordamerika wachsen" (1788); "Betrachtungen über die Tannen von Preussisch-Litthauen" (1789); "Betrachtungen über die Weichhölzer die in Nordamerika wachsen" (1795); and several memoirs in the "Transactions" of the Berlin academy of sciences.

WANTON, Joseph, governor of Rhode Island, b. in Newport, R. I., in 1705; d. there, 19 July, 1780. His father, William (1680-1737), was governor of Rhode Island in 1732-'4. The son was graduated at Harvard in 1751, acquired wealth as a merchant, and in 1769 was elected governor. In June, 1775, the assembly of Rhode Island deprived Gov. Wanton of all power, in consequence of his opposition to the will of that body and his supposed sympathy with the royalists, and from that period Deputy-Governor Nicholas Cooke acted as the executive authority. Among the chief causes that induced the people to regard Gov. Wanton with suspicion was, doubtless, his acceptance, in 1773, of an appointment, under the great seal of England, to inquire into the burning of the king's ship, the "Gaspee," by the Whigs. While Newport was occupied by the British he was superintendent of the troops, and at the evacuation he followed the royal army to New York. He was a man of amiable disposition, elegant manners, and handsome person.

WARBURTON, George, British author, b. near Tullamore, County Galway, Ireland, about 1812; d. in 1857. He entered the British army, attained the rank of major, and resided in Canada for some time. After his return to England he was a member of parliament for Harwich. He died by his own hand. Mr. Warburton published "Hochelaga, or England in the New World" (2 vols., London, 1846); "The Conquest of Canada" (2 vols., 1849); and "A Memoir of Charles Mordaunt, Earl of Peterborough" (3 vols., 1853). His books were edited by his brother Eliot, who became distinguished as an author.

WARD, Aaron, congressman, b. in Sing Sing, N. Y., 5 July, 1790; d. in Georgetown, D. C., 2 March, 1867. He received a classical education, and began the study of law, which he relinquished to join the army at the age of eighteen. He served as a lieutenant under Gen. Wade Hampton in the expedition against Montreal, and was promoted captain in 1814. After the close of the war with Great Britain he resumed his legal studies in Oxford, N. Y., was admitted to the bar, and began practice in Sing Sing. He married in 1820 a daughter of Elkanah Watson, and shortly afterward was appointed district attorney for Westchester county. He entered congress on 5 Dec., 1825, and served till 3 March, 1829. After an intermission of one term he was again elected for three consecutive terms, serving from 5 Dec., 1831, till 3 March, 1837, and four years later returned for a single congress, which closed its sessions on 3 March, 1843. He was a supporter of the administrations of Andrew Jackson and Martin Van Buren, took an active part in commercial legislation and in all measures that affected the interests of New York, and also concerned himself with the framing of military bills, and was the special advocate of state education for soldiers' children. In 1846 he was a member of the State constitutional convention, and in 1855 he was defeated as a candidate for secretary of state of New York. He was a major-general of militia from 1835 till 1853. Gen. Ward was the author of "Around the Pyramids," describing travels in Europe and the East (New York, 1863). He died at the home of his son-in-law, Samuel J. Randall. Another daughter married John R. Thompson, U. S. senator from New Jersey. —His nephew, Elijah, congressman, b. in Sing Sing, N. Y., 16 Sept., 1816; d. in Roslyn, L. I., 7 Feb., 1882, received a classical education, engaged in commercial pursuits in New York city, and was chosen president of the Mercantile library association in 1839. Afterward he studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1843, and practised in New York city. He was judge-advocate-general of the state in 1853-'5, and was elected as a Democrat to congress, serving from 7 Dec., 1857, till 3 March, 1859. He was defeated at the next election, but was successful in the following two, serving from 4 July, 1861, till 3 March, 1865. On being again defeated, he spent two years in Europe, and was not again a candidate till 1874, when he defeated his Republican competitor, but he was beaten in the succeeding election by a rival Democrat. In congress he took part in the discussion of commercial questions, advocating an interoceanic canal, uniform bankruptcy laws, postal subsidies to steamships, and reciprocity with Canada, and opposing a paper currency. In March, 1861, he addressed commercial bodies in New York city in favor of free canals, and in 1871, in response to a request from members of congress for an expression of his views, proposed freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States and Canada, on which subject he published two reports. Besides single speeches on commercial relations with Canada, the Geneva award, the Hawaiian treaty, and the shipping act, there has been published a volume of his "Speeches on Commercial, Financial, and other Subjects" (New York, 1877). —His cousin, Horatio, banker, b. in New York city about 1810; d. in London, England, in April, 1868, resided in London for many years before his death. He bequeathed $100,000 to the National soldiers' and sailors' home, Washington, D. C., and an equal sum for the education of soldiers' orphans.

WARD, Andrew Henshaw, antiquary, b. in Shrewsbury, Mass., 26 May, 1784; d. in Newtonville, Mass., 18 Feb., 1864. He was graduated at Harvard in 1808, studied law, was admitted to the bar at Northampton, Mass., in 1811, and practised till 1829 at Shrewsbury, where, while filling the office of town-clerk, he transcribed all the records of births, deaths, and marriages, and was active in putting an end to the custom of "farming out" the town's poor. For the period between 1829 and 1853, except during two years, he was employed in the custom-house at Boston, and from 1837, when a general bankruptcy law went into force, till 1846, when it expired, he was U. S. commissioner of insolvency for the district of Massachusetts. He was a delegate from Newton to the convention of 1853 for revising the constitution of Massachusetts. For more than fifty years he was a justice of the peace, either in Shrewsbury, Boston, or West Newton, where he settled in 1842. Mr. Ward was an active member of the New England historic-genealogical society almost from its first organization, and a frequent contributor to its "Register." He published a "History of the Town of Shrewsbury" (Boston, 1847), containing a "Family Register," which was also issued separately; "Ward Family: Descendants of William Ward" (1851); and "Genealogical History of the Rice Family" (1858). See his "Memoir," by William B. Trask" (Boston, 1863).

WARD, Artemas, soldier, b. in Shrewsbury, Mass., in 1727; d. there, 28 Oct., 1800. He was graduated at Harvard in 1748, entered public life at an early age as a representative to the general assembly, and was afterward chosen to the executive council. In 1752 he was a justice of the peace in his native town. In 1755 he served as major in Col. Abraham Williams's regiment, and in 1758 he was major in the one that was commanded by William Williams. He accompanied the expedition under Gen. James Abercrombie against the French and Indians, attaining the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and succeeded to the command of the 3d regiment. Afterward he represented his native town in the legislature, where he took an active part in the controversies between the colonial governors and the house of representatives and was one of the regularly chosen members that were displaced by the "mandamus councillors" in 1774. On 27 Oct., 1774, he was appointed a brigadier-general by the Provincial congress of Massachusetts, to which he was a delegate, and on 19 May, 1775, he was made commander-in-chief of the Massachusetts forces. He was in nominal command at the battle of Bunker Hill, though he remained at headquarters in Cambridge and had no share in determining the events of that day. On 17 June he was appointed by the Continental congress first on the list of major-generals, and he was in command of the forces besieging Boston until the arrival of Gen. Washington, after which he was second in command, being stationed with the right wing on Roxbury heights. In consequence of impaired health he resigned his commission in April, 1776, but at the request of Gen. Washington he continued to act until the end of May. He was elected chief justice of the court of common pleas of Worcester county in 1776, was president of the Massachusetts executive council in 1777, and a member of the legislature for sixteen years, serving as speaker in 1785. In 1779 he was appointed a delegate to the Continental congress, but, owing to failing health, did not take his seat. Being afterward elected to congress as a Federalist, he served from 4 Oct., 1791, till 3 March, 1795. He possessed integrity and unyielding principles, and his judicial conduct, especially during Shays's rebellion in 1786, was highly commended.—His son, Artemas, jurist, b. in Shrewsbury, Mass., 9 Jan., 1762; d. in Boston, Mass., 7 Oct., 1847, was graduated at Harvard in 1783, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised in Shrewsbury until 1809, when he removed to Boston. He served in the legislature, was a member of the council, and was elected to the 13th congress as a peace candidate, serving from 24 May, 1813, till 3 March, 1817. From 1820 till 1839 he was chief justice of the court of common pleas. Harvard gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1842.

WARD, Christopher Longstreet, lawyer, b. in New Milford, Susquehanna co., Pa., in 1807; d. in Towanda, Pa., 14 May, 1870. His father, William Ward, emigrated from Litchfield county, Conn. Christopher was apprenticed to a printer, and from January, 1831, till March, 1836, published the "Susquehanna Register" at Montrose, Pa. In 1832 materials that he had collected for a history of Susquehanna county were destroyed by fire. In 1837 he was admitted to the bar. In 1840 he removed to Towanda, Bradford co., where he lent his aid to many enterprises of lasting benefit to the town. He was agent for many of the large landed estates in northern Pennsylvania, was president of the Atlantic and Great Western railway during its construction through the state, and through his instrumentality the means for its early completion were obtained in Europe. He was a personal friend of Andrew Jackson, and active in the counsels of the Democratic party, but never held office. Mr. Ward collected a library of about 10,000 volumes, which contained, it is said, more rare works than any other private library in the state. His collection of autographs was unusually complete. This library, with his pictures and collections of art, was presented by his family to Lafayette college.

WARD, Durbin, lawyer, b. in Augusta, Ky., 11 Feb., 1819; d. in Lebanon, Ohio, 22 May, 1886. He removed with his family to Fayette county, Ind., where he was brought up on a farm, entered Miami university at the age of nineteen, remaining two years, then studied law with Thomas Corwin, and, on being admitted to practice in 1842, became his partner. From 1845 till 1851 he was prosecuting attorney of Warren county, Ohio. He was elected to the first legislature under the present constitution in 1851, was defeated as a Democratic candidate for congress in 1856, also as nominee for the office of attorney-general of Ohio in 1858, and in 1860 was a member of the Democratic national convention that met at Charleston, S. C., and reassembled at Baltimore, Md., in which he supported the candidacy of Stephen A. Douglas. He enlisted in the National army as a private, served in West Virginia under Gen. George B. McClellan, and subsequently took part in the campaigns of Gen. George H. Thomas, being appointed major of the 17th Ohio infantry on 17 Aug., 1861, and lieutenant-colonel on 31 Dec., 1862. He received a disabling wound at Chickamauga and was mustered out without his knowledge; but he obtained the recall of the order, was made colonel of his regiment on 13 Nov., 1863, and with a crippled arm served through the remainder of the war, being brevetted brigadier-general on 18 Oct., 1865. In November, 1866, he was appointed U. S. district attorney for the southern district of Ohio, but he was removed when Gen. Grant became president. He entered the state senate in 1870. The plan of the present circuit-court system of Ohio was drafted by him. Gen. Ward was a political orator, and at the Democratic national convention of 1884 presented the name of Allen G. Thurman as a candidate for the presidency. He began, but did not live to complete, a work on constitutional law, to be entitled "The Federal Institutes." A volume of his speeches has been published by his widow (Columbus, 1888).

WARD, Frederick Townsend, soldier, b. in Salem, Mass., 29 Nov., 1831; d. in Ningpo, China, 21 Sept., 1862. He was educated at the Salem high-school, became a sailor, served in the French army during the Crimean war, was in business for some time as a ship-broker in New York city, and about 1860, at the period when the Taeping rebels were everywhere successful, landed in Shanghai. Raising a band of various nationalities, he offered to capture a certain city for a fixed price. His first victory was the capture of the walled town of Sungkiang, which was held by 10,000 rebels, for which service he was made a mandarin of the fourth degree. He cleared the country about Shanghai, receiving his pay for each victory, disappeared for a time, returned at the head of three native regiments that he had armed and trained like European soldiers, and routed a greatly superior force, saving the city from capture. The European officers, who had shunned him as an adventurer and an outlaw, now admitted him into their counsels and welcomed his aid in organizing troops and guarding a radius of thirty miles around Shanghai. In the autumn of 1861 he captured Ningpo, an important stronghold. He adopted the Chinese nationality and manners, being called Hwa, married the daughter of an influential native, and was made a mandarin of the highest grade and admiral-general in the service of the emperor. He was mortally wounded while directing an assault on Tsekie. At the time of the "Trent" affair, when war between the United States and England was expected, and the British in China laid plans to seize American shipping and other property, Ward prepared to take possession of war-ships and merchant vessels of Great Britain then in Chinese waters. He was anxious to close up his affairs in China, in order to take part in the civil war, and offered a contribution of $10,000 to the National cause, but was killed before the answer came from Minister Anson Burlingame. He was succeeded in his command by Major Charles G. Gordon, who gained renown by the subsequent exploits of the "Ever-Victorious Army," which he brought to a high state of discipline, but which Ward had created and first organized. The Chinese paid Ward the honor of burying him in the Confucian cemetery at Ningpo, where they have erected a great mausoleum, besides placing monuments on the scenes of his victories. He had converted his large possessions into money and negotiable securities, which disappeared from his person when he was killed. The English officer who was last with him was suspected of the theft, and in the United States consular court at Shanghai there were protracted proceedings in the Ward estate case.

WARD, Genevieve, the stage-name of LUCIA GENOVEVA TERESA, Countess GUERBEL, actress, b. in New York city, 27 March, 1833. She is a granddaughter of Gideon Lee. Her childhood and youth were passed in France and Italy. When she was fifteen years old her voice attracted the interest of Rossini, who superintended her musical education. After appearing at La Scala, Milan, in "Lucrezia Borgia," she was received with great applause at Bergamo, and afterward sang in principal rôles of Italian opera at the Théâtre des Italiens, Paris. Her first performances in London were in English opera. In December, 1851, she took part in the "Messiah" at Exeter hall. Having married Count Constantine Guerbel, a Russian officer, before going upon the operatic stage, she sang under the name of Madame Guerrabella. She gave Italian operas in London during the season of 1862, and at its close came to the United States, appearing in New York city and Philadelphia, and in the winter sang in Havana. Exposing herself injudiciously to diphtheria, she caught the infection, and suffered a severe attack of the disease by which her voice was ruined for singing. For several years she taught vocal music in a school in New York, and finally she prepared herself for the dramatic stage. Being coldly received by an audience of New York critics, she sailed for England, making her first appearance on 1 Oct., 1873, in Manchester, as Lady Macbeth. She was successful in this part, and still more as Lady Constance in "King John," and, going to Dublin in the same year, was applauded in the rôles of Adrienne Lecouvreur, Medea, and Lucrezia Borgia. Adelaide Ristori, who had been her adviser in dramatic studies, desired Miss Ward to join her Italian troupe, but she preferred to enact English plays. She played Unarita in "The Prayer in the Storm" in London for six months in 1874, and was successful as Julia in "The Hunchback," and in the following year as Rebecca in "Ivanhoe." Afterward she travelled through the provinces, producing "Despite the World," by Lewis Wingfield, and "Sappho," by William G. Wills, both of which were written for her. In December, 1875, she first played "Antigone" at the Crystal Palace, London. She went to Paris in 1877 to study under François Joseph Regnier, and on 11 Feb. gained such success in a French version of "Macbeth" that the managers of the Comédie Française invited her to become a member of their company. She returned to London for the season of 1878, playing Emilia in "Othello" among other parts, and in June sailed for the United States, appearing at Booth's theatre, New York city, in "Jane Shore." "Henry VIII.," and other plays. Returning to London in April, 1879, she leased the Lyceum theatre, where she failed in the double rôle of the heroine and the gypsy in "Zillah," but made a success in the title rôle of William Young's "Lucrezia Borgia" and as Stephanie in "Forget-Me-Not," which she first produced on 22 Aug. She reappeared in the same piece at the Prince of Wales's theatre on 22 Feb., 1880, and on 10 May of that year performed the part of Clorinde in Émile Augier's "L'Aventurière," which was given in French. In 1881-'2 she played "Forget-Me-Not" in the chief cities of the United States and British America, and, after reproducing the same play in London, she sailed for India in December, 1882, playing in the Australian colonies, and, after a tour around the world, returned to England in November, 1885. She has since been the lessee of the Lyceum theatre, London, but in 1888 finally retired from the stage. Her earlier career was recounted in a "Memoir of Genevieve Guerrabella," which was published anonymously by Henry Wikoff (New York, 1863), and her later in "Genevieve Ward," by Zadel Barnes Gustafson (Boston, 1882).

WARD, Sir Henry George, English diplomatist, b. in England about 1796; d. in Madras, India, 2 Aug., 1860. He was a son of Robert Plumer Ward, juristic writer and novelist, and entered the diplomatic service in 1816. He was chargé d'affaires in Mexico and travelled extensively in that country in 1825-'7, sat in parliament from 1832 till 1849, was afterward high commissioner to the Ionian islands, and governor of Ceylon, whence he was transferred to Madras, dying of cholera a few days after his arrival. He was the author of "Mexico in 1827" (2 vols., London, 1828), which was enlarged and reissued under the title of "Travels in Mexico" (1829).—His wife, Emily Elizabeth, b. in England about 1805, was a daughter of Admiral Sir John Edward Swinburne, and married Sir Henry Ward in 1824. She drew the illustrations for her husband's work on Mexico, and published also "Views of Towns in Mexico" (2 vols., London, 1829).

WARD, James Harman, naval officer, b. in Hartford, Conn., in 1806; d. near Matthias point, Potomac river, 27 June, 1861. He was appointed as a midshipman in the navy, 4 March, 1823, and was allowed to remain under instruction in the military school at Norwich, Vt., with several other midshipmen. He made a cruise in the "Constitution" in 1824-'8, became a passed midshipman, 23 March, 1829, and was commissioned lieutenant, 3 March, 1831. He was an instructor at the naval academy at Annapolis from its establishment on its present basis in 1845 till 1847. He commanded the steamer "Vixen" of the home squadron in 1849-'50, and was promoted to commander, 9 Sept., 1853. He was appointed to command the Potomac flotilla in May, 1861, and immediately essayed to open that river and silence the Confederate batteries on its banks. His flotilla consisted of three small improvised gun-boats, the steamer "Freeborn," "Anacostia," and "Resolute." He attacked and silenced the batteries at Acquia creek, 20 May, 1861, the first time the navy engaged the Confederate batteries during the war. The next day the battle was renewed, and Ward's flotilla was re-enforced by the arrival of the "Pawnee" under Commander Stephen C. Rowan. Ward conducted a series of fights with his flotilla, and succeeded in clearing the banks and keeping the river open. On 27 June, 1861, he planned a landing expedition at Matthias point, and in the bombardment of the batteries he was killed while sighting a gun. He was the author of "Elementary Course of Instruction in Naval Ordnance and Gunnery" (Philadelphia, 1851); "Manual of Naval Tactics" (New York, 1859); and "Steam for the Million" (1860). The first two were used as a text-book at the United States naval academy for many years.

WARD, John Elliott, lawyer, b. in Sunbury, Liberty co., Ga., 2 Oct., 1814. He entered Amherst in 1831, but left on account of the indignation that was manifested toward Georgians after the imprisonment of two Cherokee missionaries, studied law in Savannah, Ga., and was admitted to the bar in 1835. He attended the lectures in the Harvard law-school before beginning practice, and on his return to Savannah was appointed, in January, 1836, solicitor-general for the eastern district of his state, to fill an unexpired term, at the close of which the legislature continued him in the office. He was appointed U. S. district attorney for Georgia in 1838, but resigned in the following year in order to enter the state legislature. He returned to the house in 1845 and in 1853, when he was chosen speaker, and in 1854 was elected mayor of Savannah. In 1856 he presided over the Democratic national convention that met in Cincinnati. In 1857 he entered the state senate, and was chosen its president and acting lieutenant-governor of the state, resigning in 1858 on being appointed U. S. minister to China. He departed for his post in January, 1859, and remained till April, 1861, when he returned and resigned in consequence of the adoption by Georgia of the ordinance of secession, although he was strongly opposed to that measure. In January, 1866, he removed from Savannah to New York city, where he has since practised law.

WARD, John Henry Hobart, soldier, b. in New York city, 17 June, 1823. His grandfather, John, a soldier of the Revolution, and his father, James, who fought in the war of 1812, were both disabled by wounds that they received in the service. The son was educated at Trinity collegiate school, enlisted at the age of eighteen in the 7th U. S. infantry, and in four years rose through the several grades to that of sergeant-major. In the Mexican war he participated in the siege of Fort Brown, received wounds at Monterey, and was at the capture of Vera Cruz. He was assistant commissary-general of the state of New York from 1851 till 1855, and commissary-general from 1855 till 1859. In the beginning of the civil war he recruited the 38th New York volunteers, was appointed colonel of the regiment, and led it at Bull Run and in all the battles of the peninsula campaign, and subsequently at the second Bull Run and Chantilly. Being promoted brigadier-general of volunteers on 4 Oct., 1862, he commanded a brigade in the 3d corps at Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, the Wilderness, and Spottsylvania. On the third day at Gettysburg, where he was wounded, as also at Kelly's Ford and Wapping Heights, he was in temporary command of the division. He was again wounded at Spottsylvania, and was frequently commended for courage and capacity, in official reports. After the war he engaged in a civil employment in New York city.

WARD, John Quincy Adams, sculptor, b. in Urbana, Champaign co., Ohio, 29 June, 1830. At the age of nineteen he began to study with Henry K. Browne, with whom he remained until 1857, assisting him in many of his works. In 1857-'8 he was in Washington modelling busts of Joshua R. Giddings, Alexander H. Stephens, John P. Hale, Hannibal Hamlin, and other public men. At this time he also made his first sketch for the "Indian Hunter," and he subsequently visited the Indian country to make studies for this subject. In 1861 he opened a studio in New York, where he has since resided. He was elected an associate of the National academy the following year, and an academician in 1863. During this period he made many designs in wax for presentation swords, and executed in 1861 a bronze statuette, "The Freedman," his first full-length figure. It attracted much attention by its subject, and its merits as a work of art won for it the admiration of critics. It was exhibited, together with the "Indian Hunter," at the Paris exposition of 1867, and has been repeated several times by the artist. The "Indian Hunter," completed in 1864 and now in the Central park, was his next work of importance. It won universal praise for its excellence in design and execution, and is among the best of his statues. (See illustration.) New York city possesses several other of his most important works. They are a colossal statue of a citizen soldier for the 7th regiment (1868); "Shakespeare" (1870-'1); a colossal statue of Washington, on the steps of the Sub-Treasury building in Wall street (1882); "The Pilgrim" (1884); and a statue of William E. Dodge (1887). His other notable works are "The Good Samaritan," a group to commemorate the discovery of sulphuric ether as an anæsthetic (1865), in Boston; statues of Matthew C. Perry, in Newport, R. I. (1866), Gen. John F. Reynolds, at Gettysburg, Pa. (1871), Israel Putnam, in Hartford, Conn. (1874), George Washington, in Newburyport, Mass. (1876), an equestrian statue of Gen. George H. Thomas, in Washington, D. C. (1878), Gen. Daniel Morgan, at Spartansburg, S. C., and Gen. Lafayette, in Burlington, Vt. (1880); and the monument to James A. Garfield, in Washington (1887). He is engaged on a large statue of Henry Ward Beecher for the city of Brooklyn. He has also executed various portrait busts, including, besides those already mentioned, Valentine Mott, James T. Brady, Dr. Orville Dewey, and Gov. William Dennison, of Ohio. Mr. Ward was vice-president of the National academy in 1870-'1 and president in 1872.—His brother, Edgar Melville, artist, b. in Urbana, Ohio, 24 Feb., 1839, studied at the National academy in 1870-'1, and under Alexandre

Cabanel at the École des beaux arts, Paris, during 1872-'8. He was elected an associate of the National academy in 1875, and an academician in 1883, and is director of its schools. His more important works are "Paternal Pride" (1878); "Locksmith"; "Lace-Makers"; "Motherly Care"; "The Tobacco-Field" (1881); "Scene in a Foundry"; "The Last Shock"; and "The Cobblers" and "The Blessing" (1886). His "Brittany Washerwomen" was at the salon of 1876, the Philadelphia exhibition of 1876, and at Paris in 1878 with "Venetian Water-Carriers" and "The Sabot-Maker."

WARD, Julius Hammond, clergyman, b. in Charlton, Worcester co., Mass., 12 Oct., 1837. He was graduated at Yale in 1860, and at Berkeley divinity-school, Middletown, Conn., in 1862, and took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church. He was rector of parishes in Ansonia and Cheshire, Conn., Rockland and Thomaston, Me., and Marblehead, Mass., till 1878, since which time he has engaged in literary work. In 1877 he was an editor of the "North American Review." Besides contributions on religious subjects to the secular and religious press, he is the author of "Life and Letters of James Gates Percival" (Boston, 1866); and has ready for the press works on "The Church in Modern Society," and "The White Mountains."

WARD, Lester Frank, botanist, b. in Joliet, Ill., 18 June, 1841. He was educated at various schools, but served in the National army in the civil war, during which he was wounded. In 1865 he settled in Washington, where he served in the treasury department, principally as chief of the division of navigation and immigration, and as librarian of the U. S. bureau of statistics. While holding office he was graduated at Columbian university in 1869 and at its law department in 1871, and in 1873 for higher studies was given the degree of A. M. He began the study of botany in 1872, and has followed that science professionally since 1874. In 1881 he entered the service of the U. S. geological survey as assistant geologist, and in 1888 attained the grade of geologist, devoting his attention chiefly to the study of paleo-botany. He also holds the office of honorary curator of botany and fossil plants in the U. S. national museum. Mr. Ward is a member of scientific societies, and his bibliography includes about 200 titles. His larger works are "Guide to the Flora of Washington and Vicinity" (Washington, 1881); "Dynamic Sociology, or Applied Social Science" (2 vols., New York, 1883); "Sketch of Paleo-Botany" (Washington, 1885); "Synopsis of the Flora of the Laramie Group" (1886); "Types of the Laramie Flora" (1887); and "Geographical Distribution of Fossil Plants" (1888).

WARD, Levi, physician, b. in East Guilford (now Madison), Conn., 29 July, 1771; d. in Rochester, N. Y., 4 Jan., 1861. He was educated at Yale, leaving college to pursue the study of medicine in East Guilford. After completing his professional studies he removed to Haddam, Conn., and practised there for seventeen years. In 1807 he emigrated to Bergen, Genesee co., N. Y., where he managed a large tract of land as agent for the state of Connecticut. He established mail routes, and carried on mercantile business at various points, besides practising medicine, and in 1817 removed to Rochester, where he became president of the first savings bank, and also of the Rochester bank, and was active in enterprises for religious and public objects and in commercial affairs.—His son, Ferdinand de Wilton, missionary, b. in Bergen, Genesee co., N. Y., 9 July, 1812, was graduated at Union in 1831 and at Princeton theological seminary in 1834, and preached at Albion, N. Y., and Philadelphia, Pa. He was ordained as an evangelist in Rochester, N. Y., on 31 Aug., 1836, and departed as a missionary of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions to Madura, whence he went to Madras, India, and remained until 1847, laboring with success as a teacher of Christianity, publishing several volumes in Tamil, and editing the first periodical in advocacy of abstinence from intoxicating liquors that was printed in a Hindu language. After returning to the United States he acted for a year as agent for the missionary board in western New York, was stated supply in Rochester in 1849, and then served as pastor of Presbyterian churches in Geneseo, N. Y., till 1861, when he went with the army as chaplain of the 104th New York volunteers, and was at the second battle of Bull Run, Chancellorsville, and Gettysburg. After the close of the civil war he returned to his former church in Geneseo, resigning in 1871, and acting during the succeeding four years as district secretary of the American Bible society. Dr. Ward, who received his degree of D. D. from Washington college in 1861, is the author of many historical and literary pamphlets, and has published in book-form "India and the Hindus" (New York, 1850); "A Christian Gift, or Pastoral Letters" (Rochester, 1852); and "Summer Vacation Abroad" (1854).—Levi's grandson, Henry Augustus, naturalist, b. in Rochester, N. Y., 9 March, 1834, was educated at Williams college and at the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard, where he became assistant to Louis Agassiz in the Museum of comparative zoölogy. He went to Europe in 1854, studied zoölogy in Paris and mineralogy in Freiberg, and then travelled through Palestine, Egypt, Nubia, and Arabia, down the west coast of Africa from Morocco to Guinea, and up Niger river. He has visited the West Indies and Central America, and as a mining engineer in the cause of gold-mining investigations has crossed the American continent ten times at different places. From 1860 till 1875 he was professor of natural sciences in the University of Rochester, and in 1861 he received the degree of A. M. from Williams. Meanwhile he established in Rochester a laboratory for the production of fac-similes of fossils that he had copied from the great museums of the world. From this he has developed a natural-science establishment, which makes a specialty of obtaining and compiling systematic cabinets in any department of nature for institutions of learning and public museums. For this purpose he has travelled extensively, and has representatives in all parts of the globe gathering specimens of everything that is rare and curious in natural history. His aim in this work has been to give system and exactitude to scientific teaching in America. Eighty of his cabinets, having an average value of $6,000 each, are distributed through nearly every state in the Union. Taxidermy plays an important part in his business, and his representations of animal forms are famous. His best-known work of this character is the elephant Jumbo, whose stuffed effigy, mounted by him, is now in Barnum's museum at Tufts college, and the skeleton, carefully prepared, is at the National museum in Washington, D. C. The Ward cabinets of mineralogy and geology collected by him fill fourteen rooms in the University of Rochester, and he has made an extensive collection in modern zoölogy. In 1871 he was naturalist of the U. S. expedition to Santo Domingo. Prof. Ward has been elected a fellow of the geological and zoölogical societies of London, has been a fellow of the American association for the advancement of sciences since 1875, and is a member of other scientific societies. In addition to his series of catalogues, which contain valuable notes on the articles that are described therein, he has published "Notice of the Megatherium Cuvieri" (Rochester, 1863) and "Description of the most Celebrated Fossil Animals in the Royal Museums of Europe" (1866).

WARD, Marcus Lawrence, governor of New Jersey, b. in Newark, N. J., 9 Nov., 1812; d. there, 25 April, 1884. He received a good education and engaged in mercantile pursuits. He was originally a Whig, aided in forming the Republican party, and was a delegate to the National Republican conventions in Chicago in 1860 and in Baltimore in 1864. During the civil war he frequently visited the camps and battle-fields to alleviate suffering, and for his many services was called the Soldiers' Friend. He devised a system by which communication could be transmitted without cost from the soldier on the field to his family, and also established a free pension bureau, which he maintained at his personal expense. In recognition of his patriotism the government gave to the hospital that he equipped in Newark the name of the "U. S. Ward hospital," which after the war was converted into a home for disabled soldiers. In 1862 he was defeated as a candidate for governor of New Jersey, but he held this office in 1865-'8. In 1866 he was chosen chairman of the National Republican committee. He was afterward elected to congress as a Republican, serving from 1 Dec., 1873, till 3 March, 1875. In the latter year he declined the office of Indian commissioner. Gov. Ward was an early member of the New Jersey historical society, of the Newark library association, and the New Jersey art union, aided education in the state, improved the condition of the state prison, and was an active philanthropist.

WARD, Matt Flournoy, author, b. in Scott county, Ky., 19 May, 1826; d. in Helena, Ark., 30 Sept., 1862. He was educated at Louisville, Ky., and Cambridge, Mass., travelled extensively, and engaged in cotton-planting in Arkansas on his return, but resided much of the time in Louisville, Ky. In 1854 he shot a schoolmaster, named W. H. G. Butler, for chastising his brother, was tried on an indictment of murder, and acquitted. He was killed before his house by a Confederate soldier, who mistook him for one of the enemy, as he wore a blue blouse like a National officer. His publications are "Letters from Three Continents" (New York, 1850); and "English Items, or Microscopic Views of England and Englishmen" (1852). A report of his trial was printed (Louisville, 1854), and at the time of his death he was writing a book in which he intended to use some of the incidents of the Butler tragedy.

WARD, Matthias, senator, b. in Elbert county, Ga., about 1800; d. in Raleigh, N. C., 13 Oct., 1861. He was taken while a child to Madison county, Ala., where he received a classical education. After teaching for two years, he studied for the bar. Removing to Texas in 1836, he became a citizen of the new republic, and was elected to its congress, serving for several years. After the admission of Texas to the Union, he was a member of the state senate. He was a delegate to the Democratic national conventions of 1852 and 1856, and in the latter year presided over the State convention. On the death of J. Pinckney Henderson he was appointed to the seat in the U. S. senate that was thus made vacant, serving from 6 Dec., 1858, till 4 Jan., 1860, when he was succeeded by Louis T. Wigfall, whom the legislature had elected.

WARD, Nancy, Indian prophetess, b. about 1740; the time of her death is unknown. Her father was a British officer named Ward, her mother a sister of the reigning vice-king, Atta-culla-culla. She was the sibyl of the Cherokees. The power of Oconostota over the nation was absolute in time of war, but in war or peace it had generally to give way to the will of Nancy Ward, who was supposed to be the inspired mouth-piece of the Great Spirit. James Robertson, who visited her at the Cherokee capital, Echota, in 1772, describes her as a woman "queenly and commanding," and her lodge as furnished in a style of barbaric splendor. Other traditional accounts speak of her as strikingly beautiful, with a tall, erect form, a prominent nose, regular and flexible features, a clear, though tawny, complexion, long, silken black hair, large, piercing black eyes, and an air that was imperious and yet kindly. She must have possessed remarkable traits of character to have retained almost autocratic control over the fierce and untamable Cherokees when she was known to sympathize with their enemies, the white settlers. The first event recorded of her is the saving the lives of two pioneers—Jeremiah Jack and William Rankin—who had ventured down to buy corn of the Indians. They had come into collision with a disorderly party of Cherokees, and their lives were about to be sacrificed, when Nancy Ward appeared among the Indians and commanded them to desist. She was instantly obeyed, and the settlers went home with their canoe loaded with corn. Another instance of her kindly spirit was her saving the life of the wife of William Bean, the first white settler beyond the Alleghanies. Mrs. Bean had been captured on the eve of the attack on the fort at Watauga, and, being taken to the Indian towns, was condemned to be burned at the stake. The fagots were already heaped about her, and Dragging Canoe, the chief of the Chickamaugas, who had ordered the execution, was standing by, when Nancy Ward came upon the ground and commanded her to be liberated. This was done, and Mrs. Bean was sent back with a strong escort to her husband. Numerous other instances are related of her releasing captives that were taken by her nation in their many wars with the whites. Among others was that of a young woman who became the ancestress of John M. Lea, of Nashville. She is reported to have said: "The white men are our brothers; the same house holds us, the same sky covers us all"; and she always acted in accordance with this sentiment. But her greatest service to the white settlers was in giving them constant warnings, through a course of years, of every intended raid of the Cherokees. The lightest hostile whisper spoken in the Cherokee councils was repeated by her to Isaac Thomas, an Indian trader, to be by him conveyed to John Sevier and James Robertson at Watauga. Thus were the whites always prepared for the attacks of the Indians, and, with the overpowering numbers against them, it is hard to conceive how in any other way they could have been saved from extermination. In doing this Nancy Ward betrayed her own people, but she did so from noble motives and in the interest of humanity, and for this service she is to this day held in grateful remembrance by the descendants of the early settlers.

WARD, Nathaniel, clergyman, b. between the years 1578 and 1580; d. in Shenfield, England, in 1652. Cotton Mather, in the "Magnalia," gives his birthplace as Haverhill, England, which is probably correct; and the date of his birth as "about 1570," which is evidently wrong. His father was John Ward, a famous Puritan minister, who, according to a mural tablet that was placed by his sons in the chancel of the church at Haverhill, England, preached the gospel in Haverhill and Bury St. Edmunds, Suffolk, for twenty-five years. Nathaniel Ward had two brothers, who, like himself, were authors and clergymen, and who also suffered for non-conformity. The eldest, Samuel, town-preacher of Ipswich, England, was author of "The Life of Faith," "The Wonders of the Loadstone," and several other works, while the youngest, John, who was rector of St. Clement's, Ipswich, and a member of the Westminster assembly of divines, preached two sermons before the house of commons, which were printed. The "Sermons and Treatises of Samuel Ward, B. D.," were edited by the present bishop of Liverpool, the Rt. Rev. John C. Ryle, D. D. (Edinburgh, 1862). It was said of the brothers—Samuel, Nathaniel, and John—that they together "would not make up the abilities of their father. Nor were they themselves offended by this hyperbole, to have the branches lessened to greaten their root." Nathaniel Ward was graduated at Cambridge in 1603, educated for the law, and admitted an outer barrister. After practising in England, he accompanied some merchants to the continent, where he travelled extensively. At Heidelberg he met the celebrated writer David Pareus, who induced him to quit the law and enter the ministry. As early as 1618 he was a clergyman at Elbing, in Prussia, probably acting as chaplain at the factory there of the Eastland merchants. Afterward he returned to his native country. At first he is said to have been a lecturer in London, but as early as 1628 he was presented by Sir Nathaniel Rich, a relative of the Earl of Warwick, to the rectory of Stondon Massey, in Essex. Mr. Ward was one of the chief Puritan ministers in that county, and in 1631 was brought before Laud, who was then bishop of London, for non-conformity, but escaped excommunication. Laud tried to induce him to conform, and had frequent conferences with him without avail. Two years later, in 1633, he was deprived of the living. Early in the next year, 1634, he sailed for New England. His first and only settlement in this country was at Ipswich, where Rev. Thomas Parker was already the minister of the church, and Mr. Ward settled as his colleague. Two years later, owing to feeble health, he resigned his pastorate. He still continued to reside at Ipswich, and while living here compiled for the colony of Massachusetts the "Body of Liberties," which was adopted by the general court in December, 1641. This was "the first code of laws established in New England." It "exhibits throughout," says Dr. Francis C. Gray, "the principles and securities of English liberty, and, although it retains some strong traces of the times, is in the main far in advance of them, and in several respects in advance of the common law of England at this day. It shows that our ancestors, instead of deducing all their laws from the books of Moses, established at the outset a code of fundamental principles, which, taken as a whole, for wisdom, equity, adaptation to the wants of the community, and a liberality of sentiment superior to the age in which it was written, may fearlessly challenge a comparison with any similar production from Magna Charta itself to the latest bill of rights that has been put forth in Europe or America." As early as 1645 Mr. Ward began to write "The Simple Cöbler of Aggawam in America." This was completed in the autumn of 1646, and sent to England for publication, where it was issued in January, 1646-'7.

It was published under the pen-name of Theodore de la Guard, which is merely a slight disguise of his own name, Theodore being the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew Nathaniel, and de la Guard the French of the English Ward. He soon afterward sailed for his native country, probably in company with Edward Winslow, who left near the middle of December. He had a "hard winter voyage," and probably arrived before the opening of spring. A second edition of the "Simple Cöbler" was issued soon after Mr. Ward's arrival, and a third and a fourth followed the same year. All the editions bear the date of 1647, each one being corrected by the author, who made material additions to the several issues. No later editions have been printed in England, but two have appeared in this country, both at Boston, one in 1718 and the other, which was edited by David Pulsifer, in 1843. Prof. Moses Coit Tyler, in his "History of American Literature," says of this book: "It is a tremendous partisan pamphlet, intensely vital even yet, full of fire, wit, whim, eloquence, sarcasm, invective, patriotism, bigotry." About a year after his arrival in England, Ward became the minister of the church at Shenfield, in Essex, four or five miles distant from Stondon Massey, where he was formerly settled. He held this living till his death in the autumn of 1652. Besides the works that have been noticed, his publications were a "Sermon preached before the House of Commons" (1647); "A Religious Retreat sounded to a Religious Army," anonymous (1647); "To the High and Honorable Parliament, Humble Petitions, Serious Suggestions, and Dutifull Expostulations," anonymous (1648); and "Discolliminium, or A Most Obedient Reply to a Late Book called 'Bounds and Bonds.' By B" (1650). The following works have been attributed to Mr. Ward. Probably the first and last were written by him: "A Word to Mr. Peters, and Two Words for the Parliament and Kingdom" (1648); "The Pulpit Incendiary" (1648); and "Mercurius Anti-Mechanicus, or The Simple Cöbler's Boy, with his Lap-full of Caveats. By Theodore de la Guarden" (1648).—His son, John, clergyman, was born, according to Cotton Mather's "Magnalia," in Haverhill, England, 5 Nov., 1606, but, if the age in his marriage license be correct, he was born at a later date, probably in November, 1609. He died at Haverhill, Mass., 27 Dec., 1693. He was matriculated in 1622 at Emmanuel college, Cambridge, where his father was educated, and was graduated in 1626. On 16 Nov., 1633, he was instituted rector of Hadleigh, in Essex, but he resigned in 1639 and came to New England. For a short time he assisted his father's step-brother, Rev. Ezekiel Rogers, of Rowley. He settled in 1641 at Pentucket (afterward Haverhill), Mass., where in 1645 a church was formed and he was ordained the first minister. There he officiated for more than fifty years till his death. He was an able and influential minister.

WARD, Richard, colonial governor, b. in Newport, R. I., 15 April, 1689; d. there, 21 Aug., 1763. His father, Thomas Ward, son of John Ward, who was an officer in one of Cromwell's cavalry regiments, came from Gloucester, England, after the restoration of Charles II., as his father did also, and both settled in Newport. Thomas Ward, who followed the business of a merchant, was general treasurer of the colony, 1677-'8, a deputy to the general assembly in 1678-'9, an assistant in 1679-'81, and then deputy from 1683 till 1686. Richard was also engaged in commerce. He was attorney-general in 1712-'13, deputy and clerk of the assembly in 1714, recorder from 1714 till 1730, deputy governor from May to July, 1740, when Gov. Wanton died, and governor from 15 July, 1740, till May, 1743—three terms. His able report to the English board of trade on paper money, 9 Jan., 1741, is printed in the "Rhode Island Colonial Records," edited by John R. Bartlett. — His son, Samuel, statesman, b. in Newport, R. I., 27 May, 1725; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 26 March, 1776, removed in early life to Westerly, R. I., where he prospered in business both as a farmer and merchant. After representing his adopted home for several years in the legislature, he was appointed in 1761 chief justice of the colony, and in 1762 he was chosen its governor. He was active in the founding of Rhode Island college (now Brown university), and was one of its trustees from 1764 till 1776. In 1765 he was re-elected governor. When the stamp-act was passed he was the only one of the colonial governors that refused to take the required oath to sustain and enforce it. For a third time he was chosen governor in 1766. From the outset he took a decided stand against the oppressive encroachments of the British crown. With Stephen Hopkins he represented Rhode Island in the Continental congress in 1774-'6, and uniformly advocated the most vigorous patriotic measures. He was always called to the chair when congress went into committee of the whole, was chairman of the committee that reported in favor of a general for the American army, when Col. George Washington was unanimously chosen. Dying of small-pox in the midst of his arduous duties, he was buried in the grounds of the 1st Baptist church in Philadelphia, where a monument was erected to his memory by order of the Rhode Island general assembly. In 1860 his remains were removed to the cemetery of Newport, R. I.—Another son, Henry, member of the colonial congress, b. in Rhode Island, 27 Dec., 1732; d. there, 25 Nov., 1797, was secretary of Rhode Island from 1760 till his death, and took part in the congress that met at New York city on 7 Oct., 1765. He early espoused the principle of national independence, and during the Revolution acted as a member of the committee of correspondence.—Samuel's son, Samuel, soldier, b. in Westerly, R. I., 17 Nov., 1756; d. in New York city 16 Aug., 1832, was graduated at Brown in 1771. He raised a company, and marched to the siege of Boston in 1775, was commissioned captain by congress, and joined Benedict Arnold's expedition into Canada, being taken prisoner at the siege of Quebec, and conveyed to New York city by sea. He was commissioned as major of the 1st Rhode Island line in 1777, was in action at Red Bank, writing the official report of the battle, and was with the army at Valley Forge. In 1778, after marrying a daughter of Gov. William Greene, he assisted in raising a new regiment in Rhode Island, which he commanded in Gen. John Sullivan's campaign in that state. He was promoted lieutenant-colonel in 1779, and retired on 1 Jan., 1781. He was a delegate in 1786 to the convention at Annapolis, Md., for the regulation of commerce between the states. He made a voyage to China in 1788, and in 1790 established himself in mercantile business in New York city. After serving as president of the New York marine insurance company in 1806-'8, he relinquished business, retiring to an estate in Rhode Island, whence he was sent as a delegate to the Hartford convention of 1814. He afterward resided in Jamaica, L. I., and at the close of his life in New York city.—The second Samuel's son, Samuel, banker, b. in Rhode Island, 1 May, 1786; d. in New York city, 27 Nov., 1839, received a common-school education, entered a banking-house as clerk, and in 1808 was taken into partnership, continuing a member of the firm of Prime, Ward and King until his death. In 1838 he secured through the Bank of England a loan of nearly $5,000,000 to enable the banks to resume specie payments, and established the Bank of commerce, becoming its president. He was a founder of the University of the city of New York and of the City temperance society, of which he was the first president, and was active in organizing mission churches, a patron of many charities, and the giver of large sums in aid of Protestant Episcopal churches and colleges in the west.—The third Samuel's wife, Julia Rush, poet, b. in Boston, Mass., 5 Jan., 1796; d. in New York city, 9 Nov., 1824, was a sister of Rev. Benjamin Clarke Cutler, and, through her mother, a grandniece of Francis Marion. She married Mr. Ward in October, 1812. One of her occasional poems is preserved in Rufus W. Griswold's "Female Poets of America" (Philadelphia, 1848).—Their son, Samuel, author, b. in New York city, 27 Jan., 1814; d. in Pegli, Italy, 19 May, 1884, was educated at Round Hill school, Northampton, Mass., and at Columbia, where he was graduated in 1831. He went abroad to perfect his studies, received the degree of Ph. D. from the University of Tübingen, travelled extensively, and became proficient in the modern languages. Returning in 1835, he married a daughter of William B. Astor, and entered his father's banking-house as a partner. After his second marriage, in 1843, to Medora, a daughter of John R. Grymes, he left the firm, and in 1848 went to California, where he engaged in mining. During his stay in the interior he acquired several Indian dialects. He visited Mexico in 1854, acted as secretary of an expedition sent by the United States government to Paraguay in 1858, went on a diplomatic mission to Nicaragua in 1862, securing the renewal of transit across the isthmus, and on his return settled in Washington, D. C., where his powers of conversation, persuasive manners, and skill in entertaining his friends, which extended even to inventing delicate dishes, enabled him to exert such influence over legislators that he was spoken of as "the king of the lobby." He was also known as "Uncle Sam Ward." His last years were spent in Europe, principally in England, where he was a social favorite. He died after returning from a journey to Malta from the home of his sister, Mrs. Terry, of Rome, whose first husband was Thomas Crawford, the sculptor. Another sister is Julia Ward Howe. Ward was for a score of years the intimate friend and correspondent of the poets Halleck and Longfellow. His nephew, Marion Crawford, has depicted him in the character of Mr. Bellingham in "Dr. Claudius" (1883). He published a volume of verse entitled "Lyrical Recreations" (New York, 1865).—The second Samuel's grandson, William Greene, soldier, b. in New York city, 20 July, 1832, was graduated at Columbia in 1851, and became a banker. He was lieutenant-colonel of the 12th regiment of New York militia, with which he served in the field from 21 April till 5 Aug., 1861. As colonel of the same regiment he was again in the United States service in 1862, participating as acting brigadier, and personally directing his artillery fire, in the defence of Harper's Ferry, where he was made prisoner and paroled. In 1863 he served again as colonel of the regiment in the Pennsylvania campaign. He partly invented and greatly improved the Ward-Burton breech-loading rifle. After the war he was made a brigadier-general in the state militia service, and served for nearly twenty years.—William Greene's brother, John, soldier, b. in New York city, 30 Nov., 1838, was graduated at Columbia college in 1858 and at Columbia law-school in 1860, then studied medicine at the New York university medical college, taking his degree of M. D. in 1864. During the civil war he served with his brother in the field as lieutenant, and afterward captain, in the 12th New York National guard, taking part in September, 1862, in the defence of Harper's Ferry, under a heavy artillery fire for three days, when surrounded by a large part of Lee's army under Stonewall Jackson, when he was made prisoner and paroled. Subsequently he became colonel of the 12th New York regiment for eleven years, till October, 1877, and for some time he acted as secretary to the National rifle association. He is the author of many historical papers and of "The Overland Route to California, and other Poems" (New York, 1875).

WARD, Richard Halsted, microscopist, b. in Bloomfield, N. J., 17 June, 1837. He was graduated at Williams in 1858, and at the College of physicians and surgeons, New York city, in 1862, was assistant surgeon in the military hospital at Nashville, Tenn., for a few months, resigned on account of failing health, and in 1863 established himself in Troy, N. Y. He became interested while in college in botany, and in 1867 accepted the professorship of that science in Rensselaer polytechnic institute, while continuing his practice as a physician, and becoming in 1868 physician to the Marshall infirmary. He also delivered lectures on the use of the microscope, and from 1871 till 1883 conducted a department in the "American Naturalist" on microscopy, on which subject he has also given lectures in the Rensselaer institute. On botany he has been a frequent lecturer before scientific societies and institutions. He has invented an illuminating appliance for binocular microscopes and other improvements, and was active in organizing the national committee on micrometry. As an expert in microscopical examinations, he was one of the first to discriminate between different kinds of blood, and his testimony is sought in murder and forgery trials, and in connection with the purity of water-supply and adulterations of food and medicine. He has also been a cultivator of medical microscopy, and has published some original investigations. Dr. Ward is a member of microscopical societies of this country and Europe, was president of the American society of microscopists, and has been the manager of the American postal microscopical club since 1875. He has contributed to the periodicals that are devoted to his specialty, and was joint editor, with the Rev. Alpheus B. Herve, of the American revision of the work of Julius W. Behrens on "The Microscope in Botany" (Boston, 1885).—His sister, Anna Lydia, author, b. in Bloomfield, N. J., about 1850, was educated at Ripley female college, Poultney, Vt. She assisted in compiling a "Dictionary of Quotations" (New York, 1881), and has published "A Dictionary of Quotations from the Poets" (1883); "Surf and Wave" (1883); and "Familiar Quotations from American Authors" in a "Library of Quotations" (4 vols., 1884). She is at present engaged on a "History of Waterbury, Conn.," in association with Miss Sarah J. Pritchard.

WARD, Thomas, poet, b. in Newark, N. J., 8 June, 1807; d. in New York city, 13 April, 1873. He studied at Princeton and at Rutgers medical college, New York city, practised his profession two or three years, and after travelling some time in foreign countries returned to that city to follow a life of literary leisure, having married a lady of fortune. He built a large music-hall in his house in New York, in which, between 1862 and 1872, nearly fifty musical entertainments were given.

Dr. Ward was the author of "A Month of Freedom" (New York, 1837); "Passaic: a Group of Poems touching that River, with other Musings," by "Flaccus" (New York, 1842); "Flora, or the Gipsy's Frolic," a pastoral opera, for which he also wrote the music, and which had several public and private representations for the benefit of charitable objects, yielding about $40,000; and "War Lyrics" (printed privately, New York, 1865).—His nephew, James Warner, poet, b. in Newark, N. J., 5 June, 1817, was educated at the Boston high-school, became the pupil and assistant of Prof. John Locke in the Medical college of Ohio, Cincinnati, was professor of general literature and of botany at the Female college of Ohio in 1853-'4, and afterward edited for several years the "Botanical Magazine and Horticultural Review" at Cincinnati, in association with Dr. John A. Warder. In 1859 he removed to New York city. Since 1874 he has been librarian of the Grosvenor public library, Buffalo, N. Y. Mr. Ward has composed pieces for the voice and the organ, and is a member of botanical and microscopical societies. Besides contributions to periodicals he has published a volume of "Home-made Verses and Stories in Rhyme," that were usually signed "Yorick" (Boston, 1857); "Woman," a poem (1852); and "Higher Water," a parody of Henry W. Longfellow's "Hiawatha," descriptive of a freshet in the Ohio river (1855).

WARD, Thomas, A. M. E. bishop, b. in Pennsylvania, 28 Sept., 1823. He is of negro parentage, was brought up on a farm, went to Philadelphia in 1843, attended a Quaker night-school, united with the African Methodist Episcopal church in 1843, and was licensed to exhort in the same year. He preached in Pennsylvania, New York, and New England, and was the first secretary of the New England conference of his church. He asked to be sent to do missionary work on the Pacific coast, and arrived there, 19 May, 1854, but returned in 1860 to meet the general conference in Pittsburg. He went back to his post in 1861, and under his guidance and inspiration societies were organized and churches built at Stockton, Sacramento, Petaluma, Grass Valley, Coloma, Placerville, Los Angeles, Negro Hill, Virginia City, Carson City, Red Bluffs, and Chico. He was elected bishop in 1868. Since 1884 he has had charge of Arkansas, Louisiana, and Indian territory.

WARD, William Hayes, Assyriologist, b. in Abington, Mass., 25 June, 1835. He was graduated at Amherst in 1856, and entered Union theological seminary, New York city, was a tutor at Beloit college in 1857-'8, and then completed his theological studies at Andover seminary, being graduated in 1859. He preached for one year at Oskaloosa, Kan., receiving ordination on 8 Jan., 1860, resumed teaching at Williston seminary, Easthampton, Mass., in 1861, taught natural science at the Utica free academy in 1863-'5, and was subsequently professor of Latin at Ripon college, Wis., till 1868, when he went to New York city as associate editor of the "Independent," of which he became superintending editor two years later. In September, 1884, he went, in charge of the Wolfe expedition, to Babylonia, and remained about a year, exploring the ruins south of Bagdad. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of the city of New York and from Rutgers college in 1873, and that of LL. D. from Amherst in 1885. Dr. Ward, who still edits the "Independent," is the author of articles on oriental archaeology in the "Proceedings" of the Palestine exploration society, the American archaeological institute, and the American oriental society, as well as in "Bibliotheca Sacra" and other periodicals. He wrote a biographical introduction to the "Poems" of Sidney Lanier (New York, 1884), and on his return from the East prepared a report of the expedition in pamphlet-form.

WARD, William Thomas, soldier, b. in Amelia county, Va., 9 Aug., 1808; d. in Louisville, Ky., 12 Oct., 1878. He was educated at St. Mary's college, near Lebanon, Ky., studied law, and practised in Greensburg. In 1847 he joined a regiment of Kentucky volunteers, was commissioned as major, and served in Mexico till July, 1848. He was elected to the Kentucky legislature on his return, and was a representative in congress from 1 Dec., 1851, till 3 March, 1853. He was appointed a brigadier-general in the National army on 18 Sept., 1861, organized a brigade of volunteers in Kentucky, commanded all troops south of Louisville and was engaged in the pursuit of Gen. John H. Morgan in 1862, was attached to the Army of the Ohio in November, commanded at Gallatin, Tenn., and served through Gen. William T. Sherman's campaigns, relinquishing the command of a division in the Cumberland at the beginning of the Atlanta campaign to assume that of a brigade in the 20th corps. His men effected a lodgment in the enemy's fortifications at Resaca, and he was severely wounded in the arm and side, but would not leave the field. He was also in the battles before the fall of Atlanta, and in the march to the sea commanded a division, performing effective services in the fights that preceded the surrender of Gen. Joseph E. Johnston's army. He was brevetted major-general on 24 Feb., 1865, and mustered out on 24 Aug., after which he practised law in Louisville, Ky.

WARDEN, David Bailie, author, b. in Ireland in 1778; d. in Paris, France, 9 Oct., 1845. He came to this country when young, received a classical education, and was graduated at New York medical college. He was appointed secretary of legation to Gen. John Armstrong, minister to France, in 1804, and subsequently consul at Paris, which post he held forty years. He was distinguished for his scientific attainments and varied learning, was a member of the French academy, and formed two libraries of American books, one of which was acquired by Harvard in 1823, and the other by the New York state library in 1840. He published "Inquiry concerning the Intellectual and Moral Faculties and Literature of the Negroes" (Paris, 1810); "Origin and Nature of Consular Establishments"; "Description of the District of Columbia" (1816); "Statistical, Political, and Historical Account of the United States of North America" (3 vols., Edinburgh, 1819); "L'art de vérifier les dates, chronologie de l'Amérique" (10 vols., Paris, 1826-'44); "Bibliotheca Americana Septentrionalis, etc." (1820); "Recherches sur les antiquités de l'Amérique Septentrionale" (1827); and "Bibliotheca Americana" (1831).

WARDEN, Robert Bruce, author, b. in Bardstown, Nelson co., Ky., 18 Jan., 1824. He was educated privately, studied law, was admitted to the bar in April, 1845, became president-judge of the court of common pleas at Cincinnati, afterward reporter of the supreme court of Ohio, and then associate judge of that court. Since 1873 he has resided in Washington, D. C. Judge Warden has written much for the press and has published "A Familiar Forensic View of Man and Law" (Columbus, 1859); "A Voter's Version of the Life and Character of Stephen Arnold Douglas" (1860); "An Account of the Private Life and Public Services of Salmon Portland Chase" (Cincinnati, 1874); and vols. ii., iii., and iv. of the "Ohio Reports." He is preparing for publication "A View of Land and Life."

WARDER, John Aston, physician, b. near Philadelphia, Pa., 19 Jan., 1812; d. in North Bend, Ohio, 14 July, 1883. In early life he was associated with William Bartram and William Darlington, who were among his neighbors, and with John J. Audubon, François A. Michaux, and Thomas Nuttall, who were visitors at his father's house and from whom he acquired a great fondness for nature and learned to use his powers of observation. In 1830 he removed with his parents to Springfield, Ohio, but, returning to Philadelphia, was graduated at Jefferson medical college in 1836. Settling in Cincinnati in 1837, he followed his profession there until 1855. Meanwhile he took an active interest in everything that tended to advance education and science. He was early chosen a member of the school-board, and he travelled extensively, studying systems of teaching and the construction of school-houses that he might introduce improved plans into Cincinnati. He was associated in the organization of the Cincinnati astronomical society, the Western academy of natural sciences, the Cincinnati horticultural society, the Ohio Medical college, and the Cincinnati society of natural history, of which he was president for five years. Dr. Warder also served on the State board of agriculture and was among the first to direct public attention to the beautifying of public and private parks and cemeteries. He was associated in the establishment of the Spring Grove cemetery and did much to develop the public interest in landscape gardening. In 1873 he was appointed U. S. commissioner to the World's fair in Vienna, and prepared the official report for the U. S. government on "Forests and Forestry." He was connected with the founding of the American forestry association in 1875 and was active in the establishment of the American forestry congress. In 1883 he was chosen honorary president of the Ohio state forestry association, and was appointed by the department of agriculture to report upon the forestry of the northwestern states. He described in 1853 the Catalpa speciosa, a tree that had not been recognized until that time as a distinct species, but which is now accepted as one of the most valuable of forest-trees. In 1850 he began the publication of the "Western Horticultural Review," which continued until 1854, when, with James W. Ward, he established the "Botanical Magazine and Horticultural Review," which he then edited for several years. Besides making contributions to medical, agricultural, and horticultural periodicals, he translated Trouseau and Belloc on "Laryngeal Phthisis" (Philadelphia, 1839), and published "Hedge Manual: a Complete Treatise on Hedges, Evergreens, and all Plants suitable for American Hedging" (New York, 1858); "American Pomology: Part I., Apples" (1867); and an edition of Alphonse Du Breuil's "Vineyard Culture" (1867).—His son, Robert Bowne, chemist, b. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 28 March, 1848, was graduated at Earlham college, Richmond, Ind., in 1866 and at the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard in 1874. He has since that time been engaged in teaching chemistry and physics, and in 1883-'7 was state chemist of Indiana. In 1887 he removed to Washington, D. C. Prof. Warder is a member of various societies, and has contributed papers to their transactions and to scientific journals.

WARE, Henry, clergyman, b. in Sherburne, Mass., 1 April, 1764; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 12 July, 1845. He was the descendant in the fourth generation of Robert Ware, a native of England, who was one of the early settlers of Dedham, Mass., in 1642. Henry was graduated at Harvard in 1785, and while studying theology taught in Cambridge. He was ordained pastor of the first church at Hingham, Mass., 24 Oct., 1787, which charge he retained till 1805, when he became Hollis professor of divinity in Harvard. His election originated the discussion that led to the separation of the Unitarians—to whom he adhered—from the orthodox Congregationalists. He took no part in the controversy till 1820, when he engaged in a polemical discussion with Dr. Leonard Woods. He resigned the professorship of theology in 1840 in consequence of impaired eyesight, but continued two years longer in the chair of pulpit eloquence, which he had assumed in 1826. Harvard gave him the degree of D. D. in 1806. With Noah Worcester, William E. Channing, and Andrews Norton he laid the foundation of the conservative school of Unitarianism. He published "Letters to Trinitarians and Calvinists," in reply to Dr. Leonard Woods's "Letters to Unitarians" (Cambridge, 1820); "Answer to Dr. Woods's Reply" (1822); "Postscript to an Answer" (1823); "An Inquiry into the Foundation, Evidences, and Truths of Religion" (2 vols., Cambridge and London, 1842); also various single sermons.—His son, Henry, clergyman, b. in Hingham, Mass., 21 April, 1794; d. in Framingham, Mass., 22 Sept., 1843, was graduated at Harvard in 1812. He was assistant teacher at Phillips Exeter academy in 1812-'14, studied theology under his father's direction, and was ordained pastor of the Second church (Unitarian) at Boston, 1 Jan., 1817. He took an active part in organizing the Unitarian body, and edited its organ, the "Christian Disciple," whose name was subsequently changed to the "Christian Examiner" in 1819-'22. He visited Europe in 1829-'30 for the benefit of his health, resigned his pastorate soon after his return, and was appointed Parkman professor of pulpit eloquence and pastoral care in the divinity-school of Harvard in 1830, which chair he resigned in 1842. He received the degree of D. D. from Harvard in 1834, and published "Hints on Extemporaneous Preaching" (Boston, 1824); "Sermons on the Offices and Character of Jesus Christ" (1825); "The Formation of Christian Character" (1831); "The Life of the Saviour" (1832); memoirs of Joseph Priestley, Noah Worcester, and others; and separate sermons, essays, and poems. The Rev. Chandler Robbins published selections from his writings (4 vols., Boston, 1846-'7), and his brother, John, published his "Memoir" (2 vols., Boston, 1846).—

The second Henry's second wife, Mary Lovell Pickard, b. in Boston, Mass., 2 Oct., 1798; d. in Milton, Mass., 4 April, 1849, was distinguished for charitable traits, and her life forms the subject of a "Memoir" by the Rev. Edward B. Hall, a brother-in-law of Dr. Ware (Boston, 1852).—The second Henry's son, John Fothergill Waterhouse, clergyman, b. in Boston, 31 Aug., 1818; d. in Milton, Mass., 26 Feb., 1881, was graduated at Harvard in 1838 and at the divinity-school in 1842. He was first settled as a pastor of the Unitarian society at Fall River, Mass., afterward was stationed at Cambridgeport, and in 1864 became pastor of the Unitarian church in Baltimore, Md. During his residence in Baltimore he gave much attention to the religious needs and other wants of the negroes, and before and during the civil war was an anti-slavery man. Mr. Ware returned to Boston, and in 1872 became pastor of the Arlington street church. He organized a Unitarian society at Swampscott, Mass., of which he was pastor at the time of his death, as well as of the Boston church. He was a favorite with the members of the Grand army of the republic, having been a worker among the soldiers during the civil war, and was a frequent orator before their organizations. He published "The Silent Pastor" (Boston, 1848); "Hymns and Tunes for Sunday-School Worship" (1853-'56-'60); and "Home Life: What it Is, and what it Needs" (1873).—Another son of the second Henry, William Robert, architect, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 27 May, 1832, was graduated at Harvard in 1852, and at the Lawrence scientific school in 1856. He was professor of architecture in the Massachusetts institute of technology from 1865 till 1881, and since the latter year has held a similar professorship in the School of mines of Columbia college, where he has entire charge of the department of architecture. He was a trustee of the Museum of fine arts, Boston, in 1876-'81, and since 1881 has held a similar office in connection with the Metropolitan museum, New York. In conjunction with Henry Van Brunt he designed the Memorial hall at Harvard college, the first church in Boston, the Union railway station, Worcester, and other buildings; and later he designed the American school of classical studies at Athens, Greece. Prof. Ware is an accepted authority on architectural matters and is largely consulted in a professional capacity. He has published "Modern Perspective: a Treatise on Plane and Curvilinear Perspective" (Boston, 1883).—John, brother of the second Henry, physician, b. in Hingham, Mass., 19 Dec., 1795; d. in Boston, 29 April, 1864, was graduated at Harvard in 1813, afterward studied medicine, and received his degree in 1816. After practising for one year at Duxbury, Mass., he removed to Boston. From 1832 till 1858 he was professor of the theory and practice of medicine in the medical department of Harvard. Dr. Ware was for several years president of the Massachusetts medical society, and also a member of the American academy of arts and sciences. In addition to lectures, discourses, and essays, he published "Life of Henry Ware, Jr." (2 vols., Boston, 1846); "Hints to Young Men" (1850); and "Philosophy of Natural History" (1860).—His second wife, Mary Greene Chandler, b. in Petersham, Mass., 22 May, 1818, is the author of "Elements of Character" (Boston, 1854); "Thoughts in My Garden" (1862); and "Death and Life" (1864).—William, another brother of the second Henry, author, b. in Hingham, Mass., 3 Aug., 1797; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 19 Feb., 1852, was graduated at Harvard in 1816 and at the divinity-school in 1819, and began preaching at Northborough, Mass. From 18 Dec., 1821, till 19 Oct., 1836, he was minister of the 1st Congregational church in New York. From June, 1837, till April, 1838, he had charge of the 2d Congregational church in Waltham, Mass., and in December, 1843, was settled at West Cambridge, but feeble health soon compelled him to relinquish preaching. Mr. Ware was editor and proprietor of the "Christian Examiner" in 1839-'44. He travelled in Europe in 1848-'9, and delivered a course of lectures on European travel in 1849-'51. He published vivid representations of ancient life and manners, entitled "Letters from Palmyra" (2 vols., New York, 1837), which had appeared in the "Knickerbocker Magazine" the previous year, and were subsequently republished in London and New York with the title of "Zenobia, or the Fall of Palmyra" (new ed., 1868). He also wrote "Probus" (2 vols., New York, 1838; afterward entitled "Aurelian"); "Julian, or Scenes in Judea" (2 vols., 1841); "American Unitarian Biography" (2 vols., Boston, 1850-'1); "Sketches of European Capitals" (1851); "Lectures on the Works and Genius of Washington Allston" (1852); and a "Memoir of Nathaniel Bacon," in Sparks's "American Biography" (1848).—The first Henry's nephew, Ashur, jurist, b. in Sherburne, Mass., 10 Feb., 1782; d. in Portland, Me., 10 Sept., 1873, was graduated at Harvard in 1804, held a tutorship there from 1807 till 1811, and was professor of Greek from 1811 till 1815. He was admitted to the Boston bar in 1816, removed to Portland, Me., in 1817, and in 1820 became the first secretary of the state of Maine on its separation from Massachusetts. From 1822 till 1866 he was judge of the U. S. district court of Maine. He edited the "Boston Yankee" for a year, the Portland "Argus" for several years, contributed articles on admiralty jurisdiction to John Bouvier's "Law Dictionary," and published "Reports of Cases, United States District Court of Maine" (Boston, 1839).

WARE, Katharine Augusta, poet, b. in Quincy, Mass., in 1797; d. in Paris, France, in 1843. She was a daughter of Dr. Rhodes, of Quincy, in 1819 married Charles A. Ware, a naval officer, removed to Europe in 1839, and remained there till her death. She edited the "Bower of Taste" in Boston, and, in addition to poems for the newspapers, published "Power of the Passions, and other Poems" (London, 1842).

WARE, Nathaniel A., author, b. near Abbeville, S. C., 16 Aug., 1780; d. in Galveston, Tex., in 1854. He engaged in teaching in South Carolina, where he studied and practised law. Removing to Natchez, Miss., he became major of militia and secretary of the territorial government, acquiring a large fortune by judicious purchases of land. He travelled extensively and was known for his attainments in botany, geography, and the natural sciences. He resided at Philadelphia and Cincinnati during his later years, and published a small work on the Pestalozzian system of education; "Views of the Federal Constitution"; and "Notes on Political Economy, as Applicable to the United States" (New York, 1844). He was the father of Catharine Ann Warfield, mentioned below.

WARE, Nicholas, senator, b. in Caroline county, Va., in 1769; d. in New York city, 7 Sept., 1824. While a youth he accompanied his father, Capt. Robert Ware, to Edgefield, S. C. He afterward studied medicine at Augusta, Ga., and then law, completing his studies at the Litchfield, Conn., law-school. He attained success in his profession at Augusta, represented Richmond county in the Georgia legislature, was mayor of Augusta, afterward judge of the city court, and U. S. senator from Georgia in 1821-'4. He was president of the board of trustees of Richmond county academy, Augusta, at the time of his death, and was also a trustee of the University of Georgia at Athens.

WARFIELD, Catharine Ann, author, b. in Natchez, Miss., 6 June, 1816; d. in Pewee Valley, Ky., 21 May, 1877. She was a daughter of Nathaniel A. Ware, and her maternal grandfather was Capt. Charles Percy, of the British navy, one of the early colonists of Louisiana. She was educated with her sister Eleanor in Philadelphia, where the family then resided, but afterward went to Cincinnati, Ohio, where in 1833 she married Robert E. Warfield, of Lexington, Ky. In 1857 they removed to a farm near Louisville, Ky. Conjointly with her sister Eleanor she published "The Wife of Leon, and other Poems, by Two Sisters of the West" (New York, 1844), and "The Indian Chamber, and other Poems" (1846). Mrs. Warfield's own publications were "The Household of Bouverie" (2 vols., New York, 1860); "The Romance of the Green Seal" (1867); "Miriam Monfort, or Monfort Hall" (1873); "Hester Howard's Temptation" (Philadelphia, 1875); "A Double Wedding" (1875); "Lady Ernestine" (1876); "Miriam's Memoirs, or the Romance of Beauneincourt" (1876); "Sea and Shore" (1876); "Ferne Fleming" (1877); and "The Cardinal's Daughter" (1877).—Her sister, Eleanor Percy Ware Lee, b. in Washington, Miss., in 1820; d. in Natchez, Miss., 14 Oct., 1849, married Henry Lee, a native of Virginia, and with her sister was the author of several novels.

WARING, George E., sanitarian, b. in Poundridge, N. Y., 4 July, 1833. He was educated at College Hill, Poughkeepsie, and then studied agriculture with James J. Mapes. During the winter of 1854 he made an agricultural lecture tour through Maine and Vermont, and in 1855 he took charge of Horace Greeley's farm at Chappaqua, N. Y., which he conducted on shares for two years. In August, 1857, he was appointed agricultural and drainage engineer of Central park, New York city, where he remained for four years, during which time, among other duties, he prepared the soil of the Mall and set out the four rows of elms upon it. He was appointed in May, 1861, after the opening of the civil war, major of the Garibaldi guard, with which he served three months. In August, 1861, he was made major of cavalry by Gen. John C.

Frémont and went to St. Louis to join him. There he raised six companies of cavalry under the name of the Frémont hussars, which were afterward consolidated with the Benton hussars to form the 4th Missouri cavalry, of which he was commissioned colonel in January, 1862. In this capacity he served throughout the war, chiefly in the southwest. He settled in Newport, R. I., in 1867, where he became the manager of Ogden farm. Col. Waring then devoted himself to agriculture and cattle-breeding and to engineering, until the latter occupation required his full attention in 1877. Since that date he has been in active practice as an engineer of drainage. He was appointed in June, 1879, expert and special agent of the 10th census of the United States, with charge of the social statistics of cities, and he has been a member of the National board of health since 1882. After the yellow-fever epidemic in Memphis in 1878 he devised the system of sewerage that was accepted for that city and since that time has been generally adopted. He has invented numerous sanitary improvements chiefly in connection with the drainage of houses and towns. He has been connected with various journals and edited the "Herd-Books of the American Jersey Cattle Club" in 1868-'81, of which organization he was the founder. His other works are "Elements of Agriculture" (New York, 1854); "Draining for Profit and Draining for Health" (1867); "Handy Book of Husbandry" (1870, now called "Book of the Farm"); "A Farmer's Vacation" (Boston, 1875); "Whip and Spur" (1875); "Sanitary Drainage of Houses and Farms" (1876); "The Bride of the Rhine" (1877); "Village Improvements and Farm Villages" (1877); "Sanitary Condition of City and Country Dwelling-Houses" (1877); "Tyrol and the Skirt of the Alps" (New York, 1879); "How to Drain a House" (1885); and "Sewerage and Land Drainage" (1888).

WARNER, Adoniram Judson, soldier, b. in Wales, Erie co., N. Y., 13 Jan., 1834. He was educated at Beloit, Wis., and in New York central college. Soon after leaving college he became principal of the Lewiston, Pa., academy and superintendent of public schools of Mifflin county, and he was principal of the Mercer union schools from 1856 till 1862. In the latter year he entered the National army as captain in a Pennsylvania regiment, and was successively promoted to lieutenant-colonel, colonel, and brevet brigadier-general of volunteers, 13 March, 1865. He participated in several engagements, and was severely wounded at Antietam. After the close of the war he studied law and was admitted to the bar at Indianapolis, Ind., but never practised, and since 1866 has engaged in the railroad, coal, and iron business. He was elected to congress from Ohio as a Democrat in 1878, 1882, and 1884. He has published "Appreciation of Money" (Philadelphia, 1877); "Source of Value in Money" (1882); and various pamphlets on the silver and other economic questions.

WARNER, Charles Dudley, author, b. in Plainfield, Mass., 12 Sept., 1829. His father, a man of culture, died when Charles was five years old. During his early boyhood he had access to few books except biblical commentaries, biographies of austere divines, and some Calvinistic treatises, but he was fond of study, especially of the classics, and in 1851 was graduated at Hamilton with the first prize for English. He has embodied his recollections of his youth in New England in one of his most popular works, "Being a Boy" (Boston, 1877), which is partly an autobiography, and a faithful and amusing picture of rural life in a Calvinistic New England neighborhood fifty years ago.

While in college he contributed to the "Knickerbocker" and "Putnam's Magazine." He also prepared a "Book of Eloquence" (Cazenovia, N. Y., 1853), which displayed a critical and appreciative judgment. He joined a surveying party on the Missouri frontier in 1853, became familiar with varied phases of frontier life, returned to the east in 1854, and was graduated at the law department of the University of Pennsylvania in 1856. He then practised his profession in Chicago, Ill., till 1860, when he returned to the east and became assistant editor of the "Press,"

Chas. Dudley Warner

an evening newspaper in Hartford, Conn., of which he assumed control in the following year. In 1867 the "Press" was consolidated with the "Courant," of which he became a co-editor. He spent fourteen months abroad in 1868-'9, and gained reputation by a series of foreign letters to that journal, which were widely copied. He subsequently travelled extensively in Europe and the East, on his return resumed the editorship of the "Courant," and in 1884 became a co-editor of "Harper's Magazine." His most important work in connection with that monthly has been a series of papers beginning with "Studies in the South," followed by "Mexican Papers" and "Studies in the Great West," in which the educational, political, and social condition of these states are carefully discussed. He has also interested himself in the treatment of social science topics in Connecticut, and was for several years a member of the State commission on prisons, and of the National prison association. He has delivered lectures before educational and other societies, which for the most part have been pleas for a higher individual and national culture, for an enlargement of our collegiate courses, and an improvement in their methods. These include an address at Bowdoin on "Higher Education" (Brunswick, Me., 1871), a series of lectures on "Literature in Relation to Life," delivered before the law department of Yale (1884), address at the unveiling of Paul Gerhardt's statue of Nathan Hale in the capitol at Hartford (1887), that before the literary societies of Washington and Lee university, Lexington, Va., 1888, and one on "Shelley" (1888). He was an ardent Abolitionist during the anti-slavery agitation, and has been a Republican since the formation of the party. Yale gave him the degree of A. M. in 1872, and Dartmouth the same honor in 1884. His career as an author began in 1870. In the spring and summer of that year he wrote for the "Courant" a series of sketches, lightly and humorously depicting the experiences of an amateur gardener, into which were woven caustic comments on some of the foibles of social and political life. These papers were published in book-form, with an introduction by Henry Ward Beecher, under the title of "My Summer in a Garden," and met with immediate favor (Hartford, 1870). It was followed by "Saunterings," reminiscences of the author's travels on the European continent (Boston, 1870), and "Backlog Studies" (1872), a collection of essays, a part of which first appeared in "Scribner's Monthly." This book is a panegyric of the kindly influences of the fireside circle, and a discussion of current topics of social life, in the peculiar vein of humor that characterizes the writer. His other works include contributions to the magazines on social, artistic, and literary topics; "Baddeck, and That Sort of Thing" (1874); "My Winter on the Nile" (Hartford, 1876); "In the Levant" (1877); "In the Wilderness" (Boston, 1878); "Capt. John Smith" (New York, 1881); "Washington Irving," in the "Men of Letters" series, of which he is editor (Boston, 1881); "Roundabout Journey" (1883); "Their Pilgrimage," a serial, depicting the exploits of an author and an artist on a tour of the Atlantic coast and inland northern and southern watering-places (New York, 1886); and "On Horseback" (1888). He has also published, with Samuel L. Clemens, "The Gilded Age" (1873).

WARNER, Hiram, jurist, b. in Hampshire county, Mass., 29 Oct., 1802; d. in Atlanta, Ga., in 1881. He received an academical education, removed to Georgia in 1819, and taught there for three years. He was admitted to the bar in 1825, and began practice in Knoxville, Ga. He was a member of the state house of representatives in 1828-'31, was elected in 1833 a judge of the superior court of Georgia, re-elected in 1836, and served till 1840. He was appointed in 1845 a judge of the supreme court of the state, served till 1853, when he resigned, and was elected to congress in 1855. He was a member of the Charleston Democratic convention in 1860, and opposed the secession movement there and in the Georgia secession convention of 1861. After the war he sustained the reconstruction acts of congress. On the reorganization of the judiciary of the state, he was appointed a judge of the supreme court, and in 1872 he was appointed chief justice of that court.

WARNER, Seth, soldier, b. in Roxbury, Conn., 17 May, 1743; d. there, 26 Dec., 1784. He early became known for his skill in hunting, his energy, sound judgment, and manly bearing. In 1763 he removed with his father, Benjamin Warner, M. D., to Bennington, then in the "New Hampshire Grants." During the dispute between New York and the inhabitants of the Grants, over whom that state claimed jurisdiction, Ethan Allen and Seth Warner, who were the leaders of the people, were outlawed. At the opening of the Revolution, Warner espoused the patriot cause, and, though the New York legislature several times protested against his commission, congress refused to revoke it. As second in command, he assisted in the capture of Ticonderoga, and on the following day took the important post of Crown Point with its garrison and 113 cannon. For this he was given a colonel's commission by congress, dated 27 July, 1775, and joined Gen. Richard Montgomery in Canada. He took part in the following September in the siege of St. John's, New Brunswick, and defeated Sir Guy Carleton, who attempted its relief. His regiment was then discharged, and after the death of Gen. Montgomery, on the last day of the year, he raised another body of troops and marched to Quebec. On the night of 4 July, 1777, when Ticonderoga was evacuated, the main body of the American army took the road leading through Hubbardton and Castleton. At the former place the rear-guard was placed under the command of Warner, who was attacked by Gen. Simon Frazer on 7 July and compelled to retreat after a severe engagement. At the battle of Bennington, Warner's regiment arrived in time to repel the re-enforcement that had been sent to the enemy. He afterward joined the forces of Gen. Horatio Gates at Stillwater. He remained with the army until 1782, when his health gave way, and he returned with his family to Roxbury. Warner was more than six feet in height, erect, and well proportioned. See a memoir of him by Daniel Chipman (Middlebury, Vt., 1848). In 1787 the state of Vermont granted him 2,000 acres of land in Essex county.—His great-grandnephew, Olin Levi, sculptor, b. in Suffield, Conn., 9 April, 1844, began life as a telegraph-operator, but subsequently adopted sculpture as a profession, studying at the École des beaux arts, Paris, under François Jouffroy, during 1869-'72. His studio is in New York, where he was elected a member of the Society of American artists in 1877, and an associate of the National academy in 1888. His works include the statuettes "May" (1872) and "Twilight" (1878); a colossal medallion of Edwin Forrest, which was exhibited at Philadelphia in 1876; "Dancing Nymph" (1879); a fountain for Portland, Oregon, completed in 1888; "Diana" (1888); portrait-statues of Gov. William A. Buckingham, which was placed in the capitol in Hartford in 1883, and William Lloyd Garrison (1885) in Boston; and numerous portrait-busts, among them those of Rutherford B. Hayes, owned by the Union league club, New York (1876), and the Rev. William F. Morgan, D. D. (1887).

WARNER, Susan, author, b. in New York city, 11 July, 1819; d. in Highland Falls, N. Y., 17 March, 1885. She was the daughter of Henry W. Warner, a member of the New York bar, who died at his residence on Constitution island, opposite West Point, in 1875. She inherited a talent for writing from her father, who was the author of "An Inquiry into the Moral and Religious Character of the American Government," and "The Liberties of America" (New York, 1853). Under the pen-name of "Elizabeth Wetherell" Miss Warner published her first novel, "The Wide, Wide World," when she was thirty-one years old (New York, 1851). The publisher, George P. Putnam, was advised by his critics to reject it, and was about to do so, when his mother read the manuscript and persuaded him to put it into print. For months it seemed to have fallen dead, then it suddenly began to be called for, and ultimately a quarter of a million copies were sold. The work was also published in Europe, where it enjoyed almost equal popularity. In 1852 Miss Warner issued "Queechy," which had a large sale, and has constantly been reprinted. The year following she published "The Law and the Testimony," in which the texts establishing the great doctrines of Christianity are brought together under their appropriate heads. Her next work, "The Hills of the Shatemuc" (1856), containing descriptions of scenery on Hudson river, was followed by "The Old Helmet" (1863); "Melbourne House" (1864); "Daisy" (1868); "A Story of Small Beginnings" (1872); "The Say and Do Series: Stories on the Lord's Supper" (1875); "The Broken Walls of Jerusalem, and the Rebuilding of Them" (1878); and "The Kingdom of Judah" (1878). In collaboration with her sister she wrote "Say and Seal" (New York, 1860); "Ellen Montgomery's Book-Shelf" (1863-'9); "Books of Blessing" (1868); and "Wych Hazel" (1876). Some of Miss Warner's works were soon translated into French, German, and Swedish. "The Wide, Wide World" was the most popular novel ever written by an American, with the single exception of Mrs. Stowe's famous story. "It was not," says a critic, "as a picture of life that 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' appealed to readers. It was as a contribution of the writer to the discussion of a burning question, and its unexampled popularity was much more than merely literary. The success of 'The Wide, Wide World,' on the other hand, was purely artistic, so to speak. It owes nothing to the subject and nothing to incidents. There is not a touch of melodrama in its treatment, and it has as little story as if it had been written by Henry James." Taine expressed his astonishment that in America "a three-volume novel is devoted to the history of the moral progress of a girl of thirteen." Miss Warner was buried, by her desire, near the Cadets' monument in the West Point cemetery, shown in the illustration. Her tombstone bears the inscription: "The author of 'The Wide, Wide World' was born 11 July, 1819, and passed gently into the life that knows no ending, 17 March, 1885. In trust for a few of the friends that loved her, her sister has placed this stone. Auf Wiedersehen."—Her sister, Anna Bartlett, b. in New York in 1820, has published, under the pen-name of "Amy Lothrop," the novels of "Dollars and Cents" (New York, 1853), and "My Brother's Keeper" (1855); also "Stories of Vinegar Hill" (6 vols., 1871), "The Fourth Watch" (1872), "Gardening by Myself" (1872), "Miss Tiller's Vegetable Garden" (1873), and "The other Shore" (1873).

WARNER, Willard, senator, b. in Granville, Ohio, 4 Sept., 1826. He was graduated at Marietta college in 1845, went to California in 1849, engaged in mercantile business in Cincinnati after his return in 1852, and a few years later became general manager of the Newark machine-works. He was a delegate to the Republican national convention in 1860. In December, 1861, he joined the volunteer army as major of the 76th Ohio infantry, and was engaged at Fort Donelson, at the siege of Corinth, and in the Vicksburg campaign. In 1863, he became lieutenant-colonel of the regiment, which he led from Vicksburg to Chattanooga, and through the battles of Lookout Mountain and Mission Ridge, and at Ringgold, where he broke through Gen. Patrick Cleburne's strongly posted lines. In the Atlanta campaign he served on the staff of Gen. William T. Sherman as inspector-general. On 20 Oct., 1864, he was appointed colonel of the 180th Ohio volunteers. He was brevetted brigadier- and major-general of volunteers in March, 1865, for gallant and meritorious services, and was mustered out in July. He served one term in the Ohio state senate immediately after the war, removed to the south in 1867, where he engaged in cotton-planting, was a member of the Alabama legislature in the succeeding year, and was elected to the U. S. senate as a Republican from Alabama on the reorganization of the state government, serving from 25 July, 1868, till 3 March, 1871, when his term ended. He was collector of customs at Mobile, Ala., from July, 1871, till February, 1872, when he declined the appointment of governor of New Mexico, as he did also that of minister to the Argentine Republic. He was a member of the Republican national convention of 1868, of the Cincinnati convention that nominated Rutherford B. Hayes in 1876, and of all that have since been held. In 1873 he organized the Tecumseh iron company, of which he has since been the general manager, and in 1887 he was elected president and manager of the Nashville iron, steel, and charcoal company. He resides at Tecumseh, Ala.

WARNER, William, congressman, b. in Wisconsin in 1840. He was educated at Lawrence university, Wis., and at the University of Michigan, but was not graduated. He studied law and was admitted to the bar, but entered the army in 1862, and served till the end of the civil war in the 33d and 34th Wisconsin regiments. He then settled in the practice of his profession at Kansas City, Mo., became city attorney in 1867, and circuit attorney in 1869, and in 1871 was elected mayor. He was a Republican presidential elector in 1872, U. S. district attorney for western Missouri in 1882-'4, and twice received the votes of the Republican members of the legislature for U. S. senator. In 1884 he was chosen to congress, and he was re-elected in 1886. He was the first department commander of the Grand army of the republic in Missouri, and was chosen commander-in-chief at the National encampment in 1888.

WARNER, Zebedee, clergyman, b. in Pendleton county, Va., 28 Feb., 1833. He was educated at Clarksburg (Va.) academy, which he left in 1852. He entered the ministry of the United Brethren in Christ in 1854, was presiding elder in 1862-'9, in charge of a church at Parkersburg, W. Va., in 1869-'80, and was presiding elder of the district in 1880-'5. He was graduated in the Chautauqua Sunday-school normal course in 1879. He was elected corresponding member of the General missionary society in 1885, has been seven times in the general conference, and was for two years president of the Eastern Sunday-school assembly. He was for eight years teacher of theology in the Parkersburg conference, and since 1858 has been a trustee of Otterbein university, which conferred upon him the degree of D. D. in 1878. He published "Christian Baptism" (Parkersburg, 1864); "Rise and Progress of the United Brethren Church" (1865); "Life and Times of Rev. Jacob Bachtel" (Dayton, Ohio, 1867); and "The Roman Catholic not a True Christian Church" (Parkersburg, 1868).

WARREN, Cyrus More, chemist, b. in Dedham, Mass., 15 Jan., 1824. He was graduated at the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard in 1855, and spent three years studying chemistry, chiefly at Heidelberg and Berlin. On his return he devoted himself to original research, especially in connection with the volatile hydrocarbons, and his later investigations have resulted in practical applications in the use of coal-tar and asphaltum for roofing and paving purposes, which have been introduced by the Warren chemical and manufacturing company and the Warren-Scharf asphalt paving company, of which corporations he is president and treasurer. In 1866-'8 he held the chair of organic chemistry in the Massachusetts institute of technology. He has obtained patents for a process of fractional distillation, for various improvements in asphalt roofing and paving materials, and for a method for the distillation of anthracene. Prof. Warren is a fellow of the American academy of arts and sciences and of the American association for the advancement of science. His papers, descriptive of his original researches, have been published in the "American Journal of Science" and in the "Memoirs of the American Academy."

WARREN, Fitz-Henry, soldier, b. in Brimfield, Mass., 11 Jan., 1816; d. there, 21 June, 1878.

He emigrated to Burlington, Iowa, in 1844, and became interested in journalism and politics in that locality. He was appointed second assistant postmaster-general in 1849, and afterward served as first assistant. During the civil war he was in command of the 1st Iowa cavalry, and he became brigadier-general of volunteers, 16 July, 1862, and afterward major-general by brevet, being mustered out of the service, 24 Aug., 1865. He was a member of the Iowa state senate in 1866, minister to Guatemala in 1867-'8, and a presidential elector on the Democratic ticket in 1872. He was editor of the Burlington (Iowa) "Hawkeye" for a time, and was also, at a later period, connected with the "Sun" and the "Tribune" in New York city.

WARREN, George William, musician, b. in Albany, N. Y., 17 Aug., 1828. He displayed musical talent early in life, but for seven years was engaged in business. During that time he began to study music, and played the organ at St. Peter's church, Albany. He subsequently settled in New York, where he became a successful organist. In 1860 he was invited to take charge of the music of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, and ten years later he became organist of St. Thomas's church. He has written much church music and several pieces for the piano, and has published "Hymns and Tunes as sung at St. Thomas's Church, New York" (New York, 1888).

WARREN, Gouverneur Kemble, soldier, b. in Cold Spring, N. Y., 8 Jan., 1830; d. in Newport, R. I., 8 Aug., 1882. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1850, standing second in his class, and was assigned to the topographical engineers as brevet 2d lieutenant. After four years of duty in connection with the surveys of the delta of the Mississippi and other river surveys under Capt. Andrew A. Humphreys, he engaged in compiling reports of the Pacific railroad exploration. In 1855 he accompanied the Sioux expedition as chief topographical engineer on Gen. William S. Harney's staff, being engaged in the action of Blue Water, and subsequently until 1859 he was occupied in Dakota and Nebraska in making maps of those territories for the exploration of the routes for railroads between Mississippi river and the Pacific ocean. The general direction of this route was under Capt. Humphreys, and Lieut. Warren was his principal assistant. He then served at the military academy as assistant professor of mathematics until the beginning of the civil war, when he entered active service as lieutenant-colonel of the 5th New York volunteers, of which regiment he became colonel on 31 Aug., 1861. He was also promoted captain in the engineers on 9 Sept., 1861. His regiment was ordered to Fortress Monroe and he took part in the action of Big Bethel, where he was the last to leave the field, remaining to rescue the body of Lieut. John T. Greble, the first officer in the regular army killed in the civil war. During the remainder of the year he was stationed at Baltimore, where he constructed the fort on Federal Hill. In the spring of 1862 he joined the Army of the Potomac, serving in the peninsular campaign, and at Yorktown his regiment formed part of the siege-train under the command of the chief of artillery. He was given a brigade in the 5th army corps in May, with which he covered the extreme right of the army and took part in the capture of Hanover Court-House, the pursuit of Confederate cavalry under Gen. James E. B. Stuart, the battle of Gaines's Mills, the affair at Malvern Hill and subsequent battle, and the skirmish at Harrison's Landing. His brigade was then sent to re-enforce Gen. John Pope, and he participated in the battle of Manassas. In the subsequent campaign he served with the 5th corps, was engaged at Antietam, and then took part in the Rappahannock campaign and the battle of Fredericksburg. On 26 Sept., 1862, he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers for his services at Gaines's Mills. During the winter months of 1862-'3 he did much individual work in reconnoitring and correcting maps, and on 2 Feb., 1863, he was ordered, as chief of topographical engineers, to the staff of Gen. Joseph Hooker, then in command of the Army of the Potomac. Soon after the consolidation of the two corps of engineers on 3 March, 1863, he was appointed chief of engineers of the Army of the Potomac, and during the Chancellorsville campaign he took part in the action on Orange Pike, the storming of Marye's Heights, and the battle of Salem. He continued as chief of engineers under Gen. George G. Meade, and was engaged at Gettysburg, where he seized Little Round Top, the key to the entire National position, and, using Gen. Meade's name as his staff-officer, ordered the 140th New York regiment, under Col. Patrick H. O'Rourke (q. v.), to occupy the hill. This was accomplished after a severe hand-to-hand fight. Thereafter he was engaged in engineering duties connected with the passage of the Potomac until 11 Aug., when on the receipt of his major-general's commission, bearing date of 3 May previous, he was assigned to the temporary command of the 2d corps. His next important service was during the march on Centerville in October, 1863, when he was attacked by Gen. Ambrose P. Hill, and, although his force was about one half that of the Confederates, he held his position until he was re-enforced by the 5th corps. In the official report it was said: "The handling of the 2d corps in this operation, and the promptitude, skill, and spirit with which the enemy was met, were admirable." When the Army of the Potomac was reorganized into three corps for the Richmond campaign, he received the permanent command of the 5th corps and participated in the battles of the Wilderness, North Anna, Bethesda Church, Cold Harbor, and those around Petersburg. Before the battle of Five Forks, Gen. Sheridan, having expressed to Gen. Grant his dissatisfaction with Gen. Warren's habit of criticising the acts and orders of his superior officers, received authority to remove him, should there be satisfactory reasons for so doing. At Five Forks, when the 5th corps advanced according to Gen. Sheridan's orders, it was found that the indicated point of attack was too far to the right. This error was corrected by Gen. Warren, who in person led the charge that closed the battle and secured the victory. At this moment he received an order relieving him from the command of his corps. The reasons given by Gen. Sheridan for this act were:

1. "That Warren failed to reach me on the 1st of April, when I had reason to expect him"; 2. "That the tactical handling of his corps was unskillful"; 3. "That he did not exert himself to get his corps up to Gravelly run church"; and 4. "That when portions of his line gave way he did not exert himself to restore confidence to his troops." In reply to these charges Gen. Warren answered that his first order to relieve Gen. Sheridan on 31 March was received from Gen. George G. Meade at 9.17 p. m., when he had already accomplished Gen. Sheridan's relief by sending troops to his assistance without orders, on his own responsibility, earlier than 5 p. m., also that he carried out his orders to Gen. Meade's entire satisfaction and joined Gen. Sheridan sooner than Gen. Meade had expected; that the only lack of skill was that of Gen. Sheridan, who delivered the attack of the 5th corps at a point three quarters of a mile distant from the point intended. A court of inquiry, convened in 1879 at Gen. Warren's request, found: 1. That Gen. Warren, after the receipt of Gen. Meade's first order, should have moved his main force sooner than he did. 2. It did not find that his handling of the corps was unskilful. 3. "That there was no unnecessary delay in this march of the 5th corps, and that Gen. Warren took the usual methods of a corps commander to prevent delay." 4. That "by continuous exertions of himself and staff he substantially remedied matters"; and the court thinks "that this was for him the essential point to be attended to, which also required his whole efforts to accomplish." Gen. Warren after his removal was assigned by Gen. Grant to the charge of the defenses of the Petersburg and Southside railroad, and then had command of the Department of the Mississippi. On 27 May, 1865, he resigned his commission in the volunteer army and returned to duty as major in the corps of engineers, to which grade he had been advanced on 25 June, 1864. He received the successive brevets in the U. S. army up to major-general, of which the last two were given him on 13 March, 1865. From May, 1865, till his death he was employed in various parts of the country in making surveys and in other works connected with his department. He was made lieutenant-colonel on 4 March, 1879. Gen. Warren was elected a member of the American association for the advancement of science in 1858, of the American philosophical society in 1867, of the American society of civil engineers in 1874, and to the National academy of sciences in 1876. A heroic statue by Paul Gerhardt (shown in the accompanying illustration) was unveiled with appropriate ceremonies on Little Round Top, Gettysburg, on 8 Aug., 1888. His works include "Explorations in the Dakota Country" (2 vols., Washington, 1855-'6); "Preliminary Report of Explorations in Nebraska and Dakota in the Years 1855-'7" (1858); various reports to the government on military and engineering subjects; and a pamphlet giving "An Account of the 5th Army Corps at the Battle of Five Forks" (New York, 1866). See sketch by Gen. Henry L. Abbot in "Biographical Memoirs of the National Academy of Sciences" (vol. ii., Washington, 1886).

WARREN, Henry White, M. E. bishop, b. in Williamsburg, Hampshire co., Mass., 4 Jan., 1831. He was graduated at Wesleyan university in 1853, taught natural science for two years, and in 1855 became a minister of the Methodist Episcopal church in the New England conference. For fifteen years he filled posts in Boston, Worcester, Lynn, Westfield, Cambridgeport, and Charlestown. In 1861-'2 he was a member of the Massachusetts house of representatives. He was pastor of the Arch street Methodist Episcopal church, Philadelphia, in 1871-'4, and again in 1877-'80. In 1881 he was elected by the Philadelphia annual conference a delegate to the general conference that assembled in Cincinnati, where he was elected bishop. He received the degree of D. D. from Dickinson college in 1872. Bishop Warren is noted as a preacher, his chief characteristics being a good voice, commanding presence, great fluency, and fine play of fancy. He has also been prolific as a writer of books, and for periodicals. His residence is at Denver, Colorado, but his duties since his election have taken him over a large part of the United States, and in 1888 he visited Japan to inspect the missions of his church. Besides many pamphlets and sermons, he has published "Sights and Insights, or Knowledge by Travel" (New York, 1874); "Studies of the Stars" (1878); and "Recreations in Astronomy: with Directions for Practical Experiments and Telescopic Work" (1879).

WARREN, Ira, journalist, b. in Hawkesbury, Canada, in 1806; d. in 1864. He was educated at Brown and Kenyon, and studied medicine. He contributed to the Montreal "Episcopal Observer" and the "Christian Witness," and subsequently edited in Boston, Mass., the "Christian Alliance" and the "Family Visitor." Under the signature of "Laicus" he reviewed the Rev. William Croswell's answer to Bishop Manton Eastburn in 1845. Dr. Warren contributed to the same controversy a volume entitled "Causes and Cure of Puseyism" (Boston, 1847), and published "The Household Physician" (1859), of which, before his death, more than 30,000 copies were sold.

WARREN, Israel Perkins, author, b. in New Bethany, Conn., 8 April, 1814. He is a descendant of Richard Warren, one of the "Mayflower" Pilgrims. He was graduated at Yale in 1838, was principal of the Cromwell, Conn., academy in 1838-'9, afterward studied at Yale theological seminary, and became pastor of the Congregational church at Granby, Conn., in 1842. He was stationed at Mount Carmel, Conn., in 1846, at Plymouth, Conn., in 1851, was secretary and editor of the American tract society at Boston in 1859, an editor and book-publisher there in 1870, and became editor and proprietor of "The Christian Mirror" in Portland, Me., in 1875, which post he has held ever since. In addition to numerous sermons, tracts, and pamphlets, he has published in book-form "The Seaman's Cause" (New York, 1858); "The Sisters, a Memorial of Elizabeth H., Abbie A., and Sarah F. Dickerman" (Boston, 1859); "Sadduceism, a Refutation of the Doctrine of the Annihilation of the Wicked" (1860); "The Cross-Bearer, a Vision" (1861); "The Picture Lesson-Book," designed for the use of the refugee slaves in camp (1861); "A Chapter from the Book of Nature" (1863); "The Christian Armor" (1864); "The Cup-Bearer" (1865); "The Sabbath at Home: an Illustrated Religious Magazine for the Family" (3 vols., 1867-'9); "The New Testament, with Notes, etc." (vol. i., 1868); "Jerusalem, Ancient and Modern" (1873); "The Three Judges, Story of the Men who beheaded their King," with an introduction by Rev. Leonard Bacon (New York, 1873); "Chauncey Judd, or the Stolen Boy of the Revolution" (Boston, 1874); "The Parousia, a Critical Study of the Scripture Doctrine of Christ's Second Coming, etc." (Portland, 1879; 2d ed., rewritten and enlarged, 1884); "Our Father's Book, or the Divine Authority and Origin of the Bible" (Boston, 1885); "The Book of Revelation, a Study" (New York, 1886); and "The Stanley Families in America" (Portland, 1887).

H. W. Warren

WARREN, James, Revolutionary leader, b. in Plymouth, Mass., 28 Sept., 1726; d. there, 27 Nov., 1808. He was graduated at Harvard in 1745, and became a prosperous merchant in Plymouth. In 1766 he was chosen a member of the colonial assembly, where he served until its final dissolution in 1774. He took a prominent part in the establishment of the system of committees of correspondence in 1772. After the death of Gen. Joseph Warren at Bunker Hill, he was chosen to succeed him as president of the Provincial congress of Massachusetts. The connection between his family and that of Joseph Warren, if there be any, is to be sought in England before 1600.—His wife, Mercy, author, b. in Barnstable, Mass., 25 Sept., 1728; d. in Plymouth, 19 Oct., 1814, was a sister of the illustrious orator James Otis, and married James Warren in 1754. She was one of the most highly educated and brilliant women of her time, and her friendship was much prized by such men as Jefferson and the Adamses. Throughout her life she was an intimate friend of Abigail Adams. One of her earliest writings was "The Group," a dramatic piece in two acts, in which Gov. Hutchinson and other Tories were satirized. "The Squabble of the Sea-Nymphs" gives an account of the Boston tea-party, somewhat after the style of the "Rape of the Lock." Her two tragedies, "The Sack of Rome" and "The Ladies of Castile," were well thought of in their day. These were collected in "Poems, Dramatic and Miscellaneous" (Boston, 1790). A work of much greater importance is her "History of the American Revolution" (3 vols., Boston, 1805), which is valuable because of the personal acquaintance of the writer with so many of the characters. There is a sketch of Mrs. Warren in Mrs. Elizabeth F. Ellet's "Women of the Revolution" (New York, 1856).

WARREN, Joseph, physician, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 11 June, 1741; d. in Charlestown, Mass., 17 June, 1775. He was descended from Peter Warren, whose name appears on the town records of Boston in 1659, where he is called "mariner." Peter's second son, Joseph, built a house in 1720 in what is now Warren street, Roxbury, and died there in 1729. A view of the homestead is presented on page 365. His son, Joseph, b. in 1696; married, 29 May, 1740, Mary, daughter of Dr. Samuel Stevens, of Roxbury, and the subject of this sketch was their eldest child. Joseph Warren, the father, was a thrifty farmer, much respected by his townsmen, by whom he was elected to several offices of trust. He was interested in fruit-raising, and introduced into that part of the country the apple long known as the "Warren russet." In October, 1755, while gathering fruit in his orchard, he fell from the ladder and was instantly killed. His son, Joseph, was graduated at Harvard in 1759, and in the following year was appointed master of the Roxbury grammar-school. He studied medicine with Dr.

James Lloyd, and began to practise his profession in 1764. He married, 6 Sept., 1764, Miss Elizabeth Hooton, a young lady who had inherited an ample fortune. The passage of the stamp-act in the following year led Dr. Warren to publish several able articles in the Boston "Gazette." About this time began his intimate friendship with Samuel Adams, who conceived a warm admiration for him, and soon came to regard him as a staunch and clear-headed ally, who could be depended upon under all circumstances. On the occasion of the Townshend acts, Dr. Warren's articles, published under the signature of "A True Patriot," aroused the anger of Gov. Francis Bernard, who brought the matter before his council, and endeavored to prosecute Messrs. Edes and Gill, the publishers of the "Gazette," for giving currency to seditious libels; but the grand jury refused to find a bill against these gentlemen. The affair created much excitement in Boston, and led Gov. Bernard to write to Lord Hillsborough, secretary of state for the colonies, recommending the arrest of the publishers on a charge of treason. In the affair of the sloop "Liberty," in June, 1768, Dr. Warren was one of the committee appointed to wait upon the governor at his country-seat at Jamaica Plain, and protest against the impressment of seamen and the vexatious enforcement of the revenue laws. He was present at every town-meeting held in Boston, from the arrival of the British troops in October, 1768, to their removal in March, 1770, and he was one of the committee of safety appointed after the so-called "massacre" on 5 March. In July he was appointed on a committee to consider the condition of the town, and send a report to England. It was apparently of him that a Tory pamphleteer wrote: "One of our most bawling demagogues and voluminous writers is a crazy doctor." In March, 1772, he delivered the anniversary oration upon the "massacre"; in November his name was recorded immediately after those of James Otis and Samuel Adams in the list of the first committee of correspondence. During the next two years he was in active co-operation with Samuel Adams, and when, in August, 1774, that leader went to attend the meeting of the Continental congress at Philadelphia, the leadership of the party in Boston devolved upon Dr. Warren. On 9 Sept., 1774, the towns of Suffolk county met in convention at Milton, and Dr. Warren read a paper drawn up by himself, and since known as the "Suffolk resolves." The resolutions, which were adopted unanimously, declared that a king who violates the chartered rights of his people forfeits their allegiance; they declared the regulating act null and void, and ordered all the officers appointed under it to resign their offices at once; they directed the collectors of taxes to refuse to pay over money to Gen. Gage's treasurer; they advised the towns to choose their own militia officers; and they threatened Gage that, should he venture to arrest anybody for political reasons, they would retaliate by seizing upon the crown officers as hostages. A copy of these resolutions, which virtually placed Massachusetts in an attitude of rebellion, was forwarded to the Continental congress, which forthwith approved them and pledged the faith of all the other colonies that they would aid Massachusetts in case armed resistance should become inevitable. After the meeting of the Provincial congress at Concord in October, Dr. Warren acted as chairman of the committee of safety, charged with the duty of organizing the militia and collecting military stores. As the 5th of March, 1775, drew near, several British officers were heard to declare that any one who should dare to address the people in the Old South church on this occasion would surely lose his life. As soon as he heard of these threats, Dr. Warren solicited for himself the dangerous honor, and at the usual hour delivered a stirring oration upon "the baleful influence of standing armies in time of peace." The concourse in the church was so great that, when the orator arrived, every approach to the pulpit was blocked up; and rather than elbow his way through the crowd, which might lead to some disturbance, he procured a ladder and climbed in through a large window at the back of the pulpit. About forty British officers were present, some of whom sat on the pulpit-steps, and sought to annoy the speaker with groans and hisses, but everything passed off quietly.

On Tuesday evening, 18 April, observing the movements of the British troops, Dr. Warren despatched William Dawes, by way of Roxbury, and Paul Revere, by way of Charlestown, to give the alarm to the people dwelling on the roads toward Concord. Next morning, on hearing the news of the firing at Lexington, he left his patients in charge of his pupil and assistant, William Eustis, and rode off to the scene of action. He seems to have attended a meeting of the committee of safety that morning at the Black Horse tavern in Menotomy (now Arlington), and there to have consulted with Gen. William Heath. By the time Lord Percy reached Menotomy on his retreat, Gen. Heath had assumed command of the militia, and the fighting there was perhaps the severest of the day. Dr. Warren kept his place near Heath, and a pin was struck from his head by a musket-ball. During the next six weeks he was indefatigable in urging on the military preparations of the New England colonies. At the meeting of the Provincial congress at Watertown, 31 May, he was unanimously chosen its president, and thus became chief executive officer of Massachusetts under this provisional government. On 14 June he was chosen second major-general of the Massachusetts forces, Artemas Ward being first. On the 16th he presided over the Provincial congress, and passed the night in the transaction of public business. The next morning he met the committee of safety at Gen. Ward's headquarters on Cambridge common, and about noon, hearing that the British troops had landed at Charlestown, he rode over to Bunker Hill. It is said that both Putnam and Prescott successively signified their readiness to take orders from him, but he refused, saying that he had come as a volunteer aide to take a lesson in warfare under such well-tried officers. At the final struggle near Prescott's redoubt, as he was endeavoring to rally the militia, Gen. Warren was struck in the head by a musket-ball and instantly killed. His remains were deposited in the tomb of George R. Minot in the Granary burying-ground, whence they were removed in 1825 to the Warren tomb in St. Paul's church, Boston. In 1855 they were again removed to Forest Hills cemetery, where they now repose.

Dr. Warren's wife died, 28 April, 1773, leaving four children. After the death of their father they were left in straitened circumstances until in April, 1778, Gen. Benedict Arnold, who had conceived a warm friendship for Dr. Warren while at Cambridge, came to their relief. Arnold contributed $500 for their education, and succeeded in obtaining from congress the amount of a major-general's half-pay, to be applied to their support from the date of the father's death until the youngest child should be of age. The best biography of Dr. Warren is by Richard Frothingham, "Life and Times of Joseph Warren" (Boston, 1865).—His brother, John, physician, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 27 July, 1753; d. in Boston, Mass., 4 April, 1815, was graduated at Harvard in 1771, studied medicine for two years with his brother Joseph, and then began practice in Salem, where he attained rapid success. He attended the wounded at the battle of Bunker Hill, where he received a bayonet-wound in endeavoring to pass a sentry in order to see his brother. Soon afterward he was appointed hospital surgeon, and in 1776 he accompanied the army to New York and New Jersey. He was at Trenton and Princeton, and from 1777 till the close of the war was superintending surgeon of the military hospitals in Boston. For nearly forty years he occupied the foremost place among the surgeons of New England. In 1780 he demonstrated anatomy in a series of dissections before his colleagues, and in 1783 he was appointed professor of anatomy and surgery in the newly established medical school at Harvard. He was first president of the Massachusetts medical society, retaining the office from 1804 till his death. He was also president of the Agricultural society and of the Humane society. He frequently made public addresses, and in 1783 was the first Fourth-of-July orator in Boston. Besides "Memoirs" addressed to the American academy, "Communications" published by the Massachusetts medical society, an "Address" to the Freemasons, in whose lodge he was a grand-master, and articles in the "Journal of Medicine and Surgery," he was the author of "Mercurial Practice in Febrile Diseases." See his life by James Jackson (Boston, 1815), and by his son Edward (1873).—John's son, John Collins, surgeon, b. in Boston, Mass., 1 Aug., 1778; d. there, 4 May, 1856, was graduated at Harvard in 1797, studied medicine in London, and formed there a portion of the collection of anatomical preparations which he subsequently gave to the Massachusetts medical college. In 1800 he went to Edinburgh, where he studied chemistry, and in 1801 attended the lectures of Vauquelin, Cuvier, and Desfontaines in Paris. He then settled in Boston. In 1803 he became joint editor of the "Monthly Anthology," gave public demonstrations in anatomy in 1805, was active in establishing the reading-room that was developed into the Boston athenæum, and formed a private medical society. In 1806 he was chosen adjunct professor in anatomy and surgery in Harvard. In 1810 he assisted in founding a hospital for the destitute, and in 1811 the "New England Journal of Medicine and Surgery." In 1815 he was appointed professor of anatomy and surgery in Harvard. He was one of the founders of the Massachusetts general hospital in 1820, and principal surgeon until his death. In 1827 he was elected president of the Boston temperance society. He exercised great caution in performing surgical operations, many of which were hitherto unknown in the United States, and he was almost invariably successful. He was the first to operate for strangulated hernia, and eventually his method was adopted. He introduced the operation for aneurism, and performed it in numerous cases, all of which were successful except two. In 1837 he went to Europe for further study. After his return he became an active member of the Agricultural society of Massachusetts, and improved the breed of cattle by importation of foreign stock. He was also chosen president of the Society of natural history. In 1845 he obtained the most perfect skeleton of the mastodon that exists. In 1846 he gave a new impulse to operative surgery by the introduction of ether, and his advocacy of its use in certain cases led to its general adoption by the profession. Besides frequent contributions to scientific journals, Dr. Warren published "Cases of Organic Diseases of the Heart" (Boston, 1809); "Description of an Egyptian Mummy" (1821); "Comparative View of the Sensorial and Nervous Systems in Man and Animals" (1822); "Some Account of the Medical School in Boston, and of the Massachusetts General Hospital" (1824); "Letter to Hon. I. Parker on the Dislocation of the Hip-Joint, etc." (Cambridge, 1826); "Description of the Siamese Twins" (Boston, 1829); "Surgical Observations on Tumors: with Cases and Observations" (1837); "Physical Education and the Preservation of Health" (Boston, 1846); "Etherization: with Surgical Remarks" (1848); "Effects of Chloroform and of Strong Chloric Ether as Narcotic Agents" (1849); "Description of a Skeleton of the Mastodon Giganteus of North America" (1852); "Remarks on Some Fossil Impressions in the Sandstone Rocks of Connecticut River" (1854); "Genealogy of Warren, with Some Historical Sketches" (1854); and "The Great Tree on Boston Common" (1855). See "The Life of John Collins Warren, M. D., compiled chiefly from his Autobiography and Journals," by his brother Edward (2 vols., Boston, 1860).—John's son, Edward, physician, b. in Boston, Mass., 19 Dec., 1804, was graduated at Harvard in 1826, and at the medical school in 1829, began practice in Boston, removed in 1840 to Newton Falls, and while continuing to practise his profession engaged in agriculture. Among his medical writings are a "Sketch of the Progress of Cholera in America in 1832"; three Boylston prize essays on "Scrofula," "Rheumatism," and "Erysipelatous Inflammation," which were published together (Philadelphia, 1840).—A son of John Collins, Jonathan Mason, surgeon, b. in Boston, Mass., in 1811; d. there, 19 Aug., 1867, was graduated at the medical department of Harvard in 1832, and afterward studied in London and Paris. He established himself in Boston, where for twenty years he was attending physician to the Massachusetts general hospital. He performed a great variety of operations, and was a voluminous contributor to medical literature. His chief work was "Surgical Observations, with Cases and Operations" (Boston, 1867). His wife was a daughter of Gov. John Collins.—Jonathan Mason's son, John Collins, physician, b. in Boston, 4 May, 1842, was graduated at Harvard in 1863 and at Harvard medical school in 1866, studied two years at the Imperial hospital in Vienna, and afterward with several eminent surgeons in Berlin, Paris, and London, and began the practice of his profession in Boston in 1869. He is now surgeon in the Massachusetts general hospital, and since 1887 has been associate professor of surgery in the Harvard medical school. He was editor of the "Boston Medical and Surgical Journal" in 1873-'81, and is author of "Anatomy of Keloid," in "Archives of the Imperial Academy of Sciences" (Vienna, 1869); "Anatomy and Development of Rodent Ulcer" (Boston, 1872); "Pathology of Caruncle and Columnæ Adiposæ" (1879); and "Healing of Arteries after Ligation in Men and Animals" (New York, 1886).

WARREN, Joseph, journalist, b. in Waterbury, Vt., 24 July, 1829; d. in Buffalo, N. Y., 30 Sept., 1876. He studied at the University of Vermont, and soon afterward went to Albany, N. Y., where he was made assistant editor of the "Country Gentleman" in 1849, and also teacher of Latin and Greek at the Albany academy. He became associate editor of the Buffalo "Courier" in 1853 and editor-in-chief in 1858, and was chosen president of the New York press association in 1870. He was a member at large of the Democratic state central committee, and a leader of his party in western New York. He was elected superintendent of public schools in Buffalo in 1857, advocated a public park system for that city, and served on the park commission from its formation in 1871 till his death. He was instrumental in securing the establishment of the State insane asylum and the State normal school in Buffalo, took an active part in the organization of the Fine-arts academy, and was interested in the project of the Buffalo, New York, and Philadelphia railroad. He was at one time president of the Young men's Christian association, and was a member of the council of the medical department of the University of Buffalo.

WARREN, Josiah, reformer, b. in 1799; d. in Boston, Mass., 14 April, 1874. He took an active part in Robert Owen's communistic experiment at New Harmony, Ind., in 1825-'6, and was so discouraged by its failure that he was on the point of abandoning any further attempt in that direction when, as he said, "a new train of thought seemed to throw a sudden flash of light upon our past errors, and to show plainly the path to be pursued." He forthwith gave up the idea of maintaining a communal system of society, and sought to attain the same ends through individual sovereignty. He held that the proper reward of labor was a like amount of labor, and elucidated his theory by a supposition. "If I am a bricklayer, and need the services of a physician, an hour of my work in bricklaying is the proper recompense to be given the physician for an hour of his services." He proved the sincerity of his belief in this idea by establishing what was known as the "time store" in Cincinnati, Ohio, which he conducted with fair success for two years, giving and receiving labor-notes in transactions with his customers. He propounded his theories in a work entitled the "True Civilization," and some of his views elicited the commendation of John Stuart Mill.

WARREN, Lott, jurist, b. in Burke county, Ga., 30 Oct., 1797; d. in Albany, Ga., 17 June, 1861. He received a public-school education, was clerk in a store, and served in 1818 as 2d lieutenant of volunteers against the Seminoles. Afterward he studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1821, and practised in various places, finally establishing his residence in Albany. He was a member of the legislature in 1824 and 1831, state senator in 1830, solicitor-general, and judge of the southern circuit in 1831-'4. He was twice elected to represent his district in congress as a Whig, serving in 1839-'43, and subsequently was made judge of the superior court, where he served in 1843-'52. Judge Warren was also an ordained Baptist minister, though he preached only occasionally. He was active in promoting temperance, Sunday-school work, and all philanthropic enterprises.

WARREN, Minnie, dwarf, b. in Middleborough, Mass., 2 June, 1849; d. there, 23 July, 1878. She was the younger sister of Lavinia Warren, who married Charles S. Stratton (Tom Thumb), her real name being Huldah Peirce Bump. In 1863 she was engaged by Phineas T. Barnum, and assumed the name of Warren. Under his management she travelled extensively with Gen. Tom Thumb, Commodore Nutt, and her sister. She was bridesmaid at the celebrated wedding of the latter in Grace church, New York, on 10 Feb., 1863. Subsequently she married Maj. Edward Newall, a dwarf, and died in childbirth.

WARREN, Nathan Boughton, author, b. in Troy, N. Y., 4 July, 1805. His grandfather and father removed from Norwalk, Conn., to Troy in 1798, and were successful merchants, and from them he inherited an independent fortune. He was educated privately, visited England with Bishop Doane, of New Jersey, in 1841, and made a tour of the cathedrals, which suggested to him the idea of adapting the cathedral or choral service of the English church to the American Book of Common Prayer. These services were first introduced in 1844 into a mission church that was founded by his mother. He had a fine taste for music, composed some anthems, and received the degree of Mus. Doc. from Trinity college. He was also skilled in architecture, and designed his villa residence at Mount Ida, which is built in a chastely ornamented Gothic style. He published "The Order of Daily Service, with the Musical Notation as used in English Cathedral and Collegiate Churches, etc." (New York, 1846); "The Ancient Plain Song of the Church" (1855); "The Holidays: Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide, their Social Festivities, Customs, and Carols" (1868); and "Hidden Treasure, or the Good St. Nicholas: a Goblin Story for Christmas" (1872).

WARREN, Sir Peter, British naval officer, b. in Ireland before 1703; d. there, 29 July, 1752. He entered the navy in 1727, and had attained the rank of commodore in 1745, when he was appointed to command an armament that was intended for an attack on Louisburg. He joined the fleet of transports with the land forces under Sir William Pepperrell from Boston, in Casco bay, on 25 April, with four ships, carrying 180 guns. On 30 April the combined forces appeared before Louisburg, and on 1 May the siege was begun. (See PEPPERRELL, WILLIAM.) On 18 May, Capt. Edward Tyng, in the "Massachusetts" frigate, captured a French man-of-war of 64 guns, with more than 500 men and a large quantity of stores for the garrison, and this success greatly raised the spirits of the besiegers. Warren's fleet was re-enforced by the arrival of three large ships from England and three from Newfoundland, and, serious breaches having been made in the walls, it was determined to order a general assault; but the French commander, seeing that further resistance would be useless, surrendered the fortress on 16 June. By the capitulation, 650 veteran troops, more than 1,300 militia, and other persons—in all about 4,000—agreed not to bear arms against Great Britain during the war. Seventy-six cannon and mortars, and a great quantity of military stores, were also taken. The French loss in killed was 300; the English was 130, but the latter suffered heavily from disease. Pepperrell was made a baronet for his share in the victory, and Warren was promoted to rear-admiral, 8 Aug., 1745. He aided in defeating a French squadron off Cape Finisterre in 1747, capturing the greater part of it, and in the same year was elected to parliament for Westminster. Sir Peter married Susan, eldest daughter of Stephen De Lancey, of New York, and was the owner of a valuable estate in the Mohawk valley, which he placed in charge of his nephew, William, afterward Sir William Johnson.

WARREN, Samuel Edward, educator, b. in West Newton, Mass., 29 Oct., 1831. He was graduated at the Rensselaer polytechnic institute in 1851, where, during the same year, he became assistant in charge of descriptive geometry and drawing. In 1854 he was appointed professor, and remained until 1872, when he accepted a similar chair in the Massachusetts institute of technology. In 1875 he resigned the latter post, and also that of lecturer in the Massachusetts normal art-school, which he had held from 1872. He then devoted his attention to the revision of his series of text-books and to conducting a school of private instruction in Newton, Mass., his present residence. Prof. Warren made an exhibit of his works and of drawings by his pupils, illustrating their use, at the World's fair in Philadelphia in 1876, which was complimented in the official reports, and a similar one at the fair in Paris in 1878, for which he received a diploma. He is a member of various scientific and educational societies, and, in addition to numerous contributions on educational subjects to current reviews and periodicals, he has published a series of text-books, including "General Problems from the Orthographic Projections of Descriptive Geometry" (New York, 1860); "Students', Draftsmen's, and Artisans' Manual" (1861; afterward issued as "Elementary Projection Drawing," 1867); "Elementary Linear Perspective" (1863); "Drafting Instruments and Operations" (1865); "Elementary Plane Problems" (1867); "General Problems of Shades and Shadows" (1867); "General Problems in the Linear Perspective of Form, Shadow, and Reflection" (1868); "Elements of Machine Construction and Drawing" (2 vols., 1870); "Elementary Free-hand Geometrical Drawing" (1873); "Elements of Descriptive Geometry: Part I., Surfaces of Revolution," afterward issued as "Problems, Theorems, and Examples in Descriptive Geometry" (1874); "Problems in Stone-Cutting" (1875); "Elements of Descriptive Geometry, Shadows and Perspective" (1877); "Elements of Plane and Solid Free-hand Geometrical Drawing" (1878); and "A Primary Geometry" (1887).

WARREN, Samuel Prowse, organist, b. in Montreal, Canada, 18 Feb., 1841. He is the son of Samuel Russell Warren (1809-'82), a well-known organ-builder of that city. He went to Berlin in 1861, and studied for four years, giving his attention especially to the organ. In 1864 he returned to Montreal, and in the following year he removed to New York, where he still resides. For two years he played the organ at Dr. Henry W. Bellows's church, after which he became organist of Grace church. He then played for some time at Trinity church, after which he returned to his old post at Grace church. He has given several series of organ recitals, in which he covered the whole field of organ music, giving interpretation to all its schools.

WARREN, William, actor, b. in Bath, England, 10 May, 1767; d. in Washington, D. C., 19 Oct., 1832. His first appearance was as Young Norval in Home's tragedy of "Douglas." Soon afterward Warren came to this country, making his début at Baltimore, Md., as Friar Lawrence in "Romeo and Juliet." In 1805 he went to England, as agent for the Philadelphia theatre, to collect a company of comedians, and on his return in 1806 he married the actress, Mrs. Ann Merry (q. v.). Later, Warren became manager of the Chestnut street theatre in Philadelphia, where he made his last appearance on 25 Nov., 1829, as Robert Bramble in the "Poor Gentleman."—His son, William, actor, b. in Philadelphia, 17 Nov., 1812; d. in Boston, 12 Sept., 1888, was educated at the Franklin institute, Philadelphia. He also made his first appearance as Young Norval at the Arch street theatre in that city, 27 Oct., 1832. After continuing for some time in his native place, he appeared in New York, Boston, and other cities, playing in various characters, from broad and eccentric comedy to juvenile tragedy, with general acceptance. In 1845 Warren appeared at the Strand theatre in London, and a year later, for the extraordinary term of thirty-five years, he was permanently connected with the Howard athenæum in Boston. There he was held in special esteem, both as a man and artist, and retired from that theatre and his profession on 7 Nov., 1882, with a complimentary benefit. Toward the last Warren was particularly successful in rendering the rôles of fine old English gentlemen. He was a cousin of Joseph Jefferson, and one of the few recent actors who, in their own persons, represented the early age of the American drama. Sir Peter Teazle in "The School for Scandal," Dr. Pangloss in "The Heir at Law," and Touchstone in "As You Like It," were among his noted characters.

WARREN, William, clergyman, b. in Waterford, Me., 21 Oct., 1806; d. in Gorham, Me., 28 Jan., 1879. He entered Bowdoin, but left without being graduated, passed through the theological course at Andover seminary, where he was graduated in 1839, was ordained as a Congregational minister on 14 Feb., 1840, and was pastor of the church and teacher of a private school at Windham, Me., for nine years. He had charge of a congregation at Upton, Mass., from 1849 till 1856, acted as agent for the American colonization society for a few months, in 1857 was appointed district secretary for northern New England of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions, and retained that office till his death, making Gorham his home. Bowdoin gave him the degree of D. D. in 1870. He published, besides school-books, "Household Consecration and Baptism"; "The Spirit's Sword"; "Twelve Years among Children"; and "These for Those."

WARREN, William Fairfield, educator, b. in Williamsburg, Mass., 13 March, 1833. He was graduated at Wesleyan university in 1853, became a Methodist minister in the New England conference in 1855, and afterward studied theology at Andover, Berlin, and Halle. In 1857 he was a delegate to the world's convention of the Evangelical alliance at Berlin, and he afterward made a tour through the East. In 1861 he was appointed professor of systematic theology in the Methodist Episcopal mission theological institute at Bremen, Germany, which subsequently became the Martin institute at Frankfort, and in 1866 in Boston theological seminary, subsequently a department of Boston university, of which institution he has been president since 1873, and also professor of the comparative history of religions, comparative theology, and philosophy of religion. He was appointed a member of the American committee for the revision of the New Testament, but did not attend its meetings. He received the degree of D. D. from Ohio Wesleyan university in 1862, and that of LL. D. from Wesleyan university, Middletown, Conn., in 1874. He published "Anfangsgründe der Logik" (Bremen, 1864); "Einleitung in die systematische Theologie" (part i., 1865); and "Paradise Found: the Cradle of the Human Race at the North Pole" (Boston, 1885).

WARRINER, Francis, clergyman, b. in Springfield, Mass., 24 Nov., 1805; d. in Chester, Mass., 22 April, 1866. He was graduated at Amherst in 1830, and in 1831-'4 was chaplain and teacher of mathematics and navigation to midshipmen on the frigate "Potomac," which was one of a squadron that was sent to protect American seamen in the Indian archipelago. On his return he studied theology in New Haven and New York, was pastor over the Congregational church in Chester in 1841-'8, and again in 1859-'65, when he resigned on account of failing health. He was the author of "The Cruise of the Potomac" (New York, 1835).

WARRINGTON, Lewis, naval officer, b. in Williamsburg, near Norfolk, Va., 3 Nov., 1782; d. in Washington, D. C., 12 Oct., 1851. He was educated at William and Mary college, and entered the navy as a midshipman, 6 Jan., 1800. He made his first cruise in the frigate "Chesapeake" in the West Indies to suppress piracy, and in 1803 he joined the schooner "Vixen," of Preble's squadron, during the Tripolitan war, where he served with credit, and was included in the vote of thanks by congress to Preble and his officers. He was promoted to acting lieutenant on the station, and transferred to the brig "Siren" in 1805, and to the "Enterprise" in 1806-'7, in which he returned home. He was commissioned a lieutenant, 7 Feb., 1807, and served as executive of the brig "Siren," bearing despatches to France in 1809-'11. He served in the "Essex" and frigate "Congress" in 1811-'13, and as 1st lieutenant of the frigate "United States" from March till July, 1813. He was promoted to master-commandant, 24 July, 1813, had charge of the sloop "Peacock," and captured the British sloop "Epervier" after an engagement of forty-two minutes. For this victory, in which the two vessels were of the same armament, he was promoted to captain, 22 Nov., 1814, and received a gold medal and the thanks of congress. (See illustration.) He commanded the frigate "Macedonian," in the Mediterranean, in 1816-'18, and the frigate "Java," on the same station, in 1818-'19, returning home in the frigate "Guerrière" in 1820. He was commandant of the navy-yard at Norfolk, Va., in 1821-'4, and first commandant of that at Pensacola in 1826. He commanded the West India squadron in 1824-'6, was a member of the board of navy commissioners in 1827-'31, again commandant of the Norfolk navy-yard in 1832-'9, member of the board of commissioners a second time in 1840, and president of the board in 1841. After the new organization of the navy department he was chief of the bureau of yards and docks in 1842 '6, and of the bureau of ordnance in 1847-'51. The town that was built near the Pensacola navy-yard was named Warrington in his honor. Being on the government reservation, it was subject to the naval jurisdiction of the commandant, whose duties included those of a magistrate.

WARROCK, John, printer, b. in Richmond, Va., 4 Nov., 1774; d. there, 8 March, 1858. He received a common-school education, became a printer, and for forty years issued annually "Warrock's Almanac." He was chosen to the office of printer to the Virginia senate, and held that place for more than forty years.

WASHBURN, Edward Abiel, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 16 April, 1819; d. in New York city, 2 Feb., 1881. He was graduated at Harvard in 1838, studied theology in Andover seminary and in New Haven, was licensed as a Congregational minister in 1842, and officiated acceptably in several churches. Having resolved, through the influence of Bishop Clark and others, to enter the ministry of the Episcopal church, he made due preparation and was ordained deacon, in Trinity church, Boston, 12 July, 1844, by Bishop Eastburn, and priest, in Grace church, Boston, 9 Oct., 1845, by the same bishop. He was rector of St. Paul's, Newburyport, Mass., in 1844-'51, travelled in Egypt, Syria, India, and China, in 1851-'3, on returning home was rector of St. John's, Hartford, Conn., 1853-'62, and lectured on ecclesiastical polity in Berkeley divinity-school, Middletown, Conn. He received the degree of D. D. from Trinity in 1860. Dr. Washburn was rector of St. Mark's church, Philadelphia, in 1862-'5, and of Calvary church, New York, in 1866-'81. He was a contributor to theological literature, and an active supporter of the Evangelical alliance in 1871, 1873, and 1879, before which he read papers on "Reason and Faith," and on "Socialism." He was also a member of the New Testament company of revisers, an acknowledged leader among the "broad church" clergy of the Episcopal church, a true lover of scholarship in its highest sense, and an eloquent and effective preacher of the gospel. He published "Relation of the Episcopal Church to the other Christian Bodies" (1874); "The Social Law of God, Sermons on the Ten Commandments" (New York, 6th ed., 1884); and "Voices from a Busy Life," a volume of poems (1883).

WASHBURN, Emory, jurist, b. in Leicester, Mass., 14 Feb., 1800; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 18 March, 1877. His grandfather, Seth Washburn, grandson of John Washburn, who was the first secretary of the Massachusetts Bay company, was born in Bridgewater, Mass., in 1723, and married the granddaughter of Mary Chilton, the first white person that stepped upon Plymouth Rock. He held various town offices in Leicester, and served at different times in each branch of the legislature. He was in the campaign against the Indians in New Hampshire in 1749, and in the battle of Bunker Hill as a captain. His son, Joseph (1755-1807), the father of Emory, was lieutenant in the 15th Massachusetts regiment, was on duty at the capture of Burgoyne at Saratoga, served afterward under Washington in New Jersey, and after the war held, among other offices, that of deputy sheriff of Worcester county till his death. Emory studied for two years at Dartmouth, and was graduated at Williams in 1817, studied law at Harvard, was admitted in 1821 to the bar in Lenox, and practised in his native town till 1828, when he removed to Worcester, where he was eminent in his profession for nearly thirty years, and became the partner of Gov. John Davis. He was in the lower house of the legislature in 1826-'7 and 1838, and made during his first term the first report that suggested the feasibility of a railroad between Boston and Albany. He served in the state senate in 1841-'2, being chairman of the judiciary committee, and from 1844 till 1848 was judge of the court of common pleas. He was elected governor in 1853, and re-elected for the succeeding term, being the last Whig governor in Massachusetts, and in 1856 he was appointed Bussys professor of law in Harvard. Resigning his professorship in 1876, he opened a law-office in Cambridge, and represented that city in the legislature until his death. The illustration is a view of the state-house in Boston, which is on Beacon hill, opposite the common. The degree of LL. D. was conferred upon him by Harvard and Williams in 1854. He was a member of the board of education, took a prominent part in the establishment of the Worcester county free institute of industrial science, was a trustee of Williams college, a member of the International code committee, a fellow of the American antiquarian society, and a member of the Massachusetts historical society, the American academy of arts and sciences, and other learned societies, before which he frequently delivered public addresses on timely topics. Gov. Washburn's writings, many of them on genealogical and historical subjects, exhibit scholarship and research, while his legal works are standard authorities in the law-schools and courts of this country. His most important works are a "Judicial History of Massachusetts, 1630-'75" (Boston, 1840); "History of Leicester" (1860); "Treatise on the American Law of Real Property" (2 vols., 1860-'2; 3d ed., 1868); "Treatise on the American Law of Easements and Servitudes" (Philadelphia, 1863; Boston, 1867); a pamphlet on the "Testimony of Experts" (1866); and "Lectures on the Study and Practice of the Law" (1871). He also contributed an introduction to Rev. Calvin Durfee's "History of Williams College, Williamstown, Mass." (Boston, 1860).

WASHBURN, George, educator, b. in Middleboro', Mass., 1 March, 1833. He was graduated at Amherst in 1855, studied in the following year at Andover theological seminary, was sent by the American board as a missionary to Turkey in 1858, and licensed to preach in Constantinople in 1860. On 29 July, 1863, he was ordained at Middleboro' while on a visit to the United States, but he returned the same year to Turkey and was released from the service of the board in 1868. He was professor of philosophy and political economy and acting president in Robert college, Constantinople, in 1869-76, and since the latter year he has been president. Amherst conferred upon him the degree of D. D. in 1874. He was drawn into intimate relations with the political events that were brought about by the Russo-Turkish war, in which his policy secured him the esteem of several English statesmen. His efforts also in behalf of Bulgarian liberty and for the elevation of the people were recognized by the first Bulgarian parliament in a vote of thanks, and in 1884 he was made a commander of the Order of St. Alexander. He has regularly contributed to English and American periodicals and papers, and in 1868 published in pamphlet-form a series of articles on "Woman's Work in the Church."

WASHBURN, Henry Stevenson, editor, b. in Providence, R. I., in 1813. He was graduated at Brown in 1836, and while president of the Union mutual life insurance company, of Boston, spent three years abroad. Besides holding many other important offices, he represented the city of Boston for two years in the legislature, and served one term in the state senate, where he was chairman of the committee on education. He originated the "Young Reaper," of which he was editor for seven years, and has written many hymns and lyrics that have been widely circulated. He has been active in the various public enterprises of the Baptist denomination.

WASHBURN, Israel, governor of Maine, b. in Livermore, Me., 6 June, 1813; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 12 May, 1883. He was descended from John Washburn, who was secretary of Plymouth colony in England and who came to this country in 1631 and settled in Duxbury, Mass. His grandfather, ISRAEL, served in the Revolutionary war and attained the rank of captain. He was repeatedly elected to the legislature, and was a member from Massachusetts of the convention which ratified the constitution of the United States. In 1806 ISRAEL, son of the foregoing, removed to Maine, where he taught at first, but in 1808 settled at White's Landing (now Richmond), on Kennebec river, where he engaged in ship-building. He established a trading-post at Livermore, Me., in 1809, at what is now called The Norlands, and soon afterward settled there. Israel, the subject of this sketch, was educated at public schools and by private tutors, and was admitted to the bar in October, 1834. Settling in Orono, Me., he soon acquired a large practice, and in 1842-'3 was a member of the legislature. In 1850 he was sent to congress, serving as a Whig from 1 Dec., 1851, to 1 Jan., 1861, when he resigned, having been chosen governor of Maine. Declining a re-election, he was appointed in 1863 by President Lincoln collector of customs at Portland, Me., which office he held until 1877. He was president of the board of trustees of Tufts college, and was elected to the presidency of that institution in 1875, but declined. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Tufts college in 1872. Gov. Washburn was a member of historical and genealogical societies, and, in addition to many of his addresses and speeches, which have had a wide circulation, published "Notes, Historical, Descriptive, and Personal, of Livermore, Me." (1874).—Israel's brother, Elihu Benjamin, statesman, b. in Livermore, Me., 23 Sept., 1816; d. in Chicago, Ill., 22 Oct., 1887, wrote his family name with a final "e." He was educated at public schools, and, after working on his father's farm, entered the office of the "Christian Intelligencer" in Gardiner in 1833 as a printer's apprentice. The paper was discontinued a year later, and he was chosen to teach in the district school. In May, 1835, he entered the office of the "Kennebec Journal," at Augusta, where he continued for a year, during which time he rose gradually until he became an assistant of the editor, and acquired his first knowledge of political life during the sessions of the state legislature. He then decided to study law, and entered Kent's Hill seminary in 1836. After a year in that institution he began his professional studies in the office of John Otis in Hallowell, who, impressed by his diligence and ambition, aided him financially and took him into his own home to board. In March, 1839, he entered the law-school at Harvard, where among his classmates were Richard H. Dana, Charles Devens, and William M. Evarts. He was admitted to the bar in 1840, and at once determined to establish himself in the west. Settling in Galena, Ill., he there entered into law-partnership with Charles S. Hempstead, and, being a strong Whig, made speeches in behalf of that party, which had nominated William H. Harrison for the presidency. In 1844 he was a delegate to the Whig national convention in Baltimore that selected Henry Clay as its candidate, and on his return he visited that statesman in Washington. Meanwhile his business increased, and he was frequently called upon to practise in the supreme court of the state. In 1848 he was nominated for congress in the Galena district, but was defeated by Col. Edward D. Baker. In 1852, as a delegate to the National Whig convention, he advocated the nomination of Gen. Winfield Scott, and in the same year he was elected to congress, serving thereafter from 5 Dec., 1853, till 6 March, 1869. He soon gained an excellent reputation, and, on the election of Nathaniel P. Banks as speaker in 1855, was given the chairmanship of the committee on commerce, which he held for ten years. He was selected by the house to accompany William H. Seward, representing the senate, to receive Abraham Lincoln when he arrived in Washington after his election. From the length of his continuous service he became recognized as the "Father of the House," and in that capacity administered the oath as speaker to Schuyler Colfax three times, and to James G. Blaine once. From his continual habit of closely scrutinizing all demands that were made upon the treasury and persistently demanding that the finances of the government should be administered with the strictest economy, he acquired the name of the "Watch-dog of the Treasury." He was a steadfast friend of Ulysses S. Grant during the civil war, and every promotion that the latter received was given either solely or in part upon the recommendation of Mr. Washburne. Subsequently he originated the bills that made Gen. Grant lieutenant-general and general. Mr. Washburne was a member of the joint committee on reconstruction and chairman of the committee of the whole house in the matter of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson. He opposed all grants of the public lands and all subsidies to railroad companies, and resisted with all his power what he called "the greatest legislative crime in history"—the bill that subordinated the first mortgage of the government on the Pacific railroad to the mortgage of the railroad companies. He also opposed "logrolling" river and harbor bills, all extravagant appropriations for public buildings, all subsidies for steamship lines, and all undue renewals of patents. Among the important bills that he introduced was the one that provided for the establishment of national cemeteries. At the beginning of his administration President Grant appointed Mr. Washburne secretary of state, which office he resigned soon afterward to become minister to France. This place he held during the Franco-Prussian war, and on the withdrawal of the German ambassador, the latter was ordered by Count Bismarck to turn over his archives to the American legation. At the request of Bismarck, and with the permission of the French minister of foreign affairs, he exercised his official influence with remarkable tact and skill for the protection of the Germans in Paris and acted as the representative of the various German states and other foreign governments. When the empire was overthrown, Mr. Washburne was the first foreign representative to recognize the new republic. He remained in Paris during the siege, and was at his post when the Commune ruled the city. He visited the venerable archbishop Darboy of Paris when he was hurried to prison, and succeeded in having the prelate removed to more comfortable quarters, but failed to prevent his murder. He retained the respect and good-will of the French during all the changes of government, and the emperor of Germany recognized his services by conferring upon him the Order of the Red Eagle. This he declined, owing to the provision of the U. S. constitution that prevented its acceptance, but on his resignation in 1877 the emperor sent him his life-size portrait, and he was similarly honored by Bismarck, Thiers, and Gambetta. On his return to this country he settled in Chicago, and in 1880 his name was brought forward as a candidate for the presidency, but he refused to have it presented to the convention. He was president of the Chicago historical society from November, 1884, till his death, and was frequently invited to lecture on his foreign experiences. He wrote a series of articles on that subject for "Scribner's Magazine," which were expanded into "Recollections of a Minister to France, 1869-1877" (2 vols., New York, 1887). His collection of pictures, documents, and autographs he desired to be given to the city of Chicago, provided they should be exhibited free to the general public. Efforts are being made to secure the erection of a suitable building in Lincoln park for their exhibition. Mr. Washburne edited "History of the English Settlement in Edwards County, Illinois" (Chicago, 1882); and "The Edwards Papers" (1884).—Another brother, Cadwallader Colden, lawyer, b. in Livermore, Me., 22 April, 1818; d. in Eureka Springs, Ark., 14 May, 1882, worked on his father's farm in summer and attended the town school in winter until about 1835, when he went to Hallowell and was employed in a store. He also served in the post-office, and during the winter of 1838-9 taught in Wiscasset. In the spring of 1839 he set out for the west and settled at Davenport, Iowa, where he joined the geological survey of that state under David Dale Owen. Toward the close of the year he entered the law-office of Joseph B. Wells, having previously studied under his uncle, Reuel Washburn, in Livermore, Me., and was admitted to the bar on 29 March, 1842. In 1840 he was elected surveyor of the county of Rock Island, Ill., the duties of which he performed while preparing for his profession. He removed to Mineral Point, Wis., in 1842, and in 1844 entered into partnership with Cyrus Woodman, agent of the New England land company, but their law-practice gradually diminished as they paid greater attention to financial matters. They dealt largely in the entry of public lands for settlers and the location of Mexican land-warrants. In 1852 the firm established the Mineral Point bank, which never suspended specie payments and during its existence had a high reputation. On the repeal of the Missouri compromise, Washburn was chosen as a Whig to congress, and served with re-elections from 3 Dec., 1855, till 3 March, 1861. He then declined a renomination, but was sent as a delegate from Wisconsin to the Peace congress that was held in Philadelphia in 1861. At the beginning of the civil war he raised the 2d Wisconsin cavalry, and was commissioned its colonel, 10 Oct., 1861. His first service was under Gen. Samuel R. Curtis in Arkansas. Among his acts at this period were the dislodging of a Confederate force that was preparing to obstruct the progress of the National army at the crossing of the Tallahatchie, and the opening of the Yazoo pass; and he was conspicuous in the battle of Grand Coteau, where he saved the 4th division, under Gen. Stephen G. Burbridge, from annihilation by an overwhelming force of the enemy. He was commissioned brigadier on 16 July, 1862, and on 29 Nov., 1862, major-general of volunteers. He took part in the siege of Vicksburg, and on its surrender was given command of the 13th corps and sent to the Department of the Gulf. On 29 Nov., 1863, he landed on the coast of Texas with 2,800 men and compelled the evacuation of Fort Esperanza, a bomb-proof work, which was cased with railroad iron, surrounded by a deep moat filled with water, manned by 1,000 men, and mounted ten guns. This fort was at Pass Cavallo, and guarded the entrance to Matagorda bay. In April, 1864, he was ordered to relieve Gen. Stephen A. Hurlburt, in command at Memphis, of the district of west Tennessee. This post he held almost continuously until his resignation on 25 May, 1865. Gen. Washburn was sent as a Republican from the 6th district of Wisconsin to congress, and served with re-election from 4 March, 1867, till 3 March, 1871. In the autumn of 1871 he was elected governor of Wisconsin, and he held that office for two years, beginning 1

Jan., 1872. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the office in 1873, and afterward for the U. S. senate. On retiring from office, he directed his attention to the care of his property. The timber lands that he had purchased soon after he settled in the state had become very valuable, and he operated extensively in lumber. In 1876 he erected an immense flouring-mill in Minneapolis, where first in this country was introduced the "patent process" and the Hungarian system. It was destroyed by an explosion in 1878, but he at once replaced it with one more capacious. He was also one of the largest owners of the water-power at St. Anthony Falls, and a heavy stock-holder in the Minneapolis and St. Louis railroad. Gen. Washburn was actively interested in the Wisconsin historical society, and was its president for several years. He founded, in connection with the State university of Wisconsin, the Washburn observatory, which, with its instruments, cost more than $50,000. The legislature of the state made him a life regent of the university, which in 1873 conferred upon him the degree of LL. D. His country-house of Edgewood, near Madison, worth $20,000, he presented to the Dominican Sisters for use as a school for girls. In his will he bequeathed $50,000 to found a public library at La Crosse, and $375,000 for the establishment of an orphans' home in Minneapolis. —Another brother, Charles Ames, editor, b. in Livermore, Me., 16 March, 1822, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1848, and after studying law was admitted to practice in Mineral Point, Wis. In 1850 he went to California and connected himself with the press, settling in San Francisco in 1853, where he became editor and then proprietor of the "Alta California." Mr. Washburn took an active part in the foundation of the Republican party, and his journal was the first on the Pacific coast to advocate the distinctive principles of that organization. From 1858 till 1860 he edited and owned the San Francisco "Daily Times." In 1860 he was an elector-at-large from California, and in 1861 he was appointed by President Lincoln commissioner to Paraguay, where he was afterward minister-resident from 1863 till 1868. His term of office included the period of the war between Paraguay and Brazil, and in 1868, when the foreign residents were accused of conspiring against President Francisco S. Lopez, Mr. Washburn escaped through the opportune arrival of the U. S. war-steamer "Wasp," while two of his subordinates, unable to escape, were seized and tortured. (See LOPEZ.) His action in trying to save the lives of those that were supposed to be connected with the conspiracy brought him into collision with officers of the U. S. navy, but a congressional committee exonerated him. On his return to this country he settled at first in Oakland, Cal., but ultimately made Morristown, N. J., his home. He has devoted his attention to the invention of several ingenious machines, notably the typograph, a form of type-writer. In addition to various contributions to periodicals, he has published two works of fiction, "Philip Thaxter" (New York, 1861) and "Gomery of Montgomery" (1865); a "History of Paraguay" (2 vols., Boston, 1870); "Political Evolution" (Philadelphia, 1887), and "From Poverty to Competence" (1887). —Another brother, William Drew, b. in Livermore, Me., 14 Jan., 1831, was graduated at Bowdoin in 1854, admitted to the bar in 1857, and began practice in Minnesota. In 1861-'5 he was surveyor-general of that state. Subsequently he settled in Minneapolis and engaged in manufacturing. He became president of the Minneapolis and St. Louis railroad, and in 1878 was elected to congress, served for three terms, and in 1889 became U. S. senator.

WASHBURN, Peter Thacher, lawyer, b. in Lynn, Mass., 7 Sept., 1814; d. in Woodstock, Vt., 7 Feb., 1870. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1835, studied law at Harvard, was admitted to the bar in 1838, and practised in Ludlow, Vt., till 1844. Removing then to Woodstock, he was reporter of the state supreme court for eight years, and for several terms a member of the legislature, serving as chairman of the judiciary committee. In 1861 he was a member of the Chicago convention, and was the first to give the vote of his state to Lincoln. He was adjutant- and inspector-general of the state in 1861-'6, and his records show only 75 men unaccounted for out of more than 34,000. He served in the field as a lieutenant, and afterward as acting colonel of the 1st Vermont volunteers, which, with the Massachusetts troops, he commanded at the battle of Big Bethel. In 1869 he was elected governor by the Republicans, and died in office. He was trustee of the University of Vermont, and president of the Woodstock railroad. He was the author of "Digest of all Cases in the Supreme Court of Vermont, including the First Fifteen Volumes of Vermont Reports" (Woodstock, 1845); supplement to "Aiken's Forms" (Claremont, N. H., 1847); "Digest of Cases in the Supreme Court of Vermont," vols. xvi.-xxii. (1852); and "Reports of the Supreme Court of Vermont," vols. xvi.-xxiii. (1845-'52).

WASHBURN, William Barrett, senator, b. in Winchendon, Mass., 31 Jan., 1820; d. in Springfield, Mass., 5 Oct., 1887. He was graduated at Yale in 1844, and became a manufacturer at Greenfield, Mass., where he was for many years president of the National bank, and which he represented in both branches of the legislature in 1850-'4. He was identified with the Republican party from its organization in 1856, and at the beginning of the civil war contributed liberally to the National cause. In 1862 he was sent to congress as a Republican, and he was returned biennially till on 1 Jan., 1872, he resigned his seat to become governor of Massachusetts. This office he resigned also during his third term to fill the vacancy that was made in the U. S. senate by the death of Charles Sumner, serving from 1 May, 1874, till 3 March, 1875, when he withdrew from public affairs. Besides holding many offices of trust under corporate societies, he was a trustee of Yale, of the Massachusetts agricultural college, and of Smith college, of which he was also a benefactor, and a member of the board of overseers of Amherst from 1864 till 1877. Harvard conferred the degree of LL. D. upon him in 1872. By his will he made the American board, the American home missionary society, and the American missionary association residuary legatees, leaving to each society about $50,000. He was also a great benefactor of the Greenfield public library. He died suddenly while attending a session of the American board of commissioners for foreign missions, of which he was a member.

WASHINGTON, Booker Taliaferro, educator, b. in Hale's Ford, Franklin co., Va., 18 April, 1856. He is of African descent, and early removed to West Virginia. He was graduated at Hampton institute in 1875, and in the same year entered Wayland seminary, whence he was called to fill the chair of a teacher at Hampton. There he was elected by the Alabama state authorities to the presidency of Tuskegee institute, which he organized in 1881. Under his management it has grown from an institution with one teacher and thirty students to one with twenty teachers and 300 students. The property consists of 540 acres, a blacksmith's shop, saw-mill, carpenter's shop, brick-yard, printing-office, and several large school-buildings, one of which, shown in the vignette, was built by the students. It is valued at $68,000, and is out of debt.

WASHINGTON, George, first president of the United States, b. at Pope's Creek, near Bridge's Creek, Westmoreland co., Va., 22 Feb., 1732; d. at Mount Vernon, 14 Dec., 1799.

Mary Washington

came over to Virginia, with his brother Andrew, in 1657. Purchasing lands in Westmoreland county and establishing his residence at Pope's Creek, not far from the Potomac, he became, in due course, an extensive planter, a county magistrate, and a member of the house of burgesses. He distinguished himself, also, as colonel of the Virginia forces in driving off a band of Seneca Indians who were ravaging the neighboring settlements. In honor of his public and private character, the parish in which he resided was called Washington. In this parish his grandson, Augustine, the second son of Lawrence Washington, was born in 1694. By his first wife Augustine had four children. Two of them died young, but two sons, Lawrence and Augustine, survived their mother, who died in 1728. On 6 March, 1730, the father was again married. His second wife was Mary Ball, and George was her first child. If tradition is to be trusted, few sons ever had a more lovely and devoted mother, and no mother a more dutiful and affectionate son. Bereaved of her husband, who died after a short illness in 1743, when George was but eleven years of age, and with four younger children to be cared for, she discharged the responsibilities thus sadly devolved upon her with scrupulous fidelity and firmness. To her we owe the precepts and example that governed George's life. The excellent maxims, moral and religious, which she found in her favorite manual—"Sir Matthew Hale's Contemplations"—were impressed on his memory and on his heart, as she read them aloud to her children; and that little volume, with the autograph inscription of Mary Washington, was among the cherished treasures of his library as long as he lived. To her, too, under God, we owe especially the restraining influence and authority, that held him back, at the last moment, as we shall see, from embarking on a line of life that would have cut him off from the great career that has rendered his name immortal. Well did Dr. Sparks, in his careful and excellent biography, speak of "the debt owed by mankind to the mother of Washington." Unhappily no authentic portrait of her is extant, though a pleasing conjectural picture, not without some weight of testimony, has been adopted by Mr. Loss-ing in his "Mary and Martha." (See vignette.) She delighted in saying simply that "George had always been a good son"; and her own life was fortunately prolonged until she had seen him more than fulfil every hope of her heart. On his way to his first inauguration as president of the United States Washington came to bid his mother a last farewell, just before her death. That parting scene, however, was not at his birthplace. The primitive Virginia farm-house in which he was born had long ceased to be the family residence, and had gradually fallen into ruin. The remains of a large kitchen-chimney were all that could be identified of it in 1878, by a party of which Sec. Evarts, Gen. Sherman, and Charles C. Perkins, of Boston, were three, who visited the spot with a view to the erection of a memorial under the authority of congress. Not long after the birth that has rendered this spot forever memorable, Augustine Washington removed to an estate in Stafford county, on the east side of the Rappahannock, opposite Fredericksburg, and resided there with his family during the remaining years of his life. That was the scene of George's early childhood. There he first went to school, in an "old-field" school-house, with Hobby, the sexton of the parish, for his first master. After his father's death, however, he was sent back to the old homestead at Pope's Creek, to live for a while with his elder half-brother, Augustine, to whom the Westmoreland estate had been left, and who, on his marriage, had taken it for his residence. There George had the advantage of at least a better school than Hobby's, kept by a Mr. Williams. But it taught him nothing except reading, writing, and arithmetic, with a little geometry and surveying. For this last study he evinced a marked preference. Many of his copy-books of that period have been preserved, and they show no inconsiderable proficiency in the surveyor's art, even before he finally left school, toward the close of his sixteenth year. One of those manuscript books, however, is of a miscellaneous and peculiarly interesting character, containing carefully prepared forms for business papers; a few selections or, it may be, original compositions in rhyme; and a series of "Rules of Behavior in Company and Conversation," fifty-seven in all, compiled or copied, doubtless, from some still untraced original, embracing many moral and religious maxims, of which the last and most noteworthy one must never be omitted from the story of Washington's boyhood: "Labor to keep alive in your breast that little spark of celestial fire, Conscience." All these school-boy manuscripts bear witness alike to his extreme care in cultivating a neat, clear, and elegant handwriting, and his name is sometimes written almost as if in contemplation of the great instruments and state papers to which it was destined to be the attesting signature.

Meantime he was training himself for vigorous manhood by all sorts of robust exercises and athletic sports. He played soldier, sometimes, with his school-mates, always asserting the authority of captain, and subjecting the little company to a rigid discipline. Running, leaping, and wrestling were among his favorite pastimes. He became a fearless rider, too, and no horse is said to have been too fiery for him. "Above all," as Irving well says, "his inherent probity, and the principles of justice on which he regulated his conduct, even at this early period of his life, were soon appreciated by his school-mates; he was referred to as an umpire in their disputes, and his decisions were never reversed." A crisis in Washington's life occurred before he left school. His eldest half-brother, Lawrence, had already been an officer in the English service, and was at the siege of Carthagenia under Admiral Vernon, for whom he formed a great regard, and whose name he afterward gave to his estate on the Potomac.

Observing George's military propensities, and thinking that the English navy would afford him the most promising field for future distinction, Lawrence obtained a midshipman's warrant for him in 1746, when he was just fourteen years old, and George is said to have been on the point of embarking on this English naval service. The earnest remonstrance of his mother was interposed, and the project reluctantly abandoned. He thereupon resumed his studies, and did not leave school till the autumn before his sixteenth year. Soon afterward he went to reside with his brother Lawrence, who had married a Fairfax of Belvoir, and had established himself at Mount Vernon.

Washington's education was now finished, so far as schools and school-masters were concerned, and he never enjoyed or sought the advantages of a college. Indeed, only a month after he was sixteen he entered on the active career of a surveyor of lands, in the employment of William Fairfax, the father of his brother's wife, and the manager of the great estate of his cousin, Lord Fairfax. In this work he voluntarily subjected himself to every variety of hardship and personal danger. Those Alleghany valleys and hills were then a wilderness, where difficult obstructions were to be overcome, severe exposures to be endured, and savage tribes to be conciliated or encountered. For three successive years he persevered undauntedly in this occupation, having obtained a commission from the president and master of William and Mary college as a public surveyor for Culpeper county, which entitled his surveys to a place in the county office, where they were held in high esteem for completeness and accuracy. During these three years he allowed himself but little relaxation, yet found time in the winter months for an occasional visit to his mother, and for aiding her in the management of her affairs.

And now, at nineteen years of age, he received an appointment as adjutant-general, with the rank of major, to inspect and exercise the militia in one of the districts into which Virginia was divided in view of the French encroachments and the Indian depredations with which the frontiers were menaced. Before he had fairly entered on this service, however, he was called to accompany his brother Lawrence to the West Indies, on a voyage for his brother's health, and was absent from home for more than four months, during which he had a severe attack of small-pox. His brother remained longer, and returned at last only to die, leaving George as one of his executors, and involving him in large responsibilities as well as in much personal affliction. Meantime his appointment as adjutant-general was renewed by Gov. Dinwiddie, and he was assigned to the charge of one of the grand military divisions of the colony. A wider field of service was thus opened to Washington, on which he entered with alacrity. War between France and England was now rapidly approaching, involving a conflict for the possession of a large part of the American continent. French posts were already established on the banks of the Ohio, with a view of confining the English colonies within the Alleghany mountains. Gov. Dinwiddie, under instructions from the British ministry, resolved upon sending a commissioner to the officer commanding the French forces to inquire by what authority he was invading the king's dominions, and to ascertain, if possible, his further designs. Washington was selected for this delicate and dangerous mission, after several others had declined to undertake it. He accepted it at once, and toward the end of November, 1753, he set out from Williamsburg, without any military escort, on a journey of nearly 600 miles—a great part of it over "lofty and rugged mountains and through the heart of a wilderness." The perilous incidents of this expedition cannot be recounted here. They would occupy a whole article by themselves. His marvellous and providential escapes, at one time from the violence of the savages, at another from assassination by a treacherous guide, at a third from being drowned in crossing the Alleghany river on a raft, have been described in all the accounts of his early manhood, substantially from his own journal, published in London at the time. He reached Williamsburg on his return on 16 Jan., 1754, and delivered to Gov. Dinwiddie the reply of the French commander to his message of inquiry. No more signal test could have been afforded of Washington's various talents and characteristics, which this expedition served at once to display and to develop. "From that moment," says Irving, "he was the rising hope of Virginia."

He was then but just finishing his twenty-first year, and immediately after his return he was appointed to the chief command of a little body of troops raised for meeting immediate exigencies; but the military establishment was increased as soon as the governor could convene the legislature of Virginia, and Washington was appointed lieutenant-colonel of a regiment, with Joshua Fry, an accomplished Oxford scholar, as his colonel. Upon Washington at once devolved the duty of going forward with such companies as were enlisted, and the sudden death of Col. Fry soon left him in full command of the expedition. The much-misrepresented skirmish with the French troops, resulting in the death of Jumonville, was followed, on 3 July, 1754, by the battle of the Great Meadows, where Washington held his ground, in Fort Necessity, from eleven in the morning to eight at night, against a great superiority of numbers, until the French requested a parley. A capitulation ensued, in every way honorable to Washington as it was translated and read to him, but which proved, when printed, to contain terms in the French language which he never would have signed or admitted had they not been suppressed or softened by the interpreter. (See note at end of chapter xii., vol. i., of Irving's "Life of Washington.") The course now adopted by Gov. Dinwiddie in the reorganization of the Virginia troops, against which Washington remonstrated, and which would have reduced him to an inferior grade, led at once to his resignation, and, after a brief visit to his mother, he retired to Mount Vernon. He was soon solicited by Gov. Sharpe, of Maryland, then the commander-in-chief of the English forces, to resume his station, but under circumstances and upon conditions incompatible with his self-respect. In declining the invitation he used this memorable language: "I shall have the consolation of knowing that I have opened the way, when the smallness of our numbers exposed us to the attacks of a superior enemy; and that I have had the thanks of my country for the services I have rendered." But now Gen. Braddock was sent over from England with two regiments of regulars, and Washington did not hesitate to accept an appointment on his staff as a volunteer aide-de-camp. The prudent counsels that he gave Braddock before he set out on his ill-fated expedition, and often repeated along the road, were not followed; but Washington, notwithstanding a violent attack of fever, was with him on the bloody field of the Monongahela, behaving, as his fellow aide-de-camp, Col. Orme, testified, "with the greatest courage and resolution," witnessing at last Braddock's defeat and death, and being the only mounted officer not killed or disabled. "By the all-powerful dispensations of Providence," wrote he to his brother, "I have been protected beyond all human probability or expectation; for I had four bullets through my coat, and two horses shot under me, yet I escaped unhurt, although death was levelling my companions on every side." It fell to him by a striking coincidence—the chaplain being wounded—to read the funeral service at the burial of Braddock at the Great Meadows, the scene of his own capitulation the year before. In a sermon to one of the companies organized under the impulse of Braddock's defeat, and in view of the impending dangers of the country, the Rev. Samuel Davies, an eloquent and accomplished preacher, who, in 1759, succeeded Jonathan Edwards as president of Princeton college, after praising the zeal and courage of the Virginia troops, added these prophetic words: "As a remarkable instance of this, I may point out to the public that heroic youth, Col.

February, 1756, to make a hurried visit to Gov. Shirley in Boston, where he settled successfully with him, then the commander-in-chief of the English forces on this continent, a vexatious question of precedence between the provincial officers and those appointed by the crown. On his return he devoted himself to measures for the security of the frontier. In the course of the following year he was again the subject of a violent fever, which prostrated him for several months. "My constitution," he wrote to a friend, "is much impaired, and nothing can retrieve it but the greatest care and the most circumspect course of life." Under these circumstances he seriously contemplated again resigning his command and retiring from all further public business. But his favorite measure, the reduction of Fort Duquesne, was at length to be undertaken, and, after much disappointment and delay, Washington, on 25 Nov., 1758, was privileged to "march in and plant the British flag on the yet smoking ruins" of that fort—henceforth to be known as Fort Pitt, in honor of the great minister of England, afterward Lord Chatham.

Meantime Washington had chanced to meet on his way to Williamsburg, at the house of a hospitable Virginian with whom he dined, a charming widow, who at once won his heart. Most happily he soon succeeded in winning hers also, and on 6 Jan., 1759, she became his wife. Martha Custis, daughter of John Dandridge and widow of John Parke Custis, was henceforth to be known in history as Martha Washington. He had now finally resigned his commission as a colonial officer, and was preparing to enjoy something of the retirement of private life. But while he was still absent on his last campaign he had been chosen a delegate to the Virginia house of burgesses, and he had hardly established himself at Mount Vernon, a few months after his marriage, when he was summoned to attend a session of that body at Williamsburg. He was not allowed, however, to enter unobserved on his civil career. No sooner did he make his appearance than the speaker, agreeably to a previous vote of the house, presented their thanks to him, in the name of the colony, for the distinguished military service he had rendered to his country, accompanying the vote of thanks with expressions of compliment and praise which greatly embarrassed him. He attempted to make his acknowledgments, but stammered and trembled and "could not give distinct utterance to a single syllable." "Sit down, Mr. Washington," said the speaker, with infinite address; "your modesty equals your valor, and that surpasses the power of any language I possess."

Fourteen or fifteen years more elapsed before the great struggle for American independence began, and during all this time he continued to be a member of the house of burgesses. He was punctual in his attendance at all their sessions, which were commonly at least two in a year, and took an earnest interest in all that was said and done, but "it is not known," says Sparks, "that he ever made a set speech or entered into a stormy debate." He had a passion for agricultural pursuits. He delighted in his quiet rural life at Mount Vernon with his wife and her children—he had none of his own—finding abundant occupation in the management of his farms, and abundant enjoyment in hunting and fishing with the genial friends and relatives in his neighborhood. He was vestryman of two parishes, regular in his attendance at one or the other of the parochial churches, at Alexandria or at Pohick, and both he and his wife were communicants. Meantime he

Washington, whom I cannot but hope Providence has hitherto preserved in so signal a manner for some important service to his country."

A force of 2,000 men having now been ordered to be raised by the Virginia assembly, Washington was appointed to the chief command, and established his headquarters at Winchester. He broke away from the perplexing cares of this place in was always at the service of his friends or the community for any aid or counsel that he could render them. He was often called on to be an arbitrator, and his judgment and impartiality were never questioned. As a commissioner for settling the military accounts of the colony, after the treaty of peace of 1763, he spared himself no labor in the execution of a most arduous and complicated task. In a word, he was a good citizen, an exemplary Christian, a devoted father, a kind master to the slaves who had come to him by inheritance or marriage, and was respected and beloved by all.

At length, at forty-three years of age, he was called upon to begin a career that closed only with his life, during which he held the highest and most responsible positions in war and in peace, and rendered inestimable services to his country and to mankind. To follow that career in detail would require nothing less than a history of the United States for the next five-and-twenty years. Washington was naturally of a cautious and conservative cast, and by no means disposed for a rupture with the mother country, if it could be avoided without the sacrifice of rights and principles. But as the various stages of British aggression succeeded each other, beginning with the stamp-act, the repeal of which he hailed with delight, and followed by the tea tax and the Boston port bill, he became keenly alive to the danger of submission, and was ready to unite in measures of remonstrance, opposition, and ultimately of resistance. When he heard at Williamsburg, in August, 1773, of the sufferings resulting from the port bill, he is said to have exclaimed, impulsively: "I will raise a thousand men, subsist them at my own expense, and march with them, at their head, for the relief of Boston." He little dreamed at that moment that within two years he was destined to be hailed as the deliverer of Boston from British occupation. He accepted an election as a delegate to the 1st Continental congress in 1774, and went to the meeting at Philadelphia in September of that year, in company with Patrick Henry and Edmund Pendleton, who called for him at Mount Vernon on horseback. That congress sat in Carpenter's Hall with closed doors, but the great papers that it prepared and issued form a proud part of American history. Those were the papers and that the congress of which Chatham in the house of lords, in his memorable speech on the removal of troops from Boston, 20 Jan., 1775, said: "When your lordships look at the papers transmitted to us from America, when you consider their decency, firmness, and wisdom, you cannot but respect their cause, and wish to make it your own. For myself, I must declare and avow that in all my reading and observation—and it has been my favorite study—I have read Thucydides, and have studied and admired the master states of the world—that for solidity of reasoning, force of sagacity, and wisdom of conclusion, under such a complication of difficult circumstances, no nation or body of men can stand in preference to the general congress at Philadelphia." The precise part taken by

Washington within the closed doors of Carpenter's Hall is nowhere recorded, but the testimony of one of its most distinguished members cannot be forgotten. When Patrick Henry returned home from the meeting, and was asked whom he considered the greatest man in that congress, he replied: "If you speak of eloquence, Mr. Rutledge, of South Carolina, is by far the greatest orator; but if you speak of solid information and sound judgment, Col. Washington is unquestionably the greatest man on that floor." It is an interesting tradition that, during the prayers with which Dr. Duché opened that meeting at Carpenter's Hall on 5 Sept., 1774, while most of the other members were standing, Washington was kneeling.

He was again a delegate to the Continental congress (the 2d) that assembled at Philadelphia on 10 May, 1775, by which, on the 15th of June, on the motion of Thomas Johnson, a delegate of Maryland, at the earnest instigation of John Adams, of Massachusetts, he was unanimously elected commander-in-chief of all the Continental forces raised, or to be raised, for the defence of American liberty. On the next morning he accepted the appointment and expressed his deep and grateful sense of the high honor conferred upon him, "but," added he, "lest some unlucky event should happen, unfavorable to my reputation, I beg it may be remembered by every gentleman in the room that I this day declare, with the utmost sincerity, that I do not think myself equal to the command I am honored with." "As to pay," he continued, "I beg leave to assure the congress that, as no pecuniary consideration could have tempted me to accept this arduous employment, at the expense of my domestic ease and happiness, I do not wish to make any profit of it. I will keep an exact account of my expenses. Those I doubt not they will discharge, and that is all I desire." "You may believe me," he wrote to his wife at once, "when I assure you, in the most solemn manner, that so far from seeking this appointment, I have used every endeavor in my power to avoid it, not only from my unwillingness to part with you and the family, but from a consciousness of its being a trust too great for my capacity." Washington's commission was agreed to by congress on 17 June, and on the 21st he set out from Philadelphia on horseback to take command of the American army encamped around Boston, of which place the British forces were in possession. The tidings of the battle of Bunker Hill reached him at New York on the 25th, and the next day he was in the saddle again on his way to Cambridge. He arrived there on 2 July, and established his headquarters in the old Vassall (afterward Craigie) mansion, which has recently been known as the residence of the poet Longfellow. On 3 July he took formal command of the army, drawing his sword under an ancient elm, which has of late years been suitably inscribed. The American army numbered about 17,000 men, but only 14,500 were fit for duty. Coming hastily from different colonies, they were without supplies of tents or clothing, and there was not ammunition enough for nine cartridges to a man. Washington's work in combining and organizing this mass of raw troops was most embarrassing and arduous. But he persevered untiringly, and, after a siege of eight months, succeeded in driving the British from Boston on 17 March, 1775. For this grand exploit congress awarded him a splendid gold medal, which bore an admirable likeness of him on one side, and on the other side the inscription "Hostibus primo fugatis Bostonium recuperatum." Copies of this medal in silver and bronze have been multiplied, but the original gold medal has found a fit place, within a few years past, in the Boston public library.

The way was now opened, and the scene of the war was soon transferred to other parts of the country. The day after the evacuation of Boston, five regiments, with a battalion of riflemen and two companies of artillery, were sent to New York. But, as the British fleet was still in Nantasket road, Washington did not venture to move more of his army, or to go away himself, until the risk of a return was over. On 13 April he reached New York, and was soon summoned to Philadelphia for a conference with Congress. On his return to New York, while he was anxiously awaiting an attack by the British forces, the Declaration of Independence, signed on 4 July, was transmitted to him. The regiments were forthwith paraded, and the Declaration was read at the head of the army. "The general hopes," said he in the orders of the day, "that this important event will serve as a fresh incentive to every officer and soldier to act with fidelity and courage, as knowing that now the peace and safety of his country depend, under God, solely on the success of our arms." He hailed the Declaration with delight, and had written to his brother, from Philadelphia, that he was rejoiced at "the noble act" of the Virginia convention, recommending that such a declaration should be adopted. But his little army, according to the returns of 5 Aug. following, hardly numbered more than 20,000 men, of whom six or seven thousand were sick or on furlough or otherwise absent, while the British forces were at least 24,000, supported by a large and thoroughly equipped fleet. The battle of Long Island soon followed, with disastrous results to the Americans, and the British took possession of New York. Other reverses were not long delayed, and the strategy of Washington found its exhibition only in his skillful retreat from Long Island and through the Jerseys. But he was not disheartened, nor his confidence in ultimate success impaired. When asked what was to be done if Philadelphia were taken, he replied: "We will retreat beyond the Susquehanna, and thence, if necessary, to the Alleghany mountains." His masterly movements on the Delaware were now witnessed, which Frederick the Great is said to have declared "the most brilliant achievements recorded in military annals." "Many years later," Mr. Lossing informs us in his interesting volume on Mount Vernon and its associations, "the great Frederick sent him a portrait of himself, accompanied by the remarkable words: 'From the oldest general in Europe to the greatest general in the world!'" Meantime he had a vast work to accomplish with entirely inadequate means. But he went along with heroic fortitude, unswerving constancy, and unsparing self-devotion, through all the trials and sufferings of Monmouth and Brandywine and Germantown and Valley Forge, until the grand consummation was at last reached at Yorktown, on 19 Oct., 1781. There, with the aid of our generous and gallant allies, he achieved the crowning victory of independence on the soil of his beloved Virginia.

The details of this protracted contest must be left to history, as well as the infamous cabal for impeaching his ability and depriving him of his command (see CONWAY, THOMAS), and the still more infamous treason of Arnold, in September, 1780 (see ARNOLD, BENEDICT). Standing on the field of Yorktown, to receive the surrender of Lord Cornwallis and the British army, Washington was at length rewarded for all the labors and sacrifices and disappointments he had so bravely endured since his first great victory in expelling the British from Boston nearly seven years before. Massachusetts and Virginia were thus the scenes of his proudest successes, as they had been foremost in bringing to a test the great issue of American independence and American liberty. The glorious consummation was at last accomplished. But two years more were to elapse before the treaty of peace was signed and the war with England ended; and during that period Washington was to give most signal illustration of his disinterested patriotism and of his political wisdom and foresight.

Discontents had for some time been manifested by officers and soldiers alike, owing to arrearages of pay, and they were naturally increased by the apprehension that the army would now be disbanded without proper provision being made by Congress for meeting the just claims of the troops. Not a few of the officers began to distrust the efficiency of the government and of all republican institutions. One of them, "a colonel of the army, of a highly respectable character and somewhat advanced in life," whose name is given by Irving as Lewis Nicola, was put forward to communicate these sentiments to Washington, and he even dared to suggest for him the title of king. Washington's reply, dated Newburg, 22 May, 1782, expressed the indignation and "abhorrence" with which he had received such a suggestion, and rebuked the writer with severity. "I am at a loss to conceive," wrote he, "what part of my conduct could have given encouragement to an address which to me seems big with the greatest mischiefs that can befall my country. If I am not deceived in the knowledge of myself, you could not have found a person to whom your schemes are more disagreeable. . . . Let me conjure you, then, if you have any regard for your country, concern for yourself or posterity, or respect for me, to banish these thoughts from your mind, and never communicate, from yourself or any one else, a sentiment of the like nature." Nothing more was ever heard of making Washington a king. He had sufficiently shown his scorn for such an overture.

The apprehensions of the army, however, were by no means quieted. A memorial on the subject of their pay was prepared and transmitted to Congress in December, 1782, but the resolutions that Congress adopted did not satisfy their expectations. A meeting of officers was arranged, and anonymous addresses, commonly known as the Newburg addresses, were issued, to rouse the army to resentment. Washington insisted on attending the meeting, and delivered an impressive address. Gen. Gates was in the chair, and Washington began by apologizing for having come. After reading the first paragraph of what he had prepared, he begged the indulgence of those present while he paused to put on his spectacles, saying, casually, but most touchingly, that "he had grown gray in the service of his country, and now found himself growing blind." He then proceeded to read a most forcible and noble paper, in which, after acknowledging the just claims of the army on the government, and assuring them that those claims would not be disregarded, he conjured them "to express their utmost horror and detestation of the man who wishes, under any specious pretences, to overturn the liberties of our country, and who wickedly attempts to open the floodgates of civil discord and deluge our rising empire in blood." The original autograph of this ever-memorable address, just as it came from Washington's own pen, is in the archives of the Massachusetts historical society, and a lithographed copy was published by them, together with the letters of eye-witnesses to the scene, as a contribution to the centennial papers of 1876. Washington retired at once from the meeting, but resolutions were forthwith unanimously adopted, on motion of Gen. Knox, seconded by Gen. Putnam, reciprocating all his affectionate expressions, and concurring entirely in the policy he had proposed. "Every doubt was dispelled," says Maj. Shaw in his journal, "and the tide of patriotism rolled again in its wonted course." The treaty of peace was signed in Paris on 20 Jan., 1783. On 17 April following, a proclamation by congress was received by Washington for the cessation of hostilities. On 19 April, the anniversary of the shedding of the first blood at Lexington, which completed the eighth year of the war, the cessation was proclaimed at the head of every regiment of the army, after which, said

Washington's general orders, "the chaplains of the several brigades will render thanks to Almighty God for all his mercies, particularly for his overruling the wrath of man to his own glory, and causing the rage of war to cease among the nations."

On the following 8th of June, in view of the dissolution of the army, Washington addressed a letter to the governors of the several states—a letter full of golden maxims and consummate wisdom. "The great object," he began, "for which I had the honor to hold an appointment in the service of my country being accomplished, I am now preparing to return to that domestic retirement which, it is well known, I left with the greatest reluctance—a retirement for which I have never ceased to sigh through a long and painful absence, and in which, remote from the noise and trouble of the world, I meditate to pass the remainder of my life in a state of undisturbed repose." Then, after remarking that "this is the favorable moment for giving such a tone to the Federal government as will enable it to answer the ends of its institution," he proceeded to set forth and enlarge upon the four things that he conceived to be essential to the well-being, or even the existence, of the United States as an independent power: "First, an indissoluble union of the states under one federal head; second, a sacred regard to public justice; third, the adoption of a proper peace establishment; and, fourth, the prevalence of that pacific and friendly disposition among the people of the United States which will induce them to forget their local prejudices and policies, to make those mutual concessions which are requisite to the general prosperity, and, in some instances, to sacrifice their individual advantages to the interest of the community. These are the pillars," said he, "on which the glorious fabric of our independency and national character must rest."

Washington took final leave of the army in general orders of 2 Nov., in accordance with a proclamation by congress of 18 Oct. He accompanied Gov. Clinton in a formal entry into New York, after its evacuation by the British, on 25 Nov. On 4 Dec., after taking affectionate leave of his principal officers at Fraunce's tavern, he set off for Annapolis, and there, on 23 Dec., 1783, he presented himself to "the United States in congress assembled," and resigned the commission that he had received on 17 June, 1775. "Having now finished," said he, "the work assigned me, I retire from the great theatre of action, and, bidding an affectionate farewell to this august body, under whose orders I have long acted, I here offer my commission, and take my leave of all the employments of public life." "You retire," replied the president of congress, "from the theatre of action with the blessings of your fellow-citizens; but the glory of your virtues will not terminate with your military command: it will continue to animate remotest ages." The very next morning, Irving tells us, Washington left Annapolis, and "hastened to his beloved Mount Vernon, where he arrived the same day, on Christmas eve, in a frame of mind suited to enjoy the sacred and genial festival." Once more, at the close of the fifty-second year of his age, Washington was permitted to resume his favorite occupations of a farmer and planter, and to devote himself personally to his crops and cattle. Indeed, throughout his whole military campaign, he had kept himself informed of what was going on in the way of agriculture at Mount Vernon, and had given careful directions as to the cultivation of his lands. His correspondence now engrossed not a little of his time, and he was frequently cheered by the visits of his friends. Lafayette was among his most welcome guests, and passed a fortnight with him, to his great delight. Afterward Washington made a visit to his lands on the Kanawha and Ohio rivers, travelling on horseback, with his friend and physician, Dr. Craik, nearly seven hundred miles, through a wild, mountainous country, and devising schemes of internal navigation for the advantage of Virginia and Maryland. His passion for hunting, also, was revived, and Lafayette and others of the French officers sent him out fine hounds from their kennels.

But the condition of his country was never absent from his thoughts, and the insufficiency of the existing confederation weighed heavily on his mind. In one of his letters he writes: "The confederation appears to me little more than a shadow without the substance, and congress a migratory body." In another letter he says: "I have ever been a friend to adequate powers in congress, without which it is evident to me we shall never establish a national character. . . . We are either a united people under one head and for federal purposes, or we are thirteen independent sovereignties, eternally counteracting each other." In another letter, to John Jay, he uses still more emphatic language: "I do not conceive we can exist long as a nation without lodging somewhere a power which will pervade the whole Union in as energetic a manner as the authority of the state governments extends over the several states. . . . Retired as I am from the world, I frankly acknowledge I cannot feel myself an unconcerned spectator. Yet, having happily assisted in bringing the ship into port, and having been fairly discharged, it is not my business to embark again on the sea of troubles." Meantime the insurrection in Massachusetts, commonly known as "Shays's rebellion," added greatly to his anxiety and even anguish of mind. In a letter to Madison of 6 Nov., 1786, he exclaimed: "No morn ever dawned more favorably than ours did, and no day was ever more clouded than the present. . . . We are fast verging to anarchy and confusion." Soon afterward he poured out the bitterness of his soul to his old aide-de-camp, Gen. Humphreys, in still stronger terms: "What, gracious God! is man, that there should be such inconsistency and perfidiousness in his conduct? It was but the other day that we were shedding our blood to obtain the constitutions under which we now live—constitutions of our own choice and making—and now we are unsheathing the sword to overturn them." He was thus in full sympathy with the efforts of his friends to confer new and greater powers on the Federal government, and he yielded to their earnest solicitations in consenting to be named at the head of the Virginia delegates to the convention in Philadelphia on 14 May, 1787. Of that ever-memorable convention he was unanimously elected president, and on the following 17th of September he had the supreme satisfaction of addressing a letter to congress announcing the adoption of the constitution of the United States, which had been signed on that day. "In all our deliberations on this subject," he said in that letter, "we kept steadily in our view that which appears to us the greatest interest of every true American—the consolidation of our Union—in which is involved our prosperity, felicity, safety, and perhaps our national existence." This constitution having passed the ordeal of congress and been ratified and adopted by the people, through the conventions of the states, nothing remained but to organize the government in conformity with its provisions. As early as 2 July, 1788, congress had been notified that the necessary approval of nine states had been obtained, but not until 13 Sept. was a day appointed for the choice of electors of president. That day was the first Wednesday of the following January, while the beginning of proceedings under the new constitution was postponed until the first Wednesday of March, which chanced in that year to be the 4th of March. Not, however, until 1 April was there a quorum for business in the house of representatives, and not until 6 April was the senate organized. On that day, in the presence of the two houses, the votes for president and vice-president were opened and counted, when Washington, having received every vote from the ten states that took part in the election, was declared president of the United States. On 14 April he received at Mount Vernon the official announcement of his election, and on the morning of the 16th he set out for New York. "Reluctant," as he said, "in the evening of life to exchange a peaceful abode for an ocean of difficulties," he bravely added: "Be the voyage long or short, although I may be deserted by all men, integrity and firmness shall never forsake me." Well does Bancroft exclaim, after recounting these details in his "History of the Constitution": "But for him the country could not have achieved its independence; but for him it could not have formed its Union; and now but for him it could not set the government in successful motion."

more, Wilmington, Philadelphia, and Trenton, he was welcomed by the two houses of congress, by the governor of the state, the magistrates of the city, and by great masses of the people. The city was illuminated in his honor. But he proceeded on foot from the barge that had brought him across the bay to the house of the president of the late confederation, which had been appointed for his residence. John Adams had been installed in the chair of the senate, as vice-president of the United States, on 21 April, but congress could not get ready for the inauguration of the president until the 30th. On that day the oath of office was administered to Washington by Robert R. Livingston, chancellor of the state of New York, in the presence of the two houses of congress, on a balcony in front of the hall in which congress held its sittings, where a statue has recently been placed. Washington then retired to the senate-chamber and delivered his inaugural address. "It would be peculiarly improper to omit," said he, "in this first official act, my fervent supplications to that Almighty Being who rules over the universe, who presides in the councils of nations, and whose providential aids can supply every human defect—that his benediction may consecrate to the liberties and happiness of the people of the United States a government instituted by themselves. . . . No people can be bound to acknowledge the invisible hand which conducts the affairs of man more than the people of the United States. Every step by which they have advanced to the character of an independent nation seems to have been distinguished by some token of providential agency. . . . These reflections, arising out of the present crisis, have forced themselves too strongly on my mind to be suppressed. You will join with me, I trust, in thinking that there are none under the influence of which the proceedings of a new and free government can more auspiciously commence." In accordance with those sentiments, at the close of the ceremony, Washington and both branches of congress were escorted to St. Paul's chapel, at the corner of Broadway and Fulton street, where the chaplain of the senate read prayers suited to the occasion, after which they all attended the president to his mansion near Franklin square.

Thus began the administration of Washington, as first president of the United States, on 30 April, 1789. This is a date never to be forgotten in American history, and it would be most happy if the 30th of April could be substituted for the 4th of March as the inauguration-day of the second century of our constitutional existence. It would add two months to the too short second session of congress, give a probability of propitious weather for the ceremony, and be a perpetual commemoration of the day on which Washington entered upon his great office, and our national government was practically organized. An amendment to the constitution making this change has twice been formally proposed and has passed the

U. S. senate, but has failed of adoption in the house of representatives. From first to last, Washington's influence in conciliating all differences of opinion in regard to the rightful interpretation and execution of the new constitution was most effective. The recently printed journal of William Maclay, a senator from Pennsylvania in the 1st congress, says, in allusion to some early controversies: "The president's amiable deportment, however, smoothes and sweetens everything." Count Moustier, the French minister, in writing home to his government, five weeks after the inauguration, says: "The opinion of Gen. Washington was of such weight that it alone contributed more than any other measure to cause the present constitution to be adopted. The extreme confidence in his patriotism, his integrity, and his intelligence, forms to-day its principal support. . . . All is hushed in presence of the trust of the people in the saviour of the country." Washington had to confront not a few of the same perplexities that all his successors have experienced in a still greater degree in regard to appointments to office. But at the earliest moment he adopted rules and principles on this subject which might well be commended to presidents and governors in later days. In a letter to his friend, James Bowdoin, of Massachusetts, bearing date 9 May, 1789, less than six weeks after his inauguration, he used language that might fitly serve as an introduction to the civil-service reform manual of the present hour. "No part of my duty," he says, "will be more delicate, and in many instances more unpleasing, than that of nominating or appointing persons to office. It will undoubtedly often happen that there will be several candidates for the same office, whose pretensions, ability, and integrity may be nearly equal, and who will come forward so equally supported in every respect as almost to require the aid of supernatural intuition to fix upon the right. I shall, however, in all events, have the satisfaction to reflect that I entered upon my administration unconfined by a single engagement, uninfluenced by any ties of blood or friendship, and with the best intentions and fullest determination to nominate to office those persons only who, upon every consideration, were the most deserving, and who would probably execute their several functions to the interest and credit of the American Union, if such characters could be found by my exploring every avenue of information respecting their merits and pretensions that it was in my power to obtain." Appointing Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, as his secretary of state; Alexander Hamilton, of New York, as his secretary of the treasury; and Henry Knox, of Massachusetts, as his secretary of war, he gave clear indication at the outset that no sectional interests or prejudices were to control or shape his policy. Under Jefferson, the foreign affairs of the country were administered with great discretion and ability. Under Hamilton, the financial affairs of the country were extricated from the confusion and chaos into which they had fallen, and the national credit established on a firm basis. The preamble of the very first revenue bill, signed by Washington on 4 July, 1789, was a notable expression of the views entertained in regard to the powers and duties of the new government in the regulation of trade and the laying and collecting of taxes: "Whereas, it is necessary for the support of government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufacturers, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported, Be it enacted, etc." The incorporation of a national bank and kindred measures of the highest interest soon followed. The supreme court of the United States was organized with John Jay as its first chief justice. Important amendments to the constitution were framed and recommended to the states for adoption, and congress continued in session till the close of September.

But in the course of the summer Washington had a severe illness, and for some days his life was thought to be in danger. Confined to his bed for six weeks, it was more than twelve weeks before he was restored. With a view to the re-establishment of his health, as well as for seeing the country, he then set off on a tour to the eastern states, and visited Boston, Portsmouth, New Haven, and other places. He was welcomed everywhere with unbounded enthusiasm. No "royal progress" in any country ever equalled this tour in its demonstrations of veneration and affection. A similar tour with the same manifestations was made by him in the southern states the next year. As the four years of his first term drew to an end, he was seriously inclined to withdraw from further public service, but Jefferson and Hamilton alike, with all their respective followers, while they differed widely on so many other matters, were of one mind in earnestly remonstrating against Washington's retirement. "The confidence of the whole country," wrote Jefferson, "is centred in you. . . . North and south will hang together if they have you to hang on." "It is clear," wrote Hamilton, "that if you continue in office nothing materially mischievous is to be apprehended; if you quit, much is to be dreaded. . . . I trust, and I pray God, that you will determine to make a further sacrifice of your tranquillity and happiness to the public good." Washington could not find it in his heart to resist such appeals, and allowed himself to be again a candidate. He was chosen unanimously by the electors, and took the oath of office again on 4 March, 1793. He had but just entered on this second term of the presidency when the news reached him that France had declared war against England and Holland. He lost no time in announcing his purpose to maintain a strict neutrality toward the belligerent powers, and this policy was unanimously sustained by his cabinet. His famous proclamation of neutrality was accordingly issued on 22 April, and soon became the subject of violent partisan controversy throughout the Union. It gave occasion to the masterly essays of Hamilton and Madison, under the signatures of "Pacificus" and "Helvidius," and contributed more than anything else, perhaps, to the original formation of the Federal and Republican parties. The wisdom of Washington was abundantly justified by the progress of events, but he did not escape the assaults of partisan bitterness. Mr. Jay, still chief justice, was sent to England as minister early in 1794, and his memorable treaty added fuel to the flame. Meantime a tax on distilled spirits had encountered much opposition in various parts of the country, and in August, 1794, was forcibly resisted and defied by a large body of armed insurgents in the western counties of Pennsylvania. Washington issued a proclamation calling out the militia of the neighboring states, and left home to cross the mountains and lead the troops in person. But the insurrection happily succumbed at his approach, and his presence became unnecessary. The arrogant and offensive conduct of the French minister, M. Genet, irreconcilable dissensions in the cabinet, and renewed agitations and popular discontents growing out of the Jay treaty, gave Washington no little trouble in these latter years of his administration, and he looked forward with eagerness to a release from official cares. Having made up his mind unchangeably to decline another election as president, he thought it fit to announce that decision in the most formal manner. He had consulted Madison at the close of his first term in regard to an address declining a second election. He now sought the advice and counsel of Alexander Hamilton, no longer a member of the cabinet, and the farewell address was prepared and published nearly six months before his official term had expired. That immortal paper has often been printed with the date of 17 Sept., 1796, and special interest has been expressed in the coincidence of the date of the address with the date of the adoption of the constitution of the United States. But, as a matter of fact, the address bears date 19 Sept., 1796, as may be seen in the autograph original now in the Lenox library, New York. Mr. James Lenox purchased that precious original from the family of the printer Claypoole, by whom it was published in Philadelphia, and to whom the manuscript, wholly in Washington's handwriting, with all its interlineations, corrections, and erasures, was given by Washington himself.

On the following 4th of March, Washington was present at the inauguration of his successor, John Adams, and soon afterward went with his family to Mount Vernon, to resume his agricultural occupations. Serious difficulties with France, were soon developed, and war became imminent. A provisional army was authorized by congress to meet the exigency, and all eyes were again turned toward Washington as its leader. President Adams wrote to him: "We must have your name, if you will permit us to use it. There will be more efficacy in it than in many an army." Hamilton urged him to make "this further, this very great sacrifice." And thus, on 3 July, 1798, Washington, yielding to the entreaty of friends and a sense of duty to his country, was once more commissioned as "Lieutenant-General and Commander-in-chief of all the armies raised, or to be raised, in the United States." The organization and arrangement of this new army now engrossed his attention. Deeply impressed with the great responsibility that had been thrust upon him, and having selected Alexander Hamilton as his chief of staff, to the serious disappointment of his old friend, Gen. Knox, he entered at once into the minutest details of the preparation for war, with all the energy and zeal of his earlier days. Most happily this war with our late gallant ally was averted. Washington, however, did not live to receive the assurance of a result that he so earnestly desired. Riding over his farms, on 12 Dec., to give directions to the managers of his estate, he was overtaken by showers of rain and sleet, and returned home wet and chilled. The next day he suffered from a hoarse, sore throat, followed by an ague at night. His old physician and surgeon, Dr. Craik, who had been with him in peace and in war, was summoned from Alexandria the next morning, and two other physicians were called into consultation during the day. At four o'clock in the afternoon he requested his wife, who was constantly at his bedside, to bring him two papers from his study, one of which he gave back to her as his will. At six o'clock he said to the three physicians around him: "I feel myself going; I thank you for your attentions, but I pray you to take no more trouble about me." He had previously said to Dr. Craik: "I die hard, but I am not afraid to go." About ten o'clock he succeeded with difficulty in giving some directions about his funeral to Mr. Lear, his secretary, and on Mr. Lear's assuring him that he was understood, he uttered his last words: "It is well." And thus, between ten and eleven o'clock on Saturday night, 14 Dec., 1799, the end came, and his spirit returned to God who gave it. The funeral took place on the 18th. Such troops as were in the neighborhood formed the escort of the little procession; the general's favorite horse was led behind the bier, the Freemasons performed their ceremonies, the Rev. Thomas Davis read the service and made a brief address, a schooner lying in the Potomac fired minute-guns, the relatives and friends within reach, including Lord Fairfax and the corporation of Alexandria, were in attendance, and the body was deposited in the vault at Mount Vernon. At Mount Vernon it has remained to this day. Virginia would never consent to its removal to the stately vault prepared for it beneath the capitol at Washington. Congress was in session at Philadelphia, and the startling news of Washington's death only reached there on the day of his funeral. The next morning John Marshall, then a representative from Virginia, afterward for thirty-four years chief justice of the supreme court of the United States, announced the death in the house of representatives, concluding a short but admirable tribute to his illustrious friend with resolutions prepared by Richard Henry Lee, which contained the grand words that have ever since been associated with Washington: "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his fellow-citizens." Gen. Lee pronounced a eulogy, by order of both houses of congress, on 26 Dec., in which he changed the last word of his own famous phrase to "countrymen," and it is so given in the eulogy as published by congress. Meantime congress adopted a resolution recommending to the people of the United States to assemble on the following 22d of February, in such manner as should be convenient, to testify publicly by eulogies, orations, and discourses, or by public prayers, their grief for the death of George Washington. In conformity with this recommendation, eulogies or sermons were delivered, or exercises of some sort held, in almost every city, town, village, or hamlet throughout the land. Such was the first observance of Washington's birthday;—thenceforth to be a national holiday. But not in our own land only was his death commemorated. Napoleon Bonaparte, then first consul, announced it to the army of France, and ordered all the standards and flags throughout the republic to be bound with crape for ten days, during which a funeral oration was pronounced in presence of the first consul and all the civil and military authorities, in what is now the Hôtel des Invalides. More striking still is the fact, mentioned by Jared Sparks, that the British fleet, consisting of nearly sixty ships of the line, which was lying at Torbay, England, under the command of Lord Bridport, lowered their flags half-mast on hearing the intelligence of Washington's death.

In later years the tributes to the memory of Washington have been such as no other man of modern or even of ancient history has commanded. He has sometimes been compared, after the manner of Plutarch, with Epaminondas, or Timoleon, or Alfred the Great of England. But an eminent living English historian has recently and justly said that the place of Washington in the history of mankind "is well-nigh without a fellow." Indeed, the general judgment of the world has given ready assent to the carefully weighed, twice repeated declaration of Lord Brougham:

"It will be the duty of the historian and sage in all ages to let no occasion pass of commemorating this illustrious man; and, until time shall be no more, will a test of the progress which our race has made in wisdom and virtue be derived from the veneration paid to the immortal name of Washington!" Modest, disinterested, generous, just, of clean hands and a pure heart, self-denying and self-sacrificing, seeking nothing for himself, declining all remuneration beyond the reimbursement of his outlays, scrupulous to a farthing in keeping his accounts, of spotless integrity, scorning gifts, charitable to the needy, forgiving injuries and injustice, fearless, heroic, with a prudence ever governing his impulses and a wisdom ever guiding his valor, true to his friends, true to his whole country, true to himself, fearing God, believing in Christ, no stranger to private devotion or public worship, or to the holiest offices of the church to which he belonged, but ever gratefully recognizing a divine aid and direction in all that he attempted and in all that he accomplished—what epithet, what attribute, could be added to that consummate character to commend it as an example above all other characters in merely human history?

Washington's most important original papers were bequeathed to his favorite nephew, Bushrod Washington, and were committed by him to Chief-Justice John Marshall, by whom an elaborate life, in five volumes, was published in 1804. Abridged editions of this great work have been published more recently. "The Writings of Washington," with a life, were published by Jared Sparks (12 vols., Boston, 1834-'7). A new edition of Washington's complete works in 14 vols., edited by Worthington C. Ford, containing many letters and papers now published for the first time, is in course of publication (vol. i., New York, November, 1888). Biographies have also been published by Mason L. Weems, David Ramsay, James K. Paulding, Charles W. Upham, Joel T. Headley, Caroline M. Kirkland, and others. Benson J. Lossing made an interesting and important contribution to the illustration of the same theme by his "Mount Vernon and its Associations" in 1859. Meanwhile the genius of Washington Irving has illuminated the whole story of Washington's life, public and private, and thrown around it the charms of exquisite style and lucid narrative (5 vols., New York, 1855-'9). An abridgment and revision of Irving's work, by John Fiske (New York, 1888), and a "Life of George Washington," by Edward E. Hale (1887), have recently appeared. A sketch was prepared by Edward Everett, at the request of Lord Macaulay, for the eighth edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" (1853-1860), which was afterward published in a separate volume. To Edward Everett, too, belongs the principal credit of having saved Mount Vernon from the auctioneer's hammer, and secured its preservation, under the auspices of the Ladies' Mount Vernon association, as a place of pilgrimage. He wrote 52 articles for the New York "Ledger," and delivered his lecture on Washington many times, contributing the proceeds to the Mount Vernon fund.

The marble statue in the capitol at Richmond, Va. (for bust of this, see page 379), by the French sculptor Houdon, from life, must be named first among the standard likenesses of Washington. Excellent portraits of him by John Trumbull, by both the Peales, and by Gilbert Stuart, are to be seen in many public galleries. Stuart's head leaves nothing to be desired in the way of dignity and grandeur. Among the numerous monuments that have been erected to his memory may be mentioned the noble column in Baltimore; the colossal statue in the Capitol grounds at Washington, by Horatio Greenough; the splendid group in Richmond, surmounted by an equestrian statue, by Thomas Crawford; the marble statue in the Massachusetts state-house, by Sir Francis Chantrey; the equestrian statue in the Boston public garden, by Thomas Ball; the equestrian statue in Union square, New York, by Henry K. Brown; and, lastly, the matchless obelisk at Washington, of which the corner-stone was laid in 1848, upon which the capstone was placed, at the height of 555 feet, in 1884, and which was dedicated by congress on 21 Feb., 1885, as Washington's birthday that year fell on Sunday. See vignette, and also illustrations of his birthplace by Charles C. Perkins; a drawing of the locality by Gen. William T. Sherman, the church at Pohick (page 376), the Newburg headquarters (page 378), Mount Vernon (page 383), Washington's tomb, a portrait of him in youth (page 374); also the pictures by Trumbull (page 377), Wertmüller (page 380), and Du Simitière (page 381). The steel engraving, which appears as a frontispiece to this volume, is from Stuart's original in the Boston athenæum. The vignette of Mrs. Washington is from the portrait by the same artist.—His wife, Martha, b. in New Kent county, Va., in May, 1732; d. at Mount Vernon, Va., 22 May, 1802, was the daughter of Col. John Dandridge, a planter in New Kent county. Martha was fairly educated by private tutors, and became an expert performer on the spinet. She was introduced to the vice-regal court, during the administration of Sir William

Mrs. Washington

Gooch, at fifteen years of age, and in June, 1749, married Daniel Parke Custis, a wealthy planter, with whom she removed to his residence, the White House, on Pamunkey river. They had four children, two of whom died in infancy, and in 1757 Mr. Custis also died, leaving his widow one of the wealthiest women in Virginia. About a year after her husband's death she met Col. Washington, who was visiting at the house of Maj. William Chamberlayne, where she too was a guest. In May, 1758, they became engaged, but the marriage was delayed by Col. Washington's northern campaign, and it was not till January, 1759, that it was solemnized, at St. Peter's church, New Kent county, the Rev. John Mossum performing the ceremony. The wedding was one of the most brilliant that had ever been seen in a church in Virginia. The bridegroom wore a suit of blue cloth, the coat lined with red silk, and ornamented with silver trimmings; his waistcoat was embroidered white satin, his knee-buckles were of gold, and his hair was powdered. The bride was attired in a white satin quilted petticoat, a heavily corded white silk over-dress, diamond buckles, and pearl ornaments. The governor, many members of the legislature, British officers, and the neighboring gentry were present in full court dress. Washington's body-servant, Bishop, a tall negro, to whom he was much attached and who had accompanied him on all his military campaigns, stood in the porch, clothed in the scarlet uniform of a soldier of the royal army in the time of George II. The bride and her three attendants drove back to White House in a coach drawn by six horses led by liveried postilions, Col. Washington and an escort of cavaliers riding by its side. Mrs. Washington's life at Mount Vernon for the subsequent seventeen years partook much of the style of the English aristocracy. She was a thorough housekeeper, and entertained constantly. Her daughter, Martha Parke Custis, who died in the seventeenth year of her age, was known as the "dark lady," on account of her brunette complexion, and was greatly loved by the neighboring poor, to whom she frequently ministered. On her portrait, painted by Charles Willson Peale, is inscribed "A Virginia Beauty." Mrs. Washington ardently sympathized with her husband in his patriotic measures. To a kinswoman, who deprecated what she called "his folly," Mrs. Washington wrote in 1774: "Yes, I foresee consequences—dark days, domestic happiness suspended, social enjoyments abandoned, and eternal separations on earth possible. But my mind is made up, my heart is in the cause. George is right; he is always right. God has promised to protect the righteous, and I will trust him." Patrick Henry and Edmund Pendleton spent a day and night at Mount Vernon in August, 1774, on their way to congress. Pendleton afterward wrote to a friend: "Mrs. Washington talked like a Spartan to her son on his going to battle. 'I hope you will all stand firm,' she said; 'I know George will.'" After her husband became commander-in-chief she was burdened with many cares. He visited Mount Vernon only twice during the war. She joined him at Cambridge, Mass., in 1775, occupying the mansion, an illustration of which is shown in the article on LONGFELLOW, HENRY W. She subsequently accompanied Gen. Washington to New York and Philadelphia, and whenever it was possible joined him in camp. During the winter at Valley Forge she suffered every privation in common with the officers, and "was busy from morning till night providing comforts for the sick soldiers." Although previous to the war she had paid much attention to her attire, as became her wealth and station, while it continued she dressed only in garments that were spun and woven by her servants at Mount Vernon. At a ball in New Jersey that was given in her honor she wore one of these simple gowns and a white kerchief, "as an example of economy to the women of the Revolution." Her last surviving child, John Parke Custis, died in November, 1781, leaving four children. The two younger, Eleanor Parke Custis and George Washington Parke Custis, Gen. Washington at once adopted. After Mrs. Washington left headquarters at Newburg in 1782, she did not again return to camp life. She was residing quietly at Mount Vernon (see illustration) when Washington was chosen president of the United States. When she assumed the duties of mistress of the executive mansion in New York she was fifty-seven years old, but still retained traces of beauty, and bore herself with great personal dignity. She instituted levees, that she ever afterward continued, on Friday evening of each week from eight to nine o'clock. "None were admitted but those who had a right of entrance by official station or established character," and full dress was required. During the second term of the president they resided in Philadelphia, where their public receptions were conducted as those in New York had been. An English gentleman, describing her at her own table in 1794, says: "Mrs. Washington struck me as being older than the president. She was extremely simple in dress, and wore her gray hair turned up under a very plain cap." She greatly disliked official life, and rejoiced when her husband refused a third term in 1796. She resided at Mount Vernon during the remainder of her life, occupied with her domestic duties, of which she was fond, and in entertaining the numerous guests that visited her husband. She survived him two and a half years. Before her death she destroyed her entire correspondence with Gen. Washington. "Thus," says her grandson and biographer, George Washington Parke Custis, "proving her love for him, for she would not permit that the confidence they had shared together should be made public." See "Memoirs of the Mother and Wife of Washington," by Margaret C. Conkling (Auburn, N. Y., 1851), and "Mary and Martha," by Benson J. Lossing (New York, 1887).—George Washington's kinsman, William, soldier, b. in Stafford county, Va., 28 Feb., 1752; d. near Charleston, S. C., 6 March, 1810, was the son of Bailey Washington. But little is known of his life before the opening of the

W. Washington

Revolution. He was educated for the church, but, espousing the patriot cause, received a commission early in the war as captain of infantry in the 3d regiment of the Virginia line, and in this post acquitted himself with great credit in the operations about New York, being severely wounded in the battle of Long Island. At the engagement at Trenton, 26

Dec., 1776, he led a charge upon one of the enemy's batteries, capturing the guns. On this occasion he was again wounded. In 1778 he was transferred to the dragoons and assigned to the regiment of Lieut.-Col. George Baylor. In 1779 he joined the army of Gen. Benjamin Lincoln in the south. After being promoted to the command of the regiment, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, on 23 March, 1780, he encountered and defeated Lieut.-Col. Banastre Tarleton at Rantowles. Col. White and Col. Washington were surprised by Tarleton at Monk's Corner and Lenude's Ferry a few weeks afterward. In December, 1780, Washington, then attached to the command of Gen. Daniel Morgan, by means of the stratagem of a painted log or "Quaker gun," reduced the post at Rudgely's, receiving the surrender of Col. Rudgely and one hundred men without resistance. In the battle of the Cowpens, Washington made a successful charge upon the enemy at a critical moment, and congress voted medals to him and to Gen. Morgan and Lieut.-Col. Howard. In this battle he had a personal encounter with Col. Tarleton, in which both were wounded. The wound that Tarleton received from Washington was the subject of the sallies of wit of several American ladies. A Mrs. Ashe, daughter of Col. Joseph Montford, of North Carolina, heard Tarleton say, with a sarcastic sneer: "I would be happy to see this Col. Washington," whereupon she instantly replied: "If you had looked behind you, Col. Tarleton, at the battle of Cowpens, you would have had that pleasure." Almost immediately after this battle Morgan effected a junction with Gen. Greene, who, requiring a light corps to act as a covering party during his retreat and to harass the enemy, selected for this purpose the troops of Lieut.-Cols. Howard, Washington, and Lee. Washington also took an active part in the operations about Guilford Court-House, N. C., and in the battle of

Hobkirk's Hill, on 25 April, he charged the enemy with great vigor, secured many prisoners, and saved the artillery from capture. At the close of the engagement he succeeded in drawing Maj. Coffin, the commander of the British cavalry, into ambush and dispersing or capturing his squadron. At Eutaw Springs, S. C., 8 Sept., 1781, after the most heroic efforts, he was unhorsed, and while attempting to disengage himself received a bayonet wound and was taken prisoner. In 1782 Col. Washington married Miss Elliot, of Charleston, S. C., to a place near which city he soon afterward removed. He was subsequently elected a member of the legislature of that state, and solicited to become a candidate for governor, but declined "because he could not make a speech." In 1798, when the United States was threatened with war by France, Gen. Washington recommended the appointment of his kinsman as brigadier-general, which was done 19 July, 1798, and in a letter to the secretary of war suggested that he be given the direction of affairs in South Carolina and Georgia. His wife, a son, and a daughter survived him. On the occasion of his death the American Revolution society of South Carolina adopted resolutions, in which he was spoken of as: "Modest without timidity, generous without extravagance, brave without rashness, and disinterested without austerity; which imparted firmness to his conduct and mildness to his manners; solidity to his judgment and boldness to his achievements; which armed him with an equanimity unalterable by the frowns of adversity or the smiles of fortune, and steadiness of soul not to be subdued by the disasters of defeat or elated by the triumphs of victory."—George Washington's nephew, Bushrod, jurist, b. in Westmoreland county, Va., 5 June, 1762; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 26 Nov., 1829, was the son of John Augustine, a younger brother of the general. He was graduated at William and Mary in 1778, studied law with James Wilson, of Philadelphia, and began practice in his native county. His professional duties were interrupted by his entrance into the patriot army, and he served as a private in the Revolution. He was a member of the Virginia house of delegates in 1787, and the next year of that to ratify the constitution of the United States. He subsequently removed to Alexandria, and thence to Richmond, Va. He was appointed an associate justice of the U. S. supreme court in 1798, which office he held until his death. Judge Washington was the first president of the Colonization society, and a learned jurist. He was the favorite nephew of Gen. Washington. At the death of Mrs. Washington he inherited the mansion and 400 acres of the Mount Vernon estate. He died without issue. Judge Washington's publications include "Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Court of Appeals of Virginia" (2 vols., Richmond, Va., 1798-'9), and "Reports of Cases determined in the Circuit Court of the United States, for the 3d Circuit, from 1803 till 1827," edited by Richard Peters (4 vols., 1826-'9). Of these Horace Binney says in his "Life of Bushrod Washington" (printed privately, Philadelphia, 1858): "I have never thought that his reports of his own decisions did him entire justice, while they in no inadequate manner at all fully represent his judicial powers, nor the ready command he held of his learning in the law." See also a sketch of Judge Washington in Mr. Justice Story's "Miscellaneous Writings" (Philadelphia, 1852).—A grand-nephew of George, George Corbin, congressman, b. in Westmoreland county, Va., 20 Aug., 1789; d. in Georgetown, D. C., 17 July, 1854, was the son of William Augustine Washington, the son of George Washington's brother, John Augustine. His mother, Jane, was the daughter of Augustine, the elder half-brother of the general. George Corbin was educated at Harvard and studied law, but devoted himself to agricultural pursuits, which he followed at his plantation in Maryland, but resided for the most part on Dumbarton heights, Georgetown, D. C. He represented the Rockville district, Md., in congress in 1827-'33, having been chosen as a Whig, and was again a member of that body in 1835-'7. He was subsequently president of the Chesapeake and Ohio canal company, and commissioner of Indian affairs. He was widely spoken of as a candidate for the vice-presidency when Gen. Winfield Scott was nominated for the presidency. At the time of his death he was the oldest and nearest surviving male relative of his grand-uncle, George Washington.—George Corbin's son, Lewis William, b. in Georgetown, D. C., about 1825; d. at Harper's Ferry, W. Va., 1 Oct., 1871, was carefully educated, became a planter, and settled in Jefferson county, Va. He was conspicuously connected with the incidents of the John Brown raid on Harper's Ferry in 1859, serving at that time as aide on the staff of Gov. Henry A. Wise. Brown captured and held him as one of his hostages. Mr. Washington took no active part in the civil war, passing most of that time in Europe, but his estate was confiscated, although the government subsequently released it. He possessed a valuable collection of Gen. Washington's relics, including the sword that was sent him by Frederick the Great, on which was inscribed "From the oldest general in the world to the greatest."—Lewis William's son, WILLIAM D'HERTBURNE, engineer, b. in Hanover county, Va., 29 June, 1863, was educated at Charlestown, W. Va., and at Maryland college, became a civil engineer, and in 1886 was appointed consul at London, England.—John Augustine, soldier, great-grandson of Gen. Washington's brother, John Augustine, b. in Blakely, Jefferson co., Va., 3 May, 1821; d. near Rich Mountain, Va., 13 Sept., 1861, was the son of John A. Washington, and on his mother's side the grandson of Gen. Richard Henry Lee. He was graduated at the University of Virginia in 1840. He served as aide-de-camp, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, on the staff of Gen. Robert E. Lee, and was killed with a reconnoitring party near Rich Mountain, Va. He inherited the Mount Vernon property, but, being unable to keep it in proper preservation, he sold it to the association of ladies that now has possession of it.

WASHINGTON, John Marshall, soldier, b. in Virginia in October, 1797; d. at sea, 24 Dec., 1853. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1814, and promoted 3d lieutenant of artillery, 17 July, 1817, 2d lieutenant, 20 March, 1818, and 1st lieutenant, 23 May, 1820. On the reorganization of the army in 1821 he was transferred to the 4th regiment of artillery, and during 1824-'5 he served as instructor of mathematics in the artillery-school of practice at Fort Monroe. On 23 May, 1830, he received the brevet of captain for faithful service for ten years in one grade, and on 30 May, 1832, he was promoted to the full rank. In 1833-'4 and in 1836 he was engaged in operations in the Creek nation, in 1836-'8 and 1839 in the Florida war against the Seminole Indians, and on the northern frontier during the Canada troubles of 1839-'40. In the summer of 1846 Capt. Washington, then in command of a light battery of eight guns, joined Gen. John E. Wool's division, and, after a most arduous march through a barren country, took part with it in the battle of Buena Vista. On the first day of the battle he was placed by Gen. Wool to guard the pass of La Angostura, near the right of the line, the loss of which would have brought inevitable defeat, and he held it against the most vigorous attacks of overwhelming numbers. On the second day, when three regiments of Illinois and Kentucky troops were overpowered by a greatly superior force, he repelled the enemy, and by judicious management covered the retreat of these confused masses, thereby saving the lives of hundreds who would inevitably have been cut to pieces. Holding as he did the key-point of the American position during the entire action, his battery was the constant object of attack from the enemy, and each of these attacks was repelled with promptness and gallantry. On 16 Feb., just six days before the battle, Capt. Washington had been promoted major of the 3d regiment of artillery, and he was subsequently brevetted lieutenant-colonel for "gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle of Buena Vista." He was acting governor of Saltillo, Mexico, from 24 June till 14 Dec., 1847, chief of artillery of Gen. Wool's division from 12 March till 9 Dec., 1847, and of the Army of Occupation from 9 Dec., 1847, till 30 May, 1848, and in command of an expedition to Santa Fé, N. M., in 1848. From October, 1848, till October, 1849, Col. Washington was in command of the 9th military department and civil and military governor of New Mexico. He was with his regiment, the 3d artillery, on board the steamer "San Francisco" when she was wrecked off the Capes of the Delaware in December, 1853. With numerous other officers and 180 soldiers he was drowned.

WASSON, David Atwood, author, b. in West Brooksville, Me., 14 May, 1823; d. in West Medford, Mass., 21 Jan., 1887. He entered Bowdoin in 1845, but remained only one year, owing to feeble health. He then went to sea and afterward studied law, but in 1849 entered Bangor theological seminary. In 1851 he settled in Groveland, Mass., as a pastor; but his liberal opinions led to a rupture in the society. An independent church was then established, to which Mr. Wasson ministered for several years, but retired in 1857, owing to impaired health. In 1865-'6 he was minister of the society that had been formed by Theodore Parker. Subsequently he served in the custom-house of Boston, resided in Germany, and then retired to West Medford, where he devoted himself to literary work. He was a contributor to various periodicals. His poems include "Bugle Notes," "Seen and Unseen," and "Ideals."—His son, George Savary, artist, b. in Groveland, Mass., 27 Aug., 1855, was educated in Boston and in Stuttgart. His works are "Great Misery Island" (1880); "The Constitution and the Guerrière" (1881); "A Wreck at Isle au Haut" (1885); "Moore's Head, Isle au Haut" (1886); "Going to Pieces" (1887); and "Running for a Harbor" (1888).

WATERBURY, David, soldier, b. in Stamford, Conn., 12 Feb., 1722; d. there, 29 June, 1801. He took part in the French and Indian war, served under Sir William Johnson at the battle of Lake George in 1755, and was present at Gen. James Abercrombie's attack on Ticonderoga in 1758. He was also with Gen. Richard Montgomery in his campaign against Quebec in 1775 as lieutenant-colonel of the 9th Connecticut regiment, and at the siege of St. John's and the surrender of Montreal. On 3 June, 1776, he was appointed by the general assembly of Connecticut a brigadier for the northern department, and assigned to the command of the post at Skeensborough (now Whitehall, N. Y.), where a fleet was building for Lake Champlain. He remained here during the summer of 1776, actively engaged in pushing the flotilla to completion. At the battle of Valcour Bay, 11 Oct., 1776, between the Americans and the British, he was second in command to Benedict Arnold, and was captured with his vessel, the "Washington." The statement of Gen. James Wilkinson, who was not present during the action, that Waterbury struck his colors without firing a shot, is contradicted by Arnold, who, in his report of the engagement to Gen. Horatio Gates, says that Waterbury fought with distinguished gallantry, his vessel being hulled several times. Gen. Carleton was greatly elated over the capture of Waterbury and made haste to report it to Lord Germaine. He was soon exchanged, and in the summer of 1781 commanded a brigade under Washington, rendering more or less active service during the remainder of the war. After the Revolution he spent the rest of his life in cultivating a farm in his native town and in representing his fellow-townsmen in the general assembly during the years 1783, 1794, and 1795. His uncompromising patriotism rendered him at times harsh and severe toward those who did not support the cause of the colonies. The historian of Stamford writes that "he seems to have shown them no mercy; one of the reasons given by citizens going over to the enemy being the excessive rigor of Col. Waterbury." See Elijah B. Huntington's "History of Stamford" and the "Journal" of Lieut. James M. Hadden (Albany, 1884).

WATERBURY, Jared Bell, clergyman, b. in New York city, 11 Aug., 1799; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 31 Dec., 1876. He was graduated at Yale in 1822, studied two years in Princeton theological seminary, and was licensed to preach in 1825. In that year he was an agent for the American Bible society, and in 1826-'9 he was pastor of the Congregational church in Hatfield, Mass. He was pastor of Presbyterian churches in Portsmouth, N. H., from 1829 till 1832, and in Hudson, N. Y., in 1833, of the Bowdoin street Congregational church in Boston, Mass., from 1846 till 1857, and of the Central church in Brooklyn, N. Y., in 1859. Subsequently he served as city missionary there until his death. Union gave him the degree of S. T. D. in 1841. He was the author of "Advice to a Young Christian" (New York, 1827); "The Brighter Age," a poem (Boston, 1830); "Child of the Covenant" (1853); "Voyage of Life" (1853); "The Soldier from Home" (New York, 1862); "The Soldier on Guard" (1863); "Sketches of Eloquent Preachers" (1864); "Southern Planters and Freedmen" (1865); and a life of Rev. John Scudder (1870).

WATERHOUSE, Benjamin, physician, b. in Newport, R. I., 4 March, 1754; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 2 Oct., 1846. At the age of sixteen he began the study of medicine with Dr. John Halliburton in Newport, and he subsequently continued it under Dr. John Fothergill in London, in Edinburgh, and at Leyden, where he was graduated in 1780. He began to practise in Newport, and in 1783 aided in establishing the medical school at Harvard, where he was professor of medicine from 1783 till 1812. He was also professor of natural history at Brown from 1784 till 1791, and delivered in the state-house of Providence the first course of lectures on that science in this country. He obtained from Dr. John C. Lettsom, of Leyden, a valuable collection of minerals, introduced their study into Harvard, and procured the establishment of a botanic garden there. In 1812 he retired from his profession and became medical supervisor of military posts in New England, holding this office until 1825. In 1799 he subjected his family to the experiment of vaccination, which he vindicated against the ridicule of the profession and the public. Dr. Waterhouse supported the measures of Thomas Jefferson in his political writings. His works include "Lectures on the Theory and Practice of Medicine" (Cambridge, 1780); "On the Principles of Vitality" (Boston, 1790); "Rise, Progress, and Present State of Medicine" (1792); "Prospect of exterminating the Small-Pox" (1800); "Heads of a Course of Lectures on Natural History" (1810); "The Botanist" (1811); "The Journal of a Young Man of Massachusetts," a novel (1816); and an essay on the "Junius" letters, in which he supports the claim of Lord Chatham to their authorship (Boston, 1831).

WATERMAN, Elijah, clergyman, b. in Bozrah, New London co., Conn., 28 Nov., 1769; d. in Springfield, Mass., 11 Oct., 1825. His father was a magistrate and an active patriot during the Revolutionary war. The son was graduated at Yale in 1791, taught in Hartford in 1791-'2, studied theology under Timothy Dwight in Greenfield Hill, and under Jonathan Edwards, was licensed to preach in 1793, and in 1794 was installed pastor of a Congregational church in Windham, Conn., where he remained until 1804. After supplying the pulpit in New Milford, Conn., he became pastor of the church in Bridgeport, of which he held charge until his death. He contributed prose and verse to periodicals, and his other publications include "An Oration before the Society of the Cincinnati" (Hartford, 1794); "A Century Sermon at Windham" (Windham, 1800); and "Life and Writings of John Calvin" (Hartford, 1813).

WATERMAN, Marcus, artist, b. in Providence, R. I., 1 Sept., 1834. He was graduated at Brown in 1855, and during 1857-'70 worked in New York, where he was elected an associate of the National academy in 1861. In 1874 he opened a studio in Boston, where an exhibition of his works was held in 1878, previous to his departure for Europe. He visited Algeria in 1879 and 1883, and Spain in 1882, and went abroad again in 1884. His landscapes include "Gulliver in Lilliput," which was at the Centennial exhibition, Philadelphia, in 1876; "The Roc's Egg" (1886); "The Journey to the City of Brass" (1888); and numerous American forest scenes and Arabian subjects.

WATERMAN, Robert Whitney, governor of California, b. in Fairfield, Herkimer co., N. Y., 15 Dec., 1826. His father was a merchant, and died while the son was quite young. Two years afterward Robert removed to Sycamore, Ill., where three elder brothers had preceded him. Until his twentieth year he was a clerk in a country store, and in 1846 he engaged in business for himself in Belvidere, Ill. In 1849 he was postmaster at Genoa, Ill. In 1850 he went to California and engaged in mining on Feather river, but two years later he returned to Wilmington, Ill., where in 1853 he published the Wilmington "Independent," at the same time carrying on other business enterprises. In 1854 he was a delegate to the convention at Bloomington, Ill., that gave a name to the Republican party, and he was an associate of Abraham Lincoln, Lyman Trumbull, Richard Yates, David Davis, and Owen Lovejoy. In 1856 he took an active part in the Fremont campaign, and in 1858 he was engaged in the senatorial contest between Lincoln and Douglas. In 1873 he returned to California, and he established his home at San Bernardino in that state the following year. He was successful in discovering and developing silver-mines in what has since come to be known as the Calico mining district in San Bernardino county. In 1886 he was elected lieutenant-governor as a Republican. Upon the death of Gov. Washington Bartlett, 12 Sept., 1887, Mr. Waterman was called to the duties of chief executive. During recent years Gov. Waterman has engaged in numerous business enterprises in various parts of California. He is the owner of the famous Stonewall gold-mine in San Diego county, and has extensive ranch properties in southern California. He is president of the San Diego, Cuyamaca and Eastern railway, and is connected with many other public enterprises.

WATERMAN, Sigismund, physician, b. in Bruck, Bavaria, 22 Feb., 1819. He was educated in Erlangen, Bavaria, and was graduated in medicine at Yale in 1848. His professional life has been passed chiefly in New York, where he has engaged in general practice. In 1857 he was appointed police surgeon, which place he filled for nearly thirty years, and during the civil war he was made one of the draft surgeons. Dr. Waterman became consulting physician in 1875 to the Home for aged and infirm Hebrews, and is now medical director of that institution. He has devoted special attention to the use of the spectroscope in the practice of medicine, and has been successful in its application. During 1868 he lectured on that subject before the medical societies of New York, and he has since spoken elsewhere on the same topic. He is a member of various medical societies and has contributed to the literature of his profession. Among his papers are "Practical Remarks on Scarlatina" (1859); "Therapeutic Employment of Oxide of Zinc" (1861); "Spectral Analysis as an Aid in the Diagnosis of Disease" (1869); "The Blood-Crystals and their Physiological Importance" (1872); "Spectral Analysis of Blood-Stains" (1873); "The Importance of the Spectroscope in Forensic Cases" (1874); and "Revivification" (1884).

WATERMAN, Thomas Glasby, lawyer, b. in New York city, 23 Jan., 1788; d. in Binghamton, N. Y., 7 Jan., 1862. At an early age he removed with his parents to Salisbury, Conn., where his father, David, established extensive iron-works. The son was graduated at Yale in 1806 in the class with James Fenimore Cooper, studied in the Litchfield law-school, and afterward with Samuel Sherwood in Delhi, N. Y., and after admission to the bar in 1809 remained with the latter until 1812, when he went to Owego, N. Y., for a few months, but settled finally in Binghamton, N. Y., where he practised until about 1830. He served in the lower house of the legislature in 1826, and from 1827 till 1831 in the state senate, where he was one of a committee that made a thorough revision of the statutes of the state. By appointment of the governor he discharged the duties of judge of the court of common pleas for the state. He prepared and published "The Justice's Manual, or a Summary of the Powers and Duties of Justices of the Peace in New York State" (Albany, 1828).—His son, Thomas Whitney, lawyer, b. in Binghamton, N. Y., 28 June, 1821, entered Yale in 1838, but was not graduated. He travelled in Europe in 1842-'4, studied law, and was admitted to the bar of New York in 1848. Until 1870 he practised in New York city, and he then removed to Binghamton. He has edited many law-books, including American editions of J. H. Dart's "Vendors and Purchasers of Real Estate," with notes (New York, 1851); J. F. Archbold's "New System of Criminal Procedure" (3 vols., New York, 1852); Robert Henley Eden's "Treatise on the Law of Injunctions" (2 vols., New York, 1852); vols. viii. and ix. of Alonzo C. Paige's "Reports of Cases in the Court of Chancery of the State of New York" (1852); Murray Hoffman's "Chancery Reports" (1853); George Caines's "New York Reports" (3d ed., 3 vols., 1854); vol. ii. of Elijah Paine's "Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Circuit Court of the United States for the Second Circuit, 1816-'26" (1856); the 4th American edition of William Paley's "Treatise on the Law of Principal and Agent Chiefly in Reference to Mercantile Transactions" (1856); and vols. xviii., xix., and xx. of John L. Wendell's "Reports of Cases in the Supreme Court of Judicature and in the Court for Trial of Impeachments and the Correction of Errors of the State of New York, 1828-'41" (1857). He is the author of a "Treatise on the Civil Jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace, to which are added Outlines of the Powers and Duties of Country and Town Officers in the State of New York" (New York, 1849); the 3d edition of the "American Chancery Digest," with notes and a copious index (3 vols., 1851); "Treatise on the Civil and Criminal Jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace for the States of Wisconsin and Iowa: containing Practical Forms" (1853); "Treatise on the Principles of Law and Equity which govern Courts in the granting of New Trials in Cases Civil and Criminal" (2 vols., 1855); "Digest of the Reported Decisions of the Superior Court and of the Supreme Court of Errors of the State of Connecticut from the Organization of said Courts to the Present Time" (1858); and a "Treatise on the Law of Set-Off, Recoupment, and Counter-Claim" (1869).

WATERS, Henry Fitz-Gilbert, genealogist, b. in Salem, Mass., 29 March, 1833. After graduation at Harvard in 1855 he engaged in teaching, and was a member of the school committee of Salem in 1881-'2, and its secretary in 1882-'3. He received the honorary degree of A. M. from Harvard in 1885 for tracing the family of John Harvard, when other genealogists had failed. He has spent several years in England pursuing genealogical inquiries, on which he is still engaged.

WATERS, Nicholas Baker, physician, b. in Maryland in 1764; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1796. He received a classical education, was graduated in medicine at the University of Pennsylvania in 1786, and practised in Philadelphia until his death. In 1790 he married Hester, daughter of David Rittenhouse, the astronomer. He published an abridged edition of "A System of Surgery," by Benjamin Bell, of Edinburgh, to which notes were added by Dr. John Jones (Philadelphia, 1791).

WATERS, Robert, educator, b. in Thurso, Caithness-shire, Scotland, 9 May, 1835. He came to Canada in 1842, and was taught to read and write by his mother. At the age of thirteen he was employed at setting type, and in 1851 came to this country. In this manner he acquired an education, and in 1862 he went to France, where, after working in a printing-office for a time, he began to teach. Subsequently he went to Germany to study, and gave instruction there in English and French for four years. In 1868 he accepted an appointment in the Hoboken, N. J., academy, where he remained until 1883, when he became principal of the West Hoboken public school, which place he still holds. Mr. Waters has published a "Life of William Cobbett" (New York, 1883); "Shakespeare portrayed by Himself" (1888); "How Genius works its Wonders" (1889); and edited and annotated "Cobbett's English Grammar" (1883).

WATERSTON, Robert Cassie, clergyman, b. in Kennebunk, Me., in 1812. He studied three years in Cambridge, was ordained in 1839, and was pastor of various churches in Boston. For five years he had charge of a sailors' Sunday-school. He has been engaged in various benevolent, educational, and literary associations. He has published "Thoughts on Moral and Spiritual Culture" (Boston, 1842); "Arthur Lee and Tom Palmer" (1845); and addresses on Thomas Sherwin and William Cullen Bryant.—His wife, ANNA C. QUINCY, the daughter of Josiah Quincy, has published "Verses by A. C. Q. W." (Boston, 1863).

WATERTON, Charles, English naturalist, b. at Walton Hall, near Wakefield, Yorkshire, England, 3 June, 1782; d. there, 27 May, 1865. He was of an old Roman Catholic family, from Lincolnshire, and through his grandmother was descended from Sir Thomas More. He was educated first at a school at Tudhoe, near Durham, and then at the Jesuit college at Stonyhurst, in Lancashire. In boyhood he displayed greater fondness for open-air observations of natural history than for books. Shortly after attaining his majority he visited Spain, where some of the Waterton family were in business. In 1804 he went to Demerara to superintend the estates of an uncle, and travelled through the interior of the country, noting its fauna, flora, and scenery. On the death of his father he gave up the management of these estates and returned to England, but only for a short time; so that, for twenty years from his first going to Demerara in 1804 till 1824, with the exception of a few visits to his ancestral home, he rambled about in South America, having no other object than the pursuit of natural history. Although not distinguished as a scientific man, he is well known as a good and enthusiastic field-naturalist, while his vivid and spirited style of writing has rendered his narratives popular. Waterton was eccentric and abstemious. He was noted as a skilful taxidermist, and his ornithological collection at Walton Hall was almost unrivalled. During the latter part of his life, settling in his ancestral home, which was on a small island in the midst of fine scenery, he surrounded himself with the creatures and pets he loved. He forbade the use of fire-arms on his grounds, so that they became the chosen haunt of many rare and shy birds and animals, and, to discourage poachers, he placed ingenious wooden images of game-birds in his trees. His adventures in South America, often daring, are graphically described in his "Wanderings in South America, the Northwest of the United States, and the Antilles, in 1812, 1816, 1820, and 1824; with Original Instructions for the Preservation of Birds, etc., for Cabinets of Natural History" (London, 1825). The frequent journeys that he afterward made to Belgium and Italy, with his home-life at Walton Hall, are described in the autobiography prefixed to his "Essays on Natural History, chiefly Ornithology" (3 vols., 1838-'44; new ed., with a continuation of the life, by Norman Moore, based entirely upon autobiographical notes, 1871). See also a life of him entitled "Charles Waterton, his Home, Habits, and Handiwork," by Richard Hobson, M. D. (1866).

WATIE, Stand, soldier, b. in Cherokee, Ga. (the site of the present city of Rome), in 1815; d. in August, 1877. He was a full-blooded Cherokee Indian, was educated at the mission schools in the Indian country, served as a member of the Cherokee legislative council, and was speaker of the lower house from 1862 till 1865. He became colonel of the 1st Cherokee Confederate infantry regiment in October, 1861, and was promoted brigadier-general in the Confederate army on 10 May, 1864. His brigade was composed of the 1st and 2d

Cherokee regiments of infantry, a Cherokee battalion of infantry, and a battalion each of Seminole and Osage Indians. He was a younger brother of Elias Boudinot and nephew of Maj. Ridge, who were assassinated in the Cherokee nation in 1839.

WATKINS, Louis Douglas, soldier, b. in Florida about 1835; d. in Baton Rouge, La., 29 March, 1868. He joined the U. S. army as 1st lieutenant, 14th infantry, 14 May, 1861, was transferred to the 5th cavalry, 22 June, 1861, and became captain, 17 July, 1862, and colonel of the 20th infantry, 28 July, 1866. He received the brevets of major, 8 Jan., 1863, for gallant service in the expedition to east Tennessee under Gen. Samuel P. Carter, lieutenant-colonel, 24 June, 1864, for service at Lafayette, and that of brigadier-general, 13 March, 1865. He was mustered out on 1 Sept., 1866.

WATKINS, Samuel, donor, b. in Campbell county, Va., in 1794; d. in Nashville, Tenn., 16 Oct., 1880. His parents died in his infancy, and he was bound to a Scotch family, whose cruelty to him attracted attention, and, owing to this, the county court placed him with the family of James Robertson, upon whose plantation he labored for several years. He then joined the U. S. army, served in the war against the Creek nation under Gen. Andrew Jackson, and was also at the battle of New Orleans. When peace was declared he returned to Nashville and became a brick-mason, pursuing this craft until 1827, when he began to erect houses and churches, among which were the 1st Baptist church and the 2d Presbyterian church in Nashville. During the civil war his farm of 600 acres was the battle-field of Nashville, his city buildings were destroyed, and his mansion was sacked and robbed, his loss amounting to $300,000. After the civil war he engaged in banking, manufacturing, and building, and dealt in real estate, was president of the Nashville gas-light company, and acquired a fortune. He bequeathed $130,000 for the establishment of a polytechnic institution in Nashville, which was erected there in 1882. Mr. Watkins made liberal provision for courses of free public lectures, and also classes in mathematics for those who could not attend colleges and schools.

WATKINS, Tobias, physician, b. in Maryland in 1780; d. in Washington, D. C., 14 Nov., 1855. He was graduated at St. John's college, Annapolis, in 1798, and at the Philadelphia medical college in 1802, and began practice in Havre de Grace, Md. Afterward he removed to Baltimore, where he edited the "Medical and Physical Recorder" in 1809. He was surgeon in the army during the war of 1812-'15, and was assistant surgeon-general of the United States in 1818-'21, and fourth auditor of the U. S. treasury in 1824-'9. With his brother-in-law, Stephen Simpson, Dr. Watkins edited in Philadelphia the "Portico" (4 vols., 1816-'20). He contributed to periodicals, and translated from the French Xavier Bichat's "Physiological Researches upon Life and Death" (Philadelphia, 1809), and Louis de Onis's "Memoir upon the Negotiations between Spain and the United States which led to the Treaty of 1819" (Baltimore, 1822).

WATKINS, William Brown, philologist, b. in Bridgeport, Belmont co., Ohio, 2 May, 1834. At an early age he removed to Wheeling, Va., where he received a public-school education and began the study of law, but abandoned it to enter the Pittsburgh conference of the Methodist Episcopal church. From 1868 till 1872 he was presiding elder at Steubenville, Ohio, after which he was stationed in Pittsburg for nine years. He was a delegate to the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1888, and has delivered many lectures on philology and educational subjects. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Mount Union college, Ohio, and Alleghany college, Meadville, Pa., in 1861, and that of D. D. by Mount Union in 1868. Besides contributing to reviews and magazines, chiefly on subjects pertaining to the English and Indian languages, he has prepared several school-books. Dr. Watkins is a reader of the historical dictionary of the Philological society now in course of publication in London, and for many years has been preparing an "Etymological Dictionary of American Geographical Names."

WATKINSON, David, philanthropist, b. in Lavenham, Suffolk, England, 17 Jan., 1778; d. in Hartford, Conn., 13 Dec., 1857. His education was partly conducted by Mrs. Anna Letitia Barbauld, and he came to this country with his parents in 1795, settling in Middletown, Conn. He was employed in a counting-house in New York city, and in 1800 began business with his brother, William, in Hartford. In 1841 he retired with a fortune. By his will he gave $40,000 to the Hartford hospital, $20,000 to the orphan asylum, $40,000 for the foundation of a juvenile asylum and farm school for neglected and abandoned children, and $100,000 for a library of reference in connection with the Connecticut historical society, also making the trustees of the library of reference residuary legatees of his estate.

WATMOUGH, John Goddard, soldier, b. in Wilmington, Del., 6 Dec., 1793; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 27 Nov., 1861. He entered the army as 3d lieutenant in the 2d artillery, 22 Sept., 1813, and was promoted 2d lieutenant, 19 April, 1814. He was present in the Niagara campaign of that year, and served under Capt. Alexander J. Williams at Fort Erie, where he was severely wounded. The effects of this wound he carried with him to the end of his life. For "gallant and meritorious conduct in defence of Fort Erie" Lieut. Watmough received the brevet of 1st lieutenant, 15 Aug., 1814. The same year Gen. Gaines, who has left on record the most exalted idea of his gallantry, intrepidity, and perseverance in battle, appointed him his aide-de-camp. On 1 Oct., 1816, he resigned his commission in the army, and from 1831 till 1835 he represented in congress one of the districts of Philadelphia county. From 1835 till 1838 he was high sheriff of that county, and in 1841 he was appointed surveyor of the port of Philadelphia. When the civil war opened, mortal disease alone prevented him, in spite of his advanced age, from pressing on the government his services for active command in the field.—His son, James Horatio, naval officer, b. in Whitmarsh, Montgomery co., Pa., 30 July, 1822, was an acting midshipman in the navy from 24 Nov., 1843, till October, 1844, and on 12 Dec., 1844, became paymaster. During the Mexican war he was in most of the operations in California, including the bombardment of Guaymas. From 1849 till 1855 he was on the brig "Perry" and the frigate "Constitution," on the coast of Africa; in 1857-'8 on the steamer "Michigan," on the lakes; in 1859-'60 on the sloop "Saratoga" and in action with two Spanish steamers, which were taken. In 1864-'5 he was fleet paymaster of the South Atlantic squadron and was in most of the operations of that squadron, including those on Stono river and on James and John islands previous to the evacuation of Charleston, S. C. He was subsequently general inspector, and from July, 1873, till November, 1877, paymaster-general. In 1884 he was retired.—Another son, Pendleton Gaines, naval officer, b. in Whitmarsh, Montgomery co., Pa., 3 May, 1828, entered the navy in 1841, served on the Brazil station, the Mediterranean, and the Pacific, and shared in the capture and occupation of California during the Mexican war. He returned home in 1847, the following year was graduated at the naval academy, served in the Mediterranean and Pacific and on the coast of China, and resigned in 1858. In April, 1861, he volunteered for the civil war and was reappointed in the navy. The same month he was sent to plant a battery at Perryville, Md., to cover the transportation thence to Annapolis, and for a short time was in command of a steamer on Chesapeake bay, keeping open communications, and subsequently on other active duty afloat. In October, 1861, he commanded the "Curlew," of Admiral Dupont's fleet, and shared in the capture of Port Royal. Later he was in command of the "Potomaska" in the capture of Fernandina and occupation of the inland waters of the South Atlantic. In 1863 he was ordered to the "Kansas," was in the two attacks on Fort Fisher, and in James river participated in the final operations against Richmond. He resigned as lieutenant-commander in July, 1865, and in 1869 was appointed by President Grant collector of the port of Cleveland, Ohio, which post he held for eight years.

WATSON, Alfred Augustin, P. E. bishop, b. in New York city, 21 Aug., 1818. He was graduated at the University of New York in 1837, studied law, and was admitted to practice in the supreme court of the state of New York in 1841. He followed his profession for little more than a year and then began his studies for holy orders. He was ordered deacon in St. Ann's church, Brooklyn, by Bishop Onderdonk, 3 Nov., 1844, and ordained priest in St. John's church, Fayetteville, N. C., by Bishop Ives, 25 May, 1845. He was rector of Grace church, Plymouth, and St. Luke's, Washington county, N. C., soon afterward, and remained there fourteen years. In 1858 he became rector of Christ church, New Berne, N. C. He served as chaplain to the 2d regiment of North Carolina state troops from 1861 till 1863, when he was elected assistant to Bishop Atkinson, in charge of St. James's church, Wilmington, N. C., of which he became rector in 1864, and served there until his consecration to the episcopate. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of North Carolina in June, 1868. Dr. Watson was a member of the diocesan standing committee, and for many years a deputy from the diocese of North Carolina to the general convention. He was consecrated bishop of east Carolina in St. James's church, Wilmington, 17 April, 1884.

WATSON, Benjamin Frank, lawyer, b. in Warner, N. H., 30 April, 1826. He lived in Lowell, Mass., from 1835 until 1848, studied law there and in Lawrence and Boston, and was admitted to the bar in 1850. He was editor and proprietor of the Lawrence "Sentinel," postmaster of the city under Presidents Pierce, Buchanan, and Lincoln, was nominated for mayor, and subsequently elected city solicitor. He was major of the 6th regiment of Massachusetts militia, and on 19 Jan., 1861, at a meeting of its field and company officers, Col. Edward F. Jones presiding, offered a resolution tendering the services of the regiment to the president of the United States, which was the first offer of any military organization. In April, 1861, the 6th Massachusetts regiment was the first to respond to the president's call for volunteers. The colonel with eight companies passed through Baltimore, on their way to Washington, with no interruption except insulting demonstrations, but as the car that contained Maj. Watson and part of his command was turning into Pratt street, it was derailed by the mob. He superintended its righting, and kept the driver of the horses to his duties at the muzzle of his revolver. The mob fired into the car repeatedly, and after one of his men had been wounded severely the order to fire was given by Maj. Watson. Afterward the detachment left the shattered car and marched to the depot, where the main body under the colonel had arrived in safety. Several soldiers were injured by stones and pistol-shots during the transit, and this was undoubtedly the first blood shed in the war. Shortly after this Maj. Watson was elected lieutenant-colonel of the regiment, and its command devolved upon him. In 1867 he removed to New York, where he has since practised law.

WATSON, Beriah André, physician, b. in Lake George, N. Y., 26 March, 1836. He obtained his education through his own exertion and was graduated at the medical department of the University of New York in 1861, and settled at White House, N. J. In 1862 he entered the U. S. service as contract surgeon, and he was engaged in hospital and field service until the end of the war. At his retirement, on 10 July, 1865, he was surgeon in charge of the 1st division 6th army corps hospital, and also acting medical purveyor. He then settled in Jersey City, where he still practises his profession. He was appointed attending surgeon to the Jersey City charity hospital at the time of its organization in 1869, and since 1873 has been attending surgeon to St. Francis hospital, and Christ's hospital since 1885. The passage of the act that legalized the dissection of the human cadaver in New Jersey was secured principally through his efforts and those of Dr. John D. McGill. Dr. Watson has been president of the New Jersey academy of medicine, of which he was a founder. Rutgers gave him the degree of M. A. in 1882. He has contributed essays and reports of cases to medical journals, including "A Case of Neuralgia treated by Extirpation of the Superior Maxillary Nerve" (1871); "Pathology and Treatment of Chronic Ulcers" (1875); "Cases of Rabies Canina treated with Strychina and Woorara" (1876); "Disease Germs: their Origin, Nature, and Relation to Wounds" (1878); "Woorara: its Medical Properties and Availability for the Treatment of Diseases" (1882); and an "Experimental Study of Anæsthetics," read before the American surgical association in Washington, D. C., 30 April, 1884. Dr. Watson has also translated medical essays from the French and German, and has published two books, "Amputations and their Complications" (Philadelphia, 1885) and "The Sportsman's Paradise, on the Lake Lands of Canada" (1888), and contributed the chapter on "Pyæmia and Septicæmia" to "Practical Medicine," edited by Dr. William Pepper (Philadelphia, 1885).

WATSON, Sir Brook, bart., English soldier, b. in Plymouth, England, 7 Feb., 1735; d. 2 Oct., 1807. At an early age he entered the British navy, but he was forced to abandon his profession, for, while he was bathing in the harbor of Havana, in 1749, his right leg was bitten off by a shark. He then engaged in mercantile pursuits and came to this country. In 1755 he was commissary with Col. Robert Monckton at the siege of Beauséjour, and in 1758 he served in the same capacity at Louisburg with Gen. James Wolfe's division, and was known as the "wooden-legged commissary." In 1759 he became a merchant in London, and he subsequently engaged in business in Montreal, Canada, and afterward in Boston. In 1763, with others, he obtained a grant from the government of Nova Scotia of the township of Cumberland. Before the Revolution he visited Massachusetts, New York, and other colonies, professing to be a Whig, but intercepted letters to Gen. Thomas Gage proved him to be a spy. In 1774 he went from Boston to England in the same ship with John Singleton Copley, who, in 1778, painted a picture of Brook Watson's rescue from the shark. When Lord North's bill to cut off the fisheries of New England was before parliament in 1775, he was examined by the house of commons. In 1782 he was made commissary-general to his friend, Sir Guy Carleton, in this country. From 1784 till 1793 he was a member of parliament from London, and he was sheriff of London and Middlesex in 1785, and lord mayor in 1796. In reward for his services in America, parliament voted his wife an annuity of £500 for life. He was agent in London for New Brunswick from 1786 till 1794, commissary-general to the Duke of York in 1793-'5, and of England from 1798 till 1806. He was made a baronet on 5 Dec., 1803.

WATSON, Ebenezer, editor, b. in Bethlehem, Conn., in 1744; d. in Hartford, Conn., 16 Sept., 1777. His ancestor, John Watson, came from England and settled in Hartford in 1644. For several years Ebenezer was the editor and publisher of "The Courant." It had been established in 1764 by Thomas Green, who took Watson into partnership, and, removing to New Haven about 1768, left him to be manager and editor of this journal. After his death his second wife, Hannah Bunce, conducted the paper and was probably the first woman to edit a journal in this country.—His brother, James, senator, b. in New York city, 6 April, 1750; d. there, 15 May, 1806, was graduated at Yale in 1776, engaged in mercantile business in New York, and acquired a large estate. He was a member of the Society of the Cincinnati, and served in the assembly in 1791-'6, and in the state senate in 1798. He was elected U. S. senator as a Democrat, in place of John Sloss Hobart, and served from 11 Dec., 1798, till 19 March, 1801, when he resigned to become U. S. navy agent for New York city.

WATSON, Elkanah, agriculturist, b. in Plymouth, Mass., 22 Jan., 1758; d. in Port Kent, N. Y., 5 Dec., 1842.

In September, 1773, he was apprenticed to John Brown, the Providence merchant, by whom he was sent in 1775 to Cambridge with a ton and a half of powder for Gen. Washington's army. He afterward went to the rescue of John Brown, who had been captured by the British. In 1777 he went to Charleston and other southern ports with more than $50,000 to be invested in cargoes for the European markets. The description of this journey that he subsequently published is the best extant account of the principal towns and villages of the colonies at the time of the Revolution. In August, 1779, he was the bearer of despatches from the American government to Dr. Benjamin Franklin at Paris, who gave him letters of introduction to eminent English statesmen. He engaged in mercantile pursuits in Nantes, but after three years of prosperity lost his property. He then visited England, where he contributed to the relief of Com. Silas Talbot, who was confined in the Mills prison, near Plymouth, went to Holland and Flanders in 1784, and returned to Newport in December of that year, bringing with him a present of books from Dr. Sharp, a brother of Granville Sharp, to Gen. Washington, whom he visited at "Mt. Vernon." Mr. Watson says: "I remained alone in the society of Washington for two days, the richest of my life." Much of the conversation of Washington was in regard to his plans for improving the navigation of the Potomac, and Mr. Watson thus became interested in schemes of internal improvement. He went to South Carolina, where he engaged in trade between that state and Hayti. In 1789 he removed from Providence, R. I., to Albany, N. Y., where for eighteen years he was an active promoter of public enterprises, including the improvement of the navigation of Hudson river, the projection of an interior canal for New York state, the establishment of the Albany bank, the paving of the city, the organization of stage routes to the west, and the advancement of agriculture and education. In 1791, with Jeremiah Van Rensselaer, Gen. Philip Van Cortlandt, and Stephen Bayard, he made a tour through the state to examine into the practicability of the schemes for inland navigation. After travelling several years in Europe, he published in London an account of his pioneer trip in western New York. In 1807 he removed to Pittsfield, Mass., where he engaged in farming, introduced merino sheep into Berkshire county, and founded there the Berkshire agricultural society. In 1816 he returned to Albany, and in that year organized the first agricultural society in New York. He visited Michigan, examined the lake region, and explored the route to Montreal with a view to its improvement and to connect the lake region with the seaboard. He again visited Europe, and in 1828 settled in Port Kent, on Lake Champlain. Besides frequent contributions to periodicals, he published many pamphlets on agriculture and economical topics, and was the author of a "Tour in Holland in MDCCCLXXXIV, by an American" (Worcester, 1790); "History of the Rise, Progress, and Existing Condition of the Western Canals in the State of New York, 1788-1819," etc. (Albany, 1820); "Rise, Progress, and Existing State of Modern Agricultural Societies" (1820); and "History of Agricultural Societies on the Modern Berkshire System" (1820). A pamphlet was published by Col. Robert Troup entitled "A Vindication of the Claim of Elkanah Watson to the Merit of projecting the Lake Canal Policy" (Geneva, 1831); and his son, Winslow C. Watson, edited a valuable autobiographical work entitled "Men and Times of the Revolution, or Memoirs of Elkanah Watson; including Journals of Travels in Europe and America from 1777 to 1842; with his Correspondence with Public Men, and Reminiscences and Incidents of the Revolution" (New York and London, 1855; 2d ed., with illustrations, 1856).—His son, Winslow Cossoul, author, b. in Albany, N. Y., 22 Dec., 1803, published a "Treatise on Practical Husbandry" (2 parts, Albany, 1854-'5); "Eulogy on Lieut.-Col. G. T. Thomas" (Burlington, N. J., 1862); "Pioneer History of the Champlain Valley, being an Account of the Settlement of the Town of Willsborough, by William Gilliland, together with his Journal and other Papers and a Memoir" (Albany, 1863); "The History of Essex County, New York, and Military Annals of Ticonderoga and Crown Point, etc." (1870); and addresses, pamphlets, and religious, political, and agricultural papers in periodicals.

WATSON, Henry Clay, author, b. in Baltimore, Md., in 1831; d. in Sacramento, Cal., 10 July, 1869. He removed to Philadelphia, Pa., at an early age, adopted the profession of journalism, and was editorially connected with the "North American," the "Evening Journal," and other papers. He subsequently removed to California, and at the time of his death edited the Sacramento "Times." He was the author of several volumes of hunting adventure, besides which his publications include "Camp-Fires of the Revolution" (Philadelphia, 1851); "Nights in a Block-House" (1852); "Old Bell of Independence" (1852); "The Yankee Teapot" (1853); "Lives of the Presidents of the United States" (Boston, 1853); "Heroic Women of History" (Philadelphia, 1853); "The Ladies' Glee-Book" (New York, 1854); "The Masonic Musical Manual" (1855); and "Camp-Fires of Napoleon" (Philadelphia, 1856).

WATSON, Henry Cood, musical critic, b. in London, England, in 1816; d. in New York city, 2 Dec., 1875. His father was conductor of the orchestra at Covent Garden theatre, and his sisters were well-known oratorio-singers. He had a fine voice, and made his début in the first performance of Weber's opera "Oberon" at Covent Garden, in November, 1829. Subsequently he achieved success in London as a composer and musical critic, came to this country in 1840, and was art-critic for the New York "World," in which he published several poems. He became connected with the "Musical Chronicle" in 1843, and contributed to various periodicals. In 1844 he was art and musical critic for the New York "Albion," and in 1845 was associated with Charles F. Briggs and Edgar Allan Poe in founding the "Broadway Journal." He founded the "Musical Guest," a monthly magazine, separate editions of which were devoted to sacred and operatic music, and published in it many of his own compositions. For several years previous to 1861 he was editor-in-chief of Frank Leslie's "Illustrated Newspaper and Ladies' Magazine." In 1862 he founded the "Art Journal," and in 1863 became musical critic of the New York "Tribune." He was a founder of the New York Philharmonic society, of the American Musical fund association, and of the Vocal society (afterward called the Mendelssohn union), and was associated with William Vincent Wallace and Carlos D. Stuart in organizing the famous Mendelssohn concert at Castle Garden. Mr. Watson wrote the libretto for Wallace's opera "Lurline" (1854).

WATSON, James Craig, astronomer, b. in Fingal, Ontario, Canada, 28 Jan., 1838; d. in Madison, Wis., 23 Nov., 1880. He was of American ancestry, and was born during a visit of his parents to Canada. He was graduated at the University of Michigan in 1857, and in his junior year performed the phenomenal task of reading Laplace's "Mécanique céleste" from beginning to end. During his final year he was the sole pupil in the observatory, where he spent part of his time in grinding lenses and in the construction of a telescope. On his graduation he became assistant to the chair of astronomy, and in his work he displayed such aptitude as an observer and such rapidity in his computations that in 1859 he was appointed professor of astronomy. In 1860 he was given the department of physics, but in 1863 resumed charge of the department of astronomy, and was made director of the observatory. In 1879 he was called to the chair of astronomy and the directorship of Washburn observatory in the University of Wisconsin. He discovered a comet on 29 April, 1856, while he was still an undergraduate, and on 20 Oct., 1857, he discovered independently an asteroid that had been found a few days previously. In 1858 he devoted his attention to Donati's comet, and his computation of its orbit is accepted as authoritative. His first independent planetary discovery was on 14 Sept., 1863, of the asteroid Eurynome, and on 9 Jan., 1864, the comet known as 1,863, vi., which had previously been noted, was found by him. He discovered on 7 Oct., 1865, the asteroid that has since been named Io, and on 24 Aug., 1867, he discovered Minerva, and on 6 Sept., 1867, Aurora. During 1868 he added six minor planets to the solar system. He was a member of the government expedition to observe the solar eclipse at Mount Pleasant, Iowa, in 1869, and was sent on a similar mission in 1870 to Carlelenti, Sicily. In 1874 he was appointed to the charge of the American party that observed the transit of Venus from Peking, China. On this expedition he made his eighteenth planetary discovery, to which he gave the name Juewa. Prof. Watson was one of the judges of award at the World's fair in Philadelphia in 1876, and wrote a "Report on Horological Instruments." In 1878 he had charge of the government expedition to Wyoming to observe the total solar eclipse, and on that occasion he paid special attention to the existence of an intra-Mercurial planet as well as that of an extra-Neptunian one, in both of which he believed. On 29 July, 1878, he determined the exact locality of what he believed to be "Vulcan," and he further satisfied himself of the existence of a second intra-Mercurial planet. Subsequent to his removal to Madison he devoted his energies to remodelling the observatory structure, and introducing original features of his own devising. For many years he was actuary of the Michigan mutual life insurance company, and by commercial enterprises he acquired a moderate fortune, of which he bequeathed $16,000 to the National academy of sciences, the income of which is used partly as a research fund and partly for the Watson medal. The total number of asteroids that he discovered was twenty-three, and in 1870 he received the Lalande gold medal from the French academy of sciences for the discovery of six asteroids in one year. In 1875 the khedive of Egypt made him knight commander of the Imperial order of the Medjidieh. The degree of Ph. D. was conferred on him by the University of Leipsic in 1870, and that of LL. D. by Columbia in 1877. In 1867 he was elected to the National academy of sciences. His contributions to astronomical journals were frequent, besides which he published a "Popular Treatise on Comets" (Philadelphia, 1860); "Theoretical Astronomy" (1868); and "Tables for Calculation of Simple and Compound Interest and Discount" (Ann Arbor, 1879).

WATSON, James Madison, author, b. in Onondaga county, N. Y., 8 Feb., 1827. He was educated in the public schools, studied law, and was admitted to the bar of Syracuse, N. Y., in 1853. He then connected himself with the publishing-house of A. S. Barnes and Co., New York city, and, aided by Richard G. Parker, prepared a series of "National Readers and Spellers" (New York, 1853-'5). For the subsequent twelve years he devoted himself to teaching in New York and adjacent states. He settled in Elizabeth, N. J., in 1871, became president of the city board of education, was president of the New Jersey sanitary association in 1871 and 1882, and of the Temperance reform and order club. He has given much time and study to temperance and sanitary reforms, and to physical training. He has published "Hand-Book of Gymnastics and Calisthenics" (New York, 1864); "Manual of Calisthenics" (1864); a series of "Independent Readers" (1868-'71); and one of "Independent Spellers" (1871-'8).

WATSON, James Muir, naval officer, b. in Virginia, 15 July, 1808; d. in Vallejo, Cal., 17 April, 1873. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 1 Feb., 1823, and became a lieutenant, 30 Dec., 1831. On 14 March, 1847, he took command of the store-ship "Erie," in which he served during the Mexican war. On 11 Nov., 1847, under direction of Com. Shubrick, he commanded the naval force of 600 men in the boats of the "Independence," "Congress," "Cyane," and "Erie," with which he captured the city of Mazatlan without resistance from the Mexicans, who retreated to the interior. He returned from this cruise in command of the "Erie," 24 June, 1848, was placed on the reserved list, 13 Sept., 1855, and was unemployed, waiting orders, the rest of his life, except in 1863-'6, when he served as light-house inspector. He was commissioned a commander on the reserved list, 1 Feb., 1861, retired 21 Dec., 1861, and was promoted to commodore on the retired list, 16 July, 1862. He resided in California after he was put on the reserved list until his death.

WATSON, James V., author, b. in London, England, in 1814; d. in Chicago, Ill., 17 Oct., 1856. He came to this country at the age of six years, and in 1832 entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church, afterward receiving the degree of D. D. He was editor of the "Michigan Christian Advocate" and of the "Northwestern Christian Advocate" in Chicago in 1852-'6, and was the author of "Helps to the Promotion of Revivals" (New York, 1856) and "Tales and Takings, Sketches and Incidents from the Itinerant and Editorial Budget of the Rev. J. V. Watson" (1857).

WATSON, John, physician, b. in Londonderry, Ireland, 16 April, 1807; d. in New York city, 3 June, 1863. He came to this country with his parents in 1810, settled in New York city in 1818, was graduated at the New York college of physicians and surgeons in 1832, and was on the surgical staff of the New York hospital in 1832-'3. In 1833-'5 he was physician of the New York dispensary, and from 1839 till 1862 he was an attending surgeon of the New York hospital, where he introduced many reforms and improvements. In connection with Dr. Henry D. Bulkley, he established an infirmary for cutaneous diseases, which was organized soon afterward as the Broome street school of medicine, where Dr. Watson held the chair of surgical pathology. He was instrumental in organizing the New York medical and surgical society, the American medical association, and the New York academy of medicine, of which latter institution he was president in 1859-'60. With Dr. John A. Swett he established the "New York Medical and Surgical Journal." Dr. Watson was the author of numerous reports, essays, and reviews in professional journals, and published a "Lecture on Practical Education in Medicine and on the Course of Instruction at the New York Hospital" (New York, 1846); "Thermal Ventilation and other Sanitary Improvements applicable to Public Buildings and recently adopted at the New York Hospital" (1851); "The Medical Profession in Ancient Times" (1856); "The Parish

Will Case Critically Examined in Reference to the Mental Competency of Mr. Henry Parish to execute the Codicils appended to his Will; and Notes in Reply to an Article entitled 'The Parish Will' (1857); "The True Physician" (1860); "Obscurities of Disease"; "Clinical Acumen, or the Sources of Misjudgment in the Study of Disease"; and a "History of Medicine" (1862).

WATSON, John Tadwell, British soldier, b. in London, England, in 1748; d. in Calais, France, 11 June, 1826. He entered the 3d foot-guards in April, 1767, and became captain and lieutenant-colonel in November, 1778. In the spring of 1781, with 500 picked men, he undertook the destruction of Gen. Francis Marion's brigade. After several skirmishes, and being constantly annoyed by the wary partisan, whom he could not bring to a conflict except on his own terms, he fled to Georgetown, complaining that Marion "would not fight like a gentleman or a Christian." He became colonel in 1783, and general in April, 1808.

WATSON, John Whitaker, poet, b. in New York city, 14 Oct., 1824; died there, 18 July, 1890. He was educated at the New York University, and studied medicine, but became a journalist and engraver. He wrote forty-eight serials for a weekly paper, some of which have been dramatized, notably the story of "Thirty Millions," under the title of "The World." He published "Beautiful Snow, and other Poems" (Philadelphia, 1869).

WATSON, Paul Barron, author, b. in Morristown, N. J., 25 March, 1861. He was graduated at Harvard in 1881, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1885, and practises in Boston. He has published a "Bibliography of the Pre-Columbian Discoveries of America" in the "Library Journal" (1881), which was reprinted in Rasmus B. Anderson's "America not Discovered by Columbus" (Chicago, 1884), and is the author of a "Life of Marcus Aurelius" (New York, 1884).

WATSON, Sereno, botanist, b. in East Windsor Hill, Conn., 1 Dec., 1826. He was graduated at Yale in 1847. From 1867 till 1871 he was botanist to the U. S. geological exploration of the 40th parallel under Clarence King. In 1874 he became curator of the herbarium of Harvard, which place he still holds. The degree of Ph. D. was conferred on him by Iowa college in 1878. He is a fellow of the American academy of arts and sciences, and of the American association for the advancement of science. Besides numerous contributions to scientific journals on American botany, he is the author of vol. v. on "Botany" in the series of "Reports of the Geological Exploration of the 40th Parallel" (Washington, 1871); "Bibliographical Index to North American Botany, Part I., Polypetalæ" (1878); and, in connection with William H. Brewer and Asa Gray, "Botany of California" (2 vols., Cambridge, 1876-'80).

WATSON, William, educator, b. in Nantucket, Mass., 19 Jan., 1834. He was graduated at the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard in 1857, where he was then instructor in differential and integral calculus until 1859, meanwhile taking a second degree in 1858. From 1859 till 1863 he was in Europe collecting information on technical education, which he communicated to William B. Rogers, who made it the basis of the scheme of organization of the Massachusetts institute of technology in Boston. He also took a partial course at the École des ponts et chaussées in Paris, and received in 1862 the degree of Ph. D. from the University of Jena, Germany. In 1865 he became professor of mechanical engineering and descriptive geometry in the Institute of technology, which chair he held until 1873. He was a commissioner to the World's fair in Vienna in 1873, and served on the international jury of that in Paris in 1878, during which year he was honorary vice-president of the Paris congress of hygiene, and honorary president of the Paris congress of architects. He held the same relation to the French association for the advancement of science in 1878, 1881, and 1883. Prof. Watson is a member of engineering societies in this country and abroad, and was elected secretary of the American academy of arts and sciences in 1884. In addition to papers that he has read before learned societies, he has published "Technical Education" (printed privately, Boston, 1872); "Course in Descriptive Geometry for the Use of Colleges and Scientific Schools" (1873); "Report on the Civil Engineering, Public Works, and Architecture of the Vienna Exhibition" (Washington, 1876); and "Course in Shades and Shadows" (Boston, 1885).

WATSON, William Robinson, politician, b. in South Kingston, R. I., 14 Dec., 1799; d. in Providence, R. I., 29 Aug., 1864. He was graduated at Brown in 1823, studied law in Providence, and was admitted to the bar, but engaged little in the practice of his profession, devoting his life chiefly to politics. From 1827 till 1833, and again in 1835, he was clerk of the court of common pleas for the county of Providence. In 1841-'5, and 1849-'54, he was collector of the port of Providence. In 1854 he was chosen secretary of state of Rhode Island, but he lost his election the following year, when the Native American party carried the state. In 1856 he was appointed by the general assembly state auditor, serving until May, 1863. He frequently edited political journals, and wrote for the press, vindicating and explaining the doctrines of the Whig party with great vigor. The most elaborate of his writings was a series of papers that was first published in 1844 in the Providence "Journal," under the signature of "Hamilton," and which were afterward printed in pamphlet-form.—His son, William Henry, physician, b. in Providence, R. I., 8 Nov., 1829, was graduated at Brown in 1852, studied medicine in Providence, and, after receiving his degree in 1854, settled in Utica, N. Y. He also received the honorary degree of M. D. from the University of the state of New York in 1878. He travelled extensively in Europe to study the various systems of medical education, and on his return delivered an address at the 23d convocation of the University of the state of New York on 9 July, 1885, in which he insisted that it is the prerogative of the state to determine the educational qualifications of physicians, and that there must be an entire separation of the teaching from the licensing interests. This address received the unanimous approval of the convocation, and widely attracted public attention. He was examiner in diagnosis and pathology in the State board of medical examination from 1872 till 1881, U. S. examining pension surgeon from 1875 till 1881, surgeon-general of New York state from 1880 till 1883, and since 1882 has been regent of the University of the state of New York. Dr. Watson has been active in establishing homœopathic societies and institutions, was a founder of the Homœopathic medical society of Oneida county, N. Y., and was its president in 1860-'1, and in 1868 became president of the Homœopathic medical society of New York state. He was a founder of the New York state homœopathic asylum for the insane at Middletown, and was a trustee in 1873-'6. He was appointed a commissioner of the state reservation at Niagara in 1888. In addition to addresses, he is the author of several monographs and papers, including "The Past and Present Position of Homœopathy and the Duties of its Practitioners" (1861); "Cerebro-Spinal Meningitis" (1863); "Nosological Classification of Disease," with Dr. Horace M. Paine (1863); "The Medical Profession, its Duties and Responsibilities, and the Relation of the Homœopathic to its Allopathic Branch" (1869); "No Sectarian Tests for Office, and No Sectarian Monopoly of National Institutions" (1871); "The Homœopathic School" (1872); and "The Advanced Medical Act" (1872).

WATTEAU, Boudoin Louis (vat-to), French explorer, b. in Douai in 1570; d. in Paris in 1627. He traded with the West Indies and South America, visited also Brazil, and, lured by accounts of riches in the fabulous Eldorado, induced merchants of Douai and Dunkirk to arm an expedition to explore Guiana. The scheme failed, as the company of the twelve lords refused permission to enter the country, and Watteau sailed for the Indies, where he took a cargo for the western coast of Peru, returning by way of the Strait of Magellan in 1624-'6. He went afterward to Paris to solicit permission to establish a colony in Patagonia, but he died without obtaining the grant. He wrote "Voyage des Français aux Indes Orientales, Pérou, détroit de Magellan, Patagonie et au Brésil, fait pendant les années 1624-'6" (2 vols., Paris, 1627). This is a curious work, which contains interesting details on the manner of trading in India and Peru at the beginning of the 17th century. It was never reprinted, and only a few copies are known to exist. One of them was sold in 1829 for $280.

WATTERS, John, naval officer, b. in Michigan, 5 Jan., 1831; d. in Baltimore, Md., 22 Jan., 1874. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 12 Feb., 1846, was promoted to lieutenant, 16 Sept., 1855, and was on duty as an instructor at the naval academy in 1857-'9. While he was attached to the "Minnesota" the civil war began, and he was actively employed in engagements and captures at Hatteras inlet and in the sounds of North Carolina. He served in command of boat expeditions by which he captured several blockade-runners in the vicinity of Fort Monroe, and he also participated in the engagements with the "Merrimac" and the batteries at Sewell's point. He was promoted to lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, was executive officer of the steamer "Monongahela" in Farragut's squadron, and during the operations against Port Hudson and Vicksburg commanded the gun-boat "Kineo." He was assigned to patrol Mississippi river in this vessel in 1863-'5, and convoyed army transports by the Confederate batteries along the banks of the river. He was promoted to commander, 14 April, 1867, and was attached to the naval academy in 1866-'8. He was assigned the sloop "Cyane," in the Pacific squadron, in 1868-'9, and was stationed at the New York navy-yard, in 1870-'3, on the receiving-ship. In 1873 he had of charge the "Ossipee" on the North Atlantic station, from which he was detached just before his death.

WATTERS, William, clergyman, b. in Baltimore, Md., 16 Oct., 1751; d. in Fairfax county, Va., 29 March, 1829. His parents were Episcopalians, but he became a convert to Methodism in 1771, and in the following year began to preach. In 1773 he was received on trial by the Philadelphia conference, thus becoming the first native Methodist itinerant in this country. He preached in New Jersey, Maryland, and Virginia till 1805, when he retired to his farm on Potomac river. His seven brothers were among the first in that region to open their house to Methodist preachers, and his home was looked upon as the headquarters of Methodism in that region.

WATTERSON, Harvey McGee, journalist, b. in Bedford county, Tenn., 23 Nov., 1811. He was educated at Cumberland college, Princeton, Ky., and established a newspaper at Shelbyville, Tenn., the capital of his native county, in 1831. He was elected to the legislature in 1835, served in congress in 1839-'43, having been chosen as a Democrat, declined a re-election in the latter year, and was sent by the president on a diplomatic mission to Buenos Ayres. On his return in 1845 he was elected to the state senate, and chosen president of that body. He was owner and editor of the Nashville "Union" from 1850 till the close of 1851, was connected with the editorial department of the Washington "Union" in 1853-'4, was a delegate to the National Democratic convention of 1860, where he voted for the nomination of Stephen A. Douglas, was an elector for the state at large on the Douglas ticket the same year, and chosen to the State convention in February, 1861, as a Unionist. He practised law in Washington for fourteen years after the war, and since 1878 has been a member of the editorial staff of the Louisville "Courier-Journal."—His son, Henry, journalist, b. in Washington, D. C., 16 Feb., 1840, in consequence of defective eyesight, was educated chiefly by private tutors. He entered the profession of journalism in Washington in 1858, and in 1861, returning to Tennessee, he edited the "Republican Banner" in Nashville. He served on the Confederate side during the civil war in various capacities, being a staff-officer in 1861-'3, and chief of scouts in Gen. Joseph E. Johnston's army in 1864. After the war he revived the "Banner," but soon afterward went to Louisville, Ky., to reside, and in 1867 succeeded George D. Prentice as editor of the "Journal." In the year following he united the "Courier" and the "Times" with it, and in connection with Walter N. Haldeman founded the "Courier-Journal," of which he has since been the editor. He was a member of congress from 12 Aug., 1876, till 3 March, 1877, being chosen to fill a vacancy, but, with this exception, has always declined public office. He has sat for Kentucky as delegate-at-large in four National Democratic conventions, presiding over the St. Louis convention in 1876, and serving as chairman of the platform committees in the Cincinnati convention in 1880 and in the one at St. Louis in 1888. He is identified with the revenue-reform movement of the Democratic party as an aggressive advocate of free-trade ideas. He was a personal friend and a resolute follower of Samuel J. Tilden. Mr. Watterson has often appeared as a public speaker, notably on political occasions, and his advice is sought by the leaders of his party. He has also contributed freely to periodicals, and edited "Oddities of Southern Life and Character" (Boston, 1882).

WATTERSON, John Ambrose, R. C. bishop, b. in Blairsville, Indiana co., Pa., 27 May, 1844. After being graduated at Mount St. Mary's college, Emmitsburg, in 1865, he studied for the priesthood and was ordained on 8 Aug., 1868. He was then appointed professor in Mount St. Mary's, and in 1877 he was made president. In 1880 he was nominated bishop of Columbus, and was consecrated on 8 Aug. of that year. He devoted himself specially to the work of education, and in 1884 founded a college in Columbus. The diocese contains 92 churches, 37 chapels and stations, 80 priests, and 17 ecclesiastical students.

WATTERSTON, George, librarian, b. in New York city, 23 Oct., 1783; d. in Washington, D. C., 4 Feb., 1854. He was educated at Charlotte Hall college, St. Mary's county, Md., studied law, and followed his profession in Maryland and in the District of Columbia. In 1814 he served in the defence of Washington against the British, and in March, 1815, was appointed the first librarian of congress, which place he held until 1829. He was also secretary to the National Washington monument association from its inception. He was the author of numerous books, including "Letters from Washington" (Washington, 1818); "Course of Study preparatory to the Bar or the Senate" (1823); and "The Wanderer in Washington" (1827).

WATTS, Frederick, soldier, b. in Wales, 1 June, 1719; d. on his farm on Juniata river, 3 Oct., 1795. He received a fair English education, came to this country with his wife and family about 1760, and settled in Cumberland county, Pa. When the Revolutionary war began he became a member of the Cumberland county committee, and was commissioned a lieutenant-colonel of one of the associated battalions. When the Flying camp was organized by direction of congress he was in command of the battalion that was assigned to Cumberland county, which was captured at the surrender of Fort Washington, 16 Nov., 1776. After his exchange he served in various capacities. He was commissioned justice of the peace, 1 April, 1778, chosen representative to the assembly in 1779, and appointed a sub-lieutenant of Cumberland county in 1780. He was commissioned brigadier-general of Pennsylvania militia, 27 May, 1782, in which capacity he did excellent service in protecting the frontier counties of the state from the wild savages and marauding Tories. He was a member of the supreme executive council from October, 1787, until its abolition by the state constitution of 1790. At the close of his official life he returned to his farm on the Juniata.—His son, David, lawyer, b. in Cumberland county, Pa., 29 Oct., 1764; d. in Carlisle, Pa., 25 Sept., 1819, was graduated at Dickinson college in 1787, read law in Philadelphia under William Lewis, and was admitted to the bar in October, 1790. For a long period he was the leader at the bar in the interior of Pennsylvania, and his practice extended over two thirds of the state. He was an impassioned, forcible, and fluent speaker.—David's son, Frederick, jurist, b. in Carlisle, Pa., 9 May, 1801, was graduated at Dickinson college in 1819, entered the office of Andrew Carothers as a law-student in 1821, and was admitted to the bar in August, 1824. In 1845 he became president of the Cumberland Valley railroad, and through his energy that corporation was brought to a high state of prosperity. He was commissioned, 9 March, 1849, president-judge of the 9th judicial district of Pennsylvania, which office he filled until 1852, when the elective judiciary began. He then resumed his practice at the bar at Carlisle, which has been one of great activity and success. In 1871 he was tendered the appointment of commissioner of agriculture, which he at first declined; but, the offer being renewed, he accepted the appointment, and entered upon his duties on 1 Aug. of that year, serving till 1877, when he retired to Carlisle. As state reporter he edited the reports of the supreme court from 1832 till 1840 (10 vols., Philadelphia, 1834-'41), and subsequently he edited the reports from 1841 till 1845 (9 vols., 1842-'6).—Another son of David, Henry Miller, lawyer, b. in Carlisle, Pa., 10 Oct., 1805, was graduated at Dickinson college in 1824, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1827, and began practice at Pittsburg. He served as deputy attorney-general in 1828-'9, sat in the legislature in 1835-'8, and in 1841 was appointed U. S. attorney for the eastern district of Pennsylvania. He visited Europe in 1857, in 1861 was one of the founders of the Union league of Philadelphia, and in 1868-'9 was U. S. minister to Austria. After leaving Vienna, Mr. Watts visited several countries in Europe, and on his return engaged in the development of the iron and coal interests of his state.

WATTS, John, loyalist, b. in New York city, 16 April, 1715; d. in Wales in August, 1789. He married Ann, daughter of Stephen De Lancey, in July, 1742, represented New York city in the assembly for many years, and was a member of the council in 1757-'75. He was one of the wealthiest land-proprietors of the colony, one of the original founders and trustees of the New York society library in 1754, presented its first clock to the New York exchange in 1760, and the same year was elected the first president of the New York city hospital. He was opposed to the Revolution, and in 1775 removed to England. His estate was confiscated, but part of it was repurchased and reconveyed on 1 July, 1784, to his sons, Robert and John. His wife, Ann De Lancey, died two months after leaving New York. His daughter, Ann (died in 1793) married Capt. Archibald Kennedy, of the royal navy, who became eleventh Earl of Cassilis. Their son, the twelfth earl, was born in this country.—John's son, John, b. in New York city, 27 Aug., 1749; d. there, 3 Sept., 1836, was the last royal recorder of the city of New York. He served three times as speaker of the New York assembly, was a member of congress in 1793-'6, and from 1802 till 1808 was judge of Westchester county. John G. Leake, a wealthy resident of New York city, dying childless, left his extensive properties to his relative, Robert J. Watts, on condition that Mr. Watts should assume the name of Leake. The gentleman, the only living son of John Watts, Jr., accepted the property on the terms mentioned, but very soon died. Mr. Leake's will being defective as to the real estate, that escheated to the state of New York, and the personal property went to his father, who, being grieved that his only male representative should have consented to change his name, and deeply afflicted by the loss of his son, determined that he would not benefit personally by the money thus acquired, but apply it to the purpose designed by Mr. Leake in case Robert J. Watts had not assumed his name. John Watts then founded and endowed the charity entitled the Leake and Watts orphan-house. In 1887 the institution was removed to Westchester county, N. Y., the property having been purchased as a site for the Protestant Episcopal cathedral. Mr. Watts married his cousin, Jane De Lancey, and they were considered the handsomest couple of the day.

WATTS, Robert, educator, b. in Fordham, N. Y., in 1812; d. in Paris, France, 8 Sept., 1867. He was graduated at Columbia in 1831 and at the College of physicians and surgeons in 1835. While an undergraduate he was appointed lecturer on anatomy in Vermont medical college, and in 1838 he was professor of anatomy there and at the Berkshire medical institution at Pittsfield, Mass. From 1839 till his death he was professor of anatomy in the College of physicians and surgeons, New York city, and from 1859 he was one of the attending physicians of the Nursery and child's hospital. During all this period he was extensively engaged in private practice. He was one of the founders of the New York pathological society and for several years its presiding officer. Dr. Watts contributed many articles to medical periodicals and revised and edited, with notes, several manuals of anatomy.

WATTS, Robert, author, b. in Moneylane, County Down, Ireland, 10 July, 1820. He removed to this country and was graduated at Washington college, Lexington, Va., in 1849, and at Princeton theological seminary in 1852. He entered the ministry of the Presbyterian church, established the Westminster church in Philadelphia, Pa., in 1852, and became its pastor in 1853. Returning to Ireland, he was installed as pastor in Dublin in 1863, and in 1866 was appointed professor of systematic theology in the Assembly's college at Belfast. He has published "Calvin and Calvinism" (Edinburgh, 1866); "Utilitarianism" (Belfast, 1868); "What is Presbyterianism?" (1870); "Prelatic Departures from Reformation Principles" (Edinburgh, 1871); "Arminian Departures from Reformation Principles" (1871); "Atomism" (Belfast, 1874); "Herbert Spencer's Biological Hypothesis" (1875); "The Doctrine of Eternal Punishment" (1877); "The New Apologetic" (Edinburgh, 1879); "The Newer Criticism" (1881); and "The Rule of Faith and the Doctrine of Inspiration" (London, 1885).

WATTS, Stephen, lawyer, b. about 1743; d. in Louisiana in 1788. He was the son of Stephen Watts, of Southampton, Bucks co., Pa., and was graduated at the College of Philadelphia (now University of Pennsylvania) in 1762, becoming a tutor while still a student. In 1766 John Sargent, a member of the British parliament, offered to the college a gold medal for the best English essay on the "Reciprocal Advantage of a Perpetual Union between Great Britain and her American Colonies." Young Watts competed for the medal, and his essay on the subject was published (Philadelphia, 1766). The medal was won by John Morgan, who shortly afterward became the founder of the first medical school in America. Watts was elected on 8 March, 1768, a member of the American philosophical society. He studied law, and in 1769 was admitted to the bar in Philadelphia. In 1774 he settled in Louisiana, and afterward became recorder of deeds of the English settlement on the Mississippi. His wife was a daughter of Ralph Assheton, a provincial councillor of Pennsylvania, and his daughter, Margaret Cyrilla, became the wife of Don Manuel Gago de Lemos, who was brigadier-general and governor of the Spanish colony at Natchez until 1797, when he succeeded the Baron de Carondelet as governor of Louisiana. Mr. Watts contributed to John Beveridge's "Epistolæ Familiares" (1765).

WATTS, Thomas Hill, statesman, b. in Butler county, Ala., 3 Jan., 1819. He was graduated at the University of Virginia in 1840, and began the practice of law at Greenville, in his native county, in 1841. In 1842 he was elected to the legislature, and he was returned in 1844 and 1845. He removed to Montgomery county in 1847, and was in 1849 sent to the legislature from that district and in 1853 to the state senate. In 1861, with William L. Yancey, he represented Montgomery county in the Secession convention. In the same year he went to the seat of war as colonel of the 17th Alabama regiment, remaining there until April, 1862, when he was called by Jefferson Davis to act as attorney-general in his cabinet. In 1863 he was elected governor of Alabama, and he held this post until the close of the civil war. He is active in the religious enterprises of the Baptist denomination, to which he belongs.

WAUGH, Beverly, M. E. bishop, b. in Fairfax county, Va., 28 Oct., 1789; d. in Baltimore, Md., 9 Feb., 1858. At the age of fifteen he became a member of the Methodist church at Alexandria, Va. It is supposed that he was employed in one of the government offices for three or four years, for through life he was noted for his excellent penmanship and accuracy in accounts. From the time he was eighteen years old until a short time before his death he kept a journal which amounted to several manuscript volumes. In 1808 he entered the ministry, and at the end of three years he was stationed in the city of Washington. He was elected by the Baltimore conferences to the general conferences of 1816 and 1820. In 1824, on account of his favoring the election of presiding elders, which the majority of his conference did not approve, he was not a representative. In 1828 he was again elected a member, and he was at that time chosen assistant editor and book-agent and removed to the city of New York. In 1832 he was made principal agent, though not a member of the general conference, and in 1836 he was made bishop. In this post he continued, travelling almost constantly until 1852, when he became senior bishop of the church. After that time his health gradually failed until he died. He is buried in Mount Olivet cemetery, Baltimore, near the graves of Bishops Asbury and Emory.

WAUL, Thomas N., lawyer, b. in Sumter district, S. C., 8 Jan., 1815. He was educated at the University of South Carolina, studied law in Vicksburg, Miss., under Sargeant S. Prentiss, and began to practise in 1835. While residing in Mississippi he was chosen judge of the circuit court. Having removed to Texas, he was elected one of her representatives in the 1st Confederate congress. He was a brigadier-general in the Confederate army, having raised a command that was known as "Waul's legion," and he was severely wounded during an engagement in Louisiana. Both in Mississippi and Texas he has been active in the affairs of the Baptist denomination, with which he is associated.

WAY, Andrew John Henry, artist, b. in Washington, D. C., 27 April, 1826; d. in Baltimore, Md., 7 Feb., 1888. He studied first with John P. Frankenstein in Cincinnati, then with Alfred J. Müller in Baltimore, and in 1850 went to Paris. After a stay in Europe of four years he returned to his native country, settling in Baltimore. For some time his attention was given mainly to portraiture, but a fruit-piece that he painted about 1859 attracted the attention of Emanuel Leutze, on whose advice he devoted himself thenceforth to the painting of still-life subjects. In this branch he had great success, excelling especially in the representation of grapes. At the Philadelphia exhibition of 1876 he received a medal for two panels. His numerous works include "A Christmas Memory" (1870); "Prince Albert Grapes" and "Flora and Pomona" (1874); "Wild Fowl" (1882); "A Sportsman's Luck" (1883); and "To my Sweetheart" and "Preparation for Apple Toddy" (1887). Several of his paintings have been lithographed.—His son, George Brevitt, b. in Baltimore, Md., 29 Oct., 1854, was educated at the U. S. naval academy, studied art in Paris, and has followed it as a profession. Among his works are "Sunset" (1883) and "Twilight on the Susquehanna," "Village Scene in Brownsville," and "On the Upper Potomac" (1884).

WAYLAND, Francis, educator, b. in New York city, 11 March, 1796; d. in Providence, R. I., 30 Sept., 1865. He was the son of Francis Wayland, a Baptist minister, who emigrated from England, and was the pastor of churches in Poughkeepsie, Troy, Albany, and Saratoga Springs. The son was graduated in 1813 at Union college, then under the presidency of Dr. Eliphalet Nott, whose spirit and methods influenced largely his own future course as a college president. Immediately upon his graduation he spent three years in the study of medicine. Having meanwhile united with a Baptist church, and feeling that duty called him to the Christian ministry, he entered in 1816 the Andover theological seminary, but at the end of a year he left to become a tutor in Union college, which office he held for four years. He was called in 1821 to the pastorate of the 1st Baptist church in Boston, and soon became recognized as a man of rich and varied gifts. His preaching, though unaided by an attractive delivery, was greatly admired for its broad and deep thoughtfulness and its fine grace of expression. His sermons on "The Moral Dignity of the Missionary Enterprise" (1823) and "The Duties of an American Citizen" (1825) placed him in the front rank of American preachers. The former, in particular, has obtained wide celebrity. In 1826 he accepted a professorship in Union college, but he left it in February, 1827, to take the presidency of Brown university, which office he filled for twenty-eight years with distinguished honor to himself and the highest advantage to the university. It felt at once in all its departments the inspiration of a new life, and speedily enjoyed a greatly enlarged prosperity. Dr. Wayland's instructions in psychology, political economy, and ethics, especially the last, were in a high degree stimulating to his pupils, while his strong personality was felt by the students of every class as an educating and elevating force. Not satisfied with the old text-books, he prepared lectures on all the subjects that he taught. He delivered weekly sermons to the students in the chapel, often attended their prayer-meetings, and gathered them for Bible instruction. In all these services he was singularly effective. Though he was naturally conservative, his clear perceptions and sound judgment made him a pioneer reformer in educational methods. In 1850 his views led to a reorganization of Brown university, so as to give a place to the more modern branches of learning, and to allow a larger liberty in the election of studies, changes that since his day have almost universally been adopted. After his retirement from the presidency in 1855 he served for a year and a half as pastor of the 1st Baptist church in Providence. Subsequently he gave his strength to religious and humane work, devoting much time to the inmates of the Rhode Island state prison and reform school. He received the degree of D. D. from Union in 1827 and Harvard in 1829, and that of LL. D. from the latter in 1852. Dr. Wayland was a prolific author. Besides about fifty sermons and addresses, his published works are "Occasional Discourses" (Boston, 1833); "Elements of Moral Science" (New York, 1835; abridged ed. for schools, Boston, 1836; with notes and analysis by Joseph Angus, D. D., London, 1857; with analysis by Rev. George B. Wheeler, 1863; translated into several foreign languages); "Elements of Political Economy" (New York, 1837; abridged ed., Boston, 1840); "Moral Law of Accumulation" (Boston, 1837); "The Limitations of Human Responsibility" (1838); "Thoughts on the Present Collegiate System in the United States" (1842); "Domestic Slavery considered as a Scriptural Institution," a correspondence between Dr. Wayland and Rev. Richard Fuller, of Beaufort, S. C. (1845); "Sermons delivered in the Chapel of Brown University" (1849); "Report to the Corporation of Brown University on the Changes in the System of Collegiate Education" (Providence, 1850); memoirs of Harriet Ware (1850) and Adoniram Judson (2 vols., Boston, 1853); "Elements of Intellectual Philosophy" (1854); "Notes on the Principles and Practices of Baptist Churches" (1857); "Sermons to the Churches" (1858); "Salvation by Christ" (1859); "Letters on the Ministry of the Gospel," addressed to Heman Lincoln (1863); and "Memoir of Thomas Chalmers, D. D." (1864). See a memoir, with selections from his personal reminiscences and correspondence, by his sons, Francis and Heman Lincoln Wayland (2 vols., New York, 1867), and his funeral sermon by Prof. George I. Chace (1866).—His son, Francis, lawyer, b. in Boston, Mass., 23 Aug., 1826, was graduated at Brown in 1846, studied at Harvard law-school and in Springfield, Mass., and began practice in Worcester in 1850. In 1858 he removed to New Haven, Conn., and in 1864 he was elected judge of probate for that city. In 1869 he was elected lieutenant-governor of Connecticut. In 1872 he was appointed to a professorship in the law-school of Yale, and in the next year he was made dean of that school. Dr. Wayland is president of the boards of directors of the Connecticut state prison, the Connecticut prison association, the National prison association, the Organized charities of New Haven, and the Connecticut general hospital in that city. He was president of the American Baptist education society, and is vice-president of the American Baptist missionary union. In 1874 he was president of the board of visitors to the U. S. military academy at West Point, and in 1880 he was vice-president of the board of visitors to the U. S. naval academy at Annapolis. He was for several years chairman of the jurisprudence department of the American social science association, and was chosen in 1880 president of that body. He is active in the educational and benevolent enterprises of the Baptist denomination, to which he belongs. He received in 1879 from Rochester university the degree of LL. D., and the same from Brown in 1881. Besides articles in the "Atlantic Monthly," he published papers on "Tramps" and "Out-Door Relief," prepared for the American social science association.—Another son, Heman Lincoln, clergyman, b. in Providence, R. I., 23 April, 1830, was graduated at Brown in 1849, and, after spending a year (1849-'50) in studying theology at Newton, taught for a short time at the academy in Townshend, Vt., and spent the years 1852-'4 as tutor in the University of Rochester. From 1854 till 1861 he was pastor of the Main street Baptist church in Worcester, Mass., and during the civil war he served as chaplain of the 7th Connecticut volunteers. After the war he spent a year in missionary work among the colored people in Nashville, Tenn., and from 1865 till 1870 he was professor of rhetoric and logic in Kalamazoo college, Mich. He was president of Franklin college, Ind., for two years, and then became editor of the "National Baptist" in Philadelphia, Pa., which office he still holds. He received the degree of D. D. from Brown in 1869. Dr. Wayland has contributed articles to the "New Englander" and the "Baptist Quarterly," and has published numerous sermons and addresses on education.

WAYMAN, Alexander Washington, A. M. E. bishop, b. in Caroline county, Md., in September, 1821. He is of African descent and was brought up on a farm. In 1843 he was admitted into the Philadelphia conference of the African Methodist Episcopal church, and he was elected the secretary of three successive general conferences of his church—those of 1856, 1860, and 1864. He was made bishop in 1864, and received from Howard university the degree of D. D. in 1877. He has visited almost every county of the Union, and has written "My Recollections," "Cyclopædia of African Methodism," and "Wayman on the Discipline."

WAYNE, Anthony, soldier, b. in Easttown, Chester co., Pa., 1 Jan., 1745; d. in Presque Isle (now Erie), Pa., 15 Dec., 1796. His grandfather was a native of Yorkshire, England, and settled in County Wicklow, Ireland. Although a farmer by occupation, he saw military service, and commanded a body of dragoons at the battle of the Boyne, under William III. He sold out in Ireland, and, coming to Chester county, Pa., purchased property there. His youngest son was Isaac, who was a farmer and legislator, and held a commission in part of the forces operating against the Pennsylvania colonial legislature, and in 1775 he was a member of the committee of safety. Meanwhile, his fondness for military affairs led to his studying works on the art of war, and to his drilling such of his neighbors as he could inspire with his own feelings. He raised the 4th regiment of Pennsylvania troops, and was commissioned colonel on 3 Jan., 1776. With the Pennsylvania regiments he was sent to re-enforce the northern army, and in June, 1776, was assigned to Gen. John Thomas's brigade. At Three Rivers his command attacked the British, and, although wounded and defeated, he withdrew his troops creditably and concentrated the force at Ticonderoga, where he was ordered to assume charge. On 21 Feb., 1777, he was commissioned brigadier-general, and joined the army under Gen. George Washington in New Jersey. During the summer of that year he was constantly on the alert, engaged in driving the enemy from the state, and his "bravery and good conduct" were publicly testified to by Gen. Washington. At the Brandywine he commanded a division, and was charged with the defence of Chadd's Ford, where he opposed the passage of the river by Baron von Knyphausen with the Hessians. He fought all day, and at sunset effected a successful retreat. Wayne led the attack at Warren Tavern a few days later, and then had command of a flying detachment of 1,500 men, for the purpose of harassing the British rear; but he was attacked near Paoli by superior numbers on the night of 20 Sept. Gen. Wayne quickly formed his division, and, while his right sustained a fierce attack, a retreat was directed by the left, and the whole formed again not far from the ground on which they were attacked. Charges by Col. Richard Humpton led to Wayne's demand of a court of inquiry, which unanimously acquitted him "with the highest honor." He was with the right wing at Germantown, and carried the position that was assigned to him to take, driving the enemy back more than two miles, when the Americans, having failed in their purpose, retreated. During the winter of 1777-'8 he did much to supply the American camp at Valley Forge with supplies, and in March, 1778, made a successful raid into the British lines, capturing horses, cattle, and other material. After Sir Henry Clinton abandoned Philadelphia, Wayne hung on the rear of the English, realizing the truth of what had been said of him early in the war, that "where Wayne went there was a fight always; that was his business." At Monmouth Wayne was the first to attack, but was ordered to retreat by Gen. Charles Lee. After Washington had assumed command, Wayne came up with his troops and gave victory to the Americans. Col. Henry Monckton, perceiving that the fate of the conflict depended upon driving Wayne away or capturing him, led his troops in a bayonet charge, in which almost every British officer was killed, including the leader. After this the British fell back, and in the night silently retreated. During the summer of 1779 Washington organized a corps of light infantry, the command of which he gave to Gen. Wayne. His best-known achievement was the capture of Stony Point, a post on the Hudson river that commanded King's Ferry, the crossing-place between the New England colonies and those to the southward. It was strongly fortified, and was connected with the main-land by a tide-submerged causeway across a narrow marsh, making it an island at high tide. The garrison of 600 infantry was commanded by Col. Johnson. Wayne determined to carry the place by storm, and on 15 July, 1779, marched toward the fort, reaching a

Anthony Wayne

Indians. Anthony was Isaac's only son, and was educated at the Philadelphia academy. He became a land-surveyor, and in 1765 was sent to Nova Scotia as financial agent and surveyor in the service of a wealthy association, on the recommendation of Benjamin Franklin. In 1767 he married and settled on a farm in his native county, but he continued to follow the practice of his profession, and filled several local offices. He was chosen in 1774 one of the provincial deputies to consider the disturbing relations between the colonies and Great Britain, and also a member of the Pennsylvania convention that was held in Philadelphia to discuss similar questions. During 1774-'5 he was representative from his native county to the Penn-point within a mile and a half of the works at 8 o'clock in the evening. At midnight the Americans advanced in two columns, with unloaded muskets and fixed bayonets, and, surprising the pickets, forced their way through every obstacle to the centre of the fort. Wayne received a wound in the head, but, determining to die in the fort if the wound was mortal, entered the works with his troops, supported by his aides. The garrison soon surrendered, and not a life was taken after the flag was hauled down. The ordnance and stores were conveyed to West Point, and the works were destroyed. Congress voted a gold medal to Wayne, and silver ones to his two subordinate commanders. He also received thanks from congress "for his brave, prudent, and soldier-like conduct in the well-conducted attack on Stony Point," and a similar testimonial was given him by the general assembly of his native state of Pennsylvania. A year later he was sent to capture Fort Lee, but it was too strongly fortified. He was, however, successful in sweeping the country of cattle, horses, and of everything available for the use of the enemy's army, and thwarted Gen. Clinton's plans. This raid gave rise to Maj. John André's poem of "The Cow Chase," which ended with the stanza:

"And now I've closed my epic strain,
I tremble as I show it,
Lest this same warrio-drover Wayne
Should ever catch the poet."

As if by poetic justice, Wayne had command of the troops from whom the guard was drawn that attended André's execution. On 1 Jan., 1781, 1,300 men of the Pennsylvania line mutinied; but Wayne, by his tact, arranged the matter peaceably to the advantage of the government and the satisfaction of the troops. Soon afterward he was sent by Washington to join Lafayette, who was then operating against Lord Cornwallis in Virginia. At Jamestown Ford the British appeared to be falling back to avoid Lafayette, and Wayne attacked, by the latter's orders, but found himself confronted by the entire British force. Unable to retreat, he at once charged the enemy and fell back after disconcerting a projected manœuvre against Lafayette. This action at Green Springs on 6 July, 1781, demonstrated Wayne's great ability as a general, in that he turned an almost positive defeat into a success. Wayne was actively engaged in the investment and capture of Yorktown. The first parallel was opened by him and Gen. James Clinton with six regiments on 6 Oct., 1781, and five days later the second parallel was begun by the Pennsylvania and Maryland troops, covered by two battalions under the command of Wayne. In the attack on the 14th, Wayne supported the French troops with his Pennsylvania regiments. After the surrender he was sent to join Gen. Nathanael Greene in the south, and on the night of 23-24 June he was surrounded by a numerous body of Creek Indians under an able chief and a British officer. For a few moments they held possession of his artillery, but, mustering his forces, Wayne attacked the assailants so furiously in flank and rear with sword and bayonet alone, that they soon broke and fled. With his own hand Wayne cut down a Creek chieftain, and in the morning the dead body of Guistersisto, the principal warrior of the Creeks, and the bitterest enemy of the Americans among these Indians, was found on the battlefield. When Charleston, S. C., was evacuated by the British on 14 Dec., 1782, Gen. Wayne took possession of that city, which was the last military service he performed during the Revolutionary war. The brevet rank of major-general was conferred on him on 10 Oct., 1783. He then returned to Pennsylvania and resumed his civil life. In 1784 he was elected to the general assembly from Chester county, and also served in the convention that ratified the constitution of the United States. Subsequently he settled in Georgia on a tract of land that the state gave him as a recompense for his military services, and was elected a delegate to the convention that framed the state constitution in 1787. He was elected from Georgia to congress, and served from 24 Oct., 1791, to 21 March, 1792, when his seat was contested and congress declared it vacant. A new election was ordered, but he declined to be a candidate. He was nominated on Washington's recommendation to be general-in-chief of the U. S. army, with the rank of major-general, and was confirmed in that office on 3 April, 1792.

Certain of the Indian tribes of the northwest, instigated by the British, refused to cease hostilities after the peace of 1783, and previous attempts by Gen. Josiah Harmer and Gen. Arthur

St. Clair at subjugating the savages had failed. Wayne collected an adequate force, and, conscious that failure in negotiating with the Indians would be followed by immediate hostilities on the frontiers, spent more than a year in drilling his troops and training them for the peculiar service for which they were required. In the autumn of 1793 he marched into the northwest, and near Greenville, Ohio, built a stockade which he called Fort Recovery. He pushed on during the following summer through the wilderness toward Maumee river, and at its junction with the Auglaize he built Fort Adams, as an intermediate post. In August he went down the Maumee with 1,000 men, and encamped near a British post at the foot of the Maumee rapids, called Fort Miami. Here Gen. Wayne, with a force ample to destroy the Indians in spite of British influence, offered them peace if they would lay down their weapons. On their refusal he advanced to the head of the rapids, and on 20 Aug., at Fallen Timbers, attacked and defeated the Indians. Almost all the dead warriors were found with British arms. After laying their country waste he moved up to the junction of St. Mary's and St. Joseph's rivers, where he built a strong fortification which he called Fort Wayne. He spent the winter in Greenville, where, on 3 Aug., 1795, was signed a treaty with the Indians, in which twelve tribes participated. A lasting peace followed, and a large territory was acquired by the United States. Wayne returned on a visit to Pennsylvania, and was appointed sole commissioner to treat with the Indians of the northwest, and to take possession of all the forts that had been held by the British in that territory; but, while descending Lake Erie from Detroit, he died from an attack of the gout. Although Washington called him "prudent," Wayne's unexpected successes in perilous expeditions won for him his more popular appellation of "Mad Anthony Wayne." The title of "Dandy Wayne" was also applied to him, owing to his constant attention to dress, and in one of his letters to Washington he expressed himself in favor of an elegant uniform and soldierly appearance in preference to poorly clad troops with a greater amount of ammunition. He was called "Black Snake" by the Indians, perhaps because that reptile will attack any other species and rarely gets the worst of an encounter. After he defeated them in 1794 he was given the name of "Wind" or "Tornado," because "he was exactly like a hurricane, that drives and tears and prostrates everything before it." His body was removed from Presque Isle in 1809 by his son, and buried in Radnor churchyard in his native county, where the Pennsylvania Society of the Cincinnati caused a marble monument to be erected, which was dedicated with appropriate ceremonies on 4 July of that year. His portrait was painted by Charles Wilson Peale and by John Trumbull, from whose picture our vignette is copied. Wayne's residence at Easttown, Chester co., Pa., is represented in the accompanying illustration. See "Life of Anthony Wayne," by John Armstrong, in Sparks's "American Biography," and "Orderly Book of the Northern Army at Fort Ticonderoga and Mount Independence" (Albany, 1859).—His son, Isaac, b. in Warren county, Pa., in 1770; d. in Chester county, Pa., 25 Oct., 1852, received a public-school education, was graduated at Dickinson college, and acquired the title of colonel by his military experiences. He studied law, and was admitted to the Philadelphia bar in 1795. In 1814 he was the Federal candidate for governor of Pennsylvania, but was defeated. He was elected to congress from Pennsylvania as a Federalist, and served from 1 Dec., 1823, to 3 March, 1825.—His great-nephew, William, b. 6 Dec., 1828, is the grandson of Gen. Wayne's daughter, and took the name of Wayne, being the representative of the family and the owner of Waynesborough. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1846, and during the civil war held the rank of captain in the 97th Pennsylvania volunteers. From 1881 till 1887 he served as a member of the Pennsylvania assembly.

WAYNE, Henry Constantine, soldier. b. in Savannah, Ga., 8 Sept., 1815; d. there, 15 March, 1883. He was educated at Northampton and Cambridge, Mass., and at the U. S. military academy, where he was graduated in 1838. He served on the northern frontier at Plattsburg, N. Y., in 1838-'40, during the Canadian border disturbances; on the Maine frontier at Houlton in 1840-'1, pending the disputed-territory controversy, and at the U. S. military academy in 1841-'6 as assistant instructor of artillery and cavalry, of the sword-exercise and of infantry tactics, and as quartermaster. He was promoted 1st lieutenant in the 1st artillery, 16 May, 1842. He was on quartermaster duty during the war with Mexico, 1846-'7. He took part in the battles of Churubusco and Contreras, being brevetted major for gallant conduct in those engagements. From 1848 till 1855 he was in charge of the clothing bureau of the quartermaster-general's office at Washington, D. C. Soon after the annexation of the territory acquired by the United States from Mexico, the question of transportation coming up, Maj. Wayne suggested that camels should be used as a means of conveyance over the plains of Texas and New Mexico. The government adopted the suggestion, and Maj. Wayne was sent to Egypt to investigate and report upon the subject. On his return his recommendations were adopted, and he was employed in Texas in 1857-'8 in testing the adaptability of these animals for army transportation. He was again employed at the quartermaster-general's office from 1858 till 1860, when he resigned to become adjutant- and inspector-general of the state of Georgia under the Confederacy. He received in 1858 a first-class gold medal from the Société impériale zoologique d'acclimatation of Paris, for the successful introduction and acclimation of the camel in the United States. He was also the author of "The Sword Exercise, arranged for Military Instruction" (1856).

WAYNE, James Moore, jurist, b. in Savannah, Ga., in 1790; d. in Washington, D. C., 5 July, 1867. He was graduated at Princeton in 1808, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1810, and began practice at Savannah. He served for two years in the state house of representatives, was elected mayor of Savannah in 1823, and chosen judge of the superior court in 1824, serving for five years. He was a member of congress in 1829-'35, took an active part as a debater, and was a supporter of Gen. Andrew Jackson, who appointed him, 9 Jan., 1835, associate justice of the U. S. supreme court. His opinions upon admiralty jurisprudence are cited as being of high authority. In congress he favored free-trade, opposed internal improvements by congress, except of rivers and harbors, and opposed a recharter of the U. S. bank, claiming that it would confer dangerous political powers upon a few individuals. He took an active part in the removal of the Indians to the west. Judge Wayne presided in two conventions that were held for revising the constitution of Georgia. Princeton college gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1849.

WEAD, Charles Kasson, physicist, b. in Malone, N. Y., 1 Sept., 1848. He was graduated at the University of Vermont in 1872, afterward was appointed professor of physics in the Pittsburg (Pa.) high-school, and in 1877 accepted a similar chair in the University of Michigan, where he continued until 1885. Subsequently he settled in Hartford, and became an electrician. Since 1880 he has been a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science. He has prosecuted original experimental work in acoustics, the results of which he has contributed to the "American Journal of Sciences" and other periodicals. He has published "The Aims and Methods of the Teaching of Physics" (Washington, 1884).

WEAKLEY, Robert, pioneer, b. in Halifax county, Va., 20 July, 1764; d. near Nashville, Tenn., 4 Feb., 1845. He joined the Revolutionary army at the age of sixteen, and served in it till the close of the war. He then emigrated to the country beyond the Alleghanies, taking with him his entire worldly possessions, a horse, saddled and bridled, and one dollar and seventy-five cents in currency. He soon rose to the rank of colonel in the force of riflemen with which James Robertson beat off the raids of the Creeks and Cherokees. When but twenty-two years of age he was chosen a member of the convention that North Carolina convened to ratify the Federal constitution, and subsequently he was a member of the Tennessee house of representatives. In 1809 he was elected to congress, and in 1811 he was chosen a member of the state senate, of which he was speaker from 1819 till 1821, and again from 1823 till 1825. His last office was that of member of the convention to revise the constitution of Tennessee in 1834. In early life he was a zealous member of the Methodist church, but, marrying a lady who was not a church member, he was called to account for thus violating the rules of the denomination. He was told that if he expressed his regret, no further action would be taken; but he refused to do so, and thenceforward was connected with no religious body.

WEARE, Meshech, jurist, b. in Hampton, N. H., 16 June, 1713; d. in Hampton Falls, N. H., 15 Jan., 1786. He was graduated at Harvard in 1735, admitted to the bar, and practised law, also sitting in the legislature for several years, and serving as speaker in 1752. In 1754 he was a commissioner to the colonial congress at Albany, and he was afterward a justice of the supreme court, and in 1777 became chief justice. He was also a member of the executive council, and chairman of the committee of safety at the outset of the Revolution. He was elected president of the state in 1776, and was annually re-elected during the war, and in 1784 under the new constitution. He was made fellow of the American academy of arts and sciences in 1782. During the Revolution he rendered great services in raising and equipping the forces that were sent to the northern frontier of New Hampshire under Gen. John Stark to oppose the progress of Gen. John Burgoyne.

WEATHERSFORD, William, Indian chief, b. in the Creek settlement, Ala., about 1770; d. in Monroe county, Ala., in 1824. His father was a white trader, and his mother a Seminole Indian. William was a skilful hunter and warrior, and in the second war with Great Britain commanded the Creeks against the U. S. forces. On 14 April, 1814, he surrendered voluntarily to Gen. Andrew Jackson, and he afterward lived peaceably on his plantation at Little River, Monroe county, Ala.

WEAVER, George Sumner, author, b. in Rockingham, Vt., 24 Dec., 1818. He studied law and was admitted to the bar, but, relinquishing law for theology, was ordained as a Universalist minister in 1848. He has published "Lectures on Mental Science according to the Philosophy of Phrenology" (New York, 1852); "Hopes and Helps for the Young of Both Sexes" (1853); "Aims and Aids for Girls" (1854); "The Ways of Life" (1855); "The Christian Household" (1855); "The Open Way" (1873); "Moses and Modern Science" (1874); "The Heart of the World" (1883); and "Lives and Graves of our Presidents" (1884).

WEAVER, James B., candidate for the presidency, b. in Dayton, Ohio, 12 June, 1833. He was graduated at the law-school of Ohio university, Cincinnati, in 1854. In April, 1861, he enlisted as a private in the 2d Iowa infantry, was elected a lieutenant, rose to be major on 3 Oct., 1861, and after the senior field-officers had fallen at Corinth was commissioned colonel, 12 Oct., 1862. He was brevetted brigadier-general on 13 March, 1865, for gallantry in action. After the war he resumed legal practice, was elected district attorney of the 2d judicial district of Iowa in 1866, and was appointed assessor of internal revenue for the 5th district of the state in 1867, serving six years. He became editor of the "Iowa Tribune," published at Des Moines, and was elected to congress, taking his seat on 18 March, 1879. In June, 1880, he was nominated for the presidency by the convention of the National Greenback-Labor party, and in the November election he received 307,740 votes. He was returned to congress after an interval of two terms by the vote of the Greenback-Labor and Democratic parties, taking his seat on 7 Dec., 1885, and in 1886 was re-elected.

WEAVER, Jonathan, bishop of the United Brethren in Christ, b. in Carroll county, Ohio, 23 Feb., 1824. He was brought up on a farm, educated at the common schools and at Hagerstown academy, and in 1845 began to preach. He was a pastor in 1847-'52, presiding elder in 1852-'7, and general agent for Otterbein university in 1857-'65. He was elected in 1865 a bishop of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, has been re-elected five times, and was in the Ohio diocese in 1887. He received the degree of D. D. from Otterbein university in 1873. He has published "Discourses on the Resurrection" (Dayton, Ohio, 1871); "Ministerial Salary" (1872); "Divine Providence" (1873); and "Universal Restoration not sustained by the Word of God" (1878). He has written much for his church organ, the "Religious Telescope," published at Dayton, and is now preparing for the press a volume of sermons by different ministers of his denomination.

WEAVER, William Augustus, naval officer, b. in Dumfries, Va., in 1797; d. there in 1846. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 4 Feb., 1811, and made his first cruise in the "Chesapeake," which was captured by the frigate "Shannon" after a short engagement off Boston, 1 June, 1813. Midshipman Weaver was severely wounded in this battle and was taken to Halifax as a prisoner with the rest of the officers and crew who survived. He was promoted to lieutenant after the war and commanded the schooner "Tom Bowlin" in 1816 and the schooner "Spark" in 1817, in the Mediterranean squadron. He served in the ship "Franklin" in 1818-'24 in the Mediterranean and the Pacific squadrons. By a misunderstanding as to his leave of absence, he was obliged to abandon the naval service, 27 Nov., 1824, after which he was employed by the government in the state department, where his knowledge of modern languages made his services specially valuable. He was secretary of the commission to adjust the claims of the Spanish citizens, was commissioner to Mexico in 1834, and superintendent of the census of 1840.—His son, Aaron Ward, naval officer, b. in the District of Columbia, 1 July, 1832, was appointed a midshipman in the navy, 10 May, 1848, attended the naval academy in 1853-'4, was graduated, and became a passed midshipman, 15 June, 1854. He was commissioned lieutenant, 16 Sept., 1855. He cruised in the sloop "Marion," on the coast of Africa, in 1858-'9, and came home in the prize slaver "Ardenne" in command. When the civil war opened he was assigned to the steamer "Susquehanna" on the blockade, in which he participated in the bombardment and capture of Fort Hatteras and Fort Clarke at Hatteras inlet, in the battle of Port Royal and capture of Fort Beauregard and Fort Walker, and in operations on the coast in command of the armed boats before the fall of Fort Pulaski. He was present at the engagements with batteries on Sewall's point and at the capture of Norfolk, Va. He was commissioned lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, and commanded the steam gun-boat "Winona," in the Western Gulf squadron, in 1862-'3. He participated in the engagements at Port Hudson in December, 1862, at Plaquemine, La., at the defeat of the Confederates when they attacked Donaldsonville, and in the engagements below that place after the capture of Port Hudson. He was highly commended by Admiral Farragut for his services. He had the gun-boat "Chippewa," in the North Atlantic blockading squadron, in 1864, in which he took part in the first attack on Fort Fisher. He was transferred to command the monitor "Mahopac," in which he participated in the final attack and capture of Fort Fisher in January, 1865, and was recommended for promotion. He went to Charleston, S. C., and was in the advanced picket when the city surrendered and its forts were captured. He next took the "Mahopac" up James river, and was present at the fall of Richmond. After the war he served at the Boston navy-yard. He was promoted and advanced to the grade of commander, 25 July, 1866. He commanded the double-turreted monitor "Terror" in 1870-'1, in which he went to Havana under great difficulties, owing to defective boilers, and arrived in season on the occasion when the Spanish students were executed by order of the government. During the excitement and threatened war with Spain owing to the "Virginus" affair, he was selected to command the sea-going iron-clad "Dictator," then one of the most formidable vessels of the navy, in which he was for some time the senior officer of the forces in the harbor of Havana. He remained in command of the "Dictator" until May, 1877. He was commissioned captain, 8 Aug., 1876, was equipment-officer at the Norfolk navy-yard in 1879-'80, and captain of the yard in 1880-'1. He commanded the steam sloop "Brooklyn," on the South Atlantic station, in 1881-'4. He was a member of the naval examining and retiring board in 1885-'6, was promoted to commodore, 7 Oct., 1886, and is now president of the retiring-board.

WEBB, Charles, soldier, b. in Stamford, Conn., 13 Feb., 1724; d. after 1794. He was a member of the Connecticut legislature in 1758, and was re-chosen twenty-three times. He served in the French war, and attained the rank of captain in 1760, was sent by congress, in May, 1775, on a tour of inspection to Ticonderoga, and became colonel of the 19th regiment in July, 1775. He participated in the battles of Long Island, 27 Aug., 1776, White Plains, 28 Oct., 1776, and Whitemarsh, 5 Dec., 1777, in which his regiment suffered severely. He retired from the service in June, 1778.

WEBB, Charles Henry, author, b. in Rouse's Point, Clinton co., N. Y., 24 Jan., 1834. He received his preliminary education in his native place. In early youth he ran away to sea, was absent three years, and on his return went to Illinois, to which state his parents had removed in the mean time. He was editorially connected with the New York "Times" in 1860-'3 and with the San Francisco "Bulletin" in 1863-'4, and then edited "The Californian," a weekly, which he left in 1866. He had been engaged in business on the banks of Mississippi river from 1856 till 1860, dealt subsequently in wheat in Chicago, and at a later period was a banker and broker in Wall street, New York. In 1868 he invented and patented "Webb's adder," an adding-machine which was placed upon the market in that year; and in 1874 he invented, patented, and manufactured a cartridge-loading machine, the utility of which was recognized by the manufacturers of fire-arms and others. Mr. Webb is now engaged in constructing an improved adder. He has published "Liffith Lank, or Lunacy," a travesty of Charles Reade's "Griffith Gaunt" (New York, 1867); "St. Twel'mo, or the Cuneiform Cyclopedist of Chattanooga," a travesty of Mrs. Augusta Evans Wilson's "St. Elmo" (1868); "John Paul's Book" (Hartford, 1874); "The Wickedest Woman in New York" (New York, 1875); "Parodies, Prose, and Verse" (1876); and "Sea-Weed and what we seed: my Vacation at Long Branch and Saratoga" (1876). In San Francisco he brought out two plays, "Our Friend from Victoria" (1865), and "Arrah-na-Poke," a burlesque of Dion Boucicault's "Arrah-na-Pogue" (1865). He edited, under the name of "John Paul," "The Celebrated Jumping Frog."

WEBB, George James, musician, b. near Salisbury, Wiltshire, England, 24 June, 1803; d. in Orange, N. J., 7 Oct., 1887. He studied music under Alexander Lucas in Salisbury, and became organist of the church at Falmouth. In 1830 he came to the United States, settling in Boston. He became well known as an organist and teacher, and was the friend and associate of Lowell Mason. When the Boston academy of music was founded, in 1833, he and Mason were appointed as musical directors. He also held office in the Handel and Haydn society, and other associations. In 1871 he resided in Orange, N. J., and his time after this was devoted principally to teaching his new method for treating the voice. He wrote, with Chester G. Allen, "Voice-Culture" (New York, 1871; revised ed., 1884), and edited collections of vocal music, most of them jointly with Lowell Mason.

WEBB, James, jurist, b. in Georgia in 1792; d. in Goliad, Tex., 1 Nov., 1856. He was educated at William and Mary college, studied law, and, removing to Georgia, practised his profession for a few years, after which he was made judge of the supreme court. While filling this office he was appointed U. S. district judge in the territory of Florida, which post he held for many years, when he resigned. In 1839 he removed to the republic of Texas, and was successively attorney-general and secretary of state under the administration of President Mirabeau B. Lamar. He served one term in the Texas senate, and after the annexation was reporter of the decisions of the supreme court, and secretary of state. At the time of his death he was judge of the 14th judicial district. With Thomas H. Duval he published "Reports of Cases in the Supreme Court of the State of Texas, 1846-'8" (3 vols., Galveston, 1848-'51).

WEBB, John Russell, educator, b. in Brownville, Jefferson co., N. Y., 6 Aug., 1824; d. in Benton Harbor, Berrien co., Mich., 10 Sept., 1887. He was graduated at the New York state normal school at Albany among the first students in 1846. While still a pupil of David P. Page, he conceived the idea of teaching children to read by familiarizing them at once with the complete forms of words, without first compelling them to learn the letters of the alphabet. Soon after leaving school, and while teaching, he published a book to exemplify this method. He taught with success, went to Indianapolis in 1851, and soon afterward relinquished professional work on account of failing health, and settled in Minneapolis, Minn., removing in 1861 to Michigan. He published "John's First Book" (Wartertown, N. Y., 1846) and "Webb's Word Method," in which he expounded his system of instruction (Detroit, 1864; revised ed., New York, 1885), besides a series of readers embodying the method.

WEBB, Samuel Blatchley, soldier, b. in Wethersfield, Conn., 15 Dec., 1753; d. in Claverack, N. Y., 3 Dec., 1807. He was descended from Richard Webb, of Gloucestershire, England, who was made a freeman of Boston in 1632, and accompanied the Rev. Thomas Hooker in the settlement of Hartford, Conn., in 1635. He was a step-son and private secretary to Silas Deane, and took part at an early age in the movements that preceded the Revolution. In command of a company of light infantry he left Wethersfield for Boston on hearing of the battle of Lexington, participated in the battle of Bunker Hill, where he was wounded, and was commended in general orders for gallantry. A letter that he wrote to his step-father describing that battle is now possessed by the Connecticut historical society at Hartford. He was soon afterward appointed aide to Gen. Israel Putnam, and on 21 June, 1776, was made private secretary and aide-de-camp to Washington, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. He wrote the order for promulgating the Declaration of Independence in New York city, 9 July, 1776, and was associated with Col. Joseph Reed a few days later in refusing to receive a letter from Lord Howe that was addressed to "George Washington, Esq." He was present at the battle of Long Island, was wounded at White Plains and Trenton, and was engaged also at Princeton. He raised and organized, almost entirely at his own expense, the 3d Connecticut regiment, of which he assumed command in 1777. He took part with it in Gen. Samuel H. Parsons's unfortunate expedition to Long Island, was captured with his command by the British fleet, 10 Dec., 1777, and was not exchanged till 1780, when he took command of the light infantry, with the brevet rank of brigadier-general. He arranged the meeting between Washington and Rochambeau at Wethersfield, Conn., 19 May, 1781, and was a founder of the Society of the Cincinnati in 1783. When Washington took the oath of office as first president of the United States, Gen. Webb was selected to hold the Bible on which he was sworn. From 1789 till his death he resided at Claverack, Columbia co., N. Y.—His son, James Watson, journalist, b. in Claverack, N. Y., 8 Feb., 1802; d. in New York city, 7 June, 1884, was educated at Cooperstown, N. Y., entered the army as 2d lieutenant in 1819, and became 1st lieutenant in 1823, assistant commissary of subsistence in 1824, and adjutant of the 3d regiment in 1826. In 1827 he resigned and became editor of the New York "Courier," which had been established the same year, and in 1829 he purchased the "Enquirer," and united the two under the name of the "Morning Courier and New York Enquirer." To expedite the business of reporting, Mr. Webb established a daily horse-express between New York and Washington, with relays of horses every six miles of the way. This cost him $7,500 a month, but enabled him to obtain news twenty-four hours before his rivals. He owned and edited the "Courier and Enquirer" till June, 1861, when it was merged in the "World." During the existence of the Whig party his paper was the chief advocate of its principles. In June, 1842, he fought a duel with Thomas F. Marshall, a member of congress from Kentucky, concerning whom he had published an article, and was wounded. He was indicted by the New York grand jury in November "for leaving the state with the intention of giving or receiving a challenge," pleaded guilty, and was sentenced to the full penalty under the law, but was pardoned after two weeks' detention. In 1843 he became engineer-in-chief of the state of New York with the rank of major-general, and in 1849 he was appointed minister to Austria, but was rejected by the senate. At the beginning of the civil war he applied for an appointment as major-general of volunteers, which was refused; but he was offered a brigadier-generalship, which he declined. He refused the mission to Turkey in 1861, but was immediately appointed minister to Brazil, in which office he secured the settlement of long-standing claims against that country, and, through his intimacy with Napoleon III., aided in procuring the withdrawal of the French from Mexico. He resigned the Brazilian mission in 1869 and returned to New York in 1870. He published "Altowan, or Incidents of Life and Adventure in the Rocky Mountains" (2 vols., New York, 1846); "Slavery and its Tendencies" (Washington, 1856); and a pamphlet on "National Currency" (New York, 1875).—James Watson's son, Alexander Stewart, soldier, b. in New York city, 15 Feb., 1835, was educated at private schools and at the U. S. military academy, where he was graduated 13th in a class of 34 in 1855, and assigned to the artillery. He served in Florida, Minnesota, and for three years as assistant professor at West Point, became 1st lieutenant in the 2d artillery, 28 April, 1861, captain in the 11th infantry, 14 May, and major of the 1st Rhode Island artillery on 14 Sept. He was present at Bull Run and in the defences of Washington until 1862, when he participated in the battles of the peninsula campaign of the Army of the Potomac and as chief-of-staff of the 5th corps during the Maryland and Rappahannock campaigns till 23 June, 1863. He was then commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, and placed in command of a brigade of the 2d corps, serving with great credit at the battle of Gettysburg. At the "angle" he met the famous charge of Pickett's Confederate division, and took the major part in its repulse. He was wounded while leading his men, and received from Gen. George G. Meade a bronze medal for "distinguished personal gallantry on that ever-memorable field." During the Rapidan campaign he commanded a division in the battle of Bristow Station and auxiliary affairs. Gen. Webb then returned to the command of his brigade, and led it with ability during the Wilderness campaign, being severely wounded at the battle of Spottsylvania in May, 1864. On his return from sick-leave he was appointed chief-of-staff to Gen. George G. Meade, commanding the Army of the Potomac in the operations before Petersburg. From June, 1865, till February, 1866, Gen. Webb was acting as inspector-general of the military division of the Atlantic, and then he was professor at the military academy till August, 1868. On the reorganization of the army he became lieutenant-colonel of the 44th infantry, 28 July, 1866, and commanded his new regiment in 1868-'9 and (with his brevet rank) the 5th military district in April, 1869, and was, at his own request, discharged the service, 3 Dec., 1870. He was brevetted major, U. S. A., 3 July, 1863, "for gallant and meritorious services" at Gettysburg; lieutenant-colonel, U. S. A., 11 Oct., 1863, for Bristow Station; colonel, U. S. A., 12 May, 1864, for Spottsylvania; major-general of volunteers, 1 Aug., 1864, "for gallant and distinguished conduct"; and brigadier-general and major-general, U. S. A., 13 March, 1865, "for gallant and meritorious services in the campaign terminating with the surrender of the insurgent army under Gen. Lee." Gen. Webb has been since 21 July, 1869, president of the College of the city of New York, and in 1870 the degree of LL. D. was conferred upon him by Hobart college. He has published "The Peninsula: McClellan's Campaign of 1862" (New York, 1882) and articles on the civil war, in the "Century" magazine.—Another son of Samuel Blatchley, Henry Livingston, soldier, b. in Claverack, N. Y., 6 Feb., 1795; d. in Makanda, Ill., 5 Oct., 1876, settled in southern Illinois in 1817, and was repeatedly a member of both houses of the legislature. He was a major of volunteers in the Black Hawk war, colonel of the 18th regiment, U. S. infantry, in the Mexican war, and was afterward a general of Illinois militia.

J. Watson Webb

WEBB, Thomas, Methodist pioneer, b. in England in 1724; d. in Bristol, England, 20 Dec., 1796. He was a British officer, served in the royal American army, and was wounded at Louisburg and Quebec. He was converted to Methodism in 1765 by the preaching of John Wesley at Bristol, England, united with a Methodist society, was licensed to preach, and gave freely of his means to found societies, attending conferences, and preaching frequently with great fervor. Being ordered again to this country, he was stationed at first at Albany, N. Y., as barrack-master, and there conducted religious services in his house. When Barbara Heck established a society in New York city, he went thither, making his first appearance in the congregation about February, 1767. He preached in alternation with Philip Embury, always wearing regimentals, with his sword on the pulpit before him. He was the most active worker and the largest contributor for the erection of a meeting-house. On being placed on the retired list, with the rank of captain, he thenceforth travelled much as a missionary, preaching in Trenton, Burlington, and other New Jersey towns, where he founded societies, and holding regular services in Jamaica, L. I., which was his home. He began to visit Philadelphia as early as 1767, and there founded the first Methodist society, to which he ministered until the arrival of Wesley's itinerants in 1769. In that year he introduced Methodism into Delaware, preaching in Newcastle and Wilmington, and later he labored in Baltimore, Md. In 1772 he went to England, preached in Dublin, London, and other places, made appeals for missionaries and pecuniary aid at the conference in Leeds and elsewhere, and returned in the following year with two of the preachers that were sent in response to his solicitations. Repeating his visit, he gained other recruits for the itinerancy. Returning to England at the beginning of the Revolution, he spent the remainder of his life at Bristol, preaching there and in the neighborhood, visiting Winchester during the war, where he preached to the French prisoners in their own language, and addressing large congregations of soldiers and sailors at Portsmouth.

WEBB, Thomas Smith, Masonic author, b. in Boston, Mass., 30 Oct., 1771; d. in Cleveland, Ohio, 6 July, 1819. At the age of sixteen he was apprenticed to a printer in Boston, and he afterward removed to Keene, N. H., where he worked for some time at his trade. Here the three degrees of ancient craft Masonry were conferred upon him by Rising Sun lodge. In 1793 he removed to Albany and established a paper-staining factory. On 14 Sept., 1797, as appears from the copyright, he published "The Freemason's Monitor, or Illustrations of Masonry," and thus secured for himself fame as a Masonic ritualist and author. This small volume, which is now exceedingly rare, consisted of two parts, the second part containing an account of the "Ineffable Degrees of Masonry," together with several Masonic songs by the author. The publication of this work was followed by successively enlarged and improved editions in 1802, 1805, 1808, 1816, 1818, and by numerous editions after the author's decease. It is still regarded as a standard work. Mr. Webb has long been known as the founder of the American system of chapter and encampment Masonry. He presided over a convention of committees in Boston in October, 1797, for the formation of a general grand chapter of royal arch Masons, and at a meeting in Providence in January, 1799, he presented, as chairman of a committee, a constitution which was adopted. The formation of the grand encampment of the United States was the result of his Masonic work. The original draft of the constitution, with all the changes, additions, and interlineations in his own handwriting, is now on file among the archives of St. John's commandery, Providence. In 1799 he removed with his family to Providence, where he spent the greater part of his remaining years. His musical attainments were considerable, and he was the first president of the Psallonian society, an organization for the improvement of its members in sacred melody. In 1815, having changed his residence to Boston, he instituted, in connection with others, the Handel and Haydn society, of which he was the first president.

WEBB, Thomas T., naval officer, b. in Virginia about 1806; d. in Norfolk, Va., 11 April, 1853. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 1 Jan., 1808, and was promoted to lieutenant, 19 Dec., 1814. He served in the navy during the war of 1812, cruised in the frigate "Macedonian" of the Mediterranean station in 1815-'18 during the Algerine war, was attached to the Norfolk navy-yard in 1818-'21, cruised in the sloop "John Adams" in the West Indies in 1821-'4, served in the receiving-ship "Alert" at Norfolk in 1825-'6, and at the navy-yard, Pensacola, 1828-'9. He commanded the schooner "Shark" in the West Indies in 1830-'2, was promoted to master-commandant, 8 March, 1831, and commanded the sloop "Vandalia" on the coast of Florida in 1833-'6. In 1837 he was on leave, and in 1838-'41 he commanded the receiving-ship at Norfolk. He was promoted to captain, 8 March, 1841, and was on waiting orders until his death.

WEBB, William Benning, lawyer, b. in Washington, D. C., 17 Sept., 1825. He was graduated at Columbian college in 1844, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1847, and entered upon active practice, in which he was soon successful. When the civil war opened in 1861 he became captain of a company of District of Columbia volunteers, and when the district police force was reorganized about that time, Mr. Webb was appointed its superintendent. After holding the office for three years, and doing much good in the way of organization, he resigned his commission and resumed the practice of his profession. He subsequently became counsel for the Washington gas-light company, for Adams express company, and the 1st national bank of Washington; was also a director in the first-named company, and was chosen president of the Washington bar association. In 1885 he became president of the board of district commissioners. He is the author of a codification of the laws of the Corporation of Washington, which is accepted as a standard authority (Washington, 1868).

WEBB, William Henry, ship-builder, b. in New York city, 19 June, 1816. He was educated privately and at Columbia college grammar-school, learned the ship-building trade in the yard of his father, Isaac, and after 1843 carried on the business alone. He has constructed many vessels of great speed and capacity, upon original plans, among them "The General Admiral," a steam frigate for the Russian navy, two steam screw-frigates for the Italian navy, and the iron-clad ram "Dunderberg" for the U. S. navy. He has declined all offers of public office. Mr. Webb purposes to erect in New York a building to be known as "Webb's free academy and home for ship-builders," and has in preparation a work on "Practical Ship-Building."

WEBBER, Charles Wilkins, author, b. in Russellville, Ky., 29 May, 1819; d. in Nicaragua, Central America, 11 April, 1856. He was the son of Dr. Augustine Webber, a well-known physician in Kentucky, and inherited from his mother, who was the daughter of Gen. John Tannehill, a fondness for out-door life. In 1838 he went to Texas, then struggling for independence, and was for several years connected with the famous Texas rangers, with whom he saw much wild and adventurous life. He then returned to Kentucky and studied medicine; but this he soon relinquished, and in 1843 entered Princeton theological seminary with a view to the Presbyterian ministry. This he soon abandoned, and settled in New York city, where he devoted himself to a literary career and became connected with the "New World," the "Democratic Review," and the "Sunday Despatch." Subsequently he was joint proprietor and associate editor of the "Whig Review" for two years. In 1849 he organized an expedition to the region of Colorado and Gila rivers; but, for various reasons, the principal of which was the seizure of the horses by Comanche Indians, it failed. The difficulty in crossing the western deserts led to his efforts to form a camel company, for which he obtained a charter from the New York legislature in 1854. In the winter of 1855-'6 he left New York to join William Walker, who was then endeavoring to maintain himself in Central America. He took part with Walker's forces in the battle of Rivas, and fell in some chance rencontre or ambushade in that engagement. In addition to many stories that he contributed to periodicals, he published "Old Hicks, the Guide, or Adventures in the Comanche Country in Search of a Gold-Mine" (New York, 1848); "Gold-Mines of the Gila" (1849); "The Hunter Naturalist, a Romance of Sporting" (Philadelphia, 1851); "Texan Virago, or the Tailor of Gotham" (1852); "Wild Girl of Nebraska" (1852); "Tales of the Southern Border" (part i., 1852; complete, 1853); "Spiritual Vampirism: the History of Ethered Softdown and her Friends of the New Light" (1853); "Shot in the Eye" (which was his most successful story) and "Adventures with Texas Rifle Rangers" (London, 1853); "Wild Scenes and Song Birds" (New York, 1854); and "History of Mystery" (Philadelphia, 1855).

WEBBER, Samuel, educator, b. in Byfield, Mass., in 1759; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 17 July, 1810. He was graduated at Harvard in 1784, taking high rank in mathematics, entered the ministry, and in 1787 was made tutor. In 1789 he was appointed to the chair of mathematics and natural philosophy, which he held till he was raised in 1804 to the presidency of the college. Dr. Webber was one of the commissioners that were appointed to settle the boundary-line between the United States and the British provinces. He was vice-president of the American academy, and Harvard gave him the degree of D. D. in 1806. He was the author of a "System of Mathematics," which was intended for use in Harvard, and for a long time was almost the only text-book on that subject in New England colleges (2 vols., Boston, 1801), and a "Eulogy on President Willard" (1804). He also revised the introduction to Jedidiah Morse's "American Universal Geography" (1796). See a "Eulogy" by Henry Ware, D. D. (Cambridge, 1810).—His son, Samuel, physician, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 15 Sept., 1797; d. in Charlestown, N. H., 5 Dec., 1880, was graduated at Harvard in 1815, taught four years, at the same time studying medicine, and received his medical degree in 1822, after serving as assistant to the professor of chemistry at Harvard for eighteen months. During the rest of his life he resided at Charlestown, N. H., on Connecticut river, where he gave much attention to study, and was elected a fellow of the Royal society of northern antiquarians of Copenhagen, Denmark. He published several poems, including "Logan, an Indian Tale" (1821), and "War" (1824).

WEBER, Gustav C. E., physician, b. in Bonn, Prussia, 26 May, 1828. His father, Dr. M. I. Weber, became professor of anatomy in the University of Bonn on its foundation in 1818, and is the author of many professional works. The son studied at the university till the revolutionary movement of 1848 caused him to emigrate to the United States, where he settled near St. Louis, Mo., and engaged in farming. He afterward completed his studies in Vienna, Amsterdam, and Paris, and in 1853 began to practise medicine in New York city. In 1856-'63 he was professor of surgery in Cleveland medical college, and in 1861, as surgeon-general of the state, he organized a system for the better medical care of the troops in the field. In 1864 he organized Charity hospital medical college, where he became professor of clinical surgery and dean of the faculty, and he was also consulting surgeon to the Charity hospital, which had been founded chiefly through his efforts. The school subsequently became the medical department of the University of Wooster, Dr. Weber retaining his chair. He is the originator of a new method of closing large arteries in surgical operations without a ligature, and of a method for removing stone from the bladder. In 1859 Dr. Weber established the Cleveland "Medical Gazette," which he conducted for several years.

WEBER, Max, soldier, b. in Achern, Baden, 27 Aug., 1824. He was graduated at the military school of Carlsruhe, in 1843, as a lieutenant of infantry, and held a commission in the army of Baden until 1849, when he served with the revolutionists under Gen. Franz Sigel. He came to this country in the same year, settled in New York city, and on 16 May, 1861, became colonel of the 20th New York regiment. He was stationed at Fort Monroe and took part in the capture of Fort Hatteras, and from September, 1861, till May, 1862, commanded Camp Hamilton, near the former post, being commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, 28 April, 1862. He was at Newport News during the fight between the "Monitor" and "Merimac," in anticipation of a Confederate attack by land, took part in the capture of Norfolk in May, and then commanded at Suffolk till September, when he was ordered to the Army of the Potomac. He led a brigade at South Mountain and Antietam, where he received a wound that crippled his right arm for life. He served under Gen. David Hunter and Gen. Franz Sigel in the Shenandoah valley in 1864, and, while commanding at Harper's Ferry, repelled Gen. Jubal A. Early's attack of 4-7 July. Gen. Weber resigned his commission on 13 May, 1865. He was assessor of internal revenue in New York in 1870-'2, and then collector till April, 1883, when he resigned.

WEBER, Paul, German artist, b. about 1823. He studied art in Frankfort, and in 1848 came to the United States, settling in Philadelphia. In 1858 he went to Darmstadt, where he was appointed court painter. Among those of his works that are owned in the United States are "A Scene in the Catskills," in the Corcoran gallery, Washington (1858); "Morning," in the Pennsylvania academy of fine arts; and "Lake Chiemsee, in the Bavarian Highlands."

WEBSTER, Albert Falvey, author, b. in Boston, Mass., in 1848; d. at sea, 27 Dec., 1876. His father was a confectioner in Boston. After engaging for a short time in various kinds of business, he became a writer for the magazines, and published many short stories in "Scribner's Monthly," "The Atlantic Monthly," and "Appletons' Journal," in which appeared his "Boarding-House Sketches." He also published a series of articles exposing abuses in the administration of criminal law and in the management of prisons. He was consumptive, went to California by way of the isthmus, and died on his way from San Francisco to Honolulu, and was buried in the Pacific. At the time of his death Mr. Webster was engaged to be married to Una, eldest daughter of Nathaniel Hawthorne. He left an unfinished novel. His most notable stories are "Our Friend Sullivan," "My Daughter's Watch," "The Clytemnestra," and "An Operation in Money."

WEBSTER, Ebenezer, patriot, b. in Kingston, N. H., in 1739; d. in Salisbury (now Franklin), N. H., in 1806. He served in the old French war under Sir Jeffrey Amherst, and in 1761 was one of the first settlers in what is now Franklin, N. H., then the most northern of the New England settlements. There he became a farmer and also kept a tavern. At the opening of the Revolution he led the Salisbury militia to Cambridge, and subsequently saw much service till the close of the war, when he had attained the rank of colonel of militia. He was a member of the lower branch of the legislature for several years, served also in the state senate, and from 1791 till his death was judge of the court of common pleas of Hillsborough county, N. H.—His son, Ezekiel, lawyer, b. in Salisbury, N. H., 11 March, 1780; d. in Concord, N. H., 10 April, 1829, was graduated at Dartmouth in 1804, studied law, and rose to eminence at the bar. He was also a member for several years of the New Hampshire legislature. His death resulted suddenly from disease of the heart while he was trying a case.—Another son, Daniel, statesman, b. in Salisbury (now Franklin), N. H., 18 Jan., 1782; d. in Marshfield, Mass., 24 Oct., 1852, was the second son of Ebenezer Webster by his second wife, Abigail Eastman. He seemed so puny and sickly as an infant that it was thought he would not live to grow up. He was considered too delicate for hard work on the farm, and was allowed a great deal of time for play. Much of this leisure he spent in fishing and hunting, or in roaming about the woods, the rest in reading. In later life he could not remember when he learned to read. As a child his thirst for knowledge was insatiable; he read every book that came within reach, and conned his favorite authors until their sentences were in great part stored in his memory. In May, 1796, he was sent to Exeter academy, where he made rapid progress with his studies, but was so overcome by shyness that he found it impossible to stand up and "speak pieces" before his school-mates. In spite of this timidity, some of his natural gifts as an orator had already begun to show themselves. His great, lustrous eyes and rich voice, with its musical intonations, had already exerted a fascination upon those who came within their range; passing teamsters would stop, and farmers pause, sickle in hand, to hear him recite verses of poetry or passages from the Bible. In February, 1797, his father sent him to Boscawen, where he continued his studies under the tuition of the Rev. Samuel Wood. Although Ebenezer Webster found it difficult, by unremitting labor and strictest economy, to support his numerous family, he still saw such signs of promise in Daniel as to convince him that it was worth while, at whatever sacrifice, to send him to college. In view of this decision, he took him from school, to hasten his preparation under a private tutor, and on the journey to Boscawen he informed Daniel of his plans. The warm-hearted boy, who had hardly dared hope for such good fortune, and keenly felt the sacrifice it involved, laid his head upon his father's shoulder and burst into tears. After six months with his tutor he had learned enough to fulfil the slender requirements of those days for admission to Dartmouth, where he was duly graduated in 1801. At college, although industrious and punctual in attendance and soon found to be very quick at learning, he was not regarded as a thorough scholar. He had not, indeed, the scholarly temperament—that rare combination of profound insight, sustained attention, microscopic accuracy, iron tenacity, and disinterested pursuit of truth—which characterizes the great scientific discoverer or the great historian. But, while he had not these qualities in perfect combination—and no one knew this better than Mr. Webster himself—there was much about him that made him more interesting and remarkable, even at that early age, than if he had been consummate in scholarship. He was capable of great industry, he seized an idea with astonishing quickness, his memory was prodigious, and for power of lucid and convincing statement he was unrivalled. With these rare gifts he possessed that supreme poetic quality that defies analysis, but is at once recognized as genius. He was naturally, therefore, considered by tutors and fellow-students the most remarkable man in the college, and the position of superiority thus early gained was easily maintained by him through life and wherever he was placed. While at college he conquered or outgrew his boyish shyness, so as to take pleasure in public speaking, and his eloquence soon attracted so much notice that in 1800 the townspeople of Hanover selected this undergraduate to deliver the Fourth-of-July oration. It has been well pointed out by Henry Cabot Lodge that "the enduring work which Mr. Webster did in the world, and his meaning and influence in American history, are all summed up in the principles enunciated in that boyish speech at Hanover," which "preached love of country, the grandeur of American nationality, fidelity to the constitution as the bulwark of nationality, and the necessity and the nobility of the union of the states." After leaving college, Mr. Webster began studying law in the office of Thomas W. Thompson, of Salisbury, who was afterward U. S. senator. Some time before this he had made up his mind to help his elder brother, Ezekiel, to go through college, and for this purpose he soon found it necessary to earn money by teaching school. After some months of teaching at Fryeburg, Me., he returned to Mr. Thompson's office. In July, 1804, he went to Boston in search of employment in some office where he might complete his studies. He there found favor with Christopher Gore, who took him into his office as student and clerk. In March, 1805, Mr. Webster was admitted to the bar, and presently he began practising his profession at Boscawen. In 1807, having acquired a fairly good business, he turned it over to his brother, Ezekiel, and removed to Portsmouth, where his reputation grew rapidly, so that he was soon considered a worthy antagonist to Jeremiah Mason, one of the ablest lawyers this country has ever produced. In June, 1808, he married Miss Grace Fletcher, of Hopkinton, N. H.

His first important political pamphlet, published that year, was a criticism on the embargo. In 1812, in a speech before the Washington benevolent society at Portsmouth, he summarized the objections of the New England people to the war just declared against Great Britain. He was immediately afterward chosen delegate to a convention of the people of Rockingham county, and drew up the so-called "Rockingham Memorial," addressed to President Madison, which contained a formal protest against the war. In the following autumn he was elected to congress, and on taking his seat, in May, 1813, he was placed on the committee on foreign relations. His first step in congress was the introduction of a series of resolutions aimed at the president, and calling for a statement of the time and manner in which Napoleon's pretended revocation of his decrees against American shipping had been announced to the United States. His first great speech, 14 Jan., 1814, was in opposition to the bill for encouraging enlistments, and at the close of that year he opposed Sec. Monroe's measures for enforcing what was known as the "draft of 1814." Mr. Webster's attitude toward the administration was that of the Federalist party to which he belonged; but he did not go so far as the leaders of that party in New England. He condemned the embargo as more harmful to ourselves than to the enemy, as there is no doubt it was; he disapproved the policy of invading Canada, and maintained that our wisest course was to increase the strength of the navy, and on these points history will probably judge him to have been correct. But in his opinion, that the war itself was unnecessary and injurious to the country, he was probably, like most New Englanders of that time, mistaken. Could he have foreseen and taken into account the rapid and powerful development of national feeling in the United States which the war called forth, it would have modified his view, for it is clear that the war party, represented by Henry Clay and his friends, was at that moment the truly national party, and Mr. Webster's sympathies were then, as always, in favor of the broadest nationalism, and entirely opposed to every sort of sectional or particularist policy. This broad, national spirit, which was strong enough in the two Adamses to sever their connection with the Federalists of New England, led Mr. Webster to use his influence successfully to keep New Hampshire out of the Hartford convention. In the 13th congress, however, he voted 191 times on the same side with Timothy Pickering, and only 4 times on the opposite side. In this and the next congress the most important work done by Mr. Webster was concerned with the questions of currency and a national bank. He did good service in killing the pernicious scheme for a bank endowed with the power of issuing irredeemable notes and obliged to lend money to the government. He was disposed to condemn outright the policy of allowing the government to take part in the management of the bank. He also opposed a protective tariff, but, by supporting Mr. Calhoun's bill for internal improvements, he put himself on record as a loose constructionist. His greatest service was unquestionably his resolution of 26 April, 1816, requiring that all payments to the national treasury must be made in specie or its equivalents. This resolution, which he supported in a very powerful speech, was adopted the same day by a large majority, and its effect upon the currency was speedily beneficial. In the course of this session he declined, with grim humor, a challenge sent him by John Randolph.

In June, 1816, he removed to Boston, and at the expiration of his second term in congress, 4 March, 1817, he retired for a while to private life. His reason for retiring was founded in need of money and the prospect of a great increase in his law-practice. On his removal to Boston this prospect was soon realized in an income of not less than $20,000 a year. One of the first cases upon which he was now engaged was the famous Dartmouth college affair. While Mr. Webster's management of this case went far toward placing him at the head of the American bar, the political significance of its decision was such as to make it an important event in the history of the United States. It shows Mr. Webster not only as a great constitutional lawyer and consummate advocate, but also as a powerful champion of Federalism. In its origin Dartmouth college was a missionary school for Indians, founded in 1754 by the Rev. Eleazar Wheelock, at Lebanon, Conn. After a few years funds were raised by private subscription for the purpose of enlarging the school into a college, and as the Earl of Dartmouth had been one of the chief contributors, Dr. Wheelock appointed him and other persons trustees of the property. The site of the college was fixed in New Hampshire, and a royal charter in 1769 created it a perpetual corporation. The charter recognized Wheelock as founder, and appointed him president, with power to name his successor, subject to confirmation by the trustees. Dr. Wheelock devised the presidency to his son, John Wheelock, who accordingly became his successor. The charter, in expressly forbidding the exclusion of any person on account of his religious belief, reflected the broad and tolerant disposition of Dr. Wheelock, who was a liberal Presbyterian, and as such had been engaged in prolonged controversy with that famous representative of the strictest Congregationalism, Dr. Joseph Bellamy. In 1793 Bellamy's pupil, Nathaniel Niles, became a trustee of Dartmouth, and between him and John Wheelock the old controversy was revived and kept up with increasing bitterness for several years, dividing the board of trustees into two hostile parties. At length, in 1809, the party opposed to President Wheelock gained a majority in the board, and thus became enabled in various ways to balk and harass the president, until in 1815 the quarrel broke forth into a war of pamphlets and editorial articles that convulsed the whole state of New Hampshire. The Congregational church was at that time the established church in New Hampshire, supported by taxation, and the Federalist party found its strongest adherents among the members of that church. Naturally, therefore, the members of other churches, and persons opposed on general principles to the establishment of a state church, were inclined to take sides with the Republicans. In 1815 President Wheelock petitioned the legislature for a committee to investigate the conduct of the trustees, whom he accused of various offences, from intolerance in matters of religion to improper management of the funds. Thus the affair soon became a party question, in which the Federalists upheld the trustees, while the Republicans sympathized with the president. The legislature granted the petition for a committee, but the trustees forthwith, in a somewhat too rash spirit of defiance, deposed Mr. Wheelock and chose a new president, the Rev. Francis Brown. In the ensuing state election Mr. Wheelock and his sympathizers went over to the Republicans, who thus succeeded in electing their candidate for governor, with a majority of the legislature. In June, 1816, the new legislature passed an act reorganizing the college, and a new board of trustees was at once appointed by the governor. Judge Woodward, secretary of the old board, went over to the new board, and became its secretary, taking with him the college seal. The new board proceeded to expel the old board, which forthwith brought suit against Judge Woodward in an action of trover for the college seal. The case was tried in May, 1817, with those two great lawyers, Jeremiah Mason and Jeremiah Smith, as counsel for the plaintiffs. It was then postponed till September, when Mr. Webster was secured by the plaintiffs as an additional counsel. The plaintiffs contended that, in the case of a corporation chartered for private uses, any alleged misconduct of the trustees was properly a question for the courts, and not for the legislature, which in meddling with such a question plainly transcended its powers. Their chief reliance was upon this point, but they also contended that the act of legislature reorganizing the college was an act impairing the obligation of a contract, and therefore a violation of the constitution of the United States. The state court at Exeter decided against the plaintiffs, and the point last mentioned enabled them to carry up their case to the supreme court of the United States. As the elder counsel were unable to go to Washington, it fell to Mr. Webster to conduct the case, which was tried in March, 1818. Mr. Webster argued that the charter of Dartmouth college created a private corporation for administering a charity; that in the administration of such uses the trustees have a recognized right of property; that the grant of such a charter is a contract between the sovereign power and the grantees, and descends to their successors; and that, therefore, the act of the New Hampshire legislature, in taking away the government from one board of trustees and conferring it upon another, was a violation of contract. These points were defended by Mr. Webster with masterly cogency, and re-enforced by illustrations calculated to appeal to the Federalist sympathies of the chief justice. He possessed in the highest degree the art of so presenting a case that the mere statement seemed equivalent to demonstration, and never did he exhibit that art in greater perfection or use it to better purpose than in this argument. A few sentences at the close, giving utterance to deep emotion, left judges and audience in tears. The decision, rendered in the autumn, sustained Mr. Webster and set aside the act of the legislature as unconstitutional. It was one of those far-reaching decisions in which the supreme court, under John Marshall, fixed the interpretation of the constitution in such wise as to add greatly to its potency as a fundamental instrument of government. The clause prohibiting state legislation in impairment of contracts, like most such general provisions, stood in need of judicial decisions to determine its scope. By bringing under the protection of this clause every charter granted by a state, the decision in the Dartmouth college case went further perhaps than any other in our history toward limiting state sovereignty and extending the jurisdiction of the Federal supreme court.

In the Massachusetts convention of 1820 for revising the state constitution Mr. Webster played an important part. He advocated with success the abolition of religious tests for office-holders, and in a speech in support of the feature of property-representation in the senate he examined the theory and practice of bicameral legislation. His discussion of that subject is well worthy of study. In the same year, at the celebration of the second centennial of the landing of the Pilgrims, his commemorative oration was one of the noblest ever delivered. In 1825, on the laying of the corner-stone of Bunker Hill monument (see illustration), he attained still higher perfection of eloquence; and one year later, on the deaths of Adams and Jefferson, his eulogy upon those statesmen completed a trio of historical addresses unsurpassed in splendor. The spirit of these orations is that of the broadest patriotism, enlightened by a clear perception of the fundamental importance of the Federal union between the states and an ever-present consciousness of the mighty future of our country and its moral significance in the history of the world. Such topics have often been treated as commonplaces and made the theme of vapid rhetoric; but under Daniel Webster's treatment they acquired a philosophical value and were fraught with most serious and earnest meaning. These orations were conceived in a spirit of religious devotion to the Union, and contributed powerfully toward awakening such a sentiment in those who read them afterward, while upon those who heard them from the lips of the majestic speaker the impression was such as could never be effaced. The historian must assign to them a high place among the literary influences that aroused in the American people a sentiment of union strong enough to endure the shock of civil war.

In 1822 Mr. Webster was elected to congress from the Boston district, and he was twice re-elected by a popular vote that was almost unanimous. When he took his seat in congress in December, 1823, the speaker, Henry Clay, appointed him chairman of the judiciary committee. In that capacity he prepared and carried through the "Crimes act," which was substantially a thorough remodelling of the criminal jurisprudence of the United States. The preparation of this bill showed in the highest degree his constructive genius as a legislator, while in carrying it through congress his parliamentary skill and persuasiveness in debate were equally conspicuous. In 1825 he prepared a bill for increasing the number of supreme court judges to ten, for making ten Federal circuits, and otherwise strengthening the working capacity of the court; but this bill, after passing the house, was lost in the senate. Of his two most celebrated speeches in congress during this period, the first was on the revolution in Greece. Mr. Webster moved, 19 Jan., 1824, the adoption of his own resolution in favor of making provision for a commissioner to Greece should President Monroe see fit to appoint one. In his speech on this occasion he set forth the hostility of the American people to the principles, motives, and methods of the "Holy Alliance," and their sympathy with such struggles for self-government as that in which the Greeks were engaged. The resolution was not adopted, but Mr. Webster's speech made a profound impression at home and abroad. It was translated into several European languages, and called forth much foreign comment. The other great speech, delivered on 1 and 2 April, 1824, was what is commonly called his "free-trade speech." A bill had been introduced for revising the tariff in such a way as to extend the operation of the protective system. In this speech Mr. Webster found fault with the phrase "American policy," as applied by Mr. Clay to the system of high protective duties. "If names are thought necessary," said Mr. Webster, "it would be well enough, one would think, that the name should be in some measure descriptive of the thing; and since Mr. Speaker denominates the policy which he recommends a 'new policy in this country'; since he speaks of the present measure as a new era in our legislation; since he professes to invite us to depart from our accustomed course, to instruct ourselves by the wisdom of others, and to adopt the policy of the most distinguished foreign states—one is a little curious to know with what propriety of speech this imitation of other nations is denominated an 'American policy,' while, on the contrary, a preference for our own established system, as it now actually exists and always has existed, is called a 'foreign policy.' This favorite American policy is what America has never tried; and this odious foreign policy is what, as we are told, foreign states have never pursued. Sir, that is the truest American policy which shall most usefully employ American capital and American labor." After this exordium, Mr. Webster went on to give a masterly exposition of some of the elementary theorems of political economy and a survey, at once comprehensive and accurate, of the condition of American industry at the time. He not only attacked Mr. Clay's policy on broad national grounds, but also showed more specifically that it was likely to prove injurious to the maritime commerce in which the New England states had so long taken the lead; and he concluded by characterizing that policy as "so burdensome and so dangerous to the interest which has steadily enriched, gallantly defended, and proudly distinguished us, that nothing can prevail upon me to give it my support." Upon this last clause of his speech he was afterward enabled to rest a partial justification of his change of attitude toward the tariff. The other chief incidents in his career in the house of representatives were his advocacy of a national bankrupt law, his defence of William H. Crawford, secretary of the treasury, against sundry charges brought against him by Ninian Edwards (q. v.), lately senator from Illinois, and his defence of President Adams's policy in the matter of Georgia and the Creek Indians.

In politics Mr. Webster occupied at this time an independent position. The old Federalist party, to which he had formerly belonged, was completely broken down, and the new National Republican party, with its inheritance of many of the principles, motives, and methods of the Federalists, was just beginning to take shape under the leadership of Adams and Clay. Between these eminent statesmen and Mr. Webster the state of feeling was not such as to insure cordial co-operation, but in their views of government there was similarity enough to bring them together in opposition to the new Democratic party represented by Jackson, Benton, and Van Buren. With the extreme southern views of Crawford and Calhoun it was impossible that he should sympathize, although his personal relations with those leaders were quite friendly, and after the death of Calhoun, the noblest eulogium upon his character and motives was made by Mr. Webster. There is a sense in which all American statesmen may be said to be intellectually the descendants and disciples either of Jefferson or of Hamilton, and as a representative follower of Hamilton, Mr. Webster was sure to be drawn rather toward Clay than toward Jackson.

The course of industrial events in New England was such as to involve changes of opinion in that part of the country, which were soon reflected in a complete reversal of Mr. Webster's attitude toward the tariff. In 1827 he was elected to the U. S. senate. In that year an agitation was begun by the woollen-manufacturers, which soon developed into a promiscuous scramble among different industries for aid from government, and finally resulted in the tariff of 1828. That act, which was generally known at the time as "the tariff of abominations," was the first extreme application of the protective system in our Federal legislation. When the bill was pending before the senate in April, 1828, Mr. Webster made a memorable speech, in which he completely abandoned the position he had held in 1824, and from this time forth he was a supporter of the policy of Mr. Clay and the protectionists. For this change of attitude he was naturally praised by his new allies, who were glad to interpret it as a powerful argument in favor of their views. By every one else he was blamed, and this speech has often been cited, together with that of 7 March, 1850, as proving that Mr. Webster was governed by unworthy motives and wanting in political principle. The two cases, as we shall see, are not altogether parallel. Probably neither admits of entire justification, but in neither case did Mr. Webster attempt to conceal or disguise his real motives. In 1828 he frankly admitted that the policy of protection to manufactures by means of tariff duties was a policy of which he had disapproved, whether as a political economist or as a representative of the interests of New England. Against his own opposition and that of New England, the act of 1824 had passed. "What, then, was New England to do? . . . Was she to hold out forever against the course of the government, and see herself losing on one side and yet make no effort to sustain herself on the other? No, sir. Nothing was left for New England but to conform herself to the will of others. Nothing was left to her but to consider that the government had fixed and determined its own policy; and that policy was protection." In other words, the tariff policy adopted at Washington, while threatening the commercial interests of New England, had favored the investment of capital in manufactures there, and it was not becoming in a representative of New England to take part in disturbing the new arrangement of things. This argument, if pushed far enough, would end in the doctrine—now apparently obsolete, though it has often been attacked and defended—that a senator is simply the minister of his state in congress. With Mr. Webster it went so far as to modify essentially his expressions of opinion as to the constitutionality of protective legislation. He had formerly been inclined to interpret the constitution strictly upon this point, but in 1828 and afterward his position was that of the loose constructionists. Here the strong Federalist bias combined with that temperament which has sometimes been called "opportunism" to override his convictions upon the economic merits of the question.

This tariff of 1828 soon furnished an occasion for the display of Mr. Webster's strong Federalist spirit in a way that was most serviceable for his country and has earned for him undying fame as an orator and statesman. It led to the distinct announcement of the principles of nullification by the public men of South Carolina, with Mr. Calhoun at their head. During President Jackson's first term the question as to nullification seemed to occupy everybody's thoughts and had a way of intruding upon the discussion of all other questions. In December, 1829, Samuel A. Foote, of Connecticut, presented to the senate a resolution inquiring into the expediency of limiting the sales of the public lands to those already in the market, besides suspending the surveys of the public lands and abolishing the office of surveyor-general. The resolution was quite naturally resented by the western senators as having a tendency to check the growth of their section of the country. The debate was opened by Mr. Benton, and lasted several weeks, with increasing bitterness. The belief in the hostility of the New England states toward the west was shared by many southern senators, who desired to unite south and west in opposition to the tariff. On 19 Jan., 1830, Robert Y. Hayne, of South Carolina, attacked the New England states, accusing them of aiming by their protective policy at aggrandizing themselves at the expense of all the rest of the Union. On the next day Mr. Webster delivered his "first speech on Foote's resolution," in which he took up Mr. Hayne's accusations and answered them with great power. This retort provoked a long and able reply from Mr. Hayne, in which he not only assailed Mr. Webster and Massachusetts and New England, but set forth quite ingeniously and elaborately the doctrines of nullification. In view of the political agitation then going on in South Carolina, it was felt that this speech would work practical mischief unless it should meet with instant refutation. It was finished on 25 Jan., and on the next two days Mr. Webster delivered his "second speech on Foote's resolution," better known in history as the "Reply to Hayne." The debate had now lasted so long that people had come from different parts of the country to Washington to hear it, and on 26 Jan. the crowd not only filled the galleries and invaded the floor of the senate-chamber, but occupied all the lobbies and entries within hearing and even beyond. In the first part of his speech Mr. Webster replied to the aspersions upon himself and New England; in the second part he attacked with weighty argument and keen-edged sarcasm the doctrine of nullification. He did not undertake to deny the right of revolution as a last resort in cases with which legal and constitutional methods are found inadequate to deal; but he assailed the theory of the constitution maintained by Calhoun and his followers, according to which nullification was a right, the exercise of which was compatible with loyal adherence to the constitution. His course of argument was twofold; he sought to show, first, that the theory of the constitution as a terminable league or compact between sovereign states was unsupported by the history of its origin, and, secondly, that the attempt on the part of any state to act upon that theory must necessarily entail civil war or the disruption of the Union. As to the sufficiency of his historical argument there has been much difference of opinion. The question is difficult to deal with in such a way as to reach an unassailable conclusion, and the difficulty is largely due to the fact that in the various ratifying conventions of 1787-'9 the men who advocated the adoption of the constitution did not all hold the same opinions as to the significance of what they were doing. There was great divergence of opinion, and plenty of room for antagonisms of interpretation to grow up as irreconcilable as those of Webster and Calhoun. If the South Carolina doctrine distorted history in one direction, that of Mr. Webster probably departed somewhat from the record in the other; but the latter was fully in harmony with the actual course of our national development, and with the increased and increasing strength of the sentiment of union at the time when it was propounded with such powerful reasoning and such magnificent eloquence in the "Reply to Hayne." As an appeal to the common sense of the American people, nothing could be more masterly than Mr. Webster's demonstration that nullification practically meant revolution, and their unalterable opinion of the soundness of his argument was amply illustrated when at length the crisis came which he deprecated with such intensity of emotion in his concluding sentences. To some of the senators who listened to the speech, as, for instance, Thomas H. Benton, it seemed as if the passionate eloquence of its close concerned itself with imaginary dangers never likely to be realized; but the event showed that Mr. Webster estimated correctly the perilousness of the doctrine against which he was contending. For genuine oratorical power, the "Reply to Hayne" is probably the greatest speech that has been delivered since the oration of Demosthenes on the crown. The comparison is natural, as there are points in the American orator that forcibly remind one of the Athenian. There is the fine sense of proportion and fitness, the massive weight of argument due to transparent clearness and matchless symmetry of statement, and along with the rest a truly Attic simplicity of diction. Mr. Webster never indulged in mere rhetorical flights; his sentences, simple in structure and weighted with meaning, went straight to the mark, and his arguments were so skilfully framed that while his most learned and critical hearers were impressed with a sense of their conclusiveness, no man of ordinary intelligence could fail to understand them. To these high qualifications of the orator was added such a physical presence as but few men have been endowed with. Mr. Webster's appearance was one of unequalled dignity and power, his voice was rich and musical, and the impressiveness of his delivery was enhanced by the depth of genuine manly feeling with which he spoke. Yet while his great speeches owed so much of their overpowering effect to the look and manner of the man, they were at the same time masterpieces of literature. Like the speeches of Demosthenes, they were capable of swaying the reader as well as the hearer, and their effects went far beyond the audience and far beyond the occasion of their delivery. In all these respects the "Reply to Hayne" marks the culmination of Mr. Webster's power as an orator. Of all the occasions of his life, this encounter with the doctrine of nullification on its first bold announcement in the senate was certainly the greatest, and the speech was equal to the occasion. It struck a chord in the heart of the American people which had not ceased to vibrate when the crisis came thirty years later. It gave articulate expression to a sentiment of loyalty to the Union that went on growing until the American citizen was as prompt to fight for the Union as the Mussulman for his prophet or the cavalier for his king. It furnished, moreover, a clear and comprehensive statement of the theory by which that sentiment of loyalty was justified. Of the men who in after-years gave up their lives for the Union, doubtless the greater number had as school-boys declaimed passages from this immortal speech and caught some inspiration from its fervid patriotism. Probably no other speech ever made in congress has found so many readers or exerted so much influence in giving shape to men's thoughts.

Three years afterward Mr. Webster returned to struggle with nullification, being now pitted against the master of that doctrine instead of the disciple. In the interval South Carolina had attempted to put the doctrine into practice, and had been resolutely met by President Jackson with his proclamation of 10 Dec., 1832. In response to a special message from the president, early in January, 1833, the so-called "Force bill," empowering the president to use the army and navy, if necessary, for enforcing the revenue laws in South Carolina, was reported in the senate. The bill was opposed by Democrats who did not go so far as to approve of nullification, but the defection of these senators was more than balanced by the accession of Mr. Webster, who upon this measure came promptly to the support of the administration. For this, says Benton, "his motives . . . were attacked, and he was accused of subserviency to the president for the sake of future favor. At the same time all the support which he gave to these measures was the regular result of the principles which he laid down against nullification in the debate with Mr. Hayne, and he could not have done less without being derelict to his own principles then avowed. It was a proud era in his life, supporting with transcendent ability the cause of the constitution and of the country, in the person of a chief magistrate to whom he was politically opposed, bursting the bonds of party at the call of duty, and displaying a patriotism worthy of admiration and imitation. Gen. Jackson felt the debt of gratitude and admiration which he owed him; the country, without distinction of party, felt the same. . . . He was the colossal figure on the political stage during that eventful time; and his labors, splendid in their day, survive for the benefit of distant posterity" ("Thirty Years' View," i., 334). The support of the president's policy by Mr. Webster, and its enthusiastic approval by nearly all the northern and a great many of the southern people, seems to have alarmed Mr. Calhoun, probably not so much for his personal safety as for the welfare of his nullification schemes. The story that he was frightened by the rumor that Jackson had threatened to begin by arresting him on a charge of treason is now generally discredited. He had seen enough, however, to convince him that the theory of peaceful nullification was not now likely to be realized. It was not his aim to provoke an armed collision, and accordingly a momentary alliance was made between himself and Mr. Clay, resulting in the compromise tariff bill of 12 Feb., 1833. Only four days elapsed between Mr. Webster's announcement of his intention to support the president and the introduction of this compromise measure. Mr. Webster at once opposed the compromise, both as unsound economically and as an unwise and dangerous concession to the threats of the nullifiers. At this point the Force bill was brought forward, and Mr. Calhoun made his great speech, 15-16 Feb., in support of the resolutions he had introduced on 22 Jan., affirming the doctrine of nullification. To this Mr. Webster replied, 16 Feb., with his speech entitled "The Constitution not a Compact between Sovereign States," in which he supplemented and re-enforced the argument of the "Reply to Hayne." Mr. Calhoun's answer, 26 Feb., was perhaps the most powerful speech he ever delivered, and Mr. Webster did not reply to it at length. The burden of the discussion was what the American people really did when they adopted the Federal constitution. Did they simply create a league between sovereign states, or did they create a national government, which operates immediately upon individuals, and, without superseding the state governments, stands superior to them, and claims a prior allegiance from all citizens? It is now plain to be seen that in point of fact they did create such a national government; but how far they realized at the outset what they were doing is quite another question. Mr. Webster's main conclusion was sustained with colossal strength; but his historical argument was in some places weak, and the weakness is unconsciously betrayed in a disposition toward wire-drawn subtlety, from which Mr. Webster was usually quite free. His ingenious reasoning upon the meaning of such words as "compact" and "accede" was easily demolished by Mr. Calhoun, who was, however, more successful in hitting upon his adversary's vulnerable points than in making good his own case. In fact, the historical question was not really so simple as it presented itself to the minds of those two great statesmen. But in whatever way it was to be settled, the force of Mr. Webster's practical conclusions remained, as he declared in the brief rejoinder with which he ended the discussion: "Mr. President, turn this question over and present it as we will—argue it as we may—exhaust upon it all the fountains of metaphysics—stretch over it all the meshes of logical or political subtlety—it still comes to this: Shall we have a general government? Shall we continue the union of the states under a government instead of a league? This is the upshot of the whole matter; because, if we are to have a government, that government must act like other governments, by majorities; it must have this power, like other governments, of enforcing its own laws and its own decisions; clothed with authority by the people and always responsible to the people, it must be able to hold its course unchecked by external interposition. According to the gentleman's views of the matter, the constitution is a league; according to mine, it is a regular popular government. This vital and all-important question the people will decide, and in deciding it they will determine whether, by ratifying the present constitution and frame of government, they meant to do nothing more than to amend the articles of the old confederation." As the immediate result of the debates, both the Force bill and the Compromise tariff bill were adopted, and this enabled Mr. Calhoun to maintain that the useful and conservative character of nullification had been demonstrated, since the action of South Carolina had, without leading to violence, led to such modifications of the tariff as she desired. But the abiding result was, that Webster had set forth the theory upon which the Union was to be preserved, and that the administration, in acting upon that theory, had established an extremely valuable precedent for the next administration that should be called upon to meet a similar crisis.

The alliance between Mr. Webster and President Jackson extended only to the question of maintaining the Union. As an advocate of the policy of a national bank, a protective tariff, and internal improvements, Mr. Webster's natural place was by the side of Mr. Clay in the Whig party, which was now in the process of formation. He was also at one with both the northern and the southern sections of the Whig party in opposition to what Mr. Benton called the "demos kratéo" principle, according to which the president, in order to carry out the "will of the people," might feel himself authorized to override the constitutional limitations upon his power. This was not precisely what Mr. Benton meant by his principle, but it was the way in which it was practically illustrated in Jackson's war against the bank. In the course of this struggle Mr. Webster made more than sixty speeches, remarkable for their wide and accurate knowledge of finance. His consummate mastery of statement is nowhere more thoroughly exemplified than in these speeches. Constitutional questions were brought up by Mr. Clay's resolutions censuring the president for the removal of the deposits, and for dismissing William J. Duane, secretary of the treasury. In reply to the resolutions, President Jackson sent to the senate his remarkable "Protest," in which he maintained that in the mere discussion of such resolutions that body transcended its constitutional prerogatives, and that the president is the "direct representative of the American people," charged with the duty, if need be, of protecting them against the usurpations of congress. The Whigs maintained, with much truth, that this doctrine, if carried out in all its implications, would push democracy to the point where it merges in Cæsarism. It was now that the opposition began to call themselves Whigs, and tried unsuccessfully to stigmatize the president's supporters as "Tories." Mr. Webster's speech on the president's protest, 7 May, 1834, was one of great importance, and should be read by every student of our constitutional history. In another elaborate speech, 16 Feb., 1835, he tried to show that under a proper interpretation of the constitution the power of removal, like the power of appointment, was vested in the president and senate conjointly, and that "the decision of congress in 1789, which separated the power of removal from the power of appointment, was founded on an erroneous construction of the constitution." But subsequent opinion has upheld the decision of 1789, leaving the speech to serve as an illustration of the way in which, under the stress of a particular contest, the Whigs were as ready to strain the constitution in one direction as the Democrats were inclined to bend it in another. An instance of the latter kind was Mr. Benton's expunging resolution, against which Mr. Webster emphatically protested.

About this time Mr. Webster was entertaining thoughts of retiring, for a while at least, from public life. As he said, in a letter to a friend, he had not for fourteen years had leisure to attend to his private affairs, or to become acquainted by travel with his own country. This period had not, however, been entirely free from professional work. It was seldom that Mr. Webster took part in criminal trials, but in this department of legal practice he showed himself qualified to take rank with the greatest advocates that have ever addressed a jury. His speech for the prosecution, on the trial of the murderers of Capt. Joseph White, at Salem, in August, 1830, has been pronounced superior to the finest speeches of Lord Erskine. In the autumn of 1824, while driving in a chaise with his wife from Sandwich to Boston, he stopped at the beautiful farm of Capt. John Thomas, by the sea-shore at Marshfield. For the next seven years his family passed their summers at this place as guests of Capt. Thomas; and, as the latter was growing old and willing to be eased of the care of the farm, Mr. Webster bought it of him in the autumn of 1831. Capt. Thomas continued to live there until his death, in 1837, as Mr. Webster's guest. For the latter it became the favorite home whither he retired in the intervals of public life. It was a place, he said, where he "could go out every day in the year and see something new." Mr. Webster was very fond of the sea. He had also a passion for country life, for all the sights and sounds of the farm, for the raising of fine animals, as well as for hunting and fishing. The earlier years of Mr. Webster's residence at Marshfield, and of his service in the U. S. senate, witnessed some serious events in his domestic life. Death removed his wife, 21 Jan., 1828, and his brother Ezekiel, 10 April, 1829. In December, 1829, he married Miss Caroline Le Roy, daughter of a wealthy merchant in New York. Immediately after this second marriage came the "Reply to Hayne." The beginning of a new era in his private life coincided with the beginning of a new era in his career as a statesman. After 1830 Mr. Webster was recognized as one of the greatest powers in the nation, and it seemed natural that the presidency should be offered to such a man. His talents, however, were not those of a party leader, and the circumstances under which the Whig party was formed were not such as to place him at its head. The elements of which that party was made up were incongruous, the bond of union between them consisting chiefly of opposition to President Jackson's policy. In the election of 1836 they had not time in which to become welded together, and after the brief triumph of 1840 they soon fell apart again. In 1836 there was no general agreement upon a candidate. The northern Whigs, or National Republicans, supported by the anti-Masons, nominated Gen. William H. Harrison; the southern or "state-rights" Whigs nominated Hugh L. White; the legislature of Massachusetts nominated Mr. Webster, and he received the electoral vote of that state only. Over such an ill-organized opposition Mr. Van Buren easily triumphed. In March, 1837, on his way from Washington to Boston, Mr. Webster stopped in New York and made a great speech at Niblo's garden, in which he reviewed and criticised the policy of the late administration, with especial reference to its violent treatment of the bank. In the course of the speech he used language that was soon proved prophetic by the financial crisis of that year. In the summer he made a journey through the western states. In the next session of congress his most important speeches were those on the sub-treasury bill. The second of these, delivered 12 March, 1838, contained some memorable remarks on the course of Mr. Calhoun, who had now taken sides with the administration. No passage in all his speeches is more graphic than that in which, with playful sarcasm, he imagines Gen. Jackson as coming from his retirement at the Hermitage, walking into the senate-chamber, and looking across "to the seats on the other side."

The whole of that portion of the speech which relates to nullification is extremely powerful. Mr. Calhoun, in his reply, "carried the war into Africa," and attacked Mr. Webster's record. He was answered, 22 March, by a speech that was a model for such parliamentary retorts. Mr. Webster never sneered at his adversaries, but always rendered them the full meed of personal respect that he would have demanded for himself. He discussed questions on their merits, and was too great to descend to recriminations. His Titanic power owed very little to the spirit of belligerency. Never was there an orator more urbane or more full of Christian magnanimity.

In the summer of 1839 Mr. Webster with his family visited England, where he was cordially received and greatly admired. On his return in December he learned that the Whigs had this time united upon Gen. Harrison for their candidate in the hope of turning to their own uses the same kind of unreflecting popular enthusiasm that had elected Jackson. The panic of 1837 aided them still more, and Mr. Webster made skilful use of it in a long series of campaign speeches, during the summer of 1840, in Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia. He accepted the office of secretary of state in President Harrison's administration, and soon showed himself as able in diplomacy as in other departments of statesmanship.

There was a complication of difficulties with Great Britain which seemed to be bringing us to the verge of war. There was the long-standing dispute about the northeastern boundary, which had not been adequately defined by the treaty of 1783, and along with the renewal of this controversy came up the cases of McLeod and the steamer "Caroline," the slave-ship "Creole," and all the manifold complications that these cases involved. The Oregon question, too, was looming in the background. In disentangling these difficulties Mr. Webster showed wonderful tact and discretion. He was fortunately aided by the change of ministry in England, which transferred the management of foreign affairs from the hands of Lord Palmerston to those of Lord Aberdeen. Edward Everett was then in London, and Mr. Webster secured his appointment as minister to Great Britain. In response to this appointment, Lord Ashburton, whose friendly feeling toward the United States was known to every one, was sent over on a special mission to confer with Mr. Webster, and the result was the Ashburton treaty of 1842, by which an arbitrary and conventional line was adopted for the northeastern boundary, while the loss thereby suffered by the states of Maine and Massachusetts was to be indemnified by the United States. It was also agreed that Great Britain and the United States should each keep its own squadron to watch the coast of Africa for the suppression of the slave-trade, and that in this good work each nation should separately enforce its own laws. This clause of the treaty was known as the "cruising convention." The old grievance of the impressment of seamen, which had been practically abolished by the glorious victories of American frigates in the war of 1812-'15, was now formally ended by Mr. Webster's declaration to Lord Ashburton that henceforth American vessels would not submit themselves to be searched. Henceforth the enforcement of the so-called "right of search" by a British ship would be regarded by the United States as a casus belli. When all the circumstances are considered, this Ashburton treaty shows that Mr. Webster's powers as a diplomatist were of the highest order. In the hands of an ordinary statesman the affair might easily have ended in a war; but his management was so dexterous that, as we now look back upon the negotiation, we find it hard to realize that there was any real danger. Perhaps there could be no more conclusive proof or more satisfactory measure of his really brilliant and solid success.

While these important negotiations were going on, great changes had come over the political horizon. There had been a quarrel between the northern and southern sections of the Whig party (see TYLER, JOHN), and on 11 Sept., 1841, all the members of President Tyler's cabinet, except Mr. Webster, resigned. It seems to have been believed by many of the Whigs that a unanimous resignation on the part of the cabinet would force President Tyler to resign. The idea came from a misunderstanding of the British custom in similar cases, and it is an incident of great interest to the student of American history; but there was not the slightest chance that it should be realized. Had there been any such chance, Mr. Webster defeated it by staying at his post in order to finish the treaty with Great Britain. The Whigs were inclined to attribute his conduct to unworthy motives, and no sooner had the treaty been signed, 9 Aug., 1842, than the newspapers began calling upon him to resign. The treaty was ratified in the senate by a vote of 39 to 9, but it had still to be adopted by parliament, and much needless excitement was occasioned on both sides of the ocean by the discovery of an old map in Paris, sustaining the British view of the northeastern boundary, and another in London, sustaining the American view. Mr. Webster remained at his post in spite of popular clamor until he knew the treaty to be quite safe. In the hope of driving him from the cabinet, the Whigs in Massachusetts held a convention and declared that President Tyler was no longer a member of their party. On a visit to Boston, Mr. Webster made a noble speech in Faneuil hall, 30 Sept., 1842, in the course of which he declared that he was neither to be coaxed nor driven into an action that in his own judgment was not conducive to the best interests of the country. He knew very well that by such independence he was likely to injure his chances for nomination to the presidency. He knew that a movement in favor of Mr. Clay had begun in Massachusetts, and that his own course was adding greatly to the impetus of that movement. But his patriotism rose superior to all personal considerations. In May, 1843, having seen the treaty firmly established, he resigned the secretaryship and returned to the practice of his profession in Boston. In the canvass of 1844 he supported Mr. Clay in a series of able speeches. On Mr. Choate's resignation, early in 1845, Mr. Webster was re-elected to the senate. The two principal questions of Mr. Polk's administration related to the partition of Oregon and the difficulties that led to war with Mexico. The Democrats declared that we must have the whole of Oregon up to the parallel of 54° 40', although the 49th parallel had already been suggested as a compromise-line. In a very able speech at Faneuil hall, Mr. Webster advocated the adoption of this compromise. The speech was widely read in England and on the continent of Europe, and Mr. Webster followed it by a private letter to Mr. Macgregor, of Glasgow, expressing a wish that the British government might see fit to offer the 49th parallel as a boundary-line. The letter was shown to Lord Aberdeen, who adopted the suggestion, and the dispute accordingly ended in the partition of Oregon between the United States and Great Britain. This successful interposition disgusted some Democrats who were really desirous of war with England, and Charles J. Ingersoll, member of congress from Pennsylvania and chairman of the committee on foreign affairs, made a scandalous attack upon Mr. Webster, charging him with a corrupt use of public funds. Mr. Webster replied in his great speech of 6 and 7 April, 1846, in defence of the Ashburton treaty. The speech was a triumphant vindication of his public policy, and in the thorough investigation of details that followed, Mr. Ingersoll's charges were shown to be utterly groundless.

During the operations on the Texas frontier, which brought on war with Mexico, Mr. Webster was absent from Washington. In the summer of 1847 he travelled through the southern states, and was everywhere received with much enthusiasm. He opposed the prosecution of the war for the sake of acquiring more territory, because he foresaw that such a policy must speedily lead to a dangerous agitation of the slavery question. The war brought Gen. Zachary Taylor into the foreground as a candidate for the presidency, and some of the Whig managers actually proposed to nominate Mr. Webster as vice-president on the same ticket with Gen. Taylor. He indignantly refused to accept such a proposal; but Mr. Clay's defeat in 1844 had made many Whigs afraid to take him again as a candidate. Mr. Webster was thought to be altogether too independent, and there was a feeling that Gen. Taylor was the most available candidate and the only one who could supplant Mr. Clay. These circumstances led to Taylor's nomination, which Mr. Webster at first declined to support. He disapproved of soldiers as presidents, and characterized the nomination as "one not fit to be made." At the same time he was far from ready to support Mr. Van Buren and the Free-soil party, yet in his situation some decided action was necessary. Accordingly, in his speech at Marshfield, 1 Sept., 1848, he declared that, as the choice was really between Gen. Taylor and Gen. Cass, he should support the former. It has been contended that in this Mr. Webster made a great mistake, and that his true place in this canvass would have been with the Free-soil party. He had always been opposed to the further extension of slavery; but it is to be borne in mind that he looked with dread upon the rise of an anti-slavery party that should be supported only in the northern states. Whatever tended to array the north and the south in opposition to each other Mr. Webster wished especially to avoid. The ruling purpose of his life was to do what he could to prevent the outbreak of a conflict that might end in the disruption of the Union; and it may well have seemed that there was more safety in sustaining the Whig party in electing its candidate by the aid of southern votes than in helping into life a new party that should be purely sectional. At the same time, this cautious policy necessarily involved an amount of concession to southern demands far greater than the rapidly growing anti-slavery sentiment in the northern states would tolerate. No doubt Mr. Webster's policy in 1848 pointed logically toward his last great speech, 7 March, 1850, in which he supported Mr. Clay's elaborate compromises for disposing of the difficulties that had grown out of the vast extension of territory consequent upon the Mexican war. (See CLAY, HENRY.) This speech aroused intense indignation at the north, and especially in Massachusetts. It was regarded by many people as a deliberate sacrifice of principle to policy. Mr. Webster was accused of truckling to the south in order to obtain southern support for the presidency. Such an accusation seems inconsistent with Mr. Webster's character, and a comprehensive survey of his political career renders it highly improbable. The "Seventh-of-March" speech may have been a political mistake; but one cannot read it to-day, with a clear recollection of what was thought and felt before the civil war, and doubt for a moment the speaker's absolute frankness and sincerity. He supported Mr. Clay's compromises because they seemed to him a conclusive settlement of the slavery question. The whole territory of the United States, as he said, was now covered with compromises, and the future destiny of every part, so far as the legal introduction of slavery was concerned, seemed to be decided. As for the regions to the west of Texas, he believed that slavery was ruled out by natural conditions of soil and climate, so that it was not necessary to protect them by a Wilmot proviso. As for the fugitive-slave law, it was simply a provision for carrying into effect a clause of the constitution, without which that instrument could never have been adopted, and in the frequent infraction of which Mr. Webster saw a serious danger to the continuance of the Union. He therefore accepted the fugitive-slave law as one feature in the proposed system of compromises; but, in accepting it, he offered amendments, which, if they had been adopted, would have gone far toward depriving it of some of its most obnoxious and irritating features. By adopting these measures of compromise, Mr. Webster believed that the extension of slavery would have been given its limit, that the north would, by reason of its free labor, increase in preponderance over the south, and that by and by the institution of slavery, hemmed in and denied further expansion, would die a natural death. That these views were mistaken, the events of the next ten years showed only too plainly, but there is no good reason for doubting their sincerity. There is little doubt, too, that the compromises had their practical value in postponing the inevitable conflict for ten years, during which the relative strength of the north was increasing and a younger generation was growing up less tolerant of slavery and more ready to discard palliatives and achieve a radical cure. So far as Mr. Webster's moral attitude was concerned, although he was not prepared for the bitter hostility that his speech provoked in many quarters, he must nevertheless have known that it was quite as likely to injure him at the north as to gain support for him in the south, and his resolute adoption of a policy that he regarded as national rather than sectional was really an instance of high moral courage. It was, however, a concession that did violence to his sentiments of humanity, and the pain and uneasiness it occasioned is visible in some of his latest utterances.

On President Taylor's death, 9 July, 1850, Mr. Webster became President Fillmore's secretary of state. An earnest attempt was made on the part of his friends to secure his nomination for the presidency in 1852; but on the first ballot in the convention he received only 29 votes, while there were 131 for Gen. Scott and 133 for Mr. Fillmore. The efforts of Mr. Webster's adherents succeeded only in giving the nomination to Scott. The result was a grave disappointment to Mr. Webster. He refused to support the nomination, and took no part in the campaign. His health was now rapidly failing. He left Washington, 8 Sept., for the last time, and returned to Marshfield, which he never left again, except on 20 Sept. for a brief call upon his physician in Boston. By his own request there were no public ceremonies at his funeral, which took place very quietly, 29 Oct., at Marshfield. The steel engraving of Webster is from a portrait made about 1840, the vignette from a painting by James B. Longacre, executed in 1833. The other illustrations represent the Bunker Hill monument, his residence and grave at Marshfield, and the imposing statue by Thomas Ball, erected in the Central park, New York. See Webster's "Works," with biographical sketch by Edward Everett (6 vols., Boston, 1851); "Webster's Private Correspondence," edited by Fletcher Webster (2 vols., Boston, 1856); George Ticknor Curtis's "Life of Webster" (2 vols., New York, 1870); Edwin P. Whipple's "Great Speeches of Webster" (Boston, 1879); and Henry Cabot Lodge's "Webster," in "American Statesmen Series" (Boston, 1883).—Daniel's son, Fletcher, lawyer, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 23 July, 1813; d. near Bull Run, Va., 30 Aug., 1862, was graduated at Harvard in 1833, studied law with his father, and was admitted to the bar. He was private secretary to his father during part of the latter's service as secretary of state, secretary of legation in China under Caleb Cushing in 1843, a member of the Massachusetts legislature in 1847, and from 1850 till 1861 surveyor of the port of Boston. He became colonel of the 12th Massachusetts regiment, 26 June, 1861, served in Virginia and Maryland, and was killed at the second battle of Bull Run. Besides editing his father's private correspondence, Col. Webster published an "Oration before the Authorities of the City of Boston, July 4, 1846."

WEBSTER, Harrison Edwin, educator, b. in Angelica, N. Y., 8 Sept., 1842. He served in the U. S. army during the civil war, and was graduated at Union in 1868. From 1869 till 1873 he was tutor in natural history and physical geography, and then until 1883 held the chair of natural history at Union. He then accepted the professorship of geology and natural history at the University of Rochester, where he remained until 1888, when he was elected president of Union. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by the University of Rochester in 1888, and he is a member of scientific societies. Prof. Webster has written several pamphlets on natural history subjects, especially on marine forms.

WEBSTER, Horace, educator, b. in Hartford, Vt., 21 Sept., 1794; d. in Geneva, N. Y., 12 July, 1871. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1818, and was assistant professor of mathematics there till 1825, when he resigned his commission in the army. He was then professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Geneva (now Hobart) college till 1848, when he became principal of the Free academy in New York city. Here he held the chair of moral and intellectual philosophy from 1851, and in 1852 that of political philosophy was added. In 1866 the name of the academy was changed by law to "The College of the city of New York," and he continued at its head till 1869, after which he was emeritus professor till his death. He was eminently successful in his administration of the affairs of the college, and the impression he made on the students was lasting. From his precept and his example they learned thoroughness, devotion to duty, and regard for the best ideals of life. Columbia gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1849, and the University of Pennsylvania that of M. D. in 1850.

WEBSTER, James, British soldier, b. about 1743; d. in North Carolina in March, 1781. His father, Dr. Alexander Webster, was an eminent divine of Edinburgh. The son entered the army, became major of the 33d foot in February, 1771, and fought with credit in the American Revolution, becoming a lieutenant-colonel. He was active in the operations in New Jersey in 1777, at Verplanck's point in 1778, and in Cornwallis's campaign in the south. He commanded the British right wing at the battle of Guilford, N. C., 14 March, 1781, and there received a wound that resulted in his death.

WEBSTER, John Adams, naval officer, b. in Harford county, Md., 19 Sept., 1785; d. there, 4 July, 1876. He entered the merchant marine, but at the beginning of the war of 1812 became 3d lieutenant on the privateer "Rossie," under Com. Joshua Barney. Afterward he received a sailing-master's warrant in the navy, and was placed by Barney in command of a barge, of which he had charge till on the advance of the British on Washington he was transferred to shore duty. He commanded a detachment of sailors under Barney at Bladensburg, serving his guns till the powder was exhausted, and had charge of Battery Babcock, near Baltimore, during the attack on that place. This battery of six guns was old and dilapidated, the guns were corroded, the carriages rusty, and the trucks immovable, the earthworks were defective, and the place was overgrown with briars, but in forty-eight hours Webster had it ready for action. On the night of 13 Sept., Webster discovered the British landing-party, and opened fire on it, and his battery, together with Fort Covington, repelled the enemy after a brisk engagement, saving Baltimore. For this service he was specially mentioned in Com. John Rodgers's report to the secretary of the navy, and presented with swords by the citizens of Baltimore and the state of Maryland. On 22 Nov., 1819, he was commissioned captain in the revenue service, and during the Mexican war he commanded a fleet of eight cutters to co-operate in the campaign on Rio Grande river and before Vera Cruz. In 1865 he retired from active duty, and at his death he was the senior officer in the service.—His son, John Adams, b. in the homestead, Mount Adams, Harford co., Md., 26 June, 1823; d. in Ogdensburg, N. Y., 6 April, 1875, entered the revenue service in 1842, was promoted captain in 1860, and saved his vessel, the "Dobbin," from capture by the Confederates at Savannah and Hampton Roads. At the latter place she was the only U. S. vessel that escaped. While on the New England coast he received a gold watch from the British board of trade for services to English seamen.

WEBSTER, John White, chemist, b. in Boston, Mass., 20 May, 1793; d. there, 30 Aug., 1850. He was graduated at Harvard in 1811, and at its medical department in 1815. In 1824 he was appointed lecturer in chemistry, mineralogy, and geology in that institution, and in 1827 he was elected to the chair of chemistry and mineralogy, which he then held until the year of his death. In 1842 Prof. Webster borrowed a sum of money from Dr. George Parkman, afterward increased to upward of $2,000, as security for which he gave notes and mortgages on household property and collections. The mineral cabinets he secretly disposed of, and during an interview with Parkman, to whom he paid considerable money, the latter accused him of dishonesty in selling his collections, and threatened to foreclose the mortgages. An arrangement was made for a meeting on 23 Nov., 1849, at the college laboratory, at which Parkman was murdered. According to the confession made by Webster, at the time appointed Parkman arrived, and at once asked for the money, which not being forthcoming, he "called me a scoundrel and a liar, and went on heaping on me the most bitter taunts and opprobrious epithets." Seizing a billet of wood, Webster struck Parkman a blow on the side of the head, which killed him. The concealment of the body at once presented itself as the only means of escaping the fatal effects of the crime, and Webster immediately dismembered it, burning such parts with the clothes as he could, and concealing the remaining parts for further treatment. As soon as Parkman's disappearance was noted, efforts were made to find him, and he was traced to the laboratory. Further search revealed parts of the cadaver, and Webster was arrested. On the trial, which lasted eleven days, the chain of circumstantial evidence was perfect in its conclusions as to the identity of the body. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jeffries Wyman, and others testified as to the anatomical proportions of the body. The teeth were identified beyond doubt by the dentist who had made them for Parkman. Webster was prosecuted by John H. Clifford, and 116 witnesses were examined on the trial. Notwithstanding that every effort was made in his behalf, the jury returned a verdict of guilty, and he was hanged. During 1823-'6 he was one of the editors with John Ware and Daniel Treadwell, of the "Boston Journal of Philosophy and Arts," and he published "Description of the Island of St. Michael" (Boston, 1821); "A Manual of Chemistry" (1826); and edited Playfair's "Liebig's Organic Chemistry" (Cambridge, 1841). Several reports of his trial were published, including one by George Bemis, one of the counsel (Boston, 1850).

WEBSTER, Joseph Dana, soldier, b. in Old Hampton, N. H., 25 Aug., 1811; d. in Chicago, Ill., 12 March, 1876. His father, Josiah (1772-1837), was pastor at Hampton from 1808 until his death. The son was graduated at Dartmouth in 1832, and read law in Newburyport, Mass., but became a clerk in the engineer and war offices in Washington, was made a U. S. civil engineer in 1835, and on 7 July, 1838, entered the army as 2d lieutenant of topographical engineers. He served through the Mexican war, and was promoted 1st lieutenant in July, 1849, and captain in March, 1853, but resigned in April, 1854, and removed to Chicago, where he engaged in business. He was president of the commission that perfected the remarkable system of sewerage for that place, and also planned and executed the operations whereby the grade of a large part of the city was made from two to eight feet higher, whole blocks being raised by jack-screws while new foundations were inserted. He entered the service of the state at the opening of the civil war, took charge of the construction of fortifications at Cairo, Ill., and Paducah, Ky., in April, and was made paymaster, with rank of major, of U. S. volunteers on 1 June, but in February, 1862, he became colonel of the 1st Illinois artillery. He was chief of Gen. Grant's staff for several months, was present at the capture of Fort Henry and Fort Donelson, and at Shiloh was also chief of artillery. At the close of the first day's fight at Shiloh he occupied with all available artillery the ridge that covered Pittsburg Landing, thus checking the hitherto victorious Confederates. He received the highest commendation in Gen. Grant's official report, and continued to be his chief of staff till, in October, 1862, he was detailed by the war department to make a survey of the Illinois and Michigan canal. He was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, 29 Nov., 1862, and, after serving for some time as military governor of Memphis, Tenn., and as superintendent of military railroads, was again Grant's chief of staff in the Vicksburg campaign, and from 1864 till the close of hostilities held the same post under Gen. William T. Sherman. He was with Gen. George H. Thomas at the battle of Nashville. Gen. Webster was given the brevet of major-general of volunteers, 13 March, 1865, resigned on 6 Nov., and returned to Chicago, where he remained during the rest of his life. He was assessor of internal revenue in that city in 1869-'72, and then assistant U. S. treasurer there till July, 1872, when he became collector of revenue.

WEBSTER, Joseph Philbrick, musician, b. in Manchester, N. H., in 1820; d. in Elkhorn, Wis., 18 Jan., 1875. He acquired a good English education at Pembroke academy, and at ten years of age could play by ear upon the violin and flute. At twenty years of age he went to Boston, where for three years he was under the instruction of Dr. Lowell Mason and other teachers of music, and became known as a singer. At twenty-eight he lost his voice, after which he taught music in Connecticut, and from 1850 till 1855 in the south. While there he became a bitter foe to slavery, and this feeling was subsequently manifested in his many war songs. He afterward removed to Indianapolis, and then to Elkhorn, Wis., where he died. He composed a great number of sentimental songs. His cantata of "The Rebellion," in which is expressed his sorrow for the death of Lincoln, is one of his best efforts. His war songs were very popular in their day. Among his ballads are "Sweet By and By," "Lorena," and "The Golden Stair."

WEBSTER, Nathan Burnham, educator, b. in Unity, N. H., 13 June, 1821. He was educated at Norwich university, but left in 1840, without being graduated, to take charge of the Virginia literary, scientific, and military academy which had been established by Capt. Alden Partridge in Portsmouth. Two years later he resigned and established a similar school in Charleston, S. C. In 1844 he returned to the Virginia military academy, but in 1847 he taught in Richmond and lectured on physics in Richmond college. During 1848-'9 he was civil engineer in the U. S. navy-yard at Norfolk, Va., and then he founded the Virginia collegiate institute, and conducted it in Norfolk till 1862, when, owing to the civil war he removed to Ottawa, Canada, where he established a similar school. He opened the Webster institute in Norfolk in 1869, which he there continued till 1886. Prof. Webster invented the meteorograph, an automatic meteorlogical register, which he described in the "Proceedings of the American Association for the Advancement of Science for 1854," of which organization he has been a member since 1853 and a fellow since 1874. He was one of the founders, and for several years president, of the Ottawa natural history society. Prof. Webster has published addresses on educational and agricultural topics, and edited "Notes, Queries, and Answers," published in Manchester, N. H., during 1882-'3. He is the author of "Outlines of Chemistry" (New York, 1883).

WEBSTER, Noah, philologist, b. in Hartford, Conn., 16 Oct., 1758; d. in New Haven, Conn., 28 May, 1843. His father was a farmer, a descendant in the fourth generation of John Webster, who previous to 1660 was one of the magistrates and governor of Connecticut. His mother was a descendant of William Bradford, second governor of Plymouth colony. Noah entered Yale in 1774, but his studies were interrupted by the war of independence, and in his junior year he served in his father's company of militia. He was graduated in 1778, in the same class with Joel Barlow, Uriah Tracy, and Oliver Wolcott. He became a teacher, gave his leisure hours to the study of law, and in 1781 was admitted to the bar. But the state of the country was unfavorable to law business, and he resumed teaching at Goshen, N. Y. Here he began the compilation of text-books, and published "A Grammatical Institute of the English Language" (3 parts, Hartford, 1783-'5). This consisted of a spelling-book, a grammar, and a reading-book; and so successful was the speller that for twenty years while he was at work on his dictionary it supported him and his family, though his royalty was less than one cent on a copy. It is still in use, and 62,000,000 copies have been published. After the war the question of giving the soldiers pay for five years beyond their term of enlistment was discussed under great excitement, and in Connecticut a convention was held to protest against the passage of a bill for that purpose. Mr. Webster published a series of articles, under the signature of "Honorius," favoring the bill, and they were said to have been the principal cause of a revulsion of popular feeling, as indicated in the next election. This turned his attention to governmental matters, and in 1784 he published a pamphlet entitled "Sketches of American Policy," in which he argued that a new system of government was necessary for the country, in which the people and congress should act without the constant intervention of the states. This is believed to have been the first movement toward a national constitution. In the spring of the next year Mr. Webster visited the southern states, to petition their legislatures for a copyright law, and at Mount Vernon gave Washington a copy of his pamphlet. In 1786 he delivered, in several cities, a course of lectures, which were published under the title "Dissertations on the English Language" (1789). In 1787 he was superintendent of an academy in Philadelphia, and after the adjournment of the Constitutional convention published a pamphlet on "The Leading Principles of the Federal Constitution." In 1788 he established in New York the "American Magazine," but it lived only twelve months, and the next year he settled in Hartford as a lawyer, and married a daughter of William Greenleaf, of Boston. His friend, John Trumbull, the poet, referring to the dullness of business, wrote: "I fear he will breakfast upon Institutes, dine upon Dissertations, and go to bed supperless." Yet he enjoyed a profitable practice for four years, when he removed to New York and established a daily paper, the "Minerva" (subsequently changed to "Commercial Advertiser"), to support Washington's administration. In 1794 he published a pamphlet on "The Revolution in France," which was widely circulated; and in 1795 he wrote ten of the twelve articles under the signature of "Curtius," to sustain the Jay treaty, which were said by Rufus King to have done more than anything else to render that treaty acceptable to the people. A little later he wrote a history of pestilences, containing a large collection of facts and his own theories (2 vols., New York and London, 1799). He had removed to New Haven in 1798, and devoted himself to literature. In 1802 he produced a treatise on blockade and rights of neutrals, and also "The Origin and State of Banking Institutions and Insurance Offices."

Mr. Webster had long been studying the origin and structure of his mother tongue, and in 1807 he published the first results of his special labors, under the title "A Philosophical and Practical Grammar of the English Language." He objected to the ordinary English grammars, on the ground that they attempted to make the language conform to the Greek and Latin; but his book was never very successful. In the preceding year, 1806, he had published a vocabulary of words not contained in any existing lexicon, and he now began work upon his "American Dictionary of the English Language." To collect new words, and make fuller and more exact definitions, was the special work to which he devoted many years, and he made a "synopsis of words in twenty languages," which is still in manuscript. He also went to Europe in 1824 to consult literary men and examine works not to be found on this side of the Atlantic, and in the library of the University of Cambridge finished his dictionary, returning with the manuscript in June, 1825. In 1828 an edition of 2,500 copies was printed, followed by one of 3,000 in England. In 1840-'1 he published an enlarged edition, in two volumes. The first edition had contained 12,000 words and 40,000 definitions that were not to be found in any similar work, and in each successive edition the number has been increased. Just before his death he revised the appendix and added several hundred words. In that year also he published "A Collection of Papers on Political, Literary, and Moral Subjects," which included a treatise "On the Supposed Change in the Temperature of Winter."

In 1812, for more economical living, he had removed to Amherst, Mass., where he was instrumental in founding Amherst college, and became the first president of its board of trustees. He was the centre of a small literary circle there, and his large library was always open to his neighbors. In 1822 he resumed his residence in New Haven, and the next year Yale gave him the degree of LL. D. He was for several years an alderman of New Haven, was a judge of one of the Connecticut courts, and sat in the legislatures of that state and Massachusetts. He is described as a genial man, of great frankness, who rendered all the affairs of his household perfectly systematic, and never was in debt. He read the Bible thoroughly, believed fully in its inspiration, had deep religious convictions, and during the last thirty-five years of his life was a member of an orthodox Congregational church. He was tall and slender, but perfectly erect. His wife survived him four years. They had one son and six daughters. Dr. Webster's life has been written by one of his daughters, as an introduction to his great dictionary, and by Horace E. Scudder, in the "Men of Letters" series (Boston, 1882).

WEBSTER, Pelatiah, political economist, b. in Lebanon, Conn., in 1725; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., in September, 1795. He was graduated at Yale in 1746, studied theology, and preached in Greenwich, Mass., in the winter of 1748-'9. About 1755 he engaged in business in Philadelphia, where he accumulated a small fortune, at the same time devoting himself to study and literary work. He was an active patriot during the Revolution, aiding the American cause with pen and purse, and in February, 1788, was seized by the British and confined for 132 days in the city jail. Part of his property, to the value of £500, was confiscated. He gave much time to the study of the currency, finance, and the resources of the country, and was often consulted on these matters by members of congress. In his first essay, in October, 1776, he strongly urged the laying of a tax to provide for the speedy redemption of the continental currency, and in 1779 he began in Philadelphia the publication of a series of "Essays on Free Trade and Finance," of which seven were issued, the last in 1785. His "Dissertation on the Political Union and Constitution of the Thirteen United States of North America" (Philadelphia, 1783) is mentioned by James Madison as having an influence in directing the public mind to the necessity of a better form of government. Mr. Webster also published "Essay on Credit" (1786); "Reasons for repealing the Act of the Legislature which took away the Charter of the Bank of North America" (1786); and "Political Essays on the Nature and Operation of Money, Public Finances, and other Subjects, published during the American War" (1791).

WEBSTER, Richard, clergyman, b. in Albany, N. Y., 14 July, 1811; d. in Mauch Chunk, Pa., 19 June, 1856. His father, Charles R. Webster (1763-1834), a bookseller of Albany, established and conducted the "Albany Gazette" (1784-1824), and published "Webster's Calendar" from 1784 till his death. The son was graduated at Union college in 1829 and at Princeton theological seminary in 1834, and was ordained as a Presbyterian minister, 29 April, 1835. After laboring for a short time at South Easton, Pa., he organized a church at Mauch Chunk, 1 Nov., 1835, and was its pastor till his death. He also did much work in all parts of the coal region, and aided in founding about a dozen churches. Defective sight and hearing induced him to give much time to historical studies, and, besides frequent contributions to current religious literature under the signature of "K. H.," he issued a "Digest of the Acts of the General Assembly," and left a "History of the Presbyterian Church in America from its Origin till the Year 1760, with Biographical Sketches of its Early Ministers," which was published after his death by the Presbyterian historical society, with a memoir of the author by Rev. Cortlandt Van Rensselaer, D. D., and a historical introduction by Rev. William Blackwood, D. D. (Philadelphia, 1857).

WEBSTER, Warren, surgeon, b. in Gilmanton, N. H., 7 March, 1835. He was educated in New Hampshire and at medical schools in Boston and Paris, and graduated at the medical department of Harvard in 1860. Dr. Webster was appointed assistant surgeon in the U. S. army, 23 June, 1860, and after brief service on the frontier was ordered to Washington, where in 1861 he was placed in charge of Douglas general hospital, at the same time engaging in the organization and superintending the construction of other permanent military hospitals at Washington. He was on duty on the field at the second battle of Bull Run, and was made a medical inspector in the Army of the Potomac in 1862. Dr. Webster was present in the battle of Fredericksburg and active in the care of the wounded after Chancellorsville (1863), where he organized numerous field hospitals, passing to and fro for the purpose within the opposing lines under flag of truce. He was in charge of McDougall general hospital, Fort Schuyler, N. Y., in 1863-'4, and then of De Camp general hospital, where in 1866, during the cholera epidemic, he greatly distinguished himself. He was promoted surgeon with rank of major, 28 July, 1866, was medical director of the 5th military district in 1868-'70, when he organized a quarantine system for the Texas coast, and afterward served at various military stations in California and the east. Dr. Webster was brevetted captain "for gallant and meritorious services" at Chancellorsville, major "for faithful and meritorious services" during the war, and lieutenant-colonel "for meritorious and distinguished services at Hart's and David's islands, New York harbor, where cholera prevailed." He is the author of "The Army Medical Staff" (Boston, 1865); "Regulations for the Government of De Camp General Hospital" (New York, 1865); "Quarantine Regulations, 5th Military District" (Austin, Tex., 1869); and "Sympathetic Diseases of the Eye," translated (New York, 1881).

WEDDERBURN, Alexander, Baron LOUGHBOROUGH, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, 13 Feb., 1733; d. in Bayles, Berkshire, England, 3 Jan., 1805. He was educated at the University of Edinburgh, called to the Scottish bar at nineteen years of age, and was rapidly rising in his profession when he became offended by a rebuke that was administered by one of the judges, removed to London, and was admitted to the English bar in 1757. He soon gained high reputation, especially in the great Douglas case in 1768-'9, in which the succession in that family had become a subject of litigation among its several branches. He obtained a seat in parliament, and on 26 Jan., 1771, became solicitor-general in the ministry of Lord North, in which office he added to his reputation by his defence of Lord Clive, who was accused of maladministration in the affairs of India. In January, 1774, when the petition of Massachusetts for the removal of Thomas Hutchinson and Andrew Oliver was laid before the privy council, Wedderburn defended those functionaries in a speech in which he made a gross attack upon Benjamin Franklin, the agent of the petitioners, stigmatizing him as a "true incendiary." He violently opposed the claims of the American colonies, and throughout the Revolution was a strong supporter of Lord North's ministry. When, in 1776, Fox directed the attention of that ministry to the assumption of power on the part of the government to raise taxes in America, or annihilate charters at its pleasure, as the two principal grievances of the colonists that needed revision

Wedderburn replied: "Till the spirit of independence is subdued, revisions are idle; the Americans have no terms to demand from your justice, whatever they may hope from your grace and mercy." He was burned in effigy in Philadelphia, and justly regarded as one of the most unscrupulous foes to the liberties of the people. He became attorney-general in 1778, chief justice of the court of common pleas in 1780, and the same year was raised to the peerage as Lord Loughborough, Baron of Loughborough in the county of Leicester. In April, 1783, he assisted Lord North in forming the famous coalition ministry, in which he was the first commissioner of the great seal. After its dissolution he remained out of office till 27 Jan., 1793, when he became high chancellor under William Pitt. On his resignation of that office in April, 1801, he was created Earl Rosslyn, in the county of Mid-Lothian. When George III. heard that Wedderburn was dead, he remarked: "He has not left a greater knave behind him in my dominions." He published a "Treatise on English Poor Laws" and "Management of Prisons" (London, 1793).

WEED, Edwin Gardner, P. E. bishop, b. in Savannah, Ga., 23 July, 1837. He was graduated at the General theological seminary, New York, in 1870, ordered deacon, 24 Aug., 1870, and ordained priest, 29 Aug., 1871. He became rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Summerville, Ga., his first and only charge, which he held for fifteen years. He was consecrated third bishop of Florida in St. John's church, Jacksonville, Fla., 11 Aug., 1886. The degree of S. T. D. was conferred upon him by Racine college, Wis., and that of D. D. by the University of the south. He has taken great interest in the work of the church among the colored people of the south, and is an active member of the commission in charge of that work.

WEED, Stephen Hinsdale, soldier, b. in New York city in 1834; d. near Gettysburg, Pa., 2 July, 1863. He was graduated at the New York free academy in 1851, and at the U. S. military academy in 1854, and assigned to the artillery. After frontier duty in Texas, and service against the Seminoles in 1856-7, he was engaged in quelling the Kansas disturbances in 1858, and then on the Utah expedition, participating in skirmishes with hostile Indians at Egan Cañon, 11 Aug., 1860, and Deep Creek on 6 Sept. He was promoted captain on 14 May, 1861, and served in the peninsular, northern Virginia, and Maryland campaigns, in command of a battery. From 3 Dec., 1862, till 23 Jan., 1863, he was chief of the artillery corps at Falmouth, Va. After a short leave of absence he took part in the battle of Chancellorsville, and on 6 June, 1863, was made brigadier-general of volunteers for gallant conduct there. After 10 May, 1863, he commanded an artillery brigade in the 5th army corps. At Gettysburg, while holding the position on Little Round Top, he was mortally wounded, exclaiming as he fell: "I would rather die here than that the rebels should gain an inch of this ground." The point was essentially important to retain, and it is historically marked as "Weed's Hill."

WEED, Thurlow, journalist, b. in Cairo, Greene co., N. Y., 15 Nov., 1797; d. in New York city, 22 Nov., 1882. At twelve years of age he entered a printing-office in Catskill, N. Y. Soon afterward he removed with his father's family to the frontier village of Cincinnatus, Cortland co., N. Y., and aided in clearing the settlement and in farming, but in 1811 returned to the printing business, and was successively employed in several newspaper offices. At the beginning of the second war with Great Britain he enlisted as a private in a New York regiment, and served on the northern frontier. In 1815 he removed to New York city, where he was employed in the printing establishment of Van Winckle and Wiley. They were the publishers at that time of William Cobbett's "Weekly Register," and Weed became acquainted with the eccentric author by carrying proof-sheets to him. He went to Norwich, Chenango co., N. Y., in 1819, established the "Agriculturist," and two years afterward removed to Manlius, N. Y., where he founded the "Onondaga County Republican." In 1824 he became owner and editor of the "Rochester Telegraph," the second daily paper that was published west of Albany.

While Mr. Weed was editing that journal Lafayette visited the United States, and Weed accompanied him in a part of his tour throughout the country. Difficulties arising out of the anti-Mason excitement caused Mr. Weed's retirement from the "Telegraph" in 1826, and in the same year he founded the "Anti-Mason Enquirer." He was a member of the legislature in 1825. In 1830 he established the Albany "Evening Journal," which took a conspicuous part in the formation of the Whig and the Republican parties, being equally opposed to the Jackson administration and to nullification. During the thirty-five years of his control of that organ it held an influential place in party journalism, and brought Mr. Weed into intimate relations with politicians of all parties. His political career began in 1824 in the presidential conflict that resulted in the election of John Quincy Adams. He succeeded in uniting the Adams and Clay factions, and was acknowledged by the leaders of his party to have contributed more than any other to their success in that canvass. He was active in the nomination of William Henry Harrison in 1836 and 1840, of Henry Clay in 1844, of Gen. Winfield Scott in 1852, and of John C. Frémont in 1856. In 1860 he earnestly advocated the nomination of William H. Seward for the presidency, but he afterward cordially supported Abraham Lincoln, whose re-election he promoted in 1864. He subsequently aided the regular nominations of the Republican party, and did good service in the canvass of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant for the presidency. Especially in his own state he influenced the elections, and in the constitutional crisis that arose from the presidential election in 1876 he guided in a powerful degree the decisions of his party. He had visited Europe several times before the civil war, and in 1861 with Archbishop Hughes and Bishop McIlvaine he was sent abroad to prevail on foreign governments to refrain from intervention in behalf of the Confederacy. In this service he stoutly defended the national interests, and, through his influence with English and French statesmen, brought about a result that permanently affected the feeling of Europe toward the United States. His "Letters" from abroad were collected and published (New York, 1866). He became editor of the New York "Commercial Advertiser" in 1867, but was compelled to resign that office the next year, owing to failing health, and did not again engage in regular work. Mr. Weed was tall, with a large head, overhanging brows, and massive person. He had great natural strength of character, good sense, judgment, and cheerfulness. From his youth he possessed a geniality and tact that drew all to him, and it is said that he never forgot a fact or a face. He was a journalist for fifty-seven years, and, although exercising great influence in legislation and the distribution of executive appointments, he refused to accept any public office. He was one of the earliest advocates of the abolition of imprisonment for debt, was a warm opponent of slavery, supported the policy of constructing and enlarging the state canals, and aided various railway enterprises and the establishment of the state banking system. He took an active part in the promotion of several New York city enterprises—the introduction of the Croton water, the establishment of the Metropolitan police, the Central park, the harbor commission, and the Castle Garden depot and commission for the protection of immigrants. He gave valuable aid to many charitable institutions, and devoted a large part of his income to private charity. He published some interesting "Reminiscences" in the "Atlantic Monthly" (1876), and after his death his "Autobiography," edited by his daughter, appeared (Boston, 1882), the story of his life being completed in a second volume by his grandson, Thurlow Weed Barnes (1884).

Thurlow Weed

WEEDON, George, soldier, b. in Fredericksburg, Va., about 1730; d. there after 1790. He was an inn-keeper in his native town previous to the Revolution, and a zealous patriot. Dr. John D. F. Smythe, who made a tour of this country, of which he published an account (2 vols., London, 1784), says of him in 1772: "He was very active in blowing the seeds of sedition." Weedon was Dr. Smythe's host during his visit to Fredericksburg. He became lieutenant-colonel of the 3d Virginia regiment in February, 1776, and in August of the same year was transferred with the same rank to the 1st Virginia regiment. He was commissioned brigadier-general, 23 Feb., 1777, participated in the battles of the Brandywine and Germantown, in the former battle supporting the brigade in Gen. Nathanael Greene's division that rendered valuable service in arresting the British pursuit and rallying the routed army. In consequence of a question of supremacy in rank with Gen. William Woodford, Weedon retired from the service shortly after the battle of Germantown, but he resumed the command of a brigade in 1780, and during the siege of Yorktown in October, 1781, was in charge of the Virginia militia at Gloucester.

WEEKS, Edwin Lord, artist, b. in Boston, Mass., in 1849. He studied under Jean L. Gérôme and Léon Bonnat in Paris, and has travelled through Egypt, Syria, and other oriental countries, where the scenes of most of his works are laid. He has exhibited frequently at the salon in Paris, receiving honorable mention in 1885. Among his paintings are "A Cup of Coffee in the Desert," "A Scene in Tangiers," "Pilgrimage to the Jordan," "Jerusalem to the Bethany Road," "Alhambra Windows," "They Toil not, neither do they Spin," "A Prayer in the Desert," and "A Blacksmith's Shop in Tangiers." His "An Arab Story-Teller" was at the Centennial exhibition (Philadelphia, 1876), "A Moorish Camel-Driver" at the salon of 1878, and his "Departure for the Hunt, India" (1884), is in the Corcoran gallery, Washington.

WEEKS, John M., inventor, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 22 May, 1788; d. in Salisbury, Vt., 1 Sept., 1858. He removed with his parents to Salisbury in 1789, was educated in that town, and subsequently resided there until his death. He was a constant contributor to agricultural journals, made a study of bees, and invented the "Vermont beehive." He is the author of a "Manual on Bees" (New York, 1854); and a "History of Salisbury, Vt., with a Memoir of the Author," by George A. Weeks (Middlebury, Vt., 1860). He left a "History of the Five Nations" in manuscript.

WEEKS, Robert Kelley, poet, b. in New York city, 21 Sept., 1840; d. there, 13 April, 1876. He was graduated at Yale in 1862 and at Columbia law-school in 1864, and was admitted to the bar of New York in the same year, but relinquished that profession and devoted himself thenceforth to literary pursuits. He published "Poems" (New York, 1866) and "Episodes and Lyric Pieces" (1870). A third volume of his poems appeared shortly after his death (1876).

WEEKS, William Raymond, clergyman, b. in Brooklyn, Conn., 6 Aug., 1783; d. in Oneida, N. Y., 27 June, 1848. He was graduated at Princeton in 1809, studied at Andover theological seminary, and was pastor of Presbyterian churches in New York state from 1812 till 1832, when he accepted a charge in Newark, N. J., which he held till 1846. Williams gave him the degree of D. D. in 1828. He is the author of "Nine Sermons" (1813), a series of tracts (1834-'41), and a posthumous volume entitled "Pilgrim's Progress in the Nineteenth Century" (1849).

WEEMS, Mason Locke, historian, b. in Dumfries, Va., about 1760; d. in Beaufort, S. C., 23 May, 1825. He studied theology in London, took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church, and for several years was rector of Pohick church, Mount Vernon parish, Va., of which Washington was an attendant. The necessities of Weems's large family compelled him to resign that charge about 1790, and he became a book agent for Mathew Carey, the Philadelphia publisher. He was remarkably successful in that employment, "travelling throughout the south with his books in his saddle-bags, equally ready for a stump, a fair, or a pulpit." He was eccentric in mind and manner, and whenever he heard of a public meeting he would attend it, and, collecting a crowd around him, urge on his hearers the merits of his books, interspersing his remarks with anecdotes and humorous sallies. With his temperance pamphlet, entitled the "Drunkard's Glass," illustrated with cuts, he would enter taverns, and, by mimicking the extravagances of the drunkard, so amuse and delight his audiences that he had no trouble in selling his wares. He was an expert violin-player, on which he performed for young people to dance, thereby causing much scandal in pious communities. On one occasion he had promised to assist at a merry-making, but, fearing for his clerical character, he decided to play behind a screen. In the course of the evening it was overturned, disclosing the parson to the jeers of the company. On another occasion he was obliged to pass through a dangerous district of South Carolina, which at that time was infested with robbers. Just at nightfall his wagon sank into a quagmire; two ruffians appeared and were about to seize him, when he took out his violin and so charmed them by his music that they lifted his wheels out of the mud and let him go. "I took precious care," says Weems, "to say nothing of my name. When they pressed the question my fiddle drowned their words and mine too." Of his temperance tracts Bishop William Meade says in his "Old Churches and Old Families of Virginia": "They would be most admirable in their effects but for the fact that you know not what to believe of the narrative. There are passages of deep pathos and great eloquence in them." This charge of a want of veracity is brought against all Weems's writings, for it is probable he would have accounted it excusable to tell any good story to the credit of his heroes. Several of the most widely circulated anecdotes of the youth of Washington, especially the famous one of the hatchet, rest on his questionable authority. He obtained his material for the life of Gen. Francis Marion from Gen. Peter Horry, who disavowed all responsibility for the manner in which the narrative is told. An entertaining sketch of Weems's early pastorate is given in the "Travels in America" of John Davis (London, 1802). In this narrative he figures as a pious and devout preacher, devoted to good works. One of his pamphlets, "The Philanthropist," was somewhat mildly commended by Washington in an autograph letter to the author, who prefixed it to subsequent editions of the tract. His principal works are "Life of George Washington," which is still largely sold in the rural districts of many parts of this country, and is the most popular biography of that general in existence (Philadelphia, Pa., 1800; 11th ed., with additions, 1811); "Life of Gen. Francis Marion" (1805); "Life of Benjamin Franklin, with Essays" (1817); and "Life of William Penn" (1819).

WEIDEMEYER, John William, author, b. in Fredericksburg, Va., 26 April, 1819. His father was an officer in the life-guards of Jerome Bonaparte, king of Westphalia, with whom at an early age he came to New York city. Among the son's first teachers was Alexander T. Stewart, and he completed his education at the Columbia college grammar-school. For several years he taught at various seminaries in Ohio, but subsequently settled in New York city, where he entered on a business career. He made collections of lepidoptera, and discovered several important species, among which was the Limenitis Weidemeyeri of the Adirondack mountains. His large collection was purchased by the museum in Ratisbon, Germany. In connection with the study of entomology, he published "Catalogue of North-American Butterflies" (Philadelphia, 1864). He contributed to the "Christian Inquirer" and the "Atlantic Monthly," and prepared political articles for various journals. In 1841 he wrote a play entitled "The Vagabonds," which was produced at the Franklin theatre in New York city and the Arch street theatre in Philadelphia, and he has in preparation "Cæsar and Cleopatra," an acting drama. Mr. Weidemeyer has also published "Real and Ideal: a Collection of Metrical Compositions by John W. Montclair" (Philadelphia, 1865); "Themes and Translations" (New York, 1867); "American Fish, and how to catch Them" (1885); and "From Alpha to Omega" (1889).

WEIDNER, Revere Franklin, clergyman, b. in Centre Valley, Lehigh co., Pa., 22 Nov., 1851. He was graduated at Muhlenberg college, Allentown, Pa., in 1869, at the Lutheran theological seminary at Philadelphia in 1873, and was ordained to the ministry in the latter year. In 1887 he received the degree of D. D. from Carthage college, Ill. He was tutor in Muhlenberg college in 1868-'9, pastor at Phillipsburg, N. J., in 1873-'8, professor of the English language and history at Muhlenberg college in 1875-'7, and pastor in Philadelphia in 1878-'82. He was director of the Theological seminary in Philadelphia in 1882, and has been a frequent delegate to the general council. Dr. Weidner was on the staff of "The Lutheran," in Philadelphia, in 1878-'80, and one of the editors of the "Lutheran Church Review" in 1882-'5. Since 1885 he has been professor of systematic theology and exegesis at Augustana Swedish-English theological seminary, Rock Island, Ill. He is a member of the American philological association, the American oriental society, the Society of biblical literature and exegesis, and other learned bodies. He has for several years been one of the instructors in the summer schools of Hebrew, under the directorship of Prof. William R. Harper, of Yale, and he has devoted much time to a careful and critical study of the Hebrew and Greek texts of the Bible, as well as to Sanskrit and other languages. He is a frequent contributor to theological and philological periodicals, and has published a critically revised translation of the book of Daniel in Dr. Joseph A. Seiss's "Voices from Babylon" (Philadelphia, 1879); "Luther's Small Catechism," with proof-texts, additions, and appendixes (1882); "Theological Encyclopædia," including "Part I., Exegetical Theology" (1885) and "Part II., Historical Theology" (Chicago, 1888); "Biblical Theology of the Old Testament" (Chicago, 1886); "System of the Dogmatic Theology of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, Part I., Prolegomena" (Philadelphia, 1888); "Grammar of the New Testament Greek" (New York, 1888); "The Greek Text of St. John, according to the Critical Texts of Westcott and Hort, Tischendorf and Tregelles" (1888); "Method for the Study of the New Testament Greek" (1888); and "Commentary on the Hebrew Text of Obadiah" (Philadelphia, 1888).

WEIGHTMAN, Richard Hanson, soldier, b. in Maryland in 1818; d. near Wilson's creek, Mo., 10 Aug., 1861. He entered the U. S. military academy in 1837, but was expelled in the same year for cutting a comrade in the face in a personal encounter. With the same knife he afterward killed a Santa Fé trader in a quarrel. He was a captain in the Missouri light infantry volunteers in the Mexican war. He became an additional paymaster in the U. S. army in 1848, was honorably discharged in 1849, settled in New Mexico, and was chosen provisionally a senator, when in 1850 the territory unsuccessfully applied for admission into the Union. In 1851-'3 he served in congress, having been elected as a Democrat. At the beginning of the civil war he became colonel of a regiment of the Missouri state guard, participated in the battle of Carthage, 5 July, 1861, and was killed while commanding a brigade at Wilson's creek.

WEIGHTMAN, Roger C., librarian, b. in Alexandria, Va., in 1786; d. in Washington, D. C., 2 Feb., 1876. He adopted the printing business, settled in Washington, D. C., and at one time was congressional printer. During the second war with Great Britain he was an officer of cavalry, and subsequently he became a general of District of Columbia militia. He was mayor of Washington in 1824-'7, became cashier of the Washington bank, and was for many years librarian of the patent-office. He commanded the troops that were quartered in that building during the civil war.

WEIR, Robert Walter, artist, b. in New Rochelle, N. Y., 18 June, 1803; d. in New York city, 1 May, 1889. He engaged in business until the age of nineteen, when he decided to adopt art as a profession and had some instruction from John Wesley Jarvis. After painting for several years in New York he went in 1824 to Florence, where he executed his "Christ and Nicodemus" and "The Angel relieving Peter," and thence, in 1825, to Rome.

In 1828 he became an associate member of the National academy, and the following year he was elected an academician. He succeeded Charles R.

Robert W. Weir

Leslie in 1832 as professor of drawing at the U. S. military academy at West Point, which post he held for forty-two years. Subsequently he resided in New York city. His portrait was painted by Daniel Huntington, and is in the library of the U. S. military academy. Prof. Weir was perhaps best known by his historical paintings, and was one of the first American artists to practise this branch of art. His numerous works, in many of which he was especially effective in the rendering of the accessories and still-life, include "The Belle of the Carnival" (1836); "The Bourbons' Last March"; "Landing of Henry Hudson" (1842); "Indian Captive"; "Taking the Veil"; "Church of the Holy Innocents at Highland Falls, West Point," in the Corcoran gallery, Washington (1847); "Embarkation of the Pilgrims" (1845), in the rotunda of the capitol at Washington; "The Evening of the Crucifixion" (1867); "Virgil and Dante crossing the Styx" (1869); "Christ in the Garden" (1873); "The Portico of the Palace of Octavia, Rome" (1874); "Our Lord on the Mount of Olives" (1877); "Indian Falls" (1878); "Titian in his Studio"; "Last Communion of Henry Clay," in water-color; and "Columbus before the Council of Salamanca" (1884). He also executed a number of portraits, including one of Red Jacket.—His son, John Ferguson, artist, b. in West Point, N. Y., 28 Aug., 1841, began to paint under his father. He opened a studio in New York in 1861, was elected an associate of the National academy in 1864, and an academician in 1866. In 1869 and again in 1880 he went abroad, and, after returning from his first trip in 1869, he became director of the School of fine arts at Yale. He was appointed judge of the fine arts at the Centennial exhibition, Philadelphia, in 1876, and wrote the official report on his department. His two best-known pictures are "The Gun-Foundry," exhibited at the National academy in 1867, in Paris the same year, and in Philadelphia in 1876, and "Forging the Shaft" (1868). The latter was burned, but a replica was exhibited in Paris in 1878. Among his other works are "Sunset at West Point" (1859); "The Christmas Bell" (1860); "The Culprit Fay" (1861); "Tapping the Furnace" (1872); "The Confessional," shown at Philadelphia in 1876; "Venice" (1887); and various portraits, including those of the faculty of the Yale theological school (1882), and S. Wells Williams (1883). Of late years he has given some attention to sculpture, and has produced a statue of the elder Benjamin Silliman, which stands on the Yale college grounds (1884).—Another son, Julian Alden, artist, b. at West Point, N. Y., 30 Aug., 1852, studied under his father and Jean L. Gérôme. He is noted for his excellent portraits, and has also painted genre pieces with success. In Paris he received honorable mention at the salon of 1881, and in 1888 he was awarded the prize, at the exhibition of the American art association, for his "Idle Hours." His studio is in New York, where he was one of the founders of the Society of American artists, and was elected an associate of the National academy in 1885 and an academician the following year. Among his works are "A Brittany Interior" (1875); "Brittany Peasant-Girl" and "Study of an Old Peasant" (1877); "Breton Interior" (1878); "The Muse of Music" (1880); "Jeune Fille" and "The Good Samaritan" (1881); and portraits of Robert W. Weir (1880); Warren Delano and Olin L. Warner (1881); Richard Grant White (1883); Peter Cooper (1884); and John Gilbert (1888). Two of Prof. Robert W. Weir's sons, Gulian Verplanck and William Bayard, were in the regular army and served through the civil war, while Henry C. served in the volunteer army and attained the brevet rank of colonel. Another son, Robert, was in the navy.

WEISS, or WEITZIUS, George Michael (wys), clergyman, b. in the Palatinate of the Rhine, Germany, in 1697; d. near Philadelphia, Pa., in 1762. He was ordained to the ministry at Heidelberg in 1725, and two years afterward emigrated to this country with 400 settlers. He went with them to Pennsylvania, organized a Reformed Dutch church at Skippack, returned to Holland, and collected funds for its support. He became pastor of German congregations in Schoharie and Dutchess counties, N. Y., in 1731, and labored there fourteen years, but was compelled to fly to Pennsylvania to escape the attacks of the Indians. From about 1746 until his death he preached in Old Goshoppen and Great Swamp, Pa. He published "An Account and Instruction relating to the Colony and Church of Pennsylvania, made up by the Deputies of the Synod of South Holland" (Amsterdam, 1730); a pamphlet concerning his arrangements with the classis of Amsterdam to care for the Germans in Pennsylvania (1731); and an "Account of the Indians" (1743).

WEISS, John, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 28 June, 1818; d. there, 9 March, 1879. His father, a German Jew, was a barber in Worcester, Mass. John was graduated at Harvard in 1837, and at the divinity-school in 1843, meanwhile studying abroad. He then was settled over the Unitarian church in Watertown, Mass., but withdrew on account of his anti-slavery opinions, and was pastor at New Bedford a short time, resigning on account of the failure of his health. After several years of study and travel he resumed his pastorate in Watertown, and preached there in 1859-70. Mr. Weiss was an ardent Abolitionist, an advocate of women's rights, a rationalist in religion, and a disciple of the transcendental philosophy. He delivered courses of lectures on "Greek Religious Ideas," "Humor in Shakespeare," and "Shakespeare's Women." Of his lectures on Greek religious ideas, Octavius B. Frothingham says: "They were the keenest interpretation of the ancient myths, the most profound, luminous, and sympathetic, I have met with." He is the author of many reviews, sermons, and magazine articles on literary, biographical, social, and political questions, "Life and Correspondence of Theodore Parker" (2 vols., New York, 1864), and "American Religion" (1871). He also edited and translated "Henry of Afterdingen," a romance by Friedrich Van Hardenberg (Boston, 1842); "Philosophical and Æsthetic Letters and Essays of Schiller," with an introduction (1845); and "Memoir of Johann G. Fichte," by William Smith (1846).

WEISS, Lewis, jurist, b. in Berlin, Prussia, 28 Dec., 1717; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 22 Oct., 1796. He was educated at Lindheim, near Frankfort-on-the-Maine, came to Pennsylvania in December, 1755, and settled in Philadelphia, where he was one of the founders of the German society, and its president in 1783-'4. He was commissioned by the executive council of the province, 20 May, 1786, a justice of the peace, and on 26 May a justice of the court of common pleas. He edited "Collection of the Laws of Pennsylvania" (1760-'2). Horace Binney says of this collection: "It is valuable for several old laws not to be found in other editions, and especially for many proceedings in the privy council of England, repealing or disallowing certain of the laws of the province."

WEISS, Susan Archer Talley, poet, b. in Hanover county, Va., 14 Feb., 1835. Her father, Thomas Talley, a lawyer, removed in 1842 to Richmond, where she went to school for one year. At the age of eleven she became deaf, and afterward educated herself. During the civil war she was accused by the National authorities of being a spy, and was arrested and imprisoned at Fort McHenry, Baltimore. While there in 1863 she married Col. von Weiss, a German officer, who died in 1869. She has thrown new and favorable light on Poe's domestic character in a paper published in "Scribner's Monthly" in March, 1876.

WEISSE, John Adam (wys), philologist, b. in Ropperville, Lorraine, 3 Dec., 1810; d. in New York city, 12 Jan., 1888. He was graduated in classics and natural sciences at the college in Bitsche, and in chemistry and philosophy at the seminary in Metz, and subsequently became professor of French in the Imperial school in Vienna. He emigrated to this country in 1840, and during an eight-years' residence in Boston published a "Key to the French Language." He went to Brussels in 1849, was graduated in medicine there in 1850, and settled in New York city, where he passed the remainder of his life. He retired from active practice several years previous to his death, devoting his later life to literary pursuits and lecturing before learned societies. He was president of the New York philological society. He published "Origin, Progress, and Destiny of the English Language and Literature," which was favorably criticised by William E. Gladstone and Max Müller (New York, 1873), and "The Obelisk and Freemasonry" (1881).

WEISSENFELS, Frederick H., Baron de, soldier, b. in Prussia in 1738; d. in New Orleans, La., 14 May, 1806. During his early life he was an officer in the British service, but he emigrated to this country, and in 1763 settled in Dutchess county, N. Y. He became lieutenant-colonel of the 3d New York battalion in 1776, and afterward commanded the 2d New York battalion at White Plains, Trenton, the surrender of Burgoyne, and the battle of Monmouth. He accompanied Gen. John Sullivan's expedition against the Six Nations in 1779, and fought at Newton. The war left him impoverished, and at the time of his death he filled a minor office in New Orleans.

WEITZEL, Godfrey, soldier, b. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 1 Nov., 1835; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 19 March, 1884. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1855, became 1st lieutenant of engineers in 1860, and was attached to the staff of Gen. Benjamin F. Butler as chief engineer of the Department of the Gulf. After the capture of New Orleans he became assistant military commander and acting mayor of the city. He was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, 29 Aug., 1862, routed a large force of the enemy at Labadieville, La., in October of that year, and was brevetted major in the U. S. army for that service. He became captain of engineers, 3 March, 1863, commanded the advance in Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks's operations in western Louisiana in April and May, 1863, a division at the siege of Port Hudson, La., and a division in the 19th army corps in the Lafourche campaign. On 8 July, 1863, he was brevetted lieutenant-colonel, U. S. army, "for gallant and meritorious services at the siege of Port Hudson." He joined in the western Louisiana campaign, and from May till September, 1864, was chief engineer of the Army of the James, being engaged at Swift's Creek, the actions near Drury's Bluff, and in constructing the defences of Bermuda Hundred, James River, and Deep Bottom. In August, 1864, he was brevetted major-general of volunteers "for meritorious and distinguished services during the civil war." He commanded the 18th army corps from September till December, 1864, was brevetted colonel in the U. S. army "for gallant and meritorious services at the capture of Fort Harrison, 30 Sept., 1864," became full major-general of volunteers on 7 Nov., was second in command of the first expedition to Fort Fisher, and in March and April, 1865, was in charge of all troops north of Potomac river during the final operations against Gen. Robert E. Lee's army, taking possession of Richmond, 3 April, 1865. In March, 1865, he was brevetted brigadier-general in the regular army for services in that campaign, and major-general in the same rank "for gallant and meritorious services in the field during the civil war." He commanded the Rio Grande district, Texas, in 1865-'6, and was mustered out of volunteer service on 1 March of the latter year. He became major of engineers in 1866, and lieutenant-colonel in 1882, and from that date was in charge of various works of improvement in and near Philadelphia, and chairman of the commission advisory to the board of harbor commissioners of that city.

WELBY, Amelia B. Coppuck, poet, b. in St. Michael's, Md., 3 Feb., 1819; d. in Louisville, Ky., 3 May, 1852. She removed with her parents to Kentucky in childhood, and, after residing in Lexington and Louisville, married in 1838 George B. Welby, a merchant of the latter city. She began in 1837 to contribute poems to the Louisville "Journal," under the name of "Amelia," by which she gained some reputation. They were highly praised by George D. Prentice, Rufus W. Griswold, Edgar A. Poe, and other critics. A small collection (Boston, 1844) passed through several editions, and a larger one was afterward published, with illustrations, by Robert W. Weir (New York, 1850).

WELCH, Adonijah Strong, senator, b. in East Hampton, Conn., 12 April, 1821; d. in Pasadena, Cal., 15 March, 1889. He was graduated at the State university in 1846, after serving as principal of its preparatory department from 1844. He then studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1847, but in that year became principal of Jonesville high-school. He went to California in 1849, and on his return in 1851 took charge of the Michigan normal school at Ypsilanti, where he remained till 1865. In that year he removed to Florida and settled in Jacksonville, where he was chairman of the State Republican committee during the canvass of 1868, which brought Florida back into the Union. He was then chosen U. S. senator, serving from 2 July, 1868, till 3 March, 1869. In 1869-'83 he was president of Iowa state agricultural college, where he is still a professor. It gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1873, and he received the same from Michigan university in 1879. He was president of the first teachers' association of Michigan in 1851. In 1882 he was sent to Europe by the commissioner of agriculture to inspect colleges of that science, and his report was published by the U. S. government. Dr. Welch is the author of "Analysis of the English Sentence" (New York, 1850); "Object Lessons" (1861); "Talks on Psychology" (1888); and "The Teachers' Psychology" (1888).

G. Weitzel

WELCH, John, jurist, b. in Harrison county, Ohio, 28 Oct., 1805. He was graduated at Franklin college in 1828, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1833. He was prosecuting attorney from 1834 till 1839, sat in the Ohio senate in 1846-'7, and in 1850 was elected to congress, serving one term. He was a member in 1852 of the national convention that nominated Winfield Scott for the presidency, and in 1856 was an elector on the Frémont ticket. He was a judge of the court of common pleas in 1863-'5, and was then raised to the supreme bench, serving thirteen years. He resumed practice, but retired after seven or eight years, and has since devoted himself to literary pursuits. The degree of LL. D. was given him by Franklin college in 1867. Judge Welch has invented a new method of computing interest, and is the author of "Mathematical Curiosities" (Athens, Ohio, 1883); "Index-Digest of Ohio Decisions" (Cincinnati, 1886); and lectures and essays on "Thomas Ewing," "Mob Law," "History of the Ohio University," and other subjects.—His brother, John-son, b. in Harrison county, Ohio, 15 Sept., 1809; d. in New Athens, Ohio, 1 April, 1837, became a minister of the Presbyterian church, adhering to the Scotch or Seceding party, and at the time of his death was president of Franklin college.

WELCH, Moses Cook, clergyman, b. in Mansfield, Conn., 22 Feb., 1754; d. there, 21 April, 1824. He was graduated at Yale in 1772. After teaching and then studying law for a year, he gave some attention to medicine, but abandoned it and again engaged in teaching. At the opening of the Revolution he was associated with Samuel Nott in making saltpetre for the powder-supply of the army. Afterward he studied theology, and was ordained, 2 June, 1784, serving as his father's successor in the pastorate of his native place till his death. He published various discourses and pamphlets, including "Eulogy on Benjamin Chaplin" (1795), and "The Addresser Addressed," a reply to Hon. Zephaniah Swift (1796).

WELCH, Ransom Bethune, clergyman, b. in Greenville, N. Y., in 1825; d. in Healing Springs, Va., 29 June, 1890. He was graduated at Union college in 1846, studied two years at Andover theological seminary, and then at Auburn. In 1853-'4 he arranged a system of colportage in Mississippi for the American tract society. He was ordained in December, 1854, as pastor of the Dutch Reformed church at Gilboa, N. Y., remained there till 1856, and was then in charge of a congregation at Catskill till 1859. He was professor of logic, rhetoric, and English literature at Union college in 1860-'76, and after the latter date he occupied the chair of Christian theology in Auburn theological seminary. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of the city of New York and Rutgers in 1868, and that of LL. D. from Maryville college, Tenn., in 1872. He was a delegate to the Presbyterian alliance at Belfast, Ireland, in 1884, and London in 1888, and to the centennial conference of Foreign missions at London in the latter year. In 1886 he became vice-president of the American institute of Christian philosophy. Prof. Welch is the author of "Faith and Modern Thought," with an introduction by Prof. Tayler Lewis (New York, 1876); "Outlines of Christian Theology" (1881); separate addresses; and contributions to current religious literature. In 1881 he became an associate editor of the "Presbyterian Review."

WELD, Horatio Hastings, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 4 Feb., 1811; d. in Riverton, N. J., 27 Aug., 1888. He became a printer and then edited newspapers in Lowell, Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, but in 1845 took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church. He was rector successively of St. James's, Downingtown, Pa.; Trinity, Morristown, N. J.; and Christ church, Riverton, N. J. He received the degree of S. T. D. from Andalusia college, Pa., in 1868. Dr. Weld has published "Corrected Proofs," a volume of sketches (Boston, 1837); "Life of Christ" (Philadelphia, 1850); "Scripture Quotations" (1850); and "Sacred Poetical Quotations" (1851), and has edited "Scenes in the Lives of the Apostles" (Philadelphia, 1846); "Scenes in the Lives of the Patriarchs and Prophets" (1847); "Women of the Scriptures" (1848); "Benjamin Franklin's Autobiography, with a Narrative of his Public Life and Services" (New York, 1849); "Sacred Poetical Quotations" (1851); and "The Star of Bethlehem" (1852).

WELD, Isaac, British traveller, b. in Dublin, Ireland, 15 March, 1774; d. near Bray, County Dublin, 4 Aug., 1856. His father, Isaac Weld, of Dublin, was a personal friend of Charles James Fox. The son travelled extensively on this continent, and was for fifty-six years connected with the Royal society of Dublin, of which he was long secretary and vice-president. His journey in this country was prompted by the idea that the Irish people would afterward be led to emigrate hither in great numbers. Arriving in Philadelphia in September, 1795, he made his way, on horseback, on foot, or in a canoe, through dense forests and along rivers, trusting often to friendly Indians for safe conduct. In the cities he saw much of the best society, and made the acquaintance of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson. The result of his trip was his "Travels through the States of North America and the Provinces of Upper and Lower Canada during the Years 1795, 1796, and 1797" (London, 1799, many later editions; French translation, 3 vols., Paris, 1800; German translation, 3 vols., The Hague, 1801-'2). Mr. Weld wrote also "Illustrations of the Scenery of Killarney and the Surrounding Country" (1807).—His half-brother, Charles Richard, English traveller, b. in Windsor, England, in 1818; d. in Bath, 15 Jan., 1869, was for many years assistant secretary of the Royal society, and the author, among many other works, of "A Vacation Tour in the United States and Canada" (London, 1855).

WELD, Lewis, educator, b. in Hampton, Conn., 17 Oct., 1796; d. in Hartford, Conn., 30 Dec., 1853. He was graduated at Yale in 1818, and became a teacher in the American asylum for the education of the deaf and dumb, of which, on the resignation of Thomas H. Gallaudet in 1830, he was made principal. Previously he served from 1822 as principal of the Pennsylvania institution for the deaf and dumb, at Philadelphia. His success in these offices gave him a wide reputation in his own field. For the last few years of his life he was a sufferer from a chronic disease.

WELD, Theodore Dwight, reformer, b. in Hampton, Conn., 23 Nov., 1803. He entered Phillips Andover academy in 1819, but was not graduated, on account of failing eyesight. In 1830 he became general agent of the Society for the promotion of manual labor in literary institutions, publishing afterward a valuable report (New York, 1833). He entered Lane theological seminary, Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1833, but left that institution on the suppression of the Anti-slavery society of the seminary by the trustees. Mr. Weld then became well known as an anti-slavery lecturer, but in 1836 he lost his voice, and was appointed by the American anti-slavery society editor of its books and pamphlets. In 1841-'3 he labored in Washington in aid of the anti-slavery members of congress, and in 1854 he established at Eagleswood, N. J., a school in which he received pupils irrespective of sex and color. In 1864 he removed to Hyde Park, near Boston, and devoted himself to teaching and lecturing. Mr. Weld is the author of many pamphlets, and of "The Power of Congress over the District of Columbia" (New York, 1837); "The Bible against Slavery" (1837); "American Slavery as it Is: Testimony of a Thousand Witnesses" (1839); and "Slavery and the Internal Slave Trade in the United States" (London, 1841).—His wife, Angelina Emily Grimké, reformer, b. in Charleston, S. C., 20 Feb., 1805, is the daughter of Judge John F. Grimké, of South Carolina, but in 1828, with her sister, Sarah M. Grimké (q. v.), she joined the Society of Friends in Philadelphia, afterward emancipating the slaves that she inherited from her parents in 1836. She was the author of an "Appeal to the Christian Women of the South," which was republished in England with an introduction by George Thompson, and was associated with her sister in delivering public addresses under the auspices of the American anti-slavery society, winning a reputation for eloquence. The controversy that the appearance of the sisters as public speakers caused was the beginning of the woman's rights agitation in this country. She married Mr. Weld on 14 May, 1838, and was afterward associated with him in educational and reformatory work. Besides the work noticed above, she wrote "Letters to Catherine E. Beecher," a review of the slavery question (Boston, 1837).

WELDE, Thomas, b. in England about 1590; d. there, 23 March, 1662. He was graduated at Cambridge in 1613, became a minister of the established church, and had charge for some time of a parish in Terling, Essex; but his Puritan opinions caused him to emigrate to Boston, where he arrived on 5 June, 1632. In July he became minister of the 1st church in Roxbury, Mass., where, after the following November, John Eliot, the "apostle," was associated with him. He was active in opposition to Anne Hutchinson and her doctrines, took a conspicuous part in her trial, and afterward wrote "A Short Story of the Rise, Reign, and Ruin of the Antinomians, Familists, and Libertines that infested the Churches of New England" (London, 1644; 2d ed., 1692). A shorter version, entitled "Antinomians and Familists Condemned," which appeared about the same time, may be the original; and some authorities maintain that Gov. John Winthrop was the chief author. The book was answered by Rev. John Wheelwright in his "Mercurius Americanus"

(1645). Welde was also associated with John Eliot and Richard Mather in preparing, by request of the authorities, the translation of the Psalms in metre that is usually called the "Bay Psalm-Book," and is entitled "The Whole Book of Psalms Faithfully translated into English Metre" (Cambridge, 1640). This was the first volume that was printed in New England. Welde was sent with Hugh Peters to England in 1641 as an agent of the colony, but was dismissed in 1646, and requested to return. He did not comply, but remained in England, and was minister of a church at Gateshead, near Newcastle-upon-Tyne. He accompanied Lord Forbes to Ireland, and, after residing there for some time, returned to England, where he was ejected from his living for non-conformity in 1662. Besides the works already noticed, Welde was the author of "An Answer to W. R., his Narration of Opinions and Practices of the New England Churches" (1644). With three other clergymen he wrote "The Perfect Pharisee under Monkish Holiness," an attack on the Quakers (1654), and "The False Jew Detected."—One of his sons, THOMAS, remained in New England, and was in the general court in 1676-'7.

WELDON, Charles Wesley, Canadian member of parliament, b. in Richibucto, New Brunswick, 27 Feb., 1830. He was the eldest son of John W. Weldon, judge of the supreme court of New Brunswick. He was graduated at King's college, Windsor, Nova Scotia, in 1847, was admitted to the bar of New Brunswick in 1852, became a queen's counsel in 1852, and was elected to the Dominion parliament in 1878, 1882, and 1887. He opposed the confederation of the provinces, and is opposed to the national policy and the present (1889) administration. He is president of the Law society of St. John, a governor of King's college, and president of the New Brunswick electric telegraph company, and is connected with several other financial corporations.

WELDON, Richard Chapman, educator, b. in Sussex, New Brunswick, 19 Jan., 1849. He was graduated at Wesleyan college, Sackville, New Brunswick, and received the degree of Ph. D. at Yale in 1872. He afterward studied international law at Heidelberg, and was called to the bar of New Brunswick. He was a professor in the Wesleyan college, 1875-'83, and since the latter date has been professor of constitutional law in Dalhousie university, Halifax, and is also dean of the law faculty there. He was elected to the Dominion parliament in February, 1887, for Albert county, New Brunswick.

WELLBOON, Marshall Johnson, lawyer, b. in Putnam county, Ga., 29 May, 1808; d. in Columbus, Ga., 16 Oct., 1874. After passing through the junior year in the University of Georgia, he studied law and was admitted to the bar at nineteen years of age by special act of the legislature. At twenty-one he was elected to the legislature of Georgia, and in 1842 he became judge of the superior court of the Chattahoochee circuit. Subsequently, after a prolonged trip in Europe, he served one term in congress in 1849-'51, having been chosen as a Democrat. In 1858 he began to think seriously on religious subjects, and in 1864 was ordained to the Baptist ministry at Columbus, Ga. From that time until his death he was pastor of various churches, serving them without compensation. In the earlier part of his life he was a brilliant, accomplished, and successful man of the world, and in his later years, by the consent of all who knew him, a man of truly apostolic devoutness and zeal.

WELLER, George, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 15 Nov., 1790; d. in Raymond, Miss., 9 Nov., 1841. He received a good English education in the public schools of his native city, but his parents were unable to send him to college. He learned the trade of a book-binder, and while pursuing his studies opened a small book-store in Newark, N. J., and subsequently in Danbury, Conn. While preparing for the ministry in the Episcopal church in Norwalk, Conn., he officiated as lay reader in Bedford, N. Y., in 1814-'16. He was ordained deacon in St. Matthew's church, Bedford, 16 June, 1816, by Bishop Hobart, and priest in St. Paul's church, East Chester, N. Y., 2 April, 1817, by the same bishop. In November, 1817, he became rector of Great Choptank parish, Cambridge, Md., which post he filled for five years. In 1822 he accepted a call to St. Stephen's church, Cecil county, Md., where he served acceptably for three years. At this date Bishop White was desirous of finding a competent editor for a new journal in the interests of the Episcopal church. He accordingly invited Mr. Weller to occupy this post, and the offer was accepted. The first number of "The Church Register" was issued on 7 Jan., 1826. After three years' service as its editor, and occupying himself in other literary labors, he removed to Nashville, Tenn., where during his ministrations the first church for Episcopal worship was consecrated in 1831. He received the degree of D. D. from Nashville university in 1834. In addition to his pastoral labors he gave instruction to candidates for orders, and opened a school for girls, which met with great success. His health was seriously impaired by work, but, after resting, he accepted a call to Calvary church, Memphis, Tenn., in 1838, and the following year became rector of Christ church, Vicksburg, Miss. In 1841 the yellow fever broke out with great virulence, and he deemed it his duty to remain at his post and minister to the sick. He was attacked by the malady, which proved fatal. In addition to contributions to church journalism, Dr. Weller published a "Vindication of the Church," being a defence of Anglican ordinations against the aspersions of Roman Catholics, and "Two Letters in Reply to Certain Publications of the Rev. Samuel Miller, of Princeton, N. J." (1835), the object of which was to support episcopacy chiefly by early patristic testimony. He also issued the first American collection of "Bishop Heber's Poems" (Philadelphia, 1828), with a short memoir; and republished treatises by eminent Anglican divines in convenient form: these are known as "The Weller Tracts," and are still regarded with favor.

WELLER, John B., senator, b. in Ohio in 1812; d. in New Orleans, La., 7 Aug., 1875. He was elected to congress as a Democrat, serving in 1839-'45, was lieutenant-colonel of an Ohio regiment in the Mexican war, becoming its commander on the death of its colonel at Monterey, and a commissioner to Mexico under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. Afterward he removed to California and was elected U. S. Senator, holding his seat from 17 March, 1852, till 3 March, 1857. He was governor of the state in 1858-'60, U. S. minister to Mexico from 7 Nov., 1860, till 14 May, 1861, and a delegate to the National Democratic convention of 1864.

WELLES, Edward Randolph, P. E. bishop, b. in Waterloo, N. Y., 10 Jan., 1830; d. there, 19 Oct., 1888. He was graduated at Hobart in 1850, ordered deacon, 20 Dec., 1857, and served as tutor in De Veaux college, Suspension Bridge, N. Y., also officiating in Lewiston, Lockport, and Suspension Bridge. He was ordained priest, 12 Sept., 1858, began work at Red Wing, Minn., where he organized the parish of Christ church, and became its rector, holding this post until his election to the episcopate. He received the degree of S. T. D. from Racine college in 1874. Dr. Welles was consecrated bishop of Wisconsin in St. Thomas's church, New York, 24 Oct., 1874. In the course of the year following, the northeastern part of the state was erected into a separate jurisdiction, under the name of the diocese of Fond du Lac, and Bishop Welles elected to remain in the old diocese. He published sermons and addresses.

WELLES, Noah, clergyman, b. in Colchester, Conn., 25 Sept., 1718; d. in Stamford, Conn., 31 Dec., 1776. He was graduated at Yale in 1741, remained there a year as dean's scholar, and then took charge of Hopkins grammar-school at Hartford, at the same time studying theology. He was a tutor at Yale in 1745-'6, and in the latter year received a call to Stamford, where he remained till the day of his death, the thirtieth anniversary of his ordination. He took an active part in the discussion of the validity of Presbyterian ordination and in relation to the proposed American episcopate, and at the opening of the Revolution advocated from his pulpit resistance to the mother country. In 1774 he was chosen a fellow of Yale, and in the same year Princeton gave him the degree of D. D. On the resignation of Dr. Thomas Clap from the presidency of Yale in 1766, Dr. Welles was a prominent candidate for the office. President Timothy Dwight, who was his nephew by marriage, says: "His imagination was vivid and poetical, his intellect vigorous, and his learning extensive. His manners, at the same time, were an unusual happy compound of politeness and dignity." Dr. Welles published "The Real Advantages which Ministers and People may enjoy, especially in the Colonies, by conforming to the Church of England," a clever anonymous attack on the Episcopalian party, which has been attributed also to Rev. Noah Hobart, of Fairfield (Boston, 1762); "The Divine Right of Presbyterian Ordination Asserted" (New York, 1763); "Patriotism Described and Recommended," the annual "election sermon" (New London, 1774); and "Vindication of the Validity and Divine Right of Presbyterian Ordination, as set forth in Dr. Chauncy's Sermon, and Mr. Welles's Discourse in Answer to the Exceptions of Mr. Jeremiah Leaming" (New Haven, 1767). He was also the author of a poem addressed to his class-mate and friend, Gov. William Livingston, which is prefixed to the latter's "Philosophic Solitude" (New York, 1747).

WELLES, Thomas, governor of Connecticut, b. in England in 1598; d. in Wethersfield, Conn., 14 Jan., 1660. He came to this country before 1636 and settled in Hartford, Conn., where he was magistrate from 1637 till his death. In 1639 he became first treasurer of the colony, and he held that office till 1651. He was secretary of Connecticut in 1640-'8, and was commissioner of the united colonies in 1649 and again in 1654. During the absence of Gov. Edward Hopkins in England in 1654 he was elected moderator of the general court, and in the same year he was chosen deputy governor. In 1655 he was elected governor, but after two years he returned to the office of deputy governor. He was chosen governor for a second time in 1658, and in 1659 again held the office of deputy governor. Gov. Welles possessed the full confidence of the people, and many of the most important of the early laws and papers pertaining to the founding of the colony were drafted by him. The successful issue of Connecticut from her difficulty concerning the fort erected at Saybrook on one side and the Dutch encroachments on the other was largely due to his skill and wisdom.—His descendant, Gideon, secretary of the navy, b. in Glastonbury, Conn., 1 July, 1802; d. in Hartford, Conn., 11 Feb., 1878, entered Norwich university, Vt., but, without being graduated, began to study law. In 1826 he became editor and part owner of the

Gideon Welles

Hartford "Times," with which he remained connected till 1854, though he retired from the responsible editorship in 1836. He made his paper the chief organ of the Democratic party in the state. It was the first to advocate the election of Andrew Jackson to the presidency, and earnestly upheld his administration. Mr. Welles was a member of the legislature in 1827-'35, and both in that body and in his journal attacked with severity the proposed measure to exclude from the courts witnesses that did not believe in a future state of rewards and punishments. He also labored for years to secure the abolition of imprisonment for debt, opposed special and private legislation, and secured the passage of general laws for the organization of financial corporations. He began an agitation for low postage before the subject had begun to attract general attention. He was chosen comptroller of the state by the legislature in 1835, and elected to that office by popular vote in 1842 and 1843, serving as postmaster of Hartford in the intervening years. From 1846 till 1849 he was chief of the bureau of provisions and clothing in the navy department at Washington. Mr. Welles had always opposed the extension of slavery. He identified himself with the newly formed Republican party in 1855, and in 1856 was its candidate for governor of Connecticut. In 1860 he labored earnestly for the election of Abraham Lincoln, and on the latter's election Mr. Welles was given the portfolio of the navy in his cabinet. Here his executive ability compensated for his previous lack of special knowledge, and though many of his acts were bitterly criticised, his administration was popular with the navy and with the country at large. His facility as a writer made his state papers more interesting than such documents usually are. In his first report, dated 4 July, 1861, he announced the increase of the effective naval force from forty-two to eighty-two vessels. This and the subsequent increase in a few months to more than 500 vessels was largely due to his energy. In the report that has just been mentioned he also recommended investigations to secure the best iron-clads, and this class of vessels was introduced under his administration. In the cabinet Mr. Welles opposed all arbitrary measures, and objected to the declaration of a blockade of southern ports, holding that this was a virtual acknowledgment of belligerent rights, and that the preferable course would be to close our ports to foreign commerce by proclamation. By request of the president, he presented his ideas in writing; but the cabinet finally yielded to the views of Sec. Seward. Early in the war, on 25 Sept., 1861, he ordered that the negro refugees that found their way to U. S. vessels should be enlisted in the navy. He held his post till the close of President Johnson's administration in 1869. In 1872 he acted with the Liberal Republicans, and in 1876 he advocated the election of Samuel J. Tilden, afterward taking strong grounds against the electoral commission and its decision. After his retirement from office he contributed freely to current literature on the political and other events of the civil war, and provoked hostile criticism by what many thought his harsh strictures on official conduct. In 1872 he published an elaborate paper to show that the capture of New Orleans in 1862 was due entirely to the navy, and in 1873 a volume entitled "Lincoln and Seward."

WELLING, James Clarke, educator, b. in Trenton, N. J., 14 July, 1825. He was graduated at Princeton in 1844, and, after studying law, renounced that profession in 1848 to become associate principal of the New York collegiate school. In 1850 he was secured by Joseph Gales and William W. Seaton as literary editor of the "National Intelligencer" at Washington, and he was afterward associated with them in the political conduct of that journal, becoming charged in 1856 with its chief management, for which post he was qualified by his accurate scholarship, his facility in writing, and his judicial temperament. His editorship continued through the crisis of the civil war. Adhering to the old-line Whigs as against the Republican and the Democratic parties, he supported the Bell-Everett ticket for president and vice-president in 1860. Steadfastly resisting the disunion movement at the south in all its phases, he gave to the war for the Union his loyal support. He advocated Lincoln's proposition of emancipation with compensation to loyal owners, the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, and its abolition throughout the Union by constitutional amendment; but he questioned the validity of the emancipation proclamation, and strenuously opposed the constitutionality of military commissions for the trial of citizens in loyal states, which practice was subsequently condemned by the supreme court. The discussions of the "Intelligencer" during this period often took the form of elaborate papers on questions of constitutional or international law, and exercised an acknowledged influence on public opinion. Some of them have been republished, and are still cited in works of history and jurisprudence. Dr. Welling withdrew from journalism in 1865, and spent the following year travelling in Europe for health and study. He had been previously appointed a clerk of the U. S. court of claims, and served in that office till 1867, when he was chosen president of St. John's college, Annapolis, Md. During his presidency the number of students advanced from 90 to 250. In 1868 he received the honorary degree of LL. D. from Columbian college, Washington. In 1870 he was appointed professor of belles-lettres in Princeton, but he resigned the post in the following year to accept the presidency of Columbian college (now university). Under his administration that institution has been enlarged, has received a new charter from congress, erected a building in the heart of Washington (see illustration), added new professional schools, and laid the foundation of a free endowment. At the same time he has been connected with many literary, historical, and scientific societies. As president of the board of trustees of the Corcoran gallery of art since 1877 he has devoted much time to its development, visiting in 1887 the studios of the chief artists of Europe in its interest. In 1884 he was appointed a regent of the Smithsonian institution, and soon afterward he was elected chairman of its executive committee. He is an active member of the Philosophical and Anthropological societies of Washington, was chosen in 1884 president of the former, and has contributed valuable memoirs to the published proceedings of both bodies. He is president of the Copyright league of the District of Columbia. For many years he has been a contributor to periodicals.

WELLINGTON, Arthur Mellen, civil engineer, b. in Waltham, Mass., 20 Dec., 1847. He was graduated at the Boston Latin-school, and was about to enter Harvard when his eyesight failed, and he turned his attention to civil engineering, studying under Prof. John B. Henck in Boston. On the completion of his studies he engaged actively in the work, and among other places has held those of chief engineer of the Inter-oceanic railway from Vera Cruz to Mexico and assistant general manager of the Mexican Central railway. He devised a plan for multiplying the traffic facilities of the Brooklyn bridge fivefold, which was recommended in 1887 by the board of experts in preference to all others. Mr. Wellington has been a member of the American society of civil engineers since 1881. In addition to his professional work, he is editor of the "Engineering News" in New York city, and has published "Computation from Diagrams of Railway Earthworks" (New York, 1878); "Economic Theory of the Location of Railways" (1878; enlarged ed., 1887); "Car-Builders' Dictionary" (New York, 1884); and "Field Work of Railway Location and Laying out of Works" (1889).

WELLS, Clark Henry, naval officer; b. in Reading, Pa., 22 Sept., 1822; d. in Washington, D. C., 28 Jan., 1888. He was appointed a midshipman in the navy, 25 Sept., 1840, attended the naval academy at Annapolis in 1846, and became a passed midshipman on 11 July of that year. During the Mexican war he served in the brig "Somers," which was capsized and sunk in a squall off Vera Cruz, after which he joined the "Petrel," in which he participated in covering the landing of Scott's army and in the bombardment of Vera Cruz. He also took part in the expeditions that captured Tampico and Tuspan in 1846-'7. He was promoted to master, 1 March, 1855, and to lieutenant, 14 Sept., 1855, served in the steam frigate "Niagara," laying the first Atlantic submarine cable in 1857. When the civil war opened he was appointed executive of the steamer "Susquehanna," in which he participated in the capture of Port Royal, S. C. He led several boat expeditions in engagements with batteries in the inland coast waters of South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, and was present at the capture of Fernandina. He commanded the sloop "Vandalia," on the blockade of Charleston, and took the sloop "Dale" home in 1862. He was commissioned a lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, was executive of the Philadelphia navy-yard in 1863, and commanded the wooden steamer "Galena" in the Western Gulf blockading squadron in 1863-'4. He participated in the battle of Mobile, in which his vessel was lashed to the "Oneida." When they were passing the forts a shell from the ram "Tennessee" exploded in one of the "Oneida's" boilers, and he towed her along, in command of both vessels because the commander of the "Oneida" had been wounded. He was highly commended by Admiral Farragut in his official report and by a special letter. He served in the Eastern Gulf squadron for a few months, was refitted at Philadelphia and joined Admiral Porter's fleet at Hampton Roads, where he remained until the close of the war. He commanded the steamer "Kansas" on the Brazil station in 1865-'6, where he rendered assistance to a British gun-boat that was stranded in the river Plate, and also to a British merchant-vessel, for which he received a letter of thanks from the British government through the president. He was commissioned a commander, 25 July, 1866, captain, 19 June, 1871, and with the "Shenandoah" rendered valuable assistance to the iron-clad "Compt de Verde" which had broken from her moorings at Spezia. He received the decoration of the Legion of honor from President Thiers of France for this service. He was chief signal officer of the navy in 1879-'80, was promoted to commodore, 22 Jan., 1880, and on 1 Aug., 1884, to rear-admiral, and he was placed on the retired list, 22 Sept., 1884.

WELLS, Darius, inventor, b. in Johnstown, N. Y., 26 April, 1800; d. in Paterson, N. J., 27 May, 1875. He was apprenticed to the printer's trade in his native place, and after serving for six years removed to Amsterdam, N. Y., where, with William Childs, he established the first newspaper. In 1826 he went to New York, and continued the printing business. At that time the largest metal type that was made was only twelve-line pica, and it cost more than the average printer could afford to pay. This led to his making large type from wood, and he followed the method of engravers by using cross-grained sections. The advantage of wood-type having been established, it was found necessary to devise means of manufacturing it with greater rapidity and less labor. Mr. Wells found that by using a vertical revolving cutter a more speedy removal of the superfluous wood could be effected. This device, improved by various modifications, is known as the routing machine. Subsequently he engaged in the business of furnishing wooden type, and also made a specialty of preparing boxwood for engravers. This was gradually extended to include printers' materials, and in 1840 he established a factory at Paterson, N. J. He continued in this occupation until 1856, when he retired. During 1861-'74 he was postmaster of Paterson, except that he was removed from office by President Johnson in 1866, but restored a short time later through the efforts of Charles Sumner.

WELLS, David Ames, economist, b. in Springfield, Mass., 17 June, 1828. He is a lineal descendant of Thomas Welles, governor of Connecticut, and, on his mother's side, of David Ames, who built and established the National armory in Springfield. In 1847 he was graduated at Williams, and, with others, published a "History and Sketches of Williams College" (Springfield, 1847). For a time during 1848 he was on the editorial staff of the "Springfield Republican." While thus engaged, he suggested the idea, and was associated in the invention, of folding newspapers and books by machinery in connection with power printing-presses. The first machine that was ever constructed and successfully operated was built at his expense, and worked under his direction, in the office of the "Republican." He then sold his interest, and entered the Lawrence scientific school of Harvard, where he became a special pupil of Louis Agassiz, and was graduated in 1851. Mr. Wells continued at Harvard as assistant, and was lecturer on physics and chemistry at Groton academy, Mass. In Cambridge he began, with George Bliss, in 1849, the publication of the "Annual of Scientific Discovery," which he continued until 1866. He invented in 1856 improvements in preparing textile fabrics. During 1857-'8 he was a member of the publishing-firm of G. P. Putnam and Co., New York. He compiled "Science of Common Things" (New York, 1857); "Elements of Natural Philosophy" (1857); "Principles and Applications of Chemistry" (1858); and "First Principles of Geology" (1861), of which works two were translated into Chinese, and that on chemistry was adopted as a text-book at the U. S. military academy. In 1864 he issued an essay on "Our Burden and our Strength," which was considered "one of the most original and startling brochures of political literature." The Loyal publication society of New York reprinted it, and it was published in England. French and German translations were issued abroad, and its entire circulation probably exceeded 200,000 copies. In 1865 he was called to Washington, and made chairman of a commission to consider the subject of raising by taxation the necessary revenue to supply the wants of the government. On the completion of his report in January, 1866, he was appointed special commissioner of the revenue, which office was created for him, and later under his direction the bureau of statistics was formed. He visited Europe in 1867, under a government commission, and investigated industries competitive with those of the United States. Although he was originally a believer in the economic system of protection, his experience resulted in his acceptance of free-trade doctrines. His term of office expired in 1870, and he was appointed chairman of a commission to examine the laws relating to local taxation in the state of New York. In 1872 he was invited to lecture on political science in Yale. He was a delegate to the Democratic national conventions of 1872 and 1880, and in 1876 was a candidate for congress from Connecticut. He was appointed by the U. S. court in 1876 one of the trustees and receivers of the Alabama and Chattanooga railroad, and in fourteen months rescued the corporation from bankruptcy, and expended a considerable sum for improvements and repairs, without incurring an additional dollar of indebtedness. In 1877 he was appointed by the state board of canal commissioners chairman of a commission to consider the subject of tolls on the New York canals, and in 1878 made an exhaustive report. He was one of the trustees of the bondholders that bought, under foreclosure and sale, and reorganized the Erie railway. In 1879 he was elected by the associated railways of the United States a member of the board of arbitration, to which they agreed to refer all disputes and arrangements for "pooling" or apportioning their respective earnings. Mr. Wells was invited to deliver the annual address before the Cobden club in 1873, and in 1874 was elected a foreign associate of the French academy of political science, also in 1877 a foreign associate of the Accademia dei Lincei of Italy, receiving its medal of honor in 1863. The degree of M. D. was given him by Berkshire medical college in 1863, that of LL. D. by Williams in 1871, and that of D. C. L. by Oxford in 1874. He was president of the American social science association in 1875-'9, president of the New London county (Conn.) historical society in 1880, and of the American free-trade league in 1881. He has been a prolific writer of pamphlets on economic subjects; some of the best known of which are "The Creed of the Free-Trade" (1875); "Production and Distribution of Wealth" (1875); "Why we Trade and How we Trade" (1878); "The Silver Question, or the Dollar of the Fathers vs. the Dollar of the Sons" (1878) and "Principles of Taxation" (1886). In book-form he has published "Year-Book of Agriculture" (Philadelphia, 1856); "Wells's Science of Common Things" (New York, 1856); "Report of U. S. Revenue Commission" (Washington, 1866), "Reports U. S. Special Commissioners of Revenue" (4 vols., 1866-'9); "Robinson Crusoe's Money" (New York, 1876); "Our Merchant Marine: how it Rose, Increased, became Great, Declined, and Decayed" (1882); "A Primer of Tariff Reform" (1884); "Practical Economics, a Collection of Essays" (1885); "A Study of Mexico" (1887); "A Short and Simple Catechism" (1888) and "Relation of the Tariff to Wages" (1888). He has edited Charles Knight's "Knowledge is Power" (Boston, 1856); Richard F. Burton's "Pilgrimage to El-Medinah and Meccah" (New York, 1857); "Things not Generally Known" (1857); and Sir Benjamin C. Brodie's "Psychological Inquiries," with notes (1857).

WELLS, Erastus, congressman, b. in Jefferson county, N. Y., 2 Dec., 1823. He received a common-school education, and at the age of nineteen, being thrown on his own resources, removed to St. Louis, Mo. He established the first omnibus line in that city, and subsequently the first street railroad, was for fifteen years a member of the city council, served as president of the Missouri railroad company, and was a director of several corporations. He was afterward chosen to congress as a Democrat, and served through four successive terms, from 4 March, 1869, till 3 March, 1877.

WELLS, Henry, expressman, b. in New Hampshire, 12 Dec., 1805; d. in Glasgow, Scotland, 10 Dec., 1878. He early entered the express business, becoming an agent for Henry F. Harnden, and in 1841 suggested to George Pomeroy the desirability of establishing an express from Albany to Buffalo. Subsequently Crawford Livingston acted on the proposition, and weekly trips were made between the two points. Beginning in 1843, railroad communication having been established between the two cities, trips were made daily. The firm-name was at first Pomeroy and Co., but was altered to Livingston, Wells and Pomeroy, and, on the retirement of the latter, became Livingston and Wells. In 1845 the business was extended westward from Buffalo to Chicago, with William G. Fargo in charge of that division, under the name of Wells and Co. Meanwhile they established a letter express to carry communications from New York to Buffalo for six cents, while the government charge for the same distance was twenty-five cents. Every means was taken by the National authorities to destroy the practice, but without success. In 1846 a European express was established, with offices in London and Paris. Competition by various companies resulted in the consolidation of the different organizations in 1850, and the formation of the American express company, of which Mr. Wells was elected president. In 1832 he was associated with William G. Fargo and others in forming the firm of Wells, Fargo and Co., for conducting the express business in the far west, and he continued an active officer of that company until its management was transferred to western capitalists after the completion of the Transcontinental railroad. In 1860 the American express company was reorganized with a capital of $1,000,000, and he acted as its president until 1868. He gave $150,000 to found and endow Wells female college at Aurora, N. Y., one of the first collegiate institutions to be established in this country for the higher education of women.

WELLS, Henry Horatio, lawyer, b. in Rochester, N. Y., 17 Sept., 1823. He was educated at Rome academy, Mich., studied law in Detroit with Theodore Romeyn, was admitted to the bar in 1846, and in 1854-'6 was a member of the legislature. He entered the army in September, 1862, as colonel of the 26th Michigan infantry, and served until September, 1866. In February, 1863, he was made provost-marshal-general of the defences south of Potomac river, which office he held until the close of the war. In May, 1865, he received the brevet of brigadier-general of volunteers, and, settling in Virginia in 1868-'9, was military governor of that state. He was the Republican candidate for governor in the latter year, but was defeated by Gilbert C. Walker. On the assassination of President Lincoln, he took charge of the investigation in Washington that resulted in the capture of the conspirators, and afterward he was associate counsel in the criminal proceedings against Jefferson Davis for treason. In 1870-'1 he was counsel, with Henry A. Wise, in the Chohoon and Ellyson mayoralty case, during the trial of which he was almost fatally injured by the falling of a gallery, crowded with people, in the capitol at Richmond. In 1871-'2 he was U. S. attorney for the eastern district of Virginia, and he then removed to Washington, where, in 1875-'80, he was U. S. attorney for the District of Columbia.

WELLS, Horace, dentist, b. in Hartford, Vt., 21 Jan., 1815; d. in New York city, 24 Jan., 1848. He was educated at New England academies, and in 1834 began the study of dentistry in Boston. In 1836 he opened an office in Hartford, Conn., where he soon gained a lucrative practice. His attention was early turned to the desirability of preventing pain during the extraction of teeth. After unsuccessfully experimenting with various narcotics he expressed his belief in the efficacy of nitrous oxide in 1840; but it was not until 1844, when that agent had been administered publicly in Hartford to several persons by Dr. Gardiner Q. Colton in his lecture on laughing-gas, that he became convinced of the practicability of its use. On the following day, 11 Dec., 1844, he had a tooth extracted from his own mouth without experiencing any pain while under the influence of the gas, and he at once began to use it in the extraction of teeth from other persons. Subsequently other dentists in Hartford became convinced of its value and used it. He went to Boston in January, 1845, for the purpose of laying his discovery more prominently before the profession, and communicated his experience to Dr. William T. G. Morton, Dr. Charles T. Jackson, and Dr. John C. Warren. Dr. Warren invited him to lecture before his class at the Harvard medical school and to administer the gas to a patient; but the experiment failed, as the subject was only partially anæsthetized, and in consequence Mr. Wells was hissed by the students, who pronounced him a charlatan and his gas a humbug. Dr. Morton had been his pupil in Hartford, and by his aid established himself in Boston. Subsequently, when he and Dr. Jackson laid claim to the discovery of anæsthesia and in 1846 applied for a patent, Mr. Wells remonstrated, stating the results of his own experiments and introducing the testimony of the medical profession in Hartford; but to no avail, for a patent was issued to Dr. Morton in November, 1846. Later, when Dr. Jackson and Dr. Morton submitted their claims to the Institute of France, Mr. Wells at once sailed for Europe in order to present his statement before that body also; but without success. He removed to New York city in 1847, where he tried to impress on the community the validity of his discovery. Mr. Wells was arrested on a charge of throwing vitriol on the clothes of women in the street, and this so aggravated a mental disorder with which he had been attacked that he committed suicide. He published a pamphlet entitled "A History of the Application of Nitrous-Oxide Gas, Ether, and other Vapors to Surgical Operations" (1847). A bronze statue by Truman H. Bartlett has been erected to his memory by the citizens of Hartford in Bushnell park. Charles T. Jackson, Crawford W. Long, William T. G. Morton, and Horace Wells are the claimants for the discovery of anæsthesia. See "An Examination of the Question of Anæsthesia" (Boston, 1859) and "An Inquiry into the Origin of Modern Anæsthesia" (Hartford, 1867).

WELLS, John, lawyer, b. in Cherry Valley, Otsego co., N. Y., in 1770; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 7 Sept., 1823. Owing to the massacre of his entire family by the Indians in Cherry Valley, he was in 1778 placed in charge of his aunt, who took him to New York city, and he was graduated at Princeton in 1788. He then studied law with Edward Griswold, was admitted to the bar in 1791, and in 1797 was appointed an associate justice of the peace by Gov. John Jay. About this time James Cheetham attacked the Federalists with vigor in "The American Citizen" and Mr. Wells replied in the "Evening Post." The ability with which his task was performed led to the belief that Alexander Hamilton was the author, and so well pleased was the latter with their strength that he sought the acquaintance of the younger man. Subsequently Mr. Wells had charge of bringing out the papers known as "The Federalist," although for final revision they passed through the hands of Hamilton. In 1804 Mr. Cheetham attacked the conduct and character of William S. Smith, son-in-law of President John Adams, in his journal, in consequence of which an action for libel was brought against him in the supreme court. Mr. Cheetham secured the services of Mr. Wells as counsel, and, although the latter failed to win the case, his conduct gained for him considerable reputation. After the war of 1812 his argument in the case of Griswold vs. Waddington, in which he took the ground that the war was a dissolution of partnership between the two brothers Waddington, one of whom was a resident of Liverpool and the other of New York, was regarded as one of his best efforts. He was a trustee of the General theological seminary and of Columbia college in 1815-'23. The degree of LL. D. was given him by Princeton. A bust was erected by the bar of New York in Grace church, of which he was a vestryman, and upon the removal of the church it was placed in St. Paul's chapel, where it still remains. See "Memorial of the Life and Character of John Wells" (printed privately, New York, 1874).

WELLS, John Sullivan, senator, b. in Durham, N. H., 18 Oct., 1803; d. in Exeter, N. H., 1 Aug., 1860. His mother was a niece of Gen. John Sullivan. He studied law, teaching to support himself, was admitted to the bar, and practised for five years in Guildhall, Vt., and after 1846 at Exeter, N. H. Mr. Wells filled various local offices, was for many years a member of the lower house of the legislature, serving in 1841 as its speaker, and was president of the state senate in 1852-'3. He was also attorney-general of the state in 1847. In 1854 he was Democratic candidate for U. S. senator, but was defeated by five votes on account of his approval of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. Shortly afterward he was appointed a U. S. senator to fill the vacancy that was caused by the death of Moses Norris, holding his seat from 22 Jan. till 3 March, 1855. He was again a candidate in that year and in 1860. He was the Democratic candidate for governor in 1856-'7, and sat in two National conventions.—His brother, Samuel, jurist, b. in Durham, N. H., 15 Aug., 1801; d. in Boston, Mass., 15 July, 1868, was self-educated, became a lawyer, and in 1836-'7 sat in the Maine legislature. From 1847 till 1854 he was on the supreme bench of the state, and in 1855-'6 he was governor.

WELLS, Robert, printer, b. in Scotland in 1728; d. in London, England, in 1794. He removed to Charleston, S. C., in 1758, and established himself as a book-seller and publisher. He was the chief book-seller in the Carolinas for many years, and published a paper called "The South Carolina and American General Gazette." At the opening of the Revolution he resigned his business to his son John and returned to Europe. His estate was confiscated in 1782. Mr. Wells acquired a fortune in England, but lost most of it. While in Charleston he wrote and published a "Travestie of Virgil."—His son, William Charles, scientist, b. in Charleston, S. C., in May, 1757; d. in London, England, 18 Sept., 1817, was placed at school in Dumfries, Scotland, in 1767, and entered Edinburgh university in 1770, but returned to Charleston in 1771, and in 1775, refusing to sign the "Association," a patriotic paper, embarked for London. He then resumed medical studies at Edinburgh, and in 1780 received his degree. After a short service as surgeon of a Scottish regiment in Holland he went back to Charleston in 1781 to arrange his family affairs. There he was a printer, book-seller, and merchant, and wrote a paper to show that Whigs of rank that appeared in arms after being sent home on parole should be put to death. He also published about this time a description of Henry Laurens under the signature of "Marius." When the British evacuated Charleston in December, 1782, Dr. Wells accompanied them to St. Augustine, Fla., where he edited the first weekly paper in the province, was captain of a military company, and managed a theatre that was established by young officers for the benefit of loyalist refugees. In 1784 he established himself in practice in London, where in 1788 he was admitted as a licentiate of the College of physicians, in 1790 elected physician to Finsbury dispensary, and in 1800 a physician of St. Thomas's hospital. His reputation as a scientist rests principally on his celebrated "Essay on Dew and Several Appearances connected with It" (London, 1814), by which he is chiefly known. This was the first announcement of a comprehensive theory of dew, and its conclusions, which were drawn from a series of ingenious experiments, are accepted to-day with slight modifications. His experimental work on this subject was remarkable for patient research, close reasoning, and the simplicity of the means that he employed. He was the first to show the relation of radiation to the deposition of dew and to explain the true origin and nature of the latter, which had generally been misunderstood. His essay on "Single Vision with Two Eyes," which had appeared previously (1792), had gained him an election in 1793 to the Royal society of London, which in 1816 awarded him the gold and silver Rumford medals. He also was chosen to the Royal society of Edinburgh in 1814. In 1813 Dr. Wells read before the Royal society a paper in which, says Charles R. Darwin, "he distinctly recognizes the principle of natural selection, and this is the first recognition that has been indicated." A volume containing his essays and an autobiographical sketch appeared after his death (Edinburgh, 1818).

WELLS, Samuel Roberts, phrenologist, b. in West Hartford, Conn., 4 April, 1820; d. in New York city, 13 April, 1875. He studied medicine, and obtained his degree, but never practised. He early became interested in phrenology, and was also one of the first advocates of an exclusively vegetable diet. In 1845 he became a partner in the publishing-house of O. S. and L. N. Fowler in New York city, the firm-name being Fowlers and Wells, and in 1865 he became sole proprietor. Mr. Wells edited the "Water-Cure Journal" in 1850-'62, the "Phrenological Journal" from 1863 till his death, and the "Annual of Phrenology and Physiognomy" after 1865. He accompanied Lorenzo N. Fowler in phrenological lecturing tours in the United States, Canada, and Great Britain, and was the author, among other works, of "The New Physiognomy, or Signs of Character" (New York, 1866); "How to read Character" (1869); and "Wedlock, or the Right Relations of the Sexes" (1869).—His wife, Charlotte Fowler, b. in Cohocton, Steuben co., N. Y., 14 Aug., 1814, is a sister of the Fowler brothers. She was educated at Franklin academy, Prattsburg, N. Y., and in 1834 became interested in phrenology, which she taught as early as 1835. She joined her brothers in their New York enterprise in 1837, married Mr. Wells in 1844, and after her husband's death succeeded to the management of his business.

WELLS, Walter, author, b. in Salisbury, N. H., in November, 1830; d. in Portland, Me., 21 April, 1881. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1852, and then taught in the high-school at Augusta, Me., for several years. Subsequently he lectured on scientific subjects, and was connected with the Western university of Pennsylvania, where he was invited to take charge of the chair of physical geography in the scientific department. In 1867 he was appointed to the hydrographic survey of Maine, and he published in connection with that work "The Water-Power of Maine" (Augusta, 1869). Subsequently he became connected with the Fairbanks scale company, and then was in the employ of various railroads. He was appointed in 1869 secretary of the National association of cotton manufacturers and planters in Boston, and made an exhaustive report on the tariff in relation to the growth and manufacture of cotton in this country. Mr. Wells also contributed papers to the periodical press, and prepared an elementary physical geography. He was engaged in literary work at the time of his death.

WELLS, William, soldier, b. in Kentucky about 1770; d. near Fort Dearborn (now Chicago), Ill., 15 Aug., 1812. When he was twelve years of age he was taken captive by the Miami Indians and adopted by Little Turtle, their chief. He served with the Indians at the opening of hostilities in 1790, and was at the battle when Gen. Arthur St. Clair was defeated. Realizing that he was fighting against his own kindred, he informed Little Turtle that he was going to his own people, set out for Gen. Anthony Wayne's army, and was made a captain of a company of scouts. He remained in the army till the treaty of Greenville in 1795, after which he settled upon a farm near Fort Wayne, where his wife, Little Turtle's daughter, joined him. He was Indian agent and justice of the peace, and rendered effective service to Gen. William Henry Harrison. When it was announced in 1812 that Fort Dearborn was to be evacuated, he set out at once with thirty friendly Miami Indians as a body-guard for the people on their route to Fort Wayne. He arrived at the fort (Chicago) on 13 Aug., but too late to prevent its evacuation, which he was certain would result in a massacre. On the morning of 15 Aug. the gates of the fort were opened and Capt. Wells, with blackened face, at the head of fifteen of his trusted Indians, the other fifteen bringing up the rear, set out on their journey for Fort Wayne. They had not gone more than a mile and a half when about 500 Indians sprang from their ambush behind the sand-hills on the bank of Lake Michigan and began an indiscriminate slaughter of soldiers, women, and children. Capt. Wells was pierced by half a dozen bullets, his head was cut off, and his heart was taken out by the infuriated savages.

WELLS, William, soldier, b. in Waterbury, Vt., 14 Dec., 1837. He attended academies in Vermont and New Hampshire, and became a merchant, but in September, 1861, enlisted in the 1st Vermont cavalry, becoming 1st lieutenant on 14 Oct., captain on 18 Nov., 1861, and major, 30 Oct., 1862. He took part in Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks's Shenandoah campaign, and Gen. John Pope's Virginia campaign in 1862, and then served in the cavalry corps of the Army of the Potomac till the close of the war, except from August, 1864, till March, 1865, when he was under Sheridan in the Shenandoah valley. He became colonel of his regiment, 4 June, 1864, was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers, 22 Feb., 1865, received his full commission on 19 May, and was brevetted major-general on 30 March. Gen. Wells commanded the 2d brigade of the 3d cavalry division in the Army of the Potomac, and for some time was temporarily at the head of that division. After June, 1865, till he was mustered out, 15 Jan., 1866, he commanded the 1st separate brigade of the 2d army corps at Fairfax Court-House. His regiment took part in numerous battles and skirmishes, and he was twice wounded. Gen. Wells was in the Vermont legislature in 1865-'6, adjutant-general and inspector-general of the state in 1866-'72, collector of internal revenue in 1872-'85, and state senator in 1886-'7.

WELLS, William Harvey, educator, b. in Tolland, Conn., 27 Feb., 1812; d. in Chicago, Ill., 21 Jan., 1885. He lived on the home farm till 1829, and, after attending school for a short time, became a teacher. He taught in the Teachers' seminary at Andover, Mass., in 1836-'47, and was principal of Putnam free school, Newburyport, Mass., in 1848-'54, and of the State normal school at Westfield, Mass., in 1854-'6. He then removed to Chicago, where he was superintendent of public schools from 1856 till 1864. Mr. Wells was an organizer of the Massachusetts state teachers' association, one of the first editors of the "Massachusetts Teacher," and at different times a member or officer of numerous educational and learned societies. He was vice-president of the Chicago astronomical society, a director of the public library of that city, and an organizer and life-long friend of the Washingtonian home of Chicago. Dartmouth gave him the honorary degree of M. A. in 1845. He was the author of several school-books and "Historical Authorship of English Grammar" (Chicago, 1878), contributed to educational journals, and assisted in the revision of "Webster's Unabridged Dictionary."

WELLS, William Hill, senator, b. in Pennsylvania about 1760; d. in Millsboro', Del., 11 March, 1829. He engaged in mercantile business in Dagsboro' and Millsboro', Del., and also practised law in Georgetown, but late in life he removed to Dover. He was chosen to the U. S. senate to fill the unexpired term of Joshua Clayton, deceased, and served from 4 Feb., 1799, till 6 May, 1804, when he resigned. On the resignation of James A. Bayard he was elected again, holding his seat from 10 June, 1813, till 3 March, 1817. Senator Wells became the owner, through his wife, of vast tracts of land in lower Sussex county, including what is known as the Cypress Swamp.

WELLS, William Vincent, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 2 Jan., 1826. He was educated in the common schools of his native city, and became a sailor and then an officer in the merchant marine. Afterward he engaged in mining and commercial enterprises, and was an agent for American capitalists in obtaining grants from foreign governments. In these capacities he has travelled since boyhood in various parts of the world, and has been four times shipwrecked. He went to California in 1849, where he built and commanded the first steamboat in that state, and he was afterward consul-general of Honduras in the United States. Mr. Wells has owned and edited several newspapers in San Francisco, has corresponded with various journals from different parts of the globe, and is the author of a narrative of "Walker's Expedition to Nicaragua, a History of the Central American War" (New York, 1856); "Explorations and Adventures in Honduras" (1857); and the "Life and Public Services" of his great-grandfather, Samuel Adams, with extracts from his correspondence, state papers, and political essays (3 vols., Boston, 1865).

WELLSTOOD, John Geikie, engraver, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, 18 Jan., 1813. He came to New York in 1830, and engaged with the firm of Rawdon, Wright and Co., with whom he remained until 1847, when he entered business for himself. His firm in 1858 was merged into what is now the American bank-note company, and he remained with this company until 1871. In that year he founded in Washington, D. C., the Columbian bank-note company. While he was president of this company he modelled and partially engraved the backs of all the U. S. treasury-notes. When this printing passed into the hands of the government, he returned to the American bank-note company in 1879, and is still (1889) employed by them as a script-engraver. He is the oldest living bank-note engraver in this country, and has made many improvements in that class of work.—His brother, William, engraver, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, 19 Dec., 1819, came to the United States with his parents in 1830, and when about sixteen years old began to work as a letter-engraver in New York. He afterward devoted himself entirely to pictorial work, and was especially successful in his landscapes. He has been employed by the Western Methodist book concern (1846-'74) and by various firms in New York. Among his plates, executed in the line manner, are portraits of Florence Nightingale (1857), Ulysses S. Grant, and Henry W. Longfellow, the latter after Alonzo Chappel, and the landscapes "Coast of Mount Desert," after William Hart (1862); "Mount Washington," after Sanford R. Gifford (1862); Albert F. Bellows's "A Quiet Nook" (1864); "Life's Day," three subjects (1865); Thomas Moran's "Florida" (1878); and Walter Satterlee's "Tempus Fugit" (1880).—William's son, James, engraver, b. in Jersey City, N. J., 20 Nov., 1855; d. there, 14 March, 1880, followed the profession of his father, whose pupil he was. At the time of his death he was a member of the firm of William Wellstood and Co., and was a successful and promising engraver. His principal plates were "The Pointer," and "Safe in Port," after Thomas Moran.

WELSER, Bartholomeus, Prince, German banker, b. in Augsburg about 1475; d. there in 1559. He was the head of the banking-firm of Welser Brothers, who claimed descent from the Byzantine general Belisarius. They possessed great riches, and Bartholomeus was created a prince of the empire and made privy councillor to the emperor, to whom he lent large sums, for the repayment of which he was granted, in 1527, the newly discovered province of Venezuela. He was to conquer the country at his own expense, enlist only Spanish and Flemish troops, fit out two expeditions of four vessels, and build two cities and three forts within two years after taking possession. As the country was reputed to contain gold-mines, he later obtained permission to send out 150 German miners. In virtue of this contract, Welser armed a fleet, which sailed from San Lucar de Barrameda early in 1528, under the command of Ambrosio Alfinger (q. v.), whom he appointed captain-general. After Alfinger's death in 1531, Georg von Speier (q. v.) became captain-general, and fitted out a new expedition, which sailed in 1534. After Speier's death in 1540 the crown of Spain claimed the right to appoint the governor, and finally, in 1546, Charles V. revoked Welser's charter. Welser did much to establish trade between the Low Countries, Germany, and South America. His enterprise has been commended by many writers, and is eulogized by Henry Ternaux-Compans in his collection, but it was detrimental to the interests of the banker, whose losses in his colonization schemes were estimated to reach the sum of 3,000,000 florins. Welser's banking-house still exists, as does also the old family mansion, which is one of the curiosities of the city of Augsburg.

WELSH, Alfred Hix, educator, b. in Fostoria, Ohio, 7 Sept., 1850. He spent his early life in manual labor, contributing to the support of his widowed mother and sisters. He was graduated at Baldwin university, Ohio, in 1872, was professor of mathematics the following three years in Buchtel college, became teacher of rhetoric in the Columbus high-school in 1876, and since 1885 has been professor of English literature in Ohio state university. Prof. Welsh is well known for his series of school-books on rhetoric, grammar, and mathematics. He has also published "The Conflict of Ages" (Columbus, 1877); "The Development of English Literature and Language" (Chicago, 1882); and "Man and His Relations" (Cincinnati, 1888). He has in preparation a "Manual of English Literature."

WELSH, John, merchant, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 9 Nov., 1805; d. there, 10 April, 1886. His father, of the same name, was a Philadelphia merchant. The son received a collegiate education, but was not graduated. After conducting a mercantile business of his own, he entered, in 1874, into partnership with his brothers in the West India trade, and was at the time of his death the senior member of the firm, which had been established since 1834. For many years he was active in public affairs, giving largely of his time and means, from his first service as member of the select council of Philadelphia. For twenty years he was a member of the sinking fund commission, and for the same length of time a trustee of the University of Pennsylvania, of which he was also a patron. He was president of the Philadelphia board of trade and of the Merchants' fund for fifteen years. He was one of the founders of the Episcopal hospital and its largest contributor. In 1862 he was appointed commissioner of Fairmount park. During the civil war he was active in measures of relief, and in 1864 he became president of the executive committee of the sanitary fair, which disbursed over $1,000,000 for the use of army hospitals and ambulances. His best-known work was as president of the Centennial board of finance, to which he was elected in April, 1873. The success of the exhibition was in a great measure due to his executive ability, in recognition of which he was presented by the city with a gold medal and with $50,000. With this sum he endowed the John Welsh chair of English literature in the University of Pennsylvania. Mr. Welsh was an active Republican, and in 1878 was appointed minister to England, but he resigned within two years. The degree of LL. D. was conferred upon him by the University of Pennsylvania in 1878, and by Washington and Lee in 1880, and many foreign decorations were given him for courtesies that he extended during the Centennial exhibition.—His brother, William, philanthropist, b. in Philadelphia about 1810; d. there, 11 Feb., 1878, was also a merchant in his native city, where he occupied many public posts, among them those of president of the board of trusts, director of Girard college, and trustee of Wills hospital. He was also largely identified with the philanthropic interests of the city, especially as a member of the Indian peace commission during Gen. Grant's administration, which place he resigned upon meeting with difficulties in the Indian bureau. For several years he was proprietor of the "North American" and the "Philadelphia Gazette," which he had purchased in order to elevate the morals of the daily press. Mr. Welsh published, besides various papers, "Lay Co-operation in St. Mark's Church" (Philadelphia, 1861); "Letters on the Home Missionary Work of the Protestant Episcopal Church"

(1863); "The Bishop Potter Memorial House" (1868); and "Taopi and his Friends, or Indians' Wrongs and Rights," with Bishop Henry B. Whipple and the Rev. Samuel Dutton Hinman (1869).

WELSH, Thomas, soldier, b. in Columbia, Pa., 5 May, 1824; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 14 Aug., 1863. He received a common-school education, and engaged in the lumber trade. Enlisting as a private for the Mexican war, he was wounded at Buena Vista, and promoted lieutenant for gallantry. At the beginning of the civil war he raised a company, was mustered into the volunteer service as captain, and was elected lieutenant-colonel of the 2d Pennsylvania regiment, which served in the Shenandoah valley until it was disbanded at the end of three months. He re-entered the service as colonel of the 45th Pennsylvania volunteers, and commanded a brigade at South Mountain and Antietam, as also at Fredericksburg, where he won promotion by his services on the right centre, being commissioned as brigadier-general of volunteers on 13 March, 1863. He was transferred to the west with the 9th army corps, and, after doing duty for some time in Kentucky, was sent to Vicksburg. After the fall of that place he marched with Gen. William T. Sherman to Jackson, Miss., and contracted a malarial fever, from which he died while travelling homeward.

WELTON, Richard, English non-juring bishop, b. in England about 1675; d. in Lisbon, Portugal, in 1726. He was rector of St. Mary's, Whitechapel, London, and in 1722 was consecrated to the episcopate by Dr. Ralph Taylor, one of the non-juring bishops. A short time afterward he assisted Dr. Taylor in consecrating Rev. John Talbot, then on a visit to England, who for many years had urged the establishment of episcopacy in the North American colonies. In 1723 the vestry of Christ church, Philadelphia, which was without a rector, prayed the bishop of London to send them "such a gentleman as may be a credit to our communion, an ornament to the profession, and a true propagator of the gospel." Six months having passed without an appointment being made, on 27 July, 1724, they invited Dr. Welton, who had arrived in town a month before, to take charge of the church. He entered at once upon his duties, served with great acceptance for two years, when he was commanded to return to England. Receiving a testimonial of his conduct from the churchwardens, he sailed for Lisbon in Jan., 1726, where he died in the autumn, refusing to commune with the English clergy. It is said that among his effects was found "an episcopal seal which he had made use of in Pensilvania," where "he assumed and exercised privily and by stealth the character and functions of a bishop." Dr. Francis L. Hawks asserts, in his "Ecclesiastical Contributions," that "there is direct evidence from the letters of some of the missionaries that both he and Dr. Talbot administered confirmation and wore the robes of a bishop." It was believed in the provinces that Dr. Welton also ordained clergymen, and these secret acts occasioned his recall.

WEMYSS, Francis Courtney, theatrical manager, b. in London, 13 May, 1797; d. in New York city, 5 Jan., 1859. He appeared at the Adelphi, London, in April, 1821, and at the Chestnut street theatre, Philadelphia, in December, 1822, as Vapid in "The Dramatist," and afterward in the principal cities of the United States. He was subsequently for many years a manager of theatres in Washington, Wheeling, Va., Wilmington, Del., Baltimore, Pittsburg, and Philadelphia. He was one of the founders and a director of the American dramatic fund association of New York city, and its secretary from 1852 till his death. He was the author of "Twenty-six Years as an Actor and Manager" (2 vols., New York, 1847); "Chronology of the American Stage, 1752-1852" (1852); and "Theatrical Biography" (New York); and edited "The Minor Drama," to which he also contributed (7 vols., 1848-'52).

WENDELL, John Lansing, lawyer, b. in Albany, N. Y., 2 Jan., 1785; d. in Hartford, Conn., 19 Dec., 1861. He was a descendant of one of the Dutch families of New York. He was educated in Albany and Cambridge, N. Y., his family having removed to the latter place about 1795. He there entered the law-office of his brother, Gerritt Wendell, became a member of the Albany bar, subsequently judge of Washington county, and was for many years reporter of the supreme court of the state of New York. He published "Reports of Cases in the Supreme Court of Judicature of New York, 1828-'41" (26 vols., Albany, 1829-'42), and "Digest of Cases, Supreme Court of New York, 1828-'35" (1836); and edited "Starkie's Law of Slander" (2 vols., Albany, 1843), and "Blackstone's Commentaries" (4 vols., New York city, 1847).

WENTWORTH, William, colonist, b. in Alford, Lincolnshire, England, in 1615; d. in Dover, N. H., 16 March, 1697. He was a follower of the Rev. John Wheelwright, came with him to Massachusetts in 1636, and was associated with him in his difficulties with the Massachusetts government respecting his Antinomian opinions. With Wheelwright and thirty-three others he signed, on 4 Aug., 1639, "A combination for a government at Exeter, N. H.," of which town he was an early settler. Subsequently he removed to Wells, Mass., but he afterward settled in Dover, N. H., where he was a ruling elder in the church and often preached. He supplied the pulpit in Exeter, after Wheelwright's return to England, as late as 1693. In 1689 he was instrumental in saving a garrison from destruction by the Indians. All the Wentworths in the United States are descended from him.—His grandson, John, lieutenant-governor of New Hampshire, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 16 Jan., 1671; d. there, 12 Dec., 1730, became a captain in the merchant marine, was appointed by Queen Anne a councillor for New Hampshire in 1711, made a justice of the common pleas in 1713, and in 1717 became lieutenant-governor of the province, which was then dependent on Massachusetts.—William's great-great-grandson, Joshua, soldier, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., in 1742; d. there, 19 Oct., 1809, was colonel of the 1st New Hampshire regiment in 1776, was elected to the legislature, served for four years as state senator, and was appointed a delegate to the Continental congress, but did not attend.—William's great-great-great-grandson, Tappan, lawyer, b. in Dover, N. H., 24 Sept., 1802; d. in Boston, Mass., 12 June, 1875, received a public-school education, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1826, and practised in Great Falls, N. H. In 1833 he removed to Lowell, where he was a member of the town council in 1836-'41. He served in the legislature as a Whig in 1851 and as a Republican in 1859 and 1863-'4, and in the state senate in 1848-'9 and 1865-'6. He was elected to congress as a Whig, and served from 4 March, 1853, till 3 March, 1855.—John's son, Benning, governor of New Hampshire, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 24 July, 1696; d. there, 14 Oct., 1770, was graduated at Harvard in 1715, and became a merchant in Portsmouth, which town he represented in the assembly. On 12 Oct., 1734, he was appointed a king's councillor, and when New Hampshire was made a distinct province in 1741 he became its governor on 13 Dec., and held this post until 1767. He was authorized by the crown to grant patents of unoccupied land, and in 1749 began to make grants in what is now southern Vermont. This land was considered by the colonial governor of New York as lying within his domain, and the collision, famous in the history of Vermont, respecting the "New Hampshire grants," ensued. A proclamation was made by the governor of New York on 28 Dec., 1763, claiming the territory under the grant from Charles II. to the Duke of York and ordering the sheriff to make returns of the names of those that had settled west of Connecticut river under titles that were derived from New Hampshire. Gov. Wentworth issued a counter-proclamation on 13 March, 1764, declaring these claims obsolete and maintaining the jurisdiction of New Hampshire. Gov. Wentworth exacted heavy fees for his grants of land, and thus accumulated a large property. In each of them he stipulated for the reservation of a lot for an Episcopal church. After his resignation as governor he gave to Dartmouth 500 acres of land, on which the college buildings were erected. He was fond of display. His splendid coach with its retinue of servants became a feature of Portsmouth, and in his spacious mansion he assumed what was then looked upon as almost regal state. The town of Bennington, Vt., was named in his honor. His first wife was Abigail, the daughter of John Ruck, of Boston, who died on 8 Nov., 1755, and his second was his young housekeeper, who had been brought up in his family. His marriage to her, which took place on 15 March, 1760, is the subject of Longfellow's poem, "Lady Wentworth." She was made sole heir of the governor's extensive property, and after his death married Col. Michael Wentworth, of the British army. Her only child, Martha, became the wife of Gov. John Wentworth's nephew, John Wentworth, author of "Special Pleading."—Benning's nephew, Sir John, bart., governor of New Hampshire and afterward of Nova Scotia, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., 9 Aug., 1737; d. in Halifax, Nova Scotia, 8 April, 1820, was the son of Mark

Wentworth

Hunking Wentworth, a councillor of New Hampshire, with whom he was associated as a merchant after his graduation at Harvard in 1755. He went to England in 1765 as agent of the province, and through the influence of Charles Watson Wentworth, Marquis of Rockingham, obtained the appointment of governor of New Hampshire, succeeding his uncle, and serving from 1767 till 1775. To this office was added that of surveyor-general of the king's woods in North America, with a salary of £700 and perquisites. He landed in Charleston, S. C., in March, 1768, and, travelling northward by land, registered his commission as surveyor in each of the colonies through which he passed. He entered on his duties as governor in June, 1768, was popular, and an excellent public man in every particular. In business he was prompt and efficient, and aided greatly in encouraging education. He gave Dartmouth college its charter and endowed it with 44,000 acres of land, and also gave a piece of land to each member of the first graduating class. (See WHEELOCK, ELEAZAR.) He did much to encourage agriculture and to promote the settlement of New Hampshire, and labored zealously to increase its wealth and importance. When the Revolution began, his efforts to prevent a rupture were unwearied, and he was popular with the people until Gen. Thomas Gage applied to him to procure workmen in New Hampshire to aid in the erection of barracks for the British troops in Boston. He endeavored to comply with this request, which gave the death-blow to his authority, and he was forced to abandon his post. The indignation of the people compelled him to take refuge first in Fort William and Mary and then on board a British ship. His last official act was performed at the Isles of Shoals, where he prorogued the assembly. He embarked for Boston in the ship-of-war "Scarborough" on 24 Aug., 1775, and soon sailed for England, where he remained until peace was declared. Although he was regarded with especial favor by the king, he seems to have held no office. In 1778 he was in Paris, and John Adams records meeting him as he was leaving his box in the theatre. "At first," says Adams, "I was somewhat embarrassed and knew not how to behave toward him. As my classmate and friend at college and ever since, I could have pressed him to my bosom with cordial affection; but we now belonged to two different nations at war with each other, and consequently we were enemies." During their interview "not an indelicate expression to us or to our country or our ally escaped him. His whole behavior was that of an accomplished gentleman." In 1792 he was appointed governor of Nova Scotia, which office he held until 1808, when he retired with a pension of £500 per annum, and was succeeded by Sir George Prevost. He also resumed his post of surveyor of the king's woods. In 1795 he was created a baronet. In 1799 the Duke of Kent, the father of Queen Victoria, visited Halifax, and Sir John gave a dinner and ball of princely magnificence in his honor at the government house. After his retirement he went with Lady Wentworth to England, but returned to Nova Scotia in 1810 and was accorded a public welcome. He received the degree of A. M. from Harvard and Princeton in 1763, and that of LL. D. from Oxford in 1766 and Dartmouth in 1773. Gov. Wentworth owned a large farm in Wolfsborough, N. H., on which he erected in 1773 a mansion 100 feet in length and 45 feet in width and out-buildings of a corresponding size. His entire estate was confiscated and this house was burned in the year of his death. His house in Pleasant street, Portsmouth, was occupied for many years by a kinsman, Ebenezer Wentworth, at one time a cashier of the branch Bank of the United States, who died in 1860. He preserved the parlor in the same style in which its old occupant left it at the time of the Revolution. Many distinguished visitors from abroad have had curiosity to view the premises and his valuable collection of family paintings.—His wife, Frances Deering, was a native of Boston and died in England in 1813. Her maiden name was Wentworth, and, although her earliest attachment was for John Wentworth, during his first visit to England, she married Theodore Atkinson, a kinsman of both. On 11 Nov., 1769, after the death of her first husband, she married Gov. Wentworth. She was beautiful, accomplished, and gay, and when abroad was conspicuous at court. Her portrait by John Singleton Copley is considered an "excellent likeness and a rare picture." The towns of Frances-town, Deering, and Wentworth, N. H., perpetuate her name.—Their son, CHARLES MARY, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., in 1775; d. in Hingsand, Devonport, England, in April, 1844, was long private secretary to the Earl of Fitzwilliam. He was appointed a member of the council of Nova Scotia in 1801, and died unmarried. His property descended to his maternal cousin, Mrs. Catherine Frances Gore, the novelist.—William's great-grandson, John, jurist, b. in Dover, N. H., 30 March, 1719; d. in Somersworth, N. H., 17 May, 1781, was a member of the legislature from 1768 till 1775, serving as speaker in 1771, in 1773 became chief justice of the court of common pleas, and on 17 Jan., 1776, was made one of the judges of the supreme court, although he had never studied nor practised law. He was president of the first Revolutionary convention in Exeter, N. H., on 21 July, 1774, and was also chairman of the Revolutionary committee of correspondence. He was usually called Colonel John, or Judge John, to distinguish him from others of the same name.—The third John's son, John, lawyer, b. in Somersworth, N. H., 17 July, 1745; d. in Dover, N. H., 10 Jan., 1787, was graduated at Harvard in 1768, and studied law, which he practised in Dover. From 1776 till 1780 he served in the legislature, and was appointed by Gov. John Wentworth register of probate for Stratford county, which office he held until his death. He was a delegate to the Continental congress in 1778-'9, and was a member of the state council in 1780-'4, of the state senate in 1784-'7, and of the New Hampshire committee of safety, which administered the government during the recess of the legislature. He was an ardent patriot, and signed, in behalf of New Hampshire, the original articles of confederation.—The second John's nephew, John, lawyer, b. in Portsmouth, N. H., in 1768; d. in Paris, France, in 1816, was taken to England about 1775 and educated as a lawyer. He was appointed attorney-general of Prince Edward island, and removed to Portsmouth, where he married Martha Wentworth. In 1816 he returned to Europe. He was the author of a "System of Pleading" (10 vols., London, 1797).—The fourth John's grandson, John, journalist, b. in Sandwich, N. H., 5 March, 1815; d. in Chicago, Ill., 16 Oct., 1888, was a son of Paul Wentworth, and the grandson on his mother's side of Col. Amos Cogswell, a Revolutionary officer. After graduation at Dartmouth in 1836, he settled in Illinois in 1836, attended the first meeting to consider the propriety of organizing the town of Chicago into a city, did much to procure its charter, and voted at its first city election in May, 1837. He studied law at Chicago, attended lectures at Harvard law-school, and was admitted to practice in Illinois in 1841. While studying law he conducted the Chicago "Democrat," which he soon purchased and made the chief daily paper of the northwest and of which he was publisher, editor, and proprietor until 1861. Being elected to congress as a Democrat, he served from 4 Dec., 1843, till 3 March, 1851, and again from 5 Dec., 1853, till 3 March, 1855. He introduced in that body the first bill favoring the establishment of the present national warehouse system, was instrumental in securing the grant of land to the state of Illinois out of which was constructed the present Illinois Central railroad. He was one of the Democrats and Whigs in congress that assembled at Crutchet's, at Washington, the morning after the repeal of the Missouri compromise passed the house, and resolved to ignore all party lines and form an anti-slavery party. Out of this grew the present Republican party, with which he afterward acted. He was elected mayor of Chicago in 1857 and again in 1860, and was the first Republican mayor elected in the United States after the formation of the party, and issued the first proclamation after Fort Sumter was fired upon, calling on his fellow-citizens to organize and send soldiers to the war.

He introduced the first steam fire-engine, "Long John," in Chicago in 1857, and later two others, the "Liberty" and "Economy." Upon each occasion of his assumption of the mayor's office he found a large floating debt, and left money in the treasury for his successor. In 1861 he was a member of the convention to revise the constitution of Illinois, and he was a member of the board of education in 1861-'4 and in 1868-'72. He served again in congress from 4 Dec., 1865, till 3 March, 1867, was a member of the committee of ways and means, and was an earnest advocate of the immediate resumption of specie payments. Mr. Wentworth had been a member of the Illinois state board of agriculture, and was the largest real estate owner in Cook county. He received the degree of LL. D. from Dartmouth, to which college he gave $10,000, and was elected president of its alumni in 1883. Owing to his extreme height he was called "Long John" Wentworth. In addition to lectures and writings upon the early history of Chicago, and historical contributions to periodicals, he was the author of "Genealogical, Bibliographical, and Biographical Account of the Descendants of Elder William Wentworth" (Boston, 1850), and "History of the Wentworth Family" (3 vols., 1878).

WERDEN, Reed, naval officer, b. in Delaware county, Pa., 28 Feb., 1818; d. in Newport, R. I., 13 July, 1886. He was appointed from Ohio a midshipman in the navy, 9 Jan., 1834, became a passed midshipman, 16 July, 1840, was commissioned lieutenant, 27 Feb., 1847, and served in the sloop "Germantown" during the Mexican war in 1847-'8, in which he commanded a detachment of men from that ship in the expeditions against Tuspan and Tampico. When the civil war began he was attached to the steam frigate "Minnesota," in which he participated in the attacks on the forts at Hatteras Inlet and operations in the sounds of North Carolina in Stringham's squadron. He commanded the steamers "Yankee" and "Stars and Stripes" on the North Atlantic blockade in 1861-'2, and in the latter led the first division in the capture of Roanoke island. He was commissioned commander, 16 July, 1862, had charge of the steamer "Conemaugh," on the South Atlantic blockade, in 1862-'3, was fleet-captain of the Eastern Gulf blockading squadron in 1864-'5, and commanded the steamer "Powhatan," in which he blockaded the Confederate ram "Stonewall" in the port of Havana, Cuba, until she was surrendered by the Spanish authorities. He was commissioned a captain, 25 July, 1866, promoted to commodore, 27 April, 1871, was made rear-admiral, 4 Feb., 1875, and commander-in-chief of the South Pacific station in 1875-'6. He was then placed on the retired list at his own request.

WEREAT, John, patriot, b. about 1730; d. in Bryan county, Ga., in 1798. He was an early and decided advocate of colonial rights, was a member of the Provincial congress of Georgia in 1775, its speaker in 1776, and after the fall of Savannah in 1779, as president of the executive council, was at the head of the state government till the next election. In 1788 he was president of the Georgia convention that ratified the constitution of the United States. In 1782 Mr. Wereat exerted himself to relieve the wants of the suffering population west of Augusta, employing his negroes and boats in carrying food to them.

WERNICKE, Gottlieb (vair-nick-eh), known also as MIGUEL DE FARIA, German adventurer, lived in the first half of the 18th century. He was a merchant, trading in Brazil, and made several expeditions to the interior. About 1720 he discovered rich gold-mines at the foot of the peak of Itabira, and a few years later he organized a new expedition to explore the mountains north of Itambe. He found a rich gold-mine, which he opened and worked for several years, acquiring great wealth; but the governor of the province of Goyaz claimed that Wernicke had never obtained a grant of the mine. Soldiers took possession of Wernicke's establishments, and he was taken prisoner; but the complaints of his friends secured his release, and he went to Portugal to lodge a complaint against the governor, but died before obtaining justice. His defence, written originally in Portuguese, was translated into French under the title "Exposé des explorations et de la découverte des mines du district d'Itabira, par Gottlieb Wernicke, et de leur exploitation, avec un résumé de ses contestations avec les autorités de la province de Goyaz" (Amsterdam, 1736).

WERNWAG, Lewis, civil engineer, b. in Altbürg, Würtemberg, Germany, 4 Dec., 1769; d. in Harper's Ferry, Va., 12 Aug., 1843. On leaving school, in order to evade military service, he was sequestered by a shepherd in the mountains, who directed his attention to the study of astronomy, natural history, and other scientific subjects. In 1786 he made his way to Amsterdam and thence to Philadelphia. His earliest venture in this country was the building of a machine for making whetstones. Soon afterward he began to build power-mills and bridges. While conducting this business he purchased land containing large quantities of white oak and pine timber in New Jersey, from which he got out, about 1809, the keel for the first U. S. frigate built at the Philadelphia navy-yard. In 1810 he erected a bridge across Neshaminy creek, on the road between Philadelphia and New York, and the next year one across Frankford creek. His third bridge of wood was built across the Schuylkill river in 1812 at Philadelphia. This structure, known as the "Colossus of Fairmount," consisted of a single arch, the span of which was 340 feet. In consideration of its length of span (it being the longest ever erected), solidity, and strength, the bridge was regarded as one of the wonders of the world. From that time until 1834 he built twenty-nine additional bridges. In 1813 he removed to Phoenixville, Pa., where he took an interest in and charge of the Phoenix nail-works, and there invented the first machine for cutting and heading spikes from four to seven inches in length. The other machinery was also remodelled and greatly improved by him. He purchased coal-lands near Pottsville, which led to his experimenting toward the use of anthracite coal. At first he found it almost impossible to ignite it, but he discovered that, by closing the furnace-doors and introducing air from beneath, combustion was possible. He was sanguine of its ultimate use for fuel, and while the Philadelphians drove from the city the person that offered to sell it, believing he offered stone for coal, he invented and used in his own residence a stove for burning it. The canal of the Schuylkill navigation company, one of the first in the United States, was partially constructed by him, and the Fairmount water-works and dam at Philadelphia were erected in accordance with his plans. In 1819 he removed to Conowingo, Md., where he built a bridge and double saw-mill, and prepared the timber for many bridges. Five years later he removed to Harper's Ferry and purchased the Isle of Virginus, where he continued his business of preparing timber for bridges. His last bridge was across the Potomac at Harper's Ferry for the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and was built in 1833.

WERTMÜLLER, Adolph Ulric, artist, b. in Stockholm, Sweden, in 1751; d. near Marcus Hook, Pa., 5 Oct., 1811. He worked for some time in France, where he became a member of the academy in 1782, and in 1787 he was made court-painter in Sweden. In 1794 he came to the United States, remaining a year or two, and in 1797 he settled finally in this country. During his first visit he painted several portraits of Washington. Though the work of an excellent artist, they are hardly successful as portraits, for Wertmüller belonged to that ideal French school, which usually sacrificed truth to nature for elegance in execution. Elizabeth B. Johnston, in her "Original Portraits of Washington" (Boston, 1882), speaks of five portraits of Washington by Wertmüller, of which one, executed in 1797, was purchased by the U. S. government in 1878, and another is owned by the Historical society of Pennsylvania. Among his other portraits are those of Gustavus III. and his queen, and Gustavus IV. His "Marie Antoinette and her Children" (1785) is in the museum at Stockholm. He was noted especially for his vivid coloring, "Danæ" being a good example of his powers in that respect. When this picture was first exhibited in the United States great indignation was expressed, for public taste and sentiment at that time were against the nude in art.

WESLEY, John, founder of Methodism, b. in Epworth, Lincolnshire, England, 17 June, 1703; d. in London, 2 March, 1791. He was graduated at Christ church college, Oxford, in 1727, and the same year he was ordained presbyter and was his father's curate at Epworth, but he returned to Oxford as tutor in 1729, and became the head of the society that had been founded by his brother Charles and others for personal purification by means of "prayer, fastings, alms, and labors among the poor," the members of which in derision were called "Methodists." In 1735 he accompanied Gen. James Oglethorpe to Georgia as a missionary to the Indians. He began his labors in Savannah, preached and read the liturgy daily, forded rivers, crossed swamps, slept on the ground, fasted, and went barefooted among the children at school to encourage those who had no shoes. His preaching was at first successful, but his rigorous discipline became distasteful alike to settlers and Indians, and at length, on becoming the subject of enmity and persecution, through his attempt to influence the secular affairs of the colony, he relinquished his work and returned to England in 1738. Shortly after his return he formed the first Methodist society in London, and in the following year, the established churches being closed against him, he joined George Whitefield in his open-air preaching. The number of societies increased, and in May he laid the foundation of the first Methodist chapel in the world at Bristol. At first there was no design to form a new denomination, his desire being rather to promote a revival within the established church. About 1740 differences with Whitefield on doctrinal questions caused the division of the societies into the Calvinistic and Arminian Methodists. He employed laymen in 1741 to take charge of the societies during his travels, assigned them circuits, thus forming the Methodist itineracy, and convened the first annual conference on 25 June, 1744. In 1760 some of his followers sailed for America from Ireland, and became the pioneers of Methodism in the New World. (See EMBURY, PHILIP; HECK, BARBARA; and STRAWBRIDGE, ROBERT.) In 1769 Wesley, in response to an appeal from New York, sent over his first missionaries, who were followed by others in 1771. (See ASBURY, FRANCIS.) In 1780 Mr. Wesley, having been importuned by his missionaries for an ordained ministry, petitioned Bishop Lowth, of London, to ordain a presbyter to administer the sacraments in America. Being refused, he conferred with Thomas Coke, a presbyter of the Church of England, and with others, and on 2 Sept., 1784, he ordained Coke bishop, after ordaining Thomas Vasey and Richard Whatcoat as presbyters, with his assistance and that of another presbyter. Bishop Coke immediately sailed for this country, and established the Methodist Episcopal church. This same year Wesley issued his "Deed of Declaration," by which the government of the church was assigned to the conference of 100 members and their successors forever. Wesley had sent by Bishop Coke an abridgment of the English liturgy, entitled "The Sunday Services of the Methodists in North America" (London, 1784), with a "Collection of Psalms and Hymns for the Lord's Day," by John and Charles Wesley (1784). The liturgy soon fell into disuse. He abridged the "Articles of Religion" from the Forty-nine articles of the English church, and the "Discipline of American Methodism" (1785) from his "Large Minutes"; and his "General Rules" for membership was adopted by the conference. His works number about 200 volumes. Collections of his writings have appeared in London (32 vols., 1771-'4; 16 vols., 1806). The first American edition was published in Philadelphia (10 vols., 1826).

The best is a corrected edition by Rev. Thomas Jackson, D. D. (7 vols., New York, 1831). His life was written by Dr. Thomas Coke and Henry Moore, to whom all his manuscripts were left (London, 1792); by Robert Southey (2 vols., London, 1820); and by Rev. Luke Tyerman (3 vols., London, 1870-'1). See also "History of the Religious Movement of the Eighteenth Century," by Rev. Abel Stevens, D. D. (3 vols., New York, 1859-'62); "History of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America," by the same (4 vols., New York, 1864-'7; abridged ed., 1868); the "Living Wesley," by Dr. James Harrison Rigg (London, 1875); and "Journal of John Wesley," in his works, edited by John Emory (7 vols., New York, 1835).—His brother, Charles, clergyman, b. in Epworth, England, 18 Dec., 1708; d. in London, 29 March, 1788, was graduated at Oxford in 1732, and in 1729 was the founder of the society there which, under the leadership of John, was the beginning of Arminian Methodism. After being ordained, he sailed with his brother for Georgia, as Gen. Oglethorpe's secretary, and preacher to the colonists. But the latter refused to conform to the severity of his discipline, and, after an unsuccessful effort in Frederica, he went to Savannah, thence to Charleston, and returned home in 1736. Two years later he joined his brother's itineracy, meeting with great success, and spent the last years of his life in London. He is best known as a hymn-writer, standing second only to Dr. John Watts. He wrote 7,000 hymns, most of which possess great merit, 625 being in use by the Wesleys. A volume of his sermons, with a memoir, was published in 1816; a "Journal," with notes, by Rev. Thomas Jackson (2 vols., London, 1841); and a "Poetical Version of the Psalms of David," edited by the Rev. Henry Fish (Nashville, Tenn., 1854). See "Memorials of the Wesley Family" (London, 1876).

WESSELLS, Henry Walton, soldier, b. in Litchfield, Conn., 20 Feb., 1809; d. in Dover, Del., 12 Jan., 1889. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1833, and was in the war with the Seminole Indians in 1837-'40, being promoted 1st lieutenant on 7 July, 1838. He served in the Mexican war, taking part in Scott's campaign, and was promoted captain, 16 Feb., 1847. At Contreras, Capt. Wessells, though wounded, seized the regimental flag on the death of the color-sergeant, and led his men against the enemy. For gallant conduct there and at Churubusco he was brevetted major, and on his return from Mexico the state of Connecticut presented him with a jeweled sword "for distinguished services at Vera Cruz, Cerro Gordo, Contreras, and Churubusco." He served on the Pacific coast in 1849-'54, and on the north-western frontier in 1855-'61, being engaged in the Sioux expedition of 1855. He was promoted major, 6 June, 1861, and from 22 Aug. till 15 Feb., 1862, was colonel of the 8th Kansas volunteers, being engaged on the Missouri border. In March, 1862, he was transferred to the Army of the Potomac, and on 25 April he was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers. After serving in the peninsular campaign, being wounded at Fair Oaks, where he was brevetted lieutenant-colonel, and commanding the rear-guard from Haxall's to Harrison's landing, 2-3 July, 1862, he engaged in the defence of Suffolk, Va., from 20 Sept. till 9 Dec., and afterward took part in the operations in North Carolina. He was at Kinston and Goldsboro', and in the defence of New Berne, 21 Dec., 1862, till 1 May, 1863, and on 3 May was placed in command of the sub-district of the Albemarle. On 17 April, 1864, the town of Plymouth, N. C., which Gen.

Wessells held with a garrison of 1,600 men, was attacked by Gen. Robert F. Hoke with about 7,000 Confederates, assisted by the iron-clad ram "Albemarle." After a fight of four days, in which the enemy was driven back repeatedly, and one refusal to capitulate, Gen. Wessells finally surrendered, with 1,600 troops, 25 cannon, and 2,000 small-arms, besides valuable stores. After the destruction of the "Albemarle" the town fell again into the hands of the National troops. After confinement at Richmond, Danville, Macon, and Charleston, where he was placed under the fire of the National batteries on Morris island, Gen. Wessells was exchanged on 3 Aug., and from 11 Nov., 1864, till 31 Jan., 1865, was commissary of prisoners. He was promoted lieutenant-colonel, 16 Feb., 1865, and received the brevet of colonel, 20 April, 1864, for "gallant and meritorious services during the rebel attack on Plymouth, N. C.," and that of brigadier-general, U. S. army, 13 March, 1865, for services during the war. Gen. Wessells then served on the northwestern frontier till his retirement, 1 Jan., 1871, after which time he resided in his native place. He had two sons in the army, one of whom, HENRY WALTON, a captain in the 3d cavalry, has attained note as an Indian fighter.—Gen. Wessells's brother, LEVERETT WARD, who was colonel of the 19th Connecticut regiment in 1862 and a provost-marshal in 1863, has served as sheriff, and in 1879-'80 was quartermaster-general of Connecticut.

WEST, Benjamin, astronomer, b. in Rehoboth, Mass., in March, 1730; d. in Providence, R. I., 13 Aug., 1813. He settled in Providence in 1753, and became a book-seller, which occupation he followed until the beginning of the Revolution. His attention was then directed to the manufacture of clothing for the Continental army. Meanwhile he diligently prosecuted scientific studies, especially that of astronomy. In 1784 he was called upon to teach mathematics in the Protestant Episcopal seminary in Philadelphia, and in 1786 he returned to Providence, accepting the chair of mathematics and natural philosophy in Brown university, which he held until 1799. In 1812-'13 he was postmaster of Providence. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Brown and Harvard in 1770 and by Dartmouth in 1782, and that of LL. D. was given him by Brown in 1792. He was elected a fellow of the American academy of arts and sciences in 1781, and published an "Account of the Observation of Venus upon the Sun, June 3, 1769" (Providence, 1769). From 1763 till 1793 he issued almanacs, including "The Ninth American Calendar."

WEST, Benjamin, artist, b. near Springfield, Chester co., Pa., 10 Oct., 1738; d. in London, England, 11 March, 1820. It is said that before the age of seven he made a pen-and-ink sketch of his sister sleeping in a cradle, and his first attempts in color were made with the red and yellow earths that were given him by friendly Indians, and the blue of his mother's indigo-pot, with brushes of his own manufacture. A friend, whose attention had been attracted by the boy's attempts, sent him a box of paints and several engravings. These were the first implements or works of art the boy had seen. Soon afterward he received some aid and instruction from William Williams, a painter in Philadelphia. At Lancaster he made his first attempts in portraiture, and even tried his hand at painting a picture of the death of Socrates for William Henry, a gunsmith. He established himself as a portrait-painter in Philadelphia in 1756, and two years later went to New York. In 1760 he visited Rome, Italy, furnished with letters to Cardinal Albani and other persons. He soon became the lion of the day, was well received by Pompeo Battoni and Antonio Raffaele Mengs, and studied in Italy until 1763. There he painted his pictures of "Cimon and Iphigenia," and "Angelica and Medora." From Italy he went to London, where he opened a studio, and where, two years later, he married Elizabeth Shewell. At the time of his arrival there, England had no historical painter of note, and his works soon attracted attention. But there were at first no purchasers, as it was not fashionable to buy any but "old masters." He painted at this time "The Parting of Hector and Andromache" and "Return of the Prodigal Son." "Agrippina landing with the Ashes of Germanicus" was painted for Dr. Drummond, archbishop of York, who presented the artist to King George III. His majesty, well pleased with the painting, ordered another, "The Departure of Regulus from Rome." These paintings won for West royal patronage and favor, which he long enjoyed. Among the paintings that he subsequently executed by order of the king were "The Death of General Wolfe," "Death of Epaminondas," and "Death of Chevalier Bayard" (1771); "Cyrus liberating the Family of the King of Armenia"; "Segestes and his Daughter brought before Germanicus"; "Edward III. embracing his Son on the Field of Battle at Cressy"; "The Installation of the Order of the Garter"; "The Black Prince receiving the King of France and his Son Prisoners at Poitiers"; "St. George vanquishing the Dragon"; "Queen Philippa defeating David of Scotland in the Battle of Neville's Cross"; "Queen Philippa interceding with Edward for the Burgesses of Calais"; "King Edward forcing the Passage of the Somme"; and "King Edward crowning Sir Eustace de Ribault at Calais." He was one of the founders, in 1768, of the Royal academy, and in 1792 succeeded Sir Joshua Reynolds as president of that institution, which post he held almost uninterruptedly till 1815. In his painting of the death of Wolfe, West had the courage to repudiate the traditions of the classical school, in abandoning classic costume, and clothing his characters in the dress of their time. It is said that on the completion of the picture, Reynolds, who before had attempted to dissuade him from his purpose, acknowledged his success, and said to the archbishop of York: "West has conquered; he has treated his subject as it ought to be treated; I retract my objections. I foresee that this picture will not only become one of the most popular, but will occasion a revolution in art." The work was purchased by Lord Grosvenor. West projected in 1780 a series of pictures on the progress of revealed religion, divided into four dispensations

—the Antediluvian, the Patriarchal, the Mosaical, and the Prophetic. Twenty-eight of the proposed thirty-six subjects were executed, but the mental disease that fell upon the king gave West's enemies an opportunity, and he was ordered to suspend work on the series, and ceased to be painter to the king. Undaunted, he again began a series of works. The first was "Christ healing the Sick" (1802), which was painted for the Pennsylvania hospital in Philadelphia, but bought by the British institution for £3,000. A copy, with some alterations, was afterward presented to the hospital. This was followed by the "Descent of the Holy Ghost on Christ at Jordan," "The Crucifixion," "The Ascension," "The Inspiration of St. Peter," and the famous "Death on the Pale Horse." Among his other important works are "The Treaty of Penn," the celebrated "Battle of La Hogue," "Christ Rejected," and various illustrations of Shakespearean scenes. The works from his hand that are owned in the United States include "Death on the Pale Horse" and "Paul and Barnabas," in possession of the Pennsylvania academy; "Penn's Treaty with the Indians," in Independence hall, Philadelphia; some classical subjects and a portrait of Charles W. Peale, owned by the New York historical society, and "King Lear," belonging to the Boston athenæum. In 1817 his wife died, and from that moment his strength began to fail. With mental faculties unimpaired, he died quietly on 11 March, 1820. He was buried in St. Paul's cathedral. In the 400 historical and sacred subjects that he painted, and of which many have been engraved, West showed skill in composition and a profound theoretical knowledge of art. But the monotonous reddish-brown tint in his works has been objected to, and it seems undoubted that at times he had the courage to attempt subjects which it would have been almost beyond the power of artists of greater genius to delineate. Yet, as one critic has said, "men should be judged not absolutely, but relatively," and West, though not entirely free from the conventionalities of his time, had at least the courage to protest against some of the prevailing ideas and fashions in art. As a man he was benevolent, kind, and liberal in imparting his knowledge to others. No painter has shown more kindness in aiding the struggling young artists of his native land. Charles W. Peale, Gilbert Stuart, Joseph Wright, and John Trumbull were among those young students that sought West when they went to Europe, and all received the same hearty welcome and generous advice from him. Several portraits of West have been made. Sir Thomas Lawrence painted a full-length portrait of West. A copy of this, by Charles R. Leslie, and a portrait by Washington Allston, are owned by the Boston athenæum. He also executed one himself. The vignette is from a painting by George H. Harlow, an English artist, and is perhaps the best of all West's portraits. A life of West was written by John Galt (London, 1820), which was severely criticised by William Dunlap. Numerous articles on West have been published, and interesting accounts of his life and criticisms on his works may be found in William Dunlap's "History" (New York, 1834); C. Edwards Lester's "Artists of America" (1846); and Henry T. Tuckerman's "Book of the Artists" (1867).

WEST, Charles W., merchant, b. in Montgomery county, Pa., 7 Aug., 1810; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 21 Sept., 1884. He received a common-school education, worked on a farm till he was twenty-one years old, was a clerk in a mill at Rochester, N. Y., for four years, and then was engaged in milling at Columbia, Pa., for a year or two. He returned to Rochester, went to the west, and in 1841 established himself in Cincinnati, where he achieved commercial success. In September, 1880, he offered to contribute $150,000 toward the erection of an art museum building, provided that an equal amount was raised by subscription, and on the condition being fulfilled he gave twice as much as he had promised. The building was begun in September, 1882, and completed before the close of 1885.

WEST, George, manufacturer, b. in Devonshire, England, 17 Feb., 1823. He served an apprenticeship of six years at his father's business of paper-making, and has been engaged in the same business with great success in this country ever since he arrived in 1849. He soon became manager of a paper-mill in Berkshire county, Mass., where he made the first water-lined paper that was manufactured in the United States. In 1860 he went to Ballston, N. Y., where he has since resided. He is the owner of nine paper-mills, with additional business interests in England and New York city. He owns "The Daily Saratogian" and several other newspapers in central New York. Mr. West was a member of the general assembly of the state of New York from 1872 till 1876, inclusive, and has been a member of congress since 1881. He was also a delegate to the Republican national conventions of 1880 and 1884. He presented the Round Lake association with a handsome building equipped with curiosities and specimens at a cost of $18,000, and called the George West museum of art and archæology, which was dedicated, 12 July, 1887.

WEST, Joseph Rodman, U. S. senator, b. in New Orleans, La., 19 Sept., 1822. He studied at the University of Pennsylvania, but was not graduated, served in the war with Mexico as a captain of volunteers, and emigrated in 1849 to California, where he engaged in commercial pursuits. At the opening of the civil war he was proprietor of the San Francisco "Prices Current." He entered the army as lieutenant-colonel of the 1st California infantry, saw service in New Mexico, and afterward in Arkansas and the southwest, was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, 25 Oct., 1862, and became brevet major-general, 4 Jan., 1866, when he was mustered out of the service. After the war he settled for a short time in Texas, and then removed to New Orleans, where he served as chief deputy U. S. marshal and auditor of the customs, and afterward as administrator of improvements, till he was elected U. S. senator from Louisiana as a Republican, serving from 4 March, 1871, till 3 March, 1877. Removing afterward to Washington, D. C., he engaged in business, and in 1882-5 was a commissioner of the District of Columbia.

WEST, Lionel Sackville Sackville, British diplomatist, b. in Bourne Hall, Cambridgeshire, England, 19 July, 1827. He is the fifth son of George John West, fifth Earl Delawarr, and Lady Elizabeth Sackville, younger daughter of the Duke of Dorset. He was educated by private tutors, entered the diplomatic service in 1847 as attaché to the legation at Lisbon, and was appointed first paid attaché at Berlin in 1853, and secretary of legation at Turin in 1858. He was transferred to Madrid in 1863, in 1867 promoted to secretary of embassy at Berlin, and during the absence of the ambassador in 1868 and 1869 acted as such at Paris. He was appointed minister to the Argentine Republic in 1872, was minister to Spain in 1878-81, and in the latter year was appointed minister to the United States, which post he held till November, 1888. He was made a knight commander of the Order of St. Michael and St. George on 26 June, 1885, and in August, 1888, grand cross of the same order. He is a lineal descendant of Thomas West, third Lord Delawarr, who was governor of Virginia in 1609, and from whom the state of Delaware takes its name. By the death of his brother Mortimer on 1 Oct., 1888, he succeeded as second Baron Sackville. During the presidential canvass of 1888 he wrote a letter in answer to one that purported to come from an English-born citizen of the United States, resident in California, who asked his advice with regard to voting, having reference to England's interest in a reduction of the tariff. This letter, being published, created much feeling in both countries, and caused his dismissal in November.

WEST, Mary Allen, educator, b. in Galesburg, Ill., 31 July, 1837. She was graduated at Knox seminary, Galesburg, in 1854, and taught till 1873, when she was elected county superintendent. She took an active part in all educational and reformatory movements, was for two years editor of "Our Home Monthly" in Philadelphia, and frequently contributed articles to educational and temperance journals. Miss West's reputation has been established chiefly by her connection with the National and state woman's Christian temperance union, of which she was one of the founders. Miss West has held in the State union the highest posts, and is editor-in-chief of the "Union Signal" in Chicago. She has published "Childhood: its Care and Culture" (Chicago, 1887).

WEST, Nathaniel, clergyman, b. in Ulster, Ireland, in September, 1794; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 2 Sept., 1864. He studied theology in Edinburgh, Scotland, was ordained in 1820, labored there for several years as a missionary, and was one of the founders of the first temperance society in that city. He came to this country in 1834, was installed as pastor of the Presbyterian church at Meadville, Pa., 11 May, 1836, and after 1838 was pastor successively of churches in Monroe, Mich., and Northeast, Pittsburg, McKeesport, and Philadelphia, Pa. In 1853 he received the degree of D. D. from Jefferson college, Pa., and he was elected a corresponding member of numerous literary and scientific societies. At the opening of the civil war he resigned his pastoral charge in Philadelphia, and in May, 1862, was appointed chaplain of the Satterlee U. S. general hospital at West Philadelphia, one of the largest military hospitals in the country, where he served till his death. He published "The Ark of God the Safety of the Nation" (Pittsburg, 1850); "Popery the Prop of European Despotisms" (1852); "The Fugitive-Slave Law" (1852); "Babylon the Great" (1882); "Right- and Left-Hand Blessings of God" (Philadelphia, 1852); "Complete Analysis of the Holy Bible, containing the Whole of the New and Old Testaments" (New York, 1853); "The Overturning of Tyrannical Governments," a sermon preached before Louis Kossuth when he was in the United States, which, by his order and at his expense, was translated and published in Magyar; "Lecture on the Causes of the Ruin of Republican Liberty in the Ancient Roman Republic" (Philadelphia, 1861); and "History of the U. S. Army General Hospital, West Philadelphia" (1863).

WEST, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Yarmouth, Mass., 3 March, 1730; d. in Tiverton, R. I., 24 Sept., 1807. His father, Sackville West, a physician, removed soon after his son's birth to Barnstable, Mass., where the boy labored on a farm and prepared himself for college. He was graduated at Harvard in 1754, entered the ministry, was settled over the congregation in New Bedford in 1761, and taught the doctrine that afterward became known as Unitarian. Immediately after the battle of Bunker Hill he joined the American army as a chaplain, remained several months with it, and deciphered for Gen. Washington a treasonable letter from Dr. Benjamin Church to an officer in the British army. He was a member of the convention that formed the constitution of the state of Massachusetts, and also of the convention for the adoption of the constitution of the United States. Among his publications are a sermon that was delivered, 29 May, 1776, being the anniversary for the election of the honorable council for the colony (Boston, 1776); "A Sermon on the Anniversary of the Landing of the Fathers at Plymouth" (1777); and "Essays on Liberty and Necessity," in reply to Jonathan Edwards' "On the Will" (2 parts, 1793-'5).—His brother, Benjamin, lawyer, b. in Plymouth county, Mass., 8 April, 1746; d. in Charlestown, N. H., 27 July, 1817, was educated at Princeton and at Harvard, where he was graduated in 1768. He afterward taught for two years, then studied theology with his brother Samuel at Needham, Mass., and began to preach at Wrentham, Mass., in January, 1771. He soon abandoned divinity for law, which he pursued at Lancaster, was admitted to the bar in 1773, and began practice at Charlestown. He was chosen a delegate from New Hampshire to the Continental congress, was elected a member of the convention that framed the Federal constitution, and also a representative from New Hampshire to the first congress, but he declined in each instance. He was distinguished for amiability, modesty, uprightness, and piety, and was universally esteemed and loved.

WEST, Stephen, clergyman, b. in Tolland, Conn., 13 Nov., 1735; d. in Stockbridge, Mass., 15 May, 1819. His father, Zebulon West, was a judge of the court of Hartford county. The son was graduated at Harvard in 1755, and afterward taught school at Hatfield, Mass., where he began the study of theology. He became chaplain at Hoosick fort in 1757, succeeded Jonathan Edwards in the Indian mission at Stockbridge in 1758, and was ordained as minister of the Congregational church there in 1759. In 1770 he resigned charge of the Indian mission, and about the same time he adopted Calvinistic theological opinions in opposition to his former views, which were Arminian. He was one of the original trustees of Williams college, was chosen vice-president at the first meeting of the board, and held this office for nineteen years. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him in 1792 by Dartmouth. In addition to many theological treatises and sermons, and essays in the "Theological Magazine" and "Connecticut Evangelical Magazine," he published "Essay on Moral Agency: Remarks on Edwards's 'Inquiry on the Freedom of the Will'" (New Haven, 1772); "Duty and Obligation of Christians to Marry only in the Lord" (1779); "An Essay on the Scripture Doctrine of the Atonement" (1785); "An Inquiry into the Ground and Import of Infant Baptism" (1794); "Life of Samuel Hopkins, D. D." (1806); "Three Sermons on the Mosaic Account of the Creation" (1809); and "Evidence of the Divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ collected from the Scriptures" (1816).

WEST, William, clergyman, b. in Fairfax county, Va., in 1739; d. near Baltimore, Md., 30 March, 1791. His birthplace was near Mount Vernon, and he became intimate with Washington. He went to England for orders, which he received from the bishop of London, 24 Nov., 1761. He served two years in his native province, in 1761-'63 was incumbent of St. Margaret's, Westminster parish, Ann Arundel co., Md., in 1763-'72, of St. Andrew's, St. Mary's county, in 1767-'72, of St. George's parish, Harford co., in 1772-'9, and of St. Paul's, Baltimore county, in 1779-'91, officiating in connection therewith in St. Thomas's parish, ten miles distant. He received the degree of D. D. from Washington college, Md., in 1785, was active in the work of settling church affairs, directly after the Revolution, and was a correspondent of Bishop White, who valued his sound judgment and accurate acquaintance with the important subject of organizing the Protestant Episcopal church and in revising the liturgy. He was secretary of the convention of Maryland, in June, 1784, and president in May, 1790; and was a delegate to the general convention.

WEST, William Edward, artist, b. in Lexington, Ky., 10 Dec., 1788; d. in Nashville, Tenn., 2 Nov., 1857. He was first a pupil of Thomas Sully in Philadelphia, and in 1819 visited Italy to continue his studies. In 1825 he went to London, where he remained until 1839. He returned to the United States, going first to Baltimore in 1840, to New York, and in 1855 to Nashville, Tenn. He excelled especially in portraiture, and in Europe executed likenesses of Washington Irving, Lord Byron, and the Countess Guiccioli, Percy B. Shelley, Mrs. Hemans, and many other well-known persons. His figure-pieces include "Pride of the Village," "Annette de l'Arbre," "Confessional" (belonging to the New York historical society), "The Toilet," and "Judith and Holofernes."

WESTCOTT, James Diamant, senator, b. in Alexandria, Va., 10 May, 1802; d. in Montreal, Canada, 12 Jan., 1880. He was the son of James D. Westcott (1775-1841), who was secretary of state in New Jersey in 1830-'40, and his grandfather served in the Revolutionary war as captain of artillery. At an early age he removed with his father to New Jersey, where he received his education, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1824, and practised until 1829. Afterward he was a clerk in the consular bureau of the state department in Washington, and in 1830-'4 was secretary of the territory of Florida, occasionally performing the duties of the governor. In 1832 he was a member of the territorial legislature, and in 1834-'6 was attorney-general for the middle district of Florida. He served again in the legislature, was a member of the convention for framing a state constitution in 1838 and 1839, and on the admission of Florida into the Union in 1845 was elected to the U. S. senate as a Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1845, till 3 March, 1849. On the expiration of his term he removed to New York city, where he practised law until 1862, when he went to Canada and remained there until his death.—His son, James Diamant, jurist, b. in Tallahassee, Fla., 18 June, 1839, was educated in his native town, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. He entered the Confederate service at the beginning of the war, and attained the rank of major. In 1885 he became attorney-general of Florida, but resigned this post a year later, and was appointed a justice of the supreme court.

WESTCOTT, Thompson, editor, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 5 June, 1820; d. there, 8 May, 1888. He was educated at the English schools of the University of Pennsylvania, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1841. In 1846 he became law-reporter on the "Public Ledger," remaining there until 1851 and frequently acting in an editorial capacity for this journal and for the "Dollar Newspaper." When the "Sunday Despatch" was begun in 1848 he became its editor and served until 1884. In 1863-'9 he was editor-in-chief of the "Inquirer," and he contributed to this journal until 1876. In 1884 he accepted an editorial appointment on the Philadelphia "Record," which he held for several months, after which he contributed to the "Public Ledger" and to other journals. Mr. Westcott was the author of a "Life of John Fitch, the Inventor of the Steamboat" (Philadelphia, 1857); "The Taxpayer's Guide" (1864); "Names of Persons who took the Oath of Allegiance to the State of Pennsylvania between the Years 1777 and 1789, with a History of the 'Test Laws' of Pennsylvania" (1865); "The Chronicles of the Great Rebellion against the United States of America," first published in the "Old Franklin Almanac" (1867); "Official Guide-Book of Philadelphia" (1876); "Centennial Portfolio" (1876); "Historic Mansions and Buildings of Philadelphia" (1877); and, with J. Thomas Scharf, a "History of Philadelphia, 1609-1884" (3 vols., 1884); and contributed to the "Sunday Despatch" a "History of Philadelphia from the First Settlements on the Delaware to the Consolidation in 1854."

WESTERLO, Eilardus, clergyman, b. in Cantes, Gröningen, Holland, in October, 1738; d. in Albany, N. Y., 26 Dec., 1790. His father, Isaac, was pastor of the church in Cantes. After graduation at the University of Gröningen the son was licensed to preach, and in 1760 was made pastor of the Dutch Reformed church in Albany, where he remained until his death, also supplying quarterly the charge at Schaghticoke, N. Y. He was influential in procuring a plan of union for the churches of his denomination. During the Revolution he sympathized with the patriots, and delivered the address of welcome to Gen. Washington when he visited Albany in 1782. Among his correspondents he numbered the Rev. Ezra Stiles, president of Yale, to whom he frequently wrote in Latin and Hebrew. He left in manuscript an autobiography containing references to the years between 1761 and 1790, Greek and Hebrew lexicons, complete, and a translation from the Dutch of Alberthonias's "Catechism" (1790; 2d ed., 1805). In 1775 he married the widow of Stephen Van Rensselaer.—Their son, Rensselaer, b. in Albany in 1775; d. there in 1851, was graduated at Columbia in 1795, and was elected to congress as a Federalist, serving from 1 Dec., 1817, till 3 March, 1819.

WESTERMAN, Hans (ves-ter-mon), Alsatian explorer, b. in Hagenau in 1660; d. in Paris in 1721. He studied law in Strasburg and Paris, but early showed a strong desire for travel and visited western Europe, serving as volunteer against the Turks for a few months, and, after publishing a narrative of his travels in Paris, sailed for Manila as supercargo. He afterward visited the East Indies, where, to avoid difficulties with the Spanish and Portuguese authorities, he became a Franciscan friar and received minor orders. Thus enabled to visit South America, he sailed from Manila for Acapulco, going afterward to Mexico and Vera Cruz, made an exploration of the pyramids of Tezcoco, and visited the mines of Pachuca and San Agustin de las Cuevas. He visited Cuba, Porto Rico, Santo Domingo, and several of the Lesser Antilles, returning to Paris in 1708. Besides works that describe his travels in Europe and Asia, he wrote "De Manille à Vera-Cruz, à travers le royaume de la Nouvelle Espagne" (1710); "Essai sur les pyramides de Tezcoco et les mines mexicaines" (1710); and "Voyage aux Indes Occidentales" (1715).

WESTERN, Pauline Lucille, actress, b. in New Orleans, La., 8 Jan., 1843; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 11 Jan., 1877. She made her first appearance on the stage with her sister Helen as "change artist" at her father's theatre in Washington, D. C., and travelled extensively with her in this country.

They were known as the "Star Sisters," and their principal play was the "Three Fast Men." In 1858 they appeared at the Old Bowery theatre in New York. On 11 Oct., 1859, she married James Harrison Mead. In 1859 or 1860 she appeared at the Holliday street theatre in "East Lynne," achieving her first success. In 1861-'5 she travelled with a combination troupe, playing Nancy Sykes in "Oliver Twist," with Edward L. Davenport as Bill Sykes and James W. Wallack, Jr., as Fagin. In 1865 she played in Philadelphia, appearing in "Eleanor's Victory," "Lucretia Borgia," "Jane Eyre," "The Child-Stealer," "Mary Tudor," "Cynthia," besides the two plays already mentioned. She appeared in the principal theatres in the United States, and at the time of her death was playing at the New Park theatre, Brooklyn.

WESTON, Edward, electrician, b. in England, 9 May, 1850. He showed as a boy a decided fondness for the physical sciences, especially electricity, but deferred to his parents' wishes and studied medicine. In 1870 he determined to follow his own special bent, and came to this country. He soon became chemist to the American nickel-plating company, and at once displayed his inventive genius by introducing improvements into the art of nickel-plating. Two years later he began to study dynamo-electric machinery, with the object of utilizing it in electro-metallurgy, and in 1873 he reached a very clear conception of the sectional armature, and in the same year prepared the first copper-coated carbons. In 1875 he removed to Newark, N. J., and there engaged in the manufacture of dynamo-electric machinery, establishing what is believed to be the first factory in this country that was devoted exclusively to that class of apparatus. His business increased so rapidly that in 1877 it was organized as the Weston dynamo-electric machine company, and in 1881 it was consolidated with the United States electric lighting company, of which he was electrician until 1888. In 1875 he began experimenting in arc and incandescent lighting, constructing several incandescent lamps in 1876, and since that time he has steadily developed his systems of both these varieties of electric lighting. In 1887 he built in Newark one of the largest private laboratories in the world, and he also possesses a fine technical library that contains many rare books on electricity. Mr. Weston has recently directed his attention to the production of new and original forms of electrical instruments such as voltmeters, ammeters, and electro-dynamometers for scientific and practical work. One of his most valuable inventions is that of tamidine, a modification of cellulose, which is extensively used in incandescent lamps. He was a charter member of the American institute of electrical engineers, and its president in 1888.

WESTON, Henry Griggs, clergyman, b. in Lynn, Mass., 11 Sept., 1820. He was graduated at Brown university in 1840, and at Newton theological institution in 1843. In the latter year he was ordained, at Frankfort, Ky., to the Baptist ministry. After preaching as a missionary for several years in Illinois he became in 1846 pastor of the Baptist church in Peoria, where he remained for thirteen years. He was then called to the pastorate of the Oliver street church, New York, and continued in this relation until 1868, when he accepted the presidency of Crozer theological seminary, Pa., which office he now holds. He was for a time editor of the "Baptist Quarterly," and has also been president of the American Baptist missionary union. In addition to his duties as an instructor, his services have been in constant demand as a preacher. In 1859 he received from Rochester university the degree of D. D. Dr. Weston has contributed to periodicals, and is the author of a treatise on the "Four Gospels."

WESTON, Mary Catharine North, author, b. in Albany, N. Y., 14 April, 1822; d. in Greenwich, Conn., 4 Aug., 1882. She was the daughter of William Steuben North, and the granddaughter of Gen. William North, who served in the Revolutionary army as aide to Baron Steuben. After receiving her education in Schenectady, she married the Rev. Daniel C. Weston, D. D., on 4 Oct., 1842. Mrs. Weston is the author of standard books of instruction, which were published under the auspices of the Church book society of the Protestant Episcopal church. These include "Jewish Antiquities" (1886); "Biography of Old Testament Characters" (1869); "Biography of New Testament Characters" (1871); "Catechism on the Doctrines, Usages, and Holy Days of the P. E. Church" (1871); and "Old Testament Stories" (1882). There are memorial windows of Mrs. Weston in St. Mark's church, New York, and in Grace church, Madison, N. J.

WESTON, Sullivan Hardy, clergyman, b. in Bristol, Me., 7 Oct., 1816; d. in New York city, 14 Oct., 1887. He was graduated at Wesleyan university in 1841, was ordained deacon in Trinity church, New York city, in 1847, and priest in the same church in 1852. His ministerial life was passed in Trinity parish, of which he was an assistant minister, in special charge of St. John's chapel. He was elected bishop of Texas in 1852, but declined the office. He served as chaplain to the 7th New York regiment, and accompanied that regiment to Washington, in 1861, at the opening of the civil war, and again when the regiment volunteered in the summer of 1863. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by Columbia in 1861.

WESTON, Thomas, adventurer, b. in England about 1575; d. in England after 1624. He was a successful merchant in London, and went to Leyden about 1619-'20 to negotiate with the merchants of New Amsterdam with regard to the proposed emigration of a colony to northern Virginia. For some reason the Pilgrims showed deference to his advice, and articles of agreement with the London merchants were drawn up, embodying conditions that were proposed by Weston. He advised them to rely neither upon the Dutch nor the Virginia company, assured them that he and others were ready to supply ships and money for such an enterprise, and reminded them that Sir Ferdinando Gorges and others were moving for a new patent in North Virginia, "Unto which," says Bradford, "Mr. Weston and the cheefe of them began to incline it was best for them to goe." A joint-stock company was then formed to continue seven years, with shares of ten pounds each, and John Carver and Robert Cushman were sent to England to collect subscriptions and to make preparations. Cushman conceded certain alterations in the agreement to please the "merchant adventurers," whose part in the scheme was indispensable. About seventy merchants engaged in the enterprise. The latter, having received glowing and deceptive accounts of the English colonists from Capt. John Smith, looked upon them as convenient instruments for the establishment of a permanent trading-post in the new country. But as time passed and the Plymouth people sent little or nothing to their English partners, Weston charged them with employing their time in arguing and consulting when they should have been trading, and sold out his interest in the company. He then organized an expedition of his own, and during the winter of 1621-'2 was busy in London gathering his company, which was made of the roughest material. Before sending out the main body he despatched a small party in the "Sparrow" to the fishing-grounds off the coast of Maine, whence they skirted the shore to Cape Ann, crossed to Boston harbor, and thence to Plymouth. The main body of sixty men, described by Weston as being "rude and profane," arrived in the "Charity," of 100 tons, and the "Swan," of 30 tons, landed at Plymouth in June, 1622, and remained there for two months, consuming the scanty stores, which they did nothing to increase. Weston's brother-in-law, Richard Greene, the leader of this party, died during the summer, and was succeeded in command by one Saunders. Finally this body determined to establish a separate colony at Wicaguscussett, or Wessagussett (now Weymouth), near Boston, Mass. The colonists became almost at once idle, profligate, and corrupt, and in the extremity of want were objects of contempt for the Indians, whose aggressions they dared not resent, and who determined to exterminate them. Fearful that such an act would be avenged by the Plymouth colonists, the savages decided to fall upon that settlement also; but, before this plan was executed, Miles Standish marched to Wessagussett, killed the chiefs Pecksnut and Wituwamat, and took with him to Plymouth part of the wretched colony, which was then broken up. Weston arrived soon after its dispersion, and a few months later, in 1623, Robert Gorges, who had been commissioned lieutenant-governor, came to Plymouth to look after his grant of land. After exercising his authority, he left suddenly for the coast of Maine in search of Weston, whom he proposed to call to account for his various trading misdemeanors, and, meeting him on the way thither, engaged in a heated discussion. Returning to Wessagussett, Gorges sent a warrant to Plymouth for the seizure of Weston's vessel and his immediate arrest, proposing to put him upon trial to answer for the ill conduct of his men at the settlement, whereby the peace of the whole country had been endangered. Weston argued that he could not be held responsible for acts done by others in his absence, and could not answer the other charges against him. Gov. Bradford and his associates, remembering the service that Weston had rendered them, convinced Gorges that nothing could be gained by prosecuting him. His vessel was then restored to him, with some compensation for its seizure, and, being allowed to depart in peace, he went to Virginia. The patent of Gorges gave him a vague title to all the main-land known as Massachusetts, and he therefore absorbed Wessagussett, landed his stores, and built warehouses on the site chosen by Weston in September, 1623. In the following spring he returned to England, and the people dispersed, but it is thought that a few colonists remained in Weymouth.

WETHERALL, Sir George Augustus, British soldier, b. in Penton, Hampshire, England, in 1788; d. in Sandhurst, England, 8 April, 1868. He was the son of Gen. Sir Frederick Wetherall, was educated in the senior department of the Royal military college, and entered the army in 1803. He served as brigade-major at the Cape of Good Hope in 1807, took part in the conquest of Java as aide-de-camp to his father, from 1822 till 1825 was military secretary to the commander-in-chief of Madras, and in 1826 was appointed deputy judge-advocate-general in India. He served in Canada during the insurrection of 1837-'8, defeated the rebels at St. Charles and Point Oliver, and for his services was made a companion of the Order of the Bath. He was deputy adjutant-general in Canada from 1843 till 1850, when he was appointed to that office at the Horse Guards, London. In 1854 he was made adjutant-general, which post he held till in 1860 he took command of the northern district. At the expiration of his services in 1865 he was appointed governor of the Royal military college at Sandhurst. He became colonel of the 84th regiment in 1854, was knighted in 1856, made a lieutenant-general in 1857, and a G. C. B. in 1865. In recognition of his services in suppressing the rebellion the inhabitants of Montreal presented Gen. Wetherall with a piece of plate.

WETHERILL, Charles Mayer, chemist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 4 Nov., 1825; d. in South Bethlehem, Pa., 5 March, 1871. He was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1845, and then worked for a year at practical chemistry in the laboratory of James C. Booth in Philadelphia. In 1847 he went abroad and studied for eight months at the College de France in Paris, after which he followed organic chemistry under Justus von Liebig at the University of Giessen, where he received the degree of Ph. D. in 1848. During 1849-'52 he was occupied in chemical investigations at his private laboratory in Philadelphia, and gave a course of lectures on chemistry before the Franklin institute. Subsequently he held no public office until his appointment as chemist to the agricultural department in Washington, where he remained for about a year. In 1866 he was chosen to the professorship of chemistry in Lehigh university, which chair he filled until his death. His chemical books were bequeathed to the library of that institution. The honorary degree of M. D. was conferred on him by the New York medical college in 1853. Dr. Wetherill was a member of the American philosophical society and other scientific bodies here and abroad. His investigations are described in forty papers in the "Journal of the Franklin Institute," "American Journal of Science," and in the transactions of societies of which he was a member. His only systematic treatise was on "The Manufacture of Vinegar" (Philadelphia, 1860).

WETHERILL, Samuel, manufacturer, b. in Burlington, N. J., 12 Oct., 1736; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 24 Sept., 1816. His family came to New Jersey from England in 1682, and his ancestor, Christopher, gave to the Quakers the land on which their first meeting-house in Burlington, N. J., was erected. In early life Samuel settled in Philadelphia as a house-carpenter and builder, but afterward he entered business, and was the first manufacturer of cloth, jean, and fustian in Philadelphia. He also engaged in dyeing, fulling, and in the manufacture of chemicals, and subsequently was the first in the United States to make white lead. Toward the close of his life he abandoned his business, except the manufacture of drugs and chemicals. During the war of 1812 his firm determined to undersell foreign merchants whose goods were imported to the ruin of its business. In this it was successful; but in 1813 the establishment on Twelfth near Race street, Philadelphia, was burned, it is believed, by enemies to the manufactory. At the time of the Revolution he actively supported the cause of independence, supplying clothing gratuitously to Washington's army at Valley Forge when it was most needed; he joined with some other Quakers in military service in the defence of Philadelphia. For these actions and for taking the oath of allegiance to the United States he was disowned or excommunicated by the Quaker meeting of which he was a member. In February, 1781, several of the Quakers who had been disowned for similar causes joining with him, he founded an independent Friends' meeting, called the Society of Free Quakers, which is a society believing in defensive war, hence sometimes called "Fighting" Quakers. This society, which still exists, denies the right of excommunication for any cause. Mr. Wetherill was clerk or presiding officer of this meeting from its foundation until 1810, was a popular preacher until his death, and numbered among his audience many persons of distinction. He was instrumental in raising a large sum of money for building the Free Quaker meeting-house, obtaining the subscriptions of Benjamin Franklin, Robert Morris, John Cadwalader, and others of note. He published several short theological tracts in defence of the society. These are remarkable for their ability and forcible expression, but have long been out of print, and are extremely rare. The principal one is "An Apology for the Religious Society of Free Quakers in the City of Philadelphia, showing that all Churches who excommunicate act inconsistently with the Gospel of Jesus."—His great-grandson, Samuel, inventor, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 27 May, 1821, is the son of John Price Wetherill, who was vice-president of the Academy of natural sciences in his native city in 1834-'53. In 1850 Samuel began to experiment with the newly discovered product of zinc ores, and to determine whether this could be substituted for white lead as a paint. His experiments led to his engagement with the New Jersey zinc company in 1850-'2, and in the latter year he invented the "furnace process," which consists in reducing mixed coal and ore by the direct action of heat and a cold blast upon a furnace-bed having small holes, each producing the reducing flame. Subsequently he invented the tower process of separating the solid impurities, in which the velocity of the fan-attachment, which impels the products into the collecting bags, lifts the white zinc seventy feet into a tower, leaving the ashes at the base. This was afterward improved by Mr. Wetherill by causing the products thus treated to pass through a film of water. In March, 1853, with Charles J. Gilbert and several New York capitalists, he entered into a contract for forming the Pennsylvania and Lehigh zinc company, and he erected works under his patents, in Bethlehem, Pa., to reduce the zinc ores in Lehigh county. These works went into operation on 13 Oct., 1853, when the first "zinc white" made in the United States was manufactured by Wetherill's process in combination with the bag process of collecting that was previously invented by Samuel T. Jones. The works were conducted by Gilbert and Wetherill in 1853-'7, and in that time delivered 4,725 tons of white oxide of zinc. In 1854-'9 he conducted a series of experiments for the manufacture of spelter, the first spelter from the Lehigh ores being made by him in 1854 by passing the vapor of oxide of zinc through a bed of incandescent coal in a muffle-furnace. Afterward he experimented with vertical retorts, which he patented, and his services were procured for the manufacture of metallic zinc at Bethlehem under the Pennsylvania and Lehigh zinc company. In 1857 he sent an ingot of his spelter to a firm of sheet-iron rollers, and they returned to him the first sheet of zinc that was rolled from metal extracted from Pennsylvania ores. At the beginning of the civil war Mr. Wetherill recruited a squadron for the 11th Pennsylvania cavalry, and entered service as captain on 19 Aug., 1861. He became major on 1 Oct., 1861, and was mustered out on 30 Sept., 1864. He was brevetted lieutenant-colonel, U. S. volunteers, on 13 March, 1865.—The second Samuel's brother, John Price, manufacturer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 4 Aug., 1824; d. there, 17 Sept., 1888, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1844, and engaged in the manufacture of white lead until 1878. He was identified with the commercial interests of Philadelphia, was one of the oldest members of the board of trade, of which he was for several years president, was a member of the Centennial board of finance, and a director of the American steamship company and of the Pennsylvania railroad company from 1874 till 1888. Mr. Wetherill was a member of the Constitutional convention of Pennsylvania in 1872, and was instrumental in introducing many reforms.

WETMORE, James, clergyman, b. in Middletown, Conn., 25 Dec., 1695; d. in Rye, N. Y., 15 May, 1760. After graduation at Yale in 1714 he studied theology, and in November, 1718, was ordained minister over the 1st Congregational society in New Haven. In September, 1722, he declared himself converted to the Episcopal church, but retained his office for several months. He went to England in 1723, was ordained in the Chapel royal, St. James's, London, on 25 July of that year, was appointed a missionary of the Society for propagating the gospel in foreign parts, and, returning to New York, was catechist and assistant to the Rev. William Vesey in Trinity church. Afterward he became missionary to Rye, a charge that included the villages of White Plains, Mamaroneck, North Castle, and Bedford, besides missionary labors in Connecticut. Here he served from 1726 until his death. He was spoken of as "a gentleman of extensive usefulness; a father and exemplary pattern to the clergy in those parts." He published several pamphlets, including "A Letter to a Parishioner" (New York, 1730); "Quakerism, a Judicial Infatuation represented in Three Dialogues" (1731); "A Letter from a Minister of the Church of England to his Dissenting Parishioners, showing the Necessity of Unity and Peace and the Dangerous Consequences of separating from the Established Episcopal Church" (1732); "Eleutherius Enervatus: or an Answer to a Pamphlet by Jonathan Dickinson intitled 'The Divine Right of Presbyterian Ordination'" (1733); "A Vindication of the Professors of the Church of England in Connecticut against the Invectives contained in a Sermon by Noah Hobart" (Boston, 1747); and other polemical discourses.—His son, TIMOTHY, became attorney-general of New Brunswick.

WETMORE, Prosper Montgomery, author, b. in Stratford, Conn., 14 Feb., 1798; d. in Great Neck, Long Island, N. Y., 16 March, 1876. He removed with his parents to New York city, and after the death of his father was placed in a counting-house. Afterward he engaged in business and entered into partnership with his brother Robert in the dry-goods trade. He joined the 11th regiment of state militia in 1819, was made major in 1824, and colonel in 1826, held several posts on the staff of the governor, and at one time was brigade-inspector. In 1845-'9 he was navy-agent, and for many years he was paymaster-general of the state militia. In 1834-'5 he served in the legislature, was chairman of the committee on colleges and academies, and advocated the bill to establish the school-district libraries. He became a regent of the University of New York in 1833, was president of the American art union until 1850, was chosen secretary of the New York chamber of commerce in 1843, and vice-president in 1849. He also aided in establishing a line of steamships to Nicaragua. He was a founder of the Union defence committee in April, 1861, and was its secretary until the close of the war. Gen. Wetmore began to write for magazines and annuals at the age of seventeen, and was at one time connected with the "New York Mirror." He was a popular speaker, and in 1832 he recited a poem, "Ambition," before a literary society of Hamilton college. He published "Lexington, with other Fugitive Poems" (New York, 1830); "Observations on the War with Mexico" (1847); and an edition of the "Poems of James Nack," with a biographical notice (1838).

WHALLEY, Edward, regicide, b. in England about 1620; d. in Hadley, Mass., about 1678. He became a merchant, and at the beginning of the revolution of 1642 joined the parliamentary party, against the wishes of his family, who were royalists. At Naseby, in 1645, his command defeated two divisions of Sir Marmaduke Langdale's cavalry, and for bravery he was made a colonel by parliament. He led the horse at Bristol, Banbury, Worcester, and elsewhere, and was afterward intrusted with the custody of the king's person at Hampton court. He commanded the infantry with Gen. George Monk at Dunbar, where two horses were shot under him, and was afterward left by Cromwell in Scotland with four regiments. He sat in the high court of justice that condemned King Charles, and was a signer of his death-warrant. Afterward, as major-general, he governed five counties, and after sitting in Cromwell's second and third parliaments was given a seat in his house of lords. After the restoration he fled to this country with William Goffe (q. v.), his son-in-law, and shared his fortunes from that time. See "History of Three of the Judges of King Charles I.," by Ezra Stiles (Hartford, 1794).

WHAREY, James, clergyman, b. in Rutherford county, N. C., 15 June, 1789; d. in Goochland county, Va., 29 April, 1842. He entered Hampden Sidney college, where he remained for five years, teaching to obtain means to pursue his education. He was licensed to preach in 1818, and began his ministry in Amherst and Nelson counties, spending a part of his time as principal of an academy. In 1819 he made a missionary tour in Virginia, and afterward he was chaplain of Hampden Sidney for a year. In 1822 he held a charge in Cartersville, Va., and in 1824 he was made pastor of the churches of Bird and Providence in Goochland county, Va., where he served until his death. He published a series of articles in the "Southern Religious Telegraph" on "Baptism," and "Sketches of Church History from the Birth of Christ to the Nineteenth Century," both of which afterward appeared in book-form. Of the latter a new edition was published (Philadelphia, 1850).

WHARTON, Charles Henry, clergyman, b. in St. Mary's county, Md., 5 June, 1748; d. in Burlington, N. J., 22 July, 1833. The family plantation, called Notley Hall, was presented to his grandfather by Lord Baltimore. In 1760 he was sent to the English Jesuits' college at St. Omer's, where he was very studious, and acquired the Latin tongue with such proficiency as to converse in it. He was ordered deacon in June, 1772, and priest the following September, both in the Roman Catholic church. At the close of the American Revolution he resided at Worcester, England, as chaplain to the Roman Catholics in that city. There he addressed a poetical epistle to Gen. Washington, with a sketch of his life, which was published for the benefit of American prisoners in England (Annapolis, 1779; London, 1780). He returned to this country in 1783 in the first vessel that sailed after the peace. In May, 1784, having adopted the views of the Church of England, he published his celebrated "Letter to the Roman Catholics of Worcester" (Philadelphia, 1784), and became rector of Immanuel church, New Castle, Del. At the general convention of 1785 he was on the committee to "draft an ecclesiastical constitution for the Protestant Episcopal church in the United States," also on the committee "to prepare a form of prayer and thanksgiving for the Fourth of July," and that to Americanize the "Book of Common Prayer." In 1786 he was elected a member of the American philosophical society. After ten years' further residence in Delaware, he became, in 1798, rector of St. Mary's church, Burlington, N. J. In 1801 he accepted the presidency of Columbia college, New York, assuming the position at the commencement; but he recalled his acceptance and returned to his rectorship in Burlington, which he held till his death in 1833. He was always president of the standing committee of the diocese and a deputy to the general convention, and among the first in scholarship and influence of the clergy of his church in the United States. The testimony of his contemporaries and his numerous publications pronounced him an accomplished divine, a gifted poet, and an able controversialist. At the time of his decease he was the senior presbyter of the Protestant Episcopal church. Besides the works already mentioned, he published "Reply to an Address [by Bishop Carroll] to the Roman Catholics of the United States" (Philadelphia, 1785); "Inquiry into the Proofs of the Divinity of Christ" (1796); and "Concise View of the Principal Points of Controversy between the Protestant and Roman Churches" (New York, 1817). In 1813-'14 he was co-editor, with Rev. Dr. Abercrombie, of the "Quarterly Theological Magazine and Religious Repository." His "Remains," with a memoir, were published by Bishop George W. Doane (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1834).

WHARTON, Gabriel Caldwell, soldier, b. in Springfield, Washington co., Ky., 13 June, 1839; d. in Louisville, Ky., 22 Feb., 1887. He was the son of a farmer, and was educated at the public schools, the academy of his native town, and the law department of Louisville university. In 1860, at the age of twenty-one, he began the practice of law at Springfield with immediate success. The next year, at the opening of the civil war, he enlisted in the 10th Kentucky infantry in the U. S. volunteer army, and in November was commissioned major of that regiment. With the regiment, Major Wharton shared in the engagements and marches of the Army of the Cumberland, and in March, 1863, was promoted to be lieutenant-colonel. He commanded and bore a gallant part in the battles of Chickamauga and Missionary Ridge and the engagements of the Atlanta campaign in 1864, until, at the expiration of his three years' service, he was mustered out. He then resumed his law-practice at Louisville, and in 1866 was appointed assistant U. S. attorney for the district of Kentucky. On the appointment of Benjamin H. Bristow as secretary of the treasury, Col. Wharton succeeded to the district attorneyship, holding that office for ten years. In 1880 he opened an office in Washington, and, after two years' practice there, spent some time in Mexico in the interest of a railroad company. Returning, after a year's absence, he resided in New York city, where he soon had a lucrative practice. He was on a visit to Louisville when he died while alone in his room at a hotel.

WHARTON, Jesse, senator, b. in Albemarle county, Va., about 1760; d. in Nashville, Tenn., 22 July, 1833. He was educated in his native state, adopted the profession of law, and settled in Tennessee. He served in congress in 1807-'9, and in the U. S. senate in 1814-'15, having been appointed by the governor to fill the place of George W. Campbell, who had resigned. In 1832 he was one of the board of visitors to the United States military academy at West Point.

WHARTON, Thomas, governor of Pennsylvania, b. in Chester county, Pa., in 1735; d. in Lancaster, Pa., 22 May, 1778. He was the son of John, some time coroner of Chester county, Pa., whose father, Thomas, of Westmoreland, England, emigrated to Pennsylvania about 1683, served in the Philadelphia common council in 1713-'18, and was the founder of the Wharton family of Philadelphia. Thomas became a merchant, was for a time a partner of Anthony Stocker, and was highly esteemed for his virtue and patriotism. On the passage of the stamp-act he took a resolute stand on the side of the opposition, and his name, with that of his grandfather and other members of the family, was among the first that were affixed to the non-importation resolutions and agreements of 1765. When the news of the closing of the Boston harbor reached Philadelphia a public meeting was held on 20 May, 1774, and Thomas Wharton was chosen a member of the committee of correspondence. On 22 June, 1774, he was placed on a committee with Joseph Reed and John Nixon to request the speaker of the assembly to summon its members to meet on 1 Aug. and consult on public affairs. He was a deputy to the convention that was called by patriotic citizens of Philadelphia, to meet on 15 July, 1774, and was one of the twenty-five citizens that formed the committee of safety in 1775. On 24 July, 1776, he became president of the council of safety, in which the executive authority of the government was temporarily vested, and in 1777 he was elected president of Pennsylvania, which office he held till his death. He was inaugurated on 5 March, with much display, and under the title of "His Excellency Thomas Wharton, junior, esquire, president of the supreme executive council of Pennsylvania, captain-general and commander-in-chief in and over the same." During the Revolution he discharged his duties with ability and success. He owned a country-seat called "Twickenham" in Montgomery county. He removed to Lancaster with the executive council on the British occupation of Philadelphia, died there, and was buried with military honors. At the request of the vestry of the Evangelical Trinity church, of Lancaster, Pa., his body was interred within the walls of that edifice.—His brother, John, was a member of the Continental navy board in 1778-'80, and built two ships, the "Experiment" and the "Washington," for the Pennsylvania navy.—Thomas's uncle, Joseph, merchant, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 4 Aug., 1707; d. there in July, 1776, was a successful merchant, and the owner of "Walnut Grove," a country place on Fifth street, near Washington avenue, Philadelphia, on which the Mischianza of 1778 was held. (See HOWE, WILLIAM.) The house, which is shown in the illustration on page 448, was the finest of its day near that city. It was torn down in 1862, to make room for a school-house. Joseph Wharton was called "Duke Wharton," because of his stately bearing.—Joseph's son, Samuel, merchant, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 3 May, 1732; d. there in March, 1800, was a partner in the house of Baynton Wharton and Morgan. At one time the Indians destroyed nearly £40,000 worth of goods, and as indemnification the chiefs of the Six Nations made over to the firm a large tract of land at the treaty of Fort Stanwix. The land bordered on Ohio river above the Little Kanawha, and included about one fourth of the present state of West Virginia. To this grant the traders gave the name of Indiana. Mr. Wharton was sent by the firm to England to solicit confirmation of this grant, in which he so far succeeded that a day was appointed for him to attend court. Some of his correspondence with Benjamin Franklin having been discovered in the mean time, he was obliged to fly for his life, and reaching France, was joined by Dr. Franklin. In 1780 he returned to Philadelphia. He was a member of the city councils, of the committee of safety of the Revolution, of the colonial and state legislatures, and of the Ohio company, whose plan of forming a settlement on Ohio river was projected by Sir William Johnson, Gov. Franklin, and others. On 9 Feb., 1781, he took the oath of allegiance to the state, and he was a member of the Continental congress in 1782-'3. In 1784 he was chosen a justice of the peace for the district of Southwark, in which suburb he owned a country-seat.—Another son of Joseph, Joseph, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 21 March, 1733; d. there, 25 Dec., 1816, went to England about 1775, and while there wrote a number of letters on the attitude of Great Britain to the colonies. Some of these were published in the "Pennsylvania Journal," others in British journals, and attracted so much attention that when their authorship was discovered Wharton was forced to leave the country, and fled to France. During his residence abroad he was much with Benjamin West, and it is said that the suggestion that West's painting of "Christ Healing the Sick" should be given to the Pennsylvania hospital in Philadelphia was made by him. He corresponded with West regarding the removal of the picture to the hospital, which was accomplished in 1817.—Another son of Joseph, Robert, mayor of Philadelphia, b. in Philadelphia, 12 Jan., 1757; d. there, 7 March, 1834, at an early age left his studies, and was apprenticed to a hatter. He entered the counting-house of his brother Charles, a merchant of Philadelphia, but spent much of his time in out-door sports, and until 1818 was president of the famous fox-hunting club of Gloucester that was organized in 1766. In 1790 he became a member of the Schuylkill fishing company, of which he was governor from 1812 till 1828. He was a member of city councils from 1792 till 1795. In 1796 he was made alderman of Philadelphia, and in that year quelled a riot among the sailors, who had organized themselves into a body and demanded exorbitant wages. After reading the riot act he requested them to disperse, and, being received with shouts of defiance, Mr. Wharton ordered each of his men "to take his man," and the sailors were captured and imprisoned. He quelled the Walnut street prison riot in 1798, and also took part in suppressing others. He was fifteen times elected mayor of Philadelphia between 1798 and 1834. He became a member of the first city troop in 1798, captain in 1803, colonel of the regiment of cavalry in 1810, and was elected brigadier-general of the state militia. He was vice-president of the Washington benevolent society, of which he was an original member.—Robert's brother, Franklin, soldier, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 23 July, 1767; d. in New York, 1 Sept., 1818, was appointed colonel commandant of the U. S. marine corps under the administration of James Madison. Col. Wharton was intrusted with the management of an armory in Washington, D. C., in which small arms that belonged to the navy and marine corps were kept in readiness for service.—Gov. Thomas's grandson, Philip Fishbourne, artist, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 30 April, 1841; d. in Media, Pa., 28 July, 1880, studied at the Pennsylvania academy of fine arts, and afterward in Paris and Dresden. His best-known pictures are "Perdita," which received a medal at the Centennial exhibition of 1876, "Eventide," "Uncle Jim," "Over the Hills and Far Away," and "Waiting for the Parade." He also painted many water-colors, chiefly scenes in Florida and Nassau.—The first Joseph's grandson, Thomas Isaac, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 17 May, 1791; d. there, 7 April, 1856, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1807, studied law in the office of his uncle, William Rawle, was admitted to the bar, and acquired reputation in his profession and as a reporter of the Pennsylvania supreme court. He served as captain of infantry in the war of 1812. He was a trustee of the University of Pennsylvania in 1837-'56, and a member of various philosophical and historical societies. With Joel Jones and William Rawle (q. v.) he revised the civil code of Pennsylvania in 1830. He edited, with copious notes, the 3d edition of Alexander J. Dallas's "Reports of Cases in the Courts of the United States and Pennsylvania before and since the Revolution" (4 vols., Philadelphia, 1830), and was associated with Thomas Sargeant and others in editing the "Law Library" (1833), and with Henry Wheaton in editing the 5th American edition of William Selwyn's "Abridgment of the Law of Nisi Prius" (1839). He was the author of "Digest of Cases in the Circuit Court of the United States, Third District, and in the Courts of Pennsylvania" (Philadelphia, 1822; 6th ed., including "A. Harris's Reports," 2 vols., 1853); "Digested Index to the Reported Decisions of the Several Courts of Law in the Western and Southern States" (1824); "Reports of Cases in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania" (6 vols., 1836-'41); "Letter on the Right and Power of the City of Philadelphia to Subscribe for Stock in the Pennsylvania Railroad Company" (1846); and various addresses and memoirs, including one on William Rawle, LL. D. (1840). He also contributed to Dennie's "Portfolio," and was an editor of the "Analectic Magazine."—Thomas Isaac's son, Francis, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 7 March, 1820; d. in Washington, D. C., 21 Feb., 1889, was graduated at Yale in 1839, studied law, practised in Philadelphia for fifteen years, and was assistant attorney-general in 1845. From 1856 till 1863 he was professor of logic and rhetoric in Kenyon college, Ohio, but he was ordained in the Protestant Episcopal church in 1863, and became rector of St. Paul's church in Brookline, Mass. He was also professor of ecclesiastical and international law in the Cambridge divinity-school, and in Boston. In 1885 he was appointed solicitor for the department of state, and examiner of international claims, in which office he continued, and later he was appointed, under a resolution of congress, editor of the Revolutionary diplomatic correspondence of the United States. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Kenyon college in 1883, and that of LL. D. by Kenyon in 1865 and by the University of Edinburgh in 1883. He was a member of various institutions of international and municipal law. With Charles E. Lex he edited the "Episcopal Recorder" in Philadelphia, and he contributed to periodicals. He edited several volumes of law reports, and was the author of "A Treatise on the Criminal Law of the United States" (Philadelphia, 1846; 6th ed., 3 vols., 1868); "The State Trials of the United States during the Administrations of Washington and Adams" (1849); "Precedents of Indictments and Pleas adapted to the Use both of the Courts of the United States and those of the Several States" (1849; 2d ed., 1857); "A Treatise on the Law of Homicide in the United States" (1855); "A Treatise on Medical Jurisprudence," with Dr. Moreton Stillé (1855; 2d ed., with additions by Alfred Stillé, 1860); "Treatise on Theism and Modern Skeptical Theories" (1859); "The Silence of Scripture, a Series of Lectures" (1867); "A Treatise on the Conflict of Laws" (Philadelphia, 1872); "The Law of Agency and Agents" (1876); and a "Digest of International Law" (1886).—Another son of Thomas, Henry, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 2 June, 1827; d. there, 11 Nov., 1880, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1846, studied law under his father, and was admitted to the bar in 1849. In 1856 he became solicitor to the Philadelphia saving fund, and he was one of the three lawyers, including Eli K. Price and Edward Olmstead, whose opinions upon real estate were considered equivalent to a judgment of the supreme court. He was legal adviser of the Philadelphia bank and other corporations. With Asa J. Fish he edited the "American Law-Register," from 1852 till 1863, and wrote a "Practical and Elementary Treatise on the Law of Vicinage" (Philadelphia, 1868).—Thomas Isaac's nephew, Joseph, manufacturer, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 3 March, 1826. His mother, Deborah Fisher (1795-1888), was an approved minister of the Society of Friends for seventy years, belonging to the branch that has been called Hicksite. She was active in charities and an interested friend to the Indians, defending their rights in Washington and visiting their reservations. After receiving a good education in his native city, the son entered a mercantile house, and afterward engaged in the manufacture of white lead and paints, bricks, copper-mining and spelter, became owner of iron, glass, and steel-works, and has been a director in manufacturing, railroad, and banking corporations. He was among the first to establish the manufacture of spelter, nickel, and cobalt in this country, and was the first to make magnetic needles of other substance than steel. He aided in establishing the Bethlehem iron company, particularly its steel-forging plant for government work. Mr. Wharton owns the deposits of nickel ore in Lancaster county, Pa., which he purchased in 1873, and established his works in Camden, N. J. He early experimented to produce nickel in a pure and malleable condition, so that it could be worked like iron, and was the first to attain practical success in this direction. He sent to the Centennial exhibition of 1876, and to the Paris exposition of 1878, samples of nickel ores, nickel-matte, metallic nickel in grains and cubes, cast and wrought nickel, cast cobalt, and electro-plating with nickel and cobalt, which illustrated the progress in the metallurgical development of this substance, and excited much admiration. Mr. Wharton aided in establishing Swarthmore college, of which he is president of the board of trustees, endowing its chair of history and political economy, and also founded the Wharton school of finance and economy in the University of Pennsylvania. He is a member of the Society of Friends. Mr. Wharton has published several pamphlets on the subject of protection to home industry.—Henry's son, Thomas Isaac, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 1 Aug., 1859, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1879, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and is the author of "A Latter-Day Saint" (New York, 1884), and "Hannibal of New York" (1886).—The first Joseph's descendant, Anne Hollingsworth, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., about 1845, has published "The Wharton Family" (Philadelphia, 1880); "Vigilia"; and "St. Bartholomew's Eve."

WHATCOAT, Richard, M. E. bishop, b. in the parish of Quinton, Gloucester co., England, 23 Feb., 1736; d. in Dover, Del., 4 July, 1806. His parents were members of the Church of England, but when he was twenty-two years of age he accepted Methodist views. Until he was thirty-three years of age he continued in business, and was a useful member of the Wesleyan connection. In July, 1769, he became a minister, and was very successful, having great ability in composing difficulties, but in 1784 John Wesley sent him to the United States as a missionary with Thomas Coke. Coke and Wesley ordained him a presbyter, an act on Wesley's part that occasioned much discussion. When he came to this country he was forty-six years of age, and was a marvellous preacher, able to move an audience, according to the testimony of Adam Clark, "as the leaves of a forest are moved by a mighty wind." His contemporaries attributed his strength chiefly to his supreme devotion. In the year 1800 he was elected bishop. After several years of infirmity, he died at the house of ex-Gov. Richard Bassett, of Delaware. Bishop Francis Asbury said of him: "A man so uniformly good I have not known in Europe or America."

WHEAT, John Thomas, clergyman, b. in Washington, D. C., 15 Nov., 1800; d. in Salisbury, N. C., 2 Feb., 1888. He was educated at Asbury college, Baltimore, and established a private school in Washington. Having devoted himself to the study of theology, he was ordained deacon in Alexandria, and in the following year at Baltimore he was made a priest. He was instrumental in founding an Episcopal church at Marietta, Ohio, afterward went to North Carolina, and subsequently to Tennessee, and for twenty years labored in Nashville and Memphis. He was also for a time in Arkansas. He held various positions of influence in the annual conventions of the church, and in 1845 was given the degree of D. D. by the University of Nashville. He was an intimate friend of Henry Clay. His book on "Preparation for the Holy Communion" (New York, 1860) won a high reputation in the religious world.

WHEATLEY, Charles Moore, mineralogist, b. in Essex, England, 16 March, 1822; d. in Phoenixville, Pa., 6 May, 1882. He came to this country when a boy, was educated in New York city, and, entering mercantile life in 1835, continued so engaged until 1845. Mr. Wheatley became in 1837 a member of the Mercantile library, was a director in 1841-'3, and served as recording secretary in 1844-'5. He then turned his attention to mining, and in 1846 became manager of the Bristol copper-mine in Connecticut, whence in 1848 he was called to a similar place at the Perkiomen copper-mine in Pennsylvania. From 1850 till 1857 he was general manager and part owner of the Wheatley silver-lead mines, which he discovered and opened. Subsequently he mined in Pennsylvania and in California, but finally settled in Phoenixville, Pa., where he established the Schuylkill copper works and was the first person successfully to reduce copper-ores. Mr. Wheatley was an active collector, and gathered a valuable library of books in geology and mineralogy. He also accumulated a collection of more than 6,000 minerals and shells, valued at $25,000, which was purchased by Edward C. Delavan and given to Union college to be kept as the Wheatley cabinets, forever subject to the control of the University of New York. Later he made an extensive collection of fresh-water shells. At the World's fair held in New York in 1853 he exhibited specimens from the Wheatley mine, plans of the mining operations and drawings of machinery, for which he received one of the two silver medals that were given. He discovered a cave near Port Kennedy, on Schuylkill river, where he found many specimens of fossils, an account of which was read before the American philosophical society in 1871 by Prof. Edward D. Cope, who named one of the species Megalonyx Wheatleyi in his honor. The degree of A. M. was given him by Yale in 1858. He was elected a member of the New York lyceum of natural history in 1840, was its treasurer in 1847-'58, and was connected with other scientific associations both in this country and abroad. He published "Catalogues of the Shells of the United States, with their Localities," one of the first volumes of its kind that were ever published (New York, 1842).

WHEATLEY, Phillis, poet, b. in Africa about 1753; d. in Boston, Mass., 5 Dec., 1784. She was brought here from Africa in 1761, and her only recollection of her early life was that of her heathen mother worshipping the sun at its rising. She was bought from the slave-market by John Wheatley, of Boston, and soon developed remarkable acquisitive faculties. She became a member of his family and was educated by his daughters. In sixteen months from her arrival she could read English fluently, soon learned to write, and also studied Latin. She visited England in 1774, where she was cordially received, and after her return to Boston she corresponded with the Countess of Huntingdon, the Earl of Dartmouth, Rev. George Whitefield, and others, and wrote many poems to her friends. She addressed some lines and a letter to Gen. Washington on 26 Oct., 1775, which were afterward published in the "Pennsylvania Magazine, or American Monthly Museum," for April, 1776. In a reply, under date of 2 Feb., 1776, Gen. Washington writes: "I thank you most sincerely for your polite notice of me in the elegant lines you inclosed; and, however undeserving I may be of such encomium and panegyric, the style and manner exhibit a striking proof of your poetical talents; in honor of which, and as a tribute justly due to you, I would have published the poem had I not been apprehensive that, while I only meant to give the world this new instance of your genius, I might have incurred the imputation of vanity. This, and nothing else, determined me not to give it place in the public prints. If you should ever come to Cambridge, or near headquarters, I shall be happy to see a person so favored by the muses, and to whom Nature has been so liberal and beneficent in her dispensations." A few days before the British evacuated Boston she visited the Revolutionary camp and was received with marked attention by Washington and his officers. Thomas Jefferson said that her verses were beneath criticism. In 1775 the Wheatley family was broken up by death, and, after attempting and failing to support herself, she married in 1778 a colored man named Peters, who, according to different accounts, was a grocer, lawyer, or barber. This marriage proved unhappy, and Peters became reduced in circumstances. During the Revolution they resided in Wilmington, Del., and they afterward returned to Boston, where they lived in wretched poverty. Among the attentions that she received in London was a gift from the lord mayor of a copy of "Paradise Lost," which was sold after her death, and is now in the library of Harvard. Her publications are "An Elegiac Poem on the Death of George Whitefield, Chaplain to the Countess of Huntingdon" (Boston, 1770); "Poems on Various Subjects, Religious and Moral, by Phillis Wheatley, Negro Servant to Mr. John Wheatley, of Boston," to certify which an attestation was addressed to the public and signed by Gov. Thomas Hutchinson, John Hancock, Rev. Samuel Mather, John Wheatley, Andrew Eliot, and others (London, 1773; 2d ed., Albany, 1793; republished as "The Negro Equalled by Few Europeans," 2 vols., Philadelphia, 1801; 2d ed., Walpole, N. H., 1802; 3d ed., with a memoir, Boston, 1834); and "Elegy Sacred to the Memory of Dr. Samuel Cooper" (1784). The "Letters of Phillis Wheatley" were printed privately by Charles Deane from the "Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society" (Boston, 1864).

WHEATLEY, Sarah, actress, b. in St. John, New Brunswick, in 1790; d. in New York city in July, 1854. Her father, whose name was Ross, died when she was two years of age. She made her first appearance in New York at the Park theatre on 12 Nov., 1805, and in 1806 married Frederick Wheatley, an actor, and retired from the stage; but on his failure in business she resumed her profession for the support of her family and achieved success. Mrs. Wheatley was noted for her artistic representation of old women.—Her son, William, actor, b. in New York city, 5 Dec., 1816; d. there, 3 Nov., 1876, made his first appearance on the stage at the Park theatre, New York, in 1826 as Albert in "William Tell," during the engagement of Macready, with whom he travelled through the United States. In 1842 he was engaged at the Walnut street theatre in Philadelphia, and in 1843 he retired and visited Nicaragua, where he raised the first American flag in Virgin bay. He returned to the United States, and in 1853 leased, with John Drew, the Arch street theatre in Philadelphia, of which he was sole manager in 1855-'8. Afterward he controlled the Continental theatre in Philadelphia, and leased Niblo's Garden, New York, of which he was manager from 1865 till he retired in 1868. During this period the "Black Crook" was first produced. Mr. Wheatley's best characters were Doricourt in "The Belle's Stratagem," Rover in "Wild Oats," Captain Absolute in "The Rivals," and Claude Melnotte in "The Lady of Lyons."

WHEATON, Frank, soldier, b. in Providence, R. I., 8 May, 1833. He was educated in common schools, became a civil engineer, and engaged in California and in the Mexican boundary surveys from 1850 till he was commissioned 1st lieutenant in the 1st U. S. cavalry, 3 March, 1855. He served at Jefferson barracks, Mo., and in Kansas until 1856, and in the field against Cheyenne Indians till 1857, being in action near Fort Kearny, Neb. He was on the Utah expedition till August, 1858, on duty with his regiment in the Indian territory, and then on recruiting service till July, 1861, having been promoted captain in March. He received permission to accept the commission of lieutenant-colonel of the 2d Rhode Island volunteers in July, 1861, became colonel in the same month, and took part in the battle of Bull Run, also serving in the principal engagements of the Army of the Potomac, including the peninsula and Maryland campaigns. He was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers in November, 1862, commanding a brigade during the operations of the same army in 1863-'4, and then a division of the 6th corps, distinguishing himself in the operations in the Shenandoah valley in 1864, and those that culminated in the surrender at Appomattox in 1865. He was brevetted major-general of volunteers for gallant and meritorious services at the Opequan, Fisher's Hill, and Middletown, Va., and received brevets in the regular army to the grade of major-general for the battles of the Wilderness, Cedar Creek, and Petersburg, respectively. He became lieutenant-colonel of the 39th infantry, 28 July, 1866, was transferred to the 21st infantry in March, 1869, and promoted colonel of the 2d infantry, 15 Dec., 1874. Since the war Gen. Wheaton has held commands in Dakota, Montana, and Nebraska. In July, 1866, he was presented with a sword by his native state for gallant services in the above-mentioned battles.

WHEATON, Henry, lawyer, b. in Providence, R. I., 27 Nov., 1785; d. in Dorchester, Mass., 11 March, 1848. He was a descendant of Robert Wheaton, a Baptist clergyman, who emigrated from Swansey, Wales, to Salem, Mass., but subsequently settled in Rhode Island. After graduation at Brown in 1802, Henry studied law under Nathaniel Searle, was admitted to the bar in 1805, and in that year continued his studies in Poitiers and London. On his return to this country he practised law in Providence till he removed in 1812 to New York, where he edited in 1812-'15 the "National Advocate," the organ of the administration party. In this paper he published notable articles on the question of neutral rights in connection with the then existing war with England. On 26 Oct., 1814, he became division judge-advocate of the army, and from 1815 till 1819 he was a justice of the marine court of New York city. From 1816 till 1827 he was reporter for the U. S. supreme court in Washington, D. C., and published "Reports of Cases argued and determined in the Supreme Court of the United States" (12 vols., New York, 1826-'7). This was termed by a German reviewer "the golden book of American law." William B. Lawrence says: "The reputation which Mr. Wheaton acquired as a reporter was unrivalled. He did not confine himself to a mere summary of the able arguments by which the cases were elucidated; but there is scarcely a proposition on any of the diversified subjects to which the jurisdiction of the court extends, that might give rise to serious doubts in the profession, that is not explained not merely by a citation of the authorities adduced by counsel, but copious rules present the views which the publicists and civilians have taken of the question." He was elected a member of the convention to form a new constitution for New York in 1821, was a member of the assembly in 1823, and in 1825 was associated with John Duer and Benjamin F. Butler in a commission to revise the statute law of New York. He also took part in important cases, and was the sole associate of Daniel Webster in that which settled the limits of the state and Federal legislation in reference to bankruptcy and insolvency. In 1827 he was appointed chargé d'affaires in Denmark, being the first diplomatist that was sent to that country from the United States. He served till 1835, displaying skill in the settlement of the Sound dues that were imposed by Denmark on the vessels of all countries, and obtained modifications of the quarantine regulations. He acquired reputation by his researches in the Scandinavian language and literature, and was elected a member of the Scandinavian and Icelandic societies. In 1835 he was appointed resident minister to the court of Prussia, and he was promoted to minister-plenipotentiary in 1837. He soon received full power to conclude a treaty with the Zollverein, which object he pursued for the ensuing six years. On 25 March, 1844, he signed a treaty with Germany, for which he received high commendation from President Tyler and John C. Calhoun, the secretary of state. This was rejected by the U. S. senate, but served as the basis for subsequent treaties. In 1846 he was requested by President Polk to resign his post, but, on his return to the United States in 1847, he was honored by public dinners in New York and Philadelphia, and immediately chosen lecturer on international law at Harvard, which office he was prevented by illness from accepting. He was made a corresponding member of the French institute in 1843, and a member of the Royal academy of Berlin in 1846. Harvard gave him the degree of A. M. in 1825, and he received that of LL. D. from Brown in 1819, from Hamilton in 1843, and from Harvard in 1845. He delivered many addresses before literary societies, among which were those before the New York historical society on the "Science of Public or International Law" (New York, 1820), and at the opening of the New York athenæum, afterward the Society library (1824). His most important work is "Elements of International Law" (Philadelphia, 1836; 2 vols., London, 1836; 3d ed., Philadelphia, 1845; French translation, Leipsic and Paris, 1848). This book was at once acknowledged as a standard authority. At the instance of Anson Burlingame, minister to China, it was translated into Chinese and published at the expense of the imperial government (4 vols., Pekin, 1865). It was also translated into Japanese. The 6th edition, with the last corrections of the author, was published by William Beach Lawrence, with a biographical notice (Boston, 1855). The 8th edition, by Richard H. Dana, Jr., was published with notes (Boston, 1866). The use of Mr. Lawrence's notes in the previous editions resulted in a protracted legal controversy, concerning which see DANA, RICHARD HENRY, vol. ii., page 71. William B. Lawrence's "Commentaire sur les éléments du droit international et sur l'histoire des progrès du droit des gens de Wheaton" was published (4 vols., Leipsic, 1868-'80). Mr. Wheaton's other publications are "Considerations on the Establishment of a Uniform System of Bankrupt Laws throughout the United States" (Washington, 1815); "A Digest of the Decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States from its Establishment in 1789 to 1820" (1820-'9); "Life of William Pinkney," which was also published in Sparks's "American Biography" (1826); "History of the Northmen, or Danes and Normans, from the Earliest Times to the Conquest of England by William of Normandy," which Washington Irving said "evinced throughout the enthusiasm of an antiquarian, the liberality of a scholar, and the enlightened toleration of a citizen of the world" (London, 1831; French translation by Paul Guillet, Paris, 1844); "Histoire du progrès des gens en Europe depuis la paix de Westphalie jusqu'au congrès de Vienne, avec un précis historique du droit des gens européens avant la paix de Westphalie" (Leipsic, 1841), written in unsuccessful competition for a prize offered by the French institute and translated into English by William Beach Lawrence as "A History of the Law of Nations in Europe and America from the Earliest Times to the Treaty of Washington" (New York, 1845); and "An Enquiry into the Validity of the British Claim to a Right of Visitation and Search of American Vessels suspected to be engaged in the Slave-Trade" (Philadelphia and London, 1842; 2d ed., 1858). Mr. Wheaton translated the "Code of Napoleon," but the manuscript was destroyed by fire, and he also contributed numerous political, historical, and literary articles to the "North American Review" and other periodicals. A discourse, "The Value of a Man," was published on his death by the Rev. Edward B. Hall (Providence, 1848).—His son, Robert, author, b. in New York city, 5 Oct., 1826; d. in Providence, R. I., 9 Oct., 1851, spent his early life in Copenhagen and Paris, but left his school in the latter city in 1841 to devote himself to engineering, which he abandoned in 1843, and attended lectures at the Sorbonne and the College de France. In 1847 he came to this country with his father, entered the Harvard law-school, and was admitted to the bar in 1851. He was a skilful musician, and published several able and thoughtful articles in the "North American Review" and other periodicals. "Selections" from his writings were published by his sister, Abby Wheaton, with a memoir (Boston, 1854).

WHEATON, Nathaniel Sheldon, clergyman, b. in Washington, Conn., 20 Aug., 1792; d. in Marbledale, Conn., 18 March, 1862. He was graduated at Yale in 1814, and after residing four years in Maryland, where he was ordained by Bishop Kemp, was elected rector of Christ church, Hartford, Conn. While discharging the duties of this office he took an active interest in the plans for the establishment of a second college in Connecticut, at least one vigorous pamphlet in its defence being from his pen. He was one of the original corporators of Washington (now Trinity) college, and was almost immediately (in 1823) deputed to visit England in the interests of the new institution. He secured donations of books for the library, and made purchases of philosophical apparatus. While abroad he also made a special study of architecture, which enabled him to prepare plans, even to minute details, for the new Christ church in Hartford, which was consecrated in 1829. At the time, perhaps, it was the best specimen of Gothic architecture in the country. On the retirement of Bishop Brownell from the presidency of Washington college in 1831, Dr. Wheaton was chosen his successor. He labored untiringly for the good of the institution, making liberal gifts and securing the endowment of two professorships, besides large additions to the general funds. Under his direction the college campus—the site that is now occupied by the state capitol—was carefully laid out and planted with trees. In 1837 Dr. Wheaton accepted the rectorship of Christ church, New Orleans, La., where he remained seven years, his courage and faithfulness being especially shown in his unremitting attention to his duties while the city was ravaged by the yellow fever. Resigning in 1844, he again visited Europe, and then resided for a short time in Hartford, unable, by reason of feeble health, to undertake regular duties. He soon withdrew to his native town, where he resided for the rest of his life, officiating in different places in the neighborhood as he was able. At his death he left to Trinity college his valuable library, besides a legacy in money, part of which was designated as the nucleus of a chapel fund. The large window in the new chancel of Christ church, Hartford, is in his memory. He received the degree of D. D. from Yale in 1833. The journal of his travels abroad in 1823-'4 was published in one volume (Hartford, 1830), and he also issued "Remarks on Washington College" (anonymous) and a "Discourse on the Epistle to Philemon."

WHEDON, Daniel Denison, author, b. in Onondaga, N. Y., 20 March, 1808; d. in Atlantic Highlands, N. J., 8 June, 1885. After graduation at Hamilton college in 1828 he studied law in Rochester, N. Y., taught in the Conference seminary, Cazenovia, N. Y., in 1830-'1, and was a tutor in Hamilton in 1831-'2. From 1833 till 1843 he was professor of ancient languages and literature in Wesleyan university, Middletown, Conn. In 1836 he was ordained a clergyman in the Methodist Episcopal church, and he held pastorates in Pittsfield, Mass., in 1843-'5, and Jamaica, L. I., in 1855. From 1845 till 1852 he was professor of logic, rhetoric, and history in the University of Michigan, where he served as president of the faculty in 1847-'8. From 1856 till 1884 he was editor of the "Methodist Quarterly Review," and he was also general editor of the publications of the Methodist book concern. The degree of D. D. was conferred on him by Emory and Henry college, Emory, Va., in 1847, and that of LL. D. by Wesleyan university in 1868. In addition to single sermons and contributions to the "Bibliotheca Sacra" and other periodicals, he published "Public Addresses, Collegiate and Popular" (Boston, 1856); "Commentary on Matthew and Mark" (New York, 1860); "The Freedom of the Will, as a Basis of Human Responsibility, elucidated and maintained in its issue with the Necessitarian Theories of Hobbes, Edwards, the Princeton Essayists, and Other Leading Advocates" (1864); "Commentary on the New Testament" intended for popular use (5 vols., 1860-'75); and "Commentary on the Old Testament" (7 vols., 1880-'6). Two additional volumes of his collected writings appeared in 1886.

WHEELER, Andrew Carpenter, journalist, b. in New York, 4 July, 1835. He began his career in journalism as a reporter on the New York "Times," under Henry J. Raymond, but soon afterward went to the west. After several years he settled in Milwaukee, Wis., as city editor of the "Sentinel." Soon after the opening of the civil war he became a war-correspondent for several eastern and western papers. At the close of hostilities he returned to the east and served on the New York "Leader," and then on the "World." With the latter paper he has been connected ever since, excepting an interval of a few years. On the "World" he first adopted the pen-name "Nym Crinkle." He is best known as a dramatic and musical critic, in which capacity he has served on most of the New York papers. He has written "The Chronicles of Milwaukee" (Milwaukee, 1861), and "The Twins," a comedy, which was produced by Lester Wallack in 1862.

WHEELER, Charles Stearns, scholar, b. in Lincoln, Me., 19 Dec., 1816; d. in Leipsic, Germany, 13 June, 1843. He was graduated at Harvard in 1837, served as tutor there in 1838-'42, and in the latter year went to Leipsic to study, but died after eighteen months' residence. He published an edition of Herodotus, with notes that evince remarkable learning (2 vols., Cambridge, Mass., 1843).

WHEELER, David Hilton, clergyman, b. in Ithaca, N. Y., 19 Nov., 1829. He was graduated at Rock River seminary, Mount Morris, Ill., in 1851, was professor of ancient languages in Cornell college, Iowa, in 1853-'5, and assumed the chair of Greek in 1857, which he held till 1861. He edited the "Carroll County Republican" in 1855-'7, and at the same time was county superintendent of public schools. In 1861-'6 he was U. S. consul at Genoa, Italy. He was professor of English literature in Northwestern university in 1867-'75, edited the "Methodist," in New York city, for the subsequent seven years, and became president of Allegheny college, Pa., in 1883, holding office till 1887. Cornell college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1867, and Northwestern university that of LL. D. in 1881. He has written for publication since 1855, is the author of "Brigandage in South Italy" (2 vols., London, 1864), and "By-Ways of Literature" (New York, 1883), and has translated, from the Italian, Ceesia's "Conspiracy of Fieschi" (1866).

WHEELER, Dora, artist, b. in Jamaica, L. I., 12 March, 1858. She is a daughter of Mrs. Candace Wheeler, who is well known for her interest in the development of art needle-work in the United States. She studied with William M. Chase in New York, and William Adolphe Bouguereau and others in Paris. Though devoting herself mainly to decorative designing, she has also painted several pictures. Among these are a series of portraits of English and American authors, including Thomas Bailey Aldrich, James Russell Lowell, Walt Whitman, Charles Dudley Warner, John Burroughs, Austin Dobson, and Walter Besant.

WHEELER, George Montague, soldier, b. in Grafton, Mass., 9 Oct., 1842. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1866, and assigned to the corps of engineers. From October, 1866, till September, 1868, he was assistant engineer on the survey of Point Lobos and vicinity, and in the construction of the defences of Fort Point, San Francisco harbor, Cal. He was promoted 1st lieutenant on 7 March, 1867, and in September, 1868, became engineer on the staff of the commanding general of the Department of California. In 1869 he was sent to make a geographical reconnoissance in central Nevada, and in 1871 he took the field with a force of surveyors and scientists. His organization assumed the title of the "Geographical survey of the territory of the United States west of the 100th meridian," of which he became superintending engineer. Money was annually granted by congress for the continuance of his work, and a large force was regularly employed. This survey had for its primary object the making of geographic maps, but it gave a prominent place to geology, and gathered valuable material in the departments of zoölogy and ethnology. Lieut. Wheeler continued this work until March, 1879, when the survey was abolished and the U. S. geological survey was organized. (See KING, CLARENCE, and POWELL, JOHN W.) Since that time he has been engaged in the preparation of the material that has been gathered, much of which has been published in his annual reports, beginning with 1871, and also in a series of quarto volumes published by the engineer department of the U. S. army. Capt. Wheeler was a delegate to the 3d International conference and exhibition held at Vienna in 1885, concerning which he made a report to the U. S. government. He was promoted captain on 30 March, 1879, and, owing to illness, retired from active service on 15 June, 1888.

WHEELER, John Hill, historian, b. in Murfreesboro', N. C., 6 Aug., 1806; d. in Washington, D. C., 7 Dec., 1882. His ancestors were early settlers of North Carolina and direct descendants of Admiral Sir Francis Wheeler. John was graduated at Columbian university, Washington, D. C., in 1826, and at the law department of the University of North Carolina in 1828. He became a member of the North Carolina legislature in 1837, and in 1831 secretary of the board of commissioners under the treaty with France to decide on the claims of American citizens for spoiliations under the Berlin and Milan treaties. He became superintendent of the branch U. S. mint at Charlotte, N. C., in 1836, and held office till 1841. He was chosen treasurer of North Carolina in 1842, and at the expiration of his term began his "History of North Carolina," to which he devoted himself for ten years (Philadelphia, 1851). In 1854-'7 he was U. S. minister to Nicaragua. As soon as William Walker established his authority there, Mr. Wheeler acknowledged his government. He resigned that post in 1857, settled in Washington, D. C., where in 1859-'61 he was employed in the statistical bureau. Later he returned to North Carolina, but he took no active part in the civil war. In 1863 he was sent by the legislature to England for material for an enlarged edition of his "History of North Carolina." His later life was passed in Washington in collating the debates of congress, and in statistical labors. His other writings include "A Legislative Manual of North Carolina" (1874); "Reminiscences and Memoirs of North Carolina" (Columbus, Ohio, 1884); and he edited Col. David Fanning's "Autobiography" (Richmond, Va., 1861).—His brother, Junius Brutus, soldier, b. in Murfreesboro', N. C., 21 Feb., 1830; d. in Lenoir, N. C., 15 July, 1886, was educated at the University of North Carolina, volunteered at the beginning of the Mexican war, and participated in every battle from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico. He was promoted lieutenant in 1847, but resigned at the end of the war, entered the U. S. military academy, and was graduated in 1855. He was transferred to the topographical engineers in 1856, became 1st lieutenant on 1 July, 1860, was assistant professor of mathematics at the U. S. military academy in 1859-'61, and principal assistant professor there in 1861-'3. He became a captain in the engineer corps in March, 1863, chief engineer of the Department of the Susquehanna in June and September of that year, and chief engineer of the Army of the Arkansas from September, 1863, till May, 1864. He participated in engagements at Elkins Ferry, Prairie D'Ane, the occupation of Camden, and the battle of Jenkins Ferry, on the Saline river, 30 April, 1864, for which he was brevetted major, U. S. army. In March, 1865, he was brevetted lieutenant-colonel and colonel for meritorious service during the civil war. He was chief engineer of the military division of the Missouri in May and June, 1865, commanded the engineer depot at Jefferson Barracks, Mo., in July and December of that year, was assistant engineer on the Mississippi levees in 1865-'6, and superintendent engineer of harbor improvements in 1866. He became major of engineers, U. S. army, in 1866, and was then professor of mining and civil engineering at the U. S. military academy, which post he held till his retirement in 1885. He wrote a valuable series of military text-books that were adopted by the U. S. war department, and published under the titles "Civil Engineering" (New York, 1877); "Art and Science of War" (1878); "Elements of Field Fortifications" (1882); and "Military Engineering" (2 vols., 1884-'5).

WHEELER, Joseph, soldier, b. in Augusta, Ga., 10 Sept., 1836. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1859, and assigned to the dragoons. After a year's service at the cavalry school for practice at Carlisle, Pa., he received the full rank of 2d lieutenant, but on 23 April, 1861, resigned and entered the Confederate army. He was made colonel of the 19th Alabama infantry on 4 Sept., 1861, and served principally in the west. At Shiloh he commanded a brigade and covered the Confederate retreat from the field.

Gen. Wheeler

In July, 1862, he was transferred to a cavalry command, and engaged in raiding western Tennessee. During the Kentucky campaign of that year he had charge of Gen. Braxton Bragg's cavalry, and fought at Green River and Perryville. He commanded the rear-guard of the Confederate army when it retreated into Tennessee, and on 30 Oct., 1862, was promoted brigadier-general. At Murfreesboro' he was in charge of the cavalry, and thereafter he was continuously active in contesting Gen. William S. Rosecrans's advance, also attacking his flanks, raiding in the rear, and destroying his trains. On 19 Jan., 1863, he received his commission as major-general, and opposed the National advance on Chattanooga. He commanded the cavalry at Chickamauga, and after the battle crossed Tennessee river and fell upon Rosecrans's line of communications, defeating the force that was sent against him and destroying over 1,200 wagons, with stores. On this raid he succeeded in damaging National property to the value of $3,000,000, but, after losing 600 men, was driven back to northern Alabama. Subsequently he took part in the siege of Knoxville and covered Bragg's retreat from Mission ridge and Lookout mountain. During the winter and spring he continually harassed the National troops, and, on the advance of Gen. William

T. Sherman's army toward Atlanta, he opposed every movement and fought almost daily, often with his men dismounted. During July 27-30 he fought the raiding force of Gen. George Stoneman, Gen. Kenner Garrard, and Gen. Edward M. McCook, and captured many prisoners, including Gen. Stoneman, and all the artillery and transportation. On 9 Aug., 1864, he was sent by Gen. John B. Hood to capture the National supplies, burn bridges, and break up railways in the rear of Gen. Sherman's army. Passing through northern Georgia, he went into eastern Tennessee as far as the Kentucky line, and thence through middle Tennessee back into northern Alabama. During this raid, which lasted one month, he was continuously engaged and ruined much property. He was unsuccessful in destroying Sherman's communications, and was finally driven back by the National cavalry. When the Confederate commander became convinced of the impossibility of arresting Sherman's advance, Wheeler was sent in front of the army to prevent the National troops from raiding and foraging. He then engaged in the defence of Savannah, and for his defence of Aiken received the thanks of the legislature of South Carolina. Gen. Wheeler received his promotion to the rank of lieutenant-general on 28 Feb., 1865, and continued in charge of the cavalry under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston until the surrender in April, 1865. The death of Gen. James E. B. Stuart, on 11 May, 1864, made him senior cavalry general of the Confederate armies. After the war, he studied law, which profession and the occupation of cotton-planting he followed until 1880, when he was elected to congress as a Democrat, and took his seat on 5 Dec., 1881; but his place was successfully contested by William M. Lowe, and he was unseated, 3 June, 1882. He was re-elected to the same congress on the death of Mr. Lowe, a few months later, and has served since 4 March, 1885. In January, 1888, he was appointed a regent of the Smithsonian institution.

WHEELER, Nathaniel, inventor, b. in Watertown, Conn., 7 Sept., 1820. He was educated in the public schools, began life as a carriage manufacturer, and continued in that business till about 1848. In 1850 he made the acquaintance of Allan B. Wilson, who was engaged in perfecting a sewing-machine, but needed aid in patenting his invention and introducing it to the public. Wilson induced Mr. Wheeler to join in that enterprise, and in 1852 the machine was patented in the firm-name of Wheeler and Wilson. In 1853 the Wheeler and Wilson manufacturing company was founded. Mr. Wheeler's knowledge of machinery and his ability as an organizer enabled him to expand the sewing-machine manufacture from the little factory that could make but one machine a day to an establishment that has facilities for producing 600 machines a day. Since 1850, as president of the Wheeler and Wilson sewing-machine company, he has created a market for more than 1,200,000 sewing-machines. He has served six sessions in the senate and house of the Connecticut legislature, and has taken out patents for various inventions in sewing-machines, railway-cars, heating and ventilation of buildings, and wood finishing.

WHEELER, Orlando Belina, civil engineer, b. in Lodi, Mich., 29 Nov., 1835. He was graduated at the University of Michigan in 1862, after taking both the scientific and classical courses, and in 1861-2 was acting assistant in the astronomical observatory of that institution under Dr. Francis Brünnow. After his graduation he entered the service of the U. S. lake survey as assistant engineer, which office he held until 1882. Meanwhile he was detailed to serve as assistant astronomer under Prof. Asaph Hall in 1874, on the expedition to Siberia to observe the transit of Venus, and in 1878 he served similarly with the total eclipse expedition in Colorado, and in 1882 he accompanied the party under Lieut. Samuel M. Very, U. S. navy, that was sent to Patagonia to observe the transit of Venus. The degree of C. E. was conferred on him by the University of Michigan in 1879, and he is a member of scientific societies. Since 1884 he has been U. S. assistant engineer under the Missouri river commission. His writings, principally reports, have appeared in the annual volumes of the chief of engineers of the U. S. army, and of the superintendent of the U. S. naval observatory.

WHEELER, Samuel, blacksmith, b. in Weccaco, Philadelphia co., Pa., in 1742; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 10 May, 1820. During the Revolution he served in the American army. His reputation as a blacksmith reached Gen. Washington, who one day sent for him and told him he wished a chain made to place across Hudson river at West Point, to arrest the British ships. Wheeler said he could make it, but not away from his forge. "Then," said Washington, "I cheerfully give you dismissal from the army. Badly as we want men, we cannot afford to keep such a man as you." Wheeler made the chain; it was moved in links through New Jersey, hung across the river, and did good service. He made a cannon out of bars of iron, by welding, which was used at the battle of the Brandywine, and was the wonder and admiration of the American officers. It was without hoops, lighter than brass ordnance, had a longer range, and was more accurate in its effect. Napoleon I. took it as a model, and had cannon for his flying artillery manufactured after its pattern, it having been captured at the Brandywine, and sent to London, where it was exhibited in the Tower. Wheeler also made many improvements in mechanics, among which were scale-beams that would weigh a ton, and could be turned by a 12-cent piece; hay-scales, hoisting-machines, screws, and lanterns for light-houses. He also adopted a successful mode for laying the stone for light-houses, and superintended the building of that at Cape Henlopen, Del., and that at Castle Williams, Governor's island, New York harbor.

WHEELER, Thomas, soldier, b. in England about 1620; d. in Concord, Mass., 16 Dec., 1686. He emigrated to this country in 1642, settled in Concord, Mass., and participated in King Philip's war, in which he was wounded. In July, 1675, he was appointed a military escort to Capt. Edward Hutchinson, of Boston, who was commissioned by the council to treat with the sachems in the Nipmuck country. His "Narrative" of this expedition, a pious and quaintly worded document, is preserved in the "Collections" of the New Hampshire historical society.

WHEELER, William Adolphus, philologist, b. in Leicester, Mass., 14 Nov., 1833; d. in Roxbury, Mass., 28 Oct., 1874. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1853, taught for several years, and, removing to Cambridge, Mass., assisted Dr. Joseph E. Worcester in the preparation of his Dictionary. For several years afterward he engaged in similar work, contributed to the quarto edition of Noah Webster's Dictionary (Springfield, Mass., 1864), and prepared for it an "Explanatory and Pronouncing Vocabulary of the Names of Noted Fictitious Persons and Places, including Familiar Pseudonyms, Surnames, etc.," which was also issued separately (Boston, 1865). He became connected with the Boston public library in 1866, and afterward superintendent of the catalogue department. He was a careful and laborious student of Shakespeare, and made collections for a cyclopædia of Shakespearian literature. Among his other works are revisions of the school editions of Webster's Dictionary, an abridgment of that work, and editions of the Rev. Charles Hole's "Brief Biographical Dictionary" (New York, 1866); "Mother Goose's Melodies," with antiquarian and philological notes (1869); and a "Dickens Dictionary" (1873). He left in manuscript an index to anonymous literature entitled "Who Wrote It?"

WHEELER, William Almon, statesman, b. in Malone, Franklin co., N. Y., 30 June, 1819; d. there, 4 June, 1887. He studied at the University of Vermont for two years, but was compelled by the death of his father to leave college without being graduated. He then began the study of law under Asa Hascall in Malone, N. Y., was admitted to the bar in 1845, and succeeded Mr. Hascall as U. S. district attorney of Franklin county, which post he held till 1849. At that time his political sympathies were with the Whig party, by which he was chosen to the assembly in 1849, but in the early part of the Frémont canvass in 1856 he supported the newly formed Republican party, remaining in it until his death. An affection of the throat compelled him to abandon the practice of law in 1851, and from that year till 1866 he was connected with a bank in Malone. He became president of the Northern New York railroad company about the same time, and for twelve years was supervisory manager of the line from Rouse's Point to Ogdensburg, N. Y. He was a member and president pro tempore of the state senate in 1858-'9, and was chosen to congress in 1860 as a Republican, but, after serving one term, returned to his railroad and banking interests. He was president of the New York constitutional convention in 1867, returned to congress in 1869, and served continuously till 1877. During that time he was chairman of the committees on the Pacific railroad company and commerce, a member of those on appropriations and southern affairs, and was the first in either house to cover his back-pay into the treasury, after the passage of the back-salary act. He was also the author of the famous "compromise" in the adjustment of the political disturbances in Louisiana, by which William Pitt Kellogg was recognized as governor, and the state legislature became Republican in the senate and Democratic in the house. In 1876 he was nominated for the vice-presidency by the Republican national convention, and he took his seat as presiding officer of the senate in March, 1877. On the expiration of his term in 1881 he returned to Malone, and did not again enter public life. Mr. Wheeler was a man of most excellent character and of great liberality.

WHELOCK, Charles, soldier, b. in Claremont, N. H., 14 Dec., 1812; d. in Washington, D. C., 21 Jan., 1865. He was educated in the common schools of New Hampshire and New York and became a farmer and provision-dealer in Oneida county, N. Y. Immediately after the fall of Fort Sumter he abandoned business and devoted his time to raising recruits, pledging himself to provide for their families. In the summer of 1861 he had thus given or pledged $5,000, about half of his possessions. Soon afterward he raised the 97th New York regiment, of which he became colonel on 10 March, 1862, and subsequently he engaged actively in the war in the Army of the Potomac, being taken prisoner at the second battle of Bull Run, and serving, after his exchange, till his death from disease. On 19 Aug., 1864, he was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers.

WHELOCK, Eleazar, educator, b. in Windham, Conn., 22 April, 1711; d. in Hanover, N. H., 24 April, 1779. His great-grandfather, Rev. Ralph Wheelock (1600-'83), an eminent non-conformist clergyman, came to New England in 1637, was a founder of the 1st church in Dedham, Mass., in 1638, and thence removed to Medfield, where he was a large land-owner and a representative to the general court. Ralph's son, Eleazar, commanded a cavalry company against the Indians, and the latter's son, Ralph, was a farmer. The second Ralph's son, Eleazar, was graduated at Yale in 1733, having been educated with the proceeds of a legacy that had been left by his grandfather, Capt. Eleazar, for that purpose. He then studied divinity, and in 1735 was ordained over the 2d church in Lebanon, Conn., where he labored thirty-five years. In the year of his settlement there was a great revival of religion in his flock. During its progress he encountered opposition both from those that were more conservative than he and from the more radical, yet he entered into his work with zeal, preaching in one year "a hundred more sermons than there are days in the year." Several years later, his salary being insufficient for his support, he began to take pupils into his house, and in 1743 he received thus Samson Occom (q. v.), a Mohican Indian, whom he educated. He now conceived the plan of an Indian missionary school, and by 1762 he had more than twenty youths under his charge, chiefly Indians. They were supported by the contributions of benevolent persons, and the school received the name of Moor's Indian charity-school, from Joshua Moor, a Mansfield farmer, who gave it a house and two acres of land in Lebanon, in 1754. In 1766, Occom and Rev. Nathaniel Whitaker went to England, and by their exertions an endowment of about £10,000 was obtained, most of which was placed in the hands of a board of trustees, of which William Legge (q. v.), Earl of Dartmouth, was president. It was afterward determined to remove the school to a new location, and to add to it a seminary where scholars might be trained in the classics, philosophy, and literature. Mr. Wheelock received offers of land from various towns, but finally selected Dresden (now Hanover), N. H., both because of the healthfulness of the region, and because of the large landed endowment that was proffered by John Wentworth, the royal governor. A charter was obtained from George III., through Gov. Wentworth, in which Wheelock was named as founder and president of the college, with the privilege of naming his successor, and also as a trustee. The college was named for Lord Dartmouth, though he and the other trustees of the Indian school were opposed to its establishment, and the institutions therefore remained nominally separate till 1849. In August, 1770, Wheelock removed to Hanover, which was then a wilderness, and, after directing the clearing of a few acres and the building of one or two log-cabins, was joined by his sons and pupils, who at first dwelt in booths of hemlock boughs and slept on beds of the same. The first winter was severe, the buildings were not far enough advanced to afford perfect shelter, and great fortitude was necessary in both teachers and students. Four pupils were graduated at the first commencement in 1771, but in the year of the founder's death the number had increased to seventeen. Dr. Wheelock was afflicted with asthma for many years, yet he continued to preach, and, when unable to walk, was repeatedly carried to the college chapel. His popularity as a pulpit orator was inferior only to that of George Whitefield, and his scholarship was advanced for his time. The University of Edinburgh gave him the degree of D. D. in 1767. The prospects of the Indian school that was the germ of Dartmouth college were blighted by the Revolution, in which many tribes adhered to the mother country, yet the Oneidas were kept from doing so probably through its means, and many frontier settlements were thus saved from pillage and murder. Dr. Wheelock published a "Narrative of the Indian School at Lebanon," with several continuations (1762-'75), and various sermons. See a "Memoir," with extracts from his correspondence, by Rev. David McClure and Rev. Elijah Parish (Newburyport, Mass., 1811).—His son, John, educator, b. in Lebanon, Conn., 28 Jan., 1754; d. in Hanover, N. H., 4 April, 1817, entered Yale in 1767, but accompanied his father to New Hampshire in 1770, and was graduated at Dartmouth with the first class in 1771. He was a tutor in 1772-'4, a member of the Provincial congress in the latter year, and in 1775 a delegate to the assembly. In the spring of 1777 he was appointed a major in the service of the state of New York, and in the following November he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel in the Continental army. He was sent by Gen. John Stark on an expedition against the Indians in 1778, and then served on the staff of Gen. Horatio Gates till he was recalled to Hanover by his father's death in 1779. In the same year he was chosen to succeed his father in the presidency of the college, though he was but twenty-five years old, and in 1782 he was given the chair of civil and ecclesiastical history. In 1783 the trustees sent him to Europe to raise funds, where by the good offices of Benjamin Franklin and John Adams, and by letters of introduction from Washington and the French minister, he was moderately successful. In England he made arrangements concerning the interrupted income of the college, and procured philosophical instruments and other donations; but on his return he was shipwrecked off Cape Cod, and lost the box that contained his money and papers. During President Wheelock's administration of thirty-six years the college was in a flourishing condition. Under him the present Dartmouth hall was built in 1786, and the medical department was established in 1798. In 1815, in consequence of questions of religious opinion and differences with the trustees, he was removed from office by the latter, and this act occasioned a violent controversy. The public in general sided with Dr. Wheelock, and the legislature, asserting their right to alter the charter, reorganized the college in 1816 as Dartmouth university, with a new board of trustees. These reinstated Dr. Wheelock in 1817, but he died a few months later. Meanwhile the old board began suit for the recovery of the college property. They lost their case in the state supreme court, but won it on appeal to the U. S. supreme court, and the new charter and board of trustees went out of existence. In this case, which is called the "Dartmouth college case," Daniel Webster laid the foundation of his reputation as a constitutional lawyer. Dr. Wheelock had received the degree of LL. D. from Dartmouth in 1789. He left half his estate to Princeton theological seminary. He published an "Essay on the Beauties and Excellences of Painting, Music, and Poetry" (1774); "Eulogy on Prof. John Smith, D. D." (1809); and "Sketches of the History of Dartmouth College" (1816).—His only daughter, MARIA MALLEVILLE, married Dr. William Allen, president of Bowdoin college. The illustration is a view of the Wilson library, the finest of the present buildings of Dartmouth college.

WHEELOCK, Joseph A., journalist, b. in Bridgstone, Nova Scotia, 8 Feb., 1831. He was educated at Sackville academy, New Brunswick, and in 1850 became a resident of Minnesota. For the next few years he was engaged in various clerical employments, and in 1856 he became editor of the "Real Estate and Financial Advertiser," a weekly newspaper in St. Paul. In 1858 and 1859 he was on the editorial staff of the St. Paul "Pioneer." In 1860 and 1861 he was commissioner of statistics of Minnesota. In the latter year, with others, he founded the St. Paul "Press," and in 1862 became its editor. Since that time he has been editor of the St. Paul "Press" and the "Pioneer Press." In 1871-'5 he was postmaster at St. Paul.

WHELOCK, Julia Susan, hospital nurse, b. in Avon, Ohio, 7 Oct., 1833. She was taken to Erie county, Pa., in 1837, and in 1855 went to Michigan, where she was educated in Kalamazoo college. In September, 1862, she was summoned from Ionia, Mich., where she was teaching, to the bedside of her brother, who had been wounded at the second battle of Bull Run, and after his death she continued to serve in hospitals till the end of the war. In 1865-'73 she held a clerkship in the U. S. treasury department, and on 28 May, 1873, she married Parter C. Freeman, with whom she has since resided in Middleville, Mich., and Springfield, Mo. Her journal was published as "The Boys in White: the Experience of a Hospital Agent in and around Washington" (New York, 1870).

WHEELWRIGHT, John, clergyman, b. in Lincolnshire, England, about 1592; d. in Salisbury, Mass., 15 Nov., 1679. He was graduated at Cambridge in 1614, and, entering the ministry of the established church, was vicar of Bilsby, near Alford, but he became a Puritan, and in 1636 emigrated to Boston to escape persecution. He was made pastor of a church at Mount Wollaston (now Braintree), and his sympathy with the religious opinions of his sister-in-law, Anne Hutchinson, caused dissensions, which were increased by a sermon that he delivered in Boston on the occasion of a fast that had been appointed by the general court in January, 1637. A majority of the congregation approved it, but he was tried by the general court and pronounced guilty of sedition and contempt, "for that the court had appointed the fast as a means of reconciliation of differences, and he purposely set himself to kindle them." In November, 1637, he was banished, and in 1638, with a company of friends, he founded Exeter, N. H., and became its pastor. Five years later, as the town came under the jurisdiction of Massachusetts, he obtained a grant of land from Sir Ferdinando Gorges, in Wells, Me., and removed thither with part of his church. In 1644 his sentence of banishment was revoked, on his admission that he had been partially in the wrong, and in 1646 he returned to Massachusetts, where he was for six years pastor at Hampton. About 1657 he returned to England, where he was well received by Oliver Cromwell, who had been his fellow-student and friend; but in 1660 he came again to this country, and after 1662 he was pastor at Salisbury. The genuineness of an Indian deed to Mr. Wheelwright, dated 1629, has been the subject of much controversy. He published "Mercurius Americanus" in answer to Thomas Wilde's "Rise, Reign, and Ruin of the Familists, Libertines, etc., in New England" (London, 1645), and his "Vindication" (1654). The sermon that caused his banishment is in the possession of the Massachusetts historical society, and was published in its "Collections," edited by Charles Deane (1867). His "Writings, with a Paper on the Genuineness of the Indian Deed of 1629, and a Memoir," by Charles H. Bell, have been published by the Prince society (Boston, 1876).—His descendant, William, capitalist, b. in Newburyport, Mass., in 1798; d. in London, England, 26 Sept., 1873, was apprenticed to a printer, but early entered the merchant marine, and when he was nineteen years old commanded a bark that was bound to Rio Janeiro. In 1823 he was in charge of the "Rising Empire," which was wrecked near the mouth of La Plata river, and on his arrival in Buenos Ayres he became supercargo on a vessel bound for Valparaiso. Thenceforward his home was in South America. In 1824-'9 he was U. S. consul at Guayaquil, Ecuador, and in the latter year removed to Valparaiso. In 1829 he established a line of passenger vessels between Valparaiso and Cobija, and in 1835 began his efforts to establish a line of steamers on the west coast. He was three years in obtaining the necessary concessions from the Pacific coast countries. Chili granted him her permission in August, 1835, but the more northern countries were slow to see the advantages of his plan. In 1838, after vainly endeavoring to enlist American capital in his enterprise, he went to England, where he was more successful. His scheme embraced the adoption of the route across the Isthmus of Panama, and the result was the formation of the Pacific steam navigation company, with a capital of £250,000. In 1840 he accompanied his new steamers, the "Chili" and "Peru," through the Straits of Ma-gellan. He was received with unbounded enthusiasm at Valparaiso and Callao, but the steamers were laid up for three months on account of lack of coal, and to supply them Wheelwright began to operate mines in Chili, which proved very productive. He met with trouble at every step, and it was not until 1845 that his plan was completed by the extension of his line to Panama. The Pacific steam navigation company, of which he was the founder, operated fifty-four steamers in 1876. Mr. Wheelwright suggested in 1842, and afterward built, a railroad from Santiago to Valparaiso. In 1849-'52 he constructed the railroad from the port of Caldera, which he created, to Copiapo, and in 1855 he planned a railway from Caldera across the Andes to Rosario, on the Parana, 934 miles. This was opened from Rosario to Cordoba, in the Argentine Republic, in 1870, but its completion was postponed for years by the action of the government, which rescinded its concessions on Wheelwright's refusal to negotiate a loan of $30,000,000, which he suspected was to be diverted to the construction of iron-clads, from its ostensible purpose of building the road. In 1872 he completed a railway, thirty miles long, from Buenos Ayres to the harbor of Ensenada, on the Atlantic coast, whose great advantages as a port he had long urged. Wheelwright also constructed the first telegraph line, the first gas and water works, and the first iron pier in South America. He gave for benevolent purposes during his life about $600,000, and left one ninth of his estate (about $100,000) to found a scientific school in Newburyport. His full-length portrait was placed in the Merchants' exchange at Valparaiso by his friends, and a bronze statue of him has been erected by the board of trade in the same city. He published "Statements and Documents relative to the Establishment of Steam Navigation in the Pacific" (London, 1838) and "Observations on the Isthmus of Panama" (London, 1844). His life was written by Juan B. Alberdi, minister of the Argentine Republic to England and France, under the title of "La Vida y los trabajos industriales de William Wheelwright en la America del Sud" (Paris, 1876; English translation, with introduction by Caleb Cushing, Boston, 1877). See also "Biographical Sketch of William Wheelwright, of Newburyport, Mass.," by Capt. John Codman (Philadelphia, 1888).—William's cousin, John Tyler, lawyer, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 28 Feb., 1856, is the son of George W. Wheelwright. He was graduated at Harvard in 1876, and at the law-school in 1878, and practised his profession in Boston. Mr. Wheelwright was a founder of the Harvard "Lampoon" in 1876, and has been a frequent contributor to "Life." He is the author of dramatic sketches, which have been read in public by George Riddle; "Rollo's Journey to Cambridge," with Frederick J. Stimson (Boston, 1880); "The King's Men," with Mr. Stimson, John Boyle O'Reilly, and Robert Grant (New York, 1882); and "A Child of the Century" (1886).

WHEILDON, William Willder, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 17 Oct., 1805. His father was a native of Birmingham, England. The son was apprenticed to Nathaniel Greene, a printer, at Haverhill, Mass., in 1820, and in the next year removed with Greene to Boston, where he became foreman in the office of his newspaper, the "American Statesman," and its assistant editor. In May, 1827, he established at Charlestown the "Bunker Hill Aurora," of which he continued as editor and publisher till September, 1870. Since 1850 he has resided in Concord, Mass. Mr. Wheildon has held various local public offices. His paper, the "Aurora," was begun under the favor of Edward Everett, whose personal friend the editor was for many years. Besides occasional poems, Mr. Wheildon's publications include "Letters from Nahant" (Charlestown, 1848); "Memoir of Solomon Willard, Architect and Superintendent of the Bunker Hill Monument," which he prepared as chairman of a committee of the Monument association (Boston, 1865); "Contributions to Thought," a volume of lectures and essays (Concord, 1874); "New History of the Battle of Bunker Hill" (1875); "Siege and Evacuation of Boston and Charlestown" (1876); "Sentry or Beacon Hill: the Beacon and the Monument of 1635 and 1790" (Concord, 1877); "Paul Revere's Signal Lanterns" (1878); and "Curiosities of History" (1880). He made the climate of the arctic regions a subject of special study, and in 1860 read a paper before the American association for the advancement of science on an "Atmospheric Theory of the Open Polar Sea," which was followed by others on the subject, the last being "Remarks on the Last Circular of Dr. Peterman" (Portland, 1873).

WHELAN, Charles, clergyman, b. in Ireland about 1745; d. in Maryland in 1809. He was a member of the order of Franciscans, and served as a chaplain on one of the French ships of Admiral De Grasse's fleet in the war of the American Revolution. Gen. Lafayette, it is claimed, strongly recommended Mr. Whelan to the kindness of the authorities of New York state before he returned to France, and he soon afterward became the first regularly settled priest in the city of New York. Having disagreed with his congregation, he was dismissed in February, 1787, and was subsequently sent by Bishop Carroll on a mission to Kentucky, being the first missionary of the Roman Catholic church in that state.

WHELAN, James, R. C. bishop, b. in Kilkenny, Ireland, 8 Dec., 1823; d. in Zanesville, Ohio, 18 Feb., 1878. He emigrated to the United States with his parents in 1833, in 1839 entered the Dominican novitiate in Springfield, Ky., and took the vows in 1842. He finished his course of philosophy and theology in the Dominican convent at Somerset, Ohio, and was ordained a priest on 2 Aug., 1846. He was engaged in missionary duties in Somerset and its neighborhood until 1852, when he was elected president of St. Joseph's college, Perry co., Ohio. In 1854 he was made provincial of the Dominican province, which included all the United States except the Pacific coast. Having been nominated coadjutor to Bishop Miles, of Nashville, he was consecrated bishop of Marcopolis in partibus on 8 May, 1859. He became bishop of Nashville on the death of Dr. Miles on 21 Feb., 1860, and at once began to enlarge the cathedral, established an academy and boarding-school, and founded schools and an orphan asylum. Having obtained permission to pass through the lines to visit Bishop Spalding at Louisville, he was accused, on his return, of making remarks in the National lines which the Confederates thought had influenced the movements of the National army. The reproaches of which he was the object on the occasion, combined with his inability to find a remedy for the evils around him, affected his mind. In 1864 he resigned his see and retired to St. Joseph's convent for a time. He published "Catena Aurea, or a Golden Chain of Evidences demonstrating, from Analytical Treatment of History, that Papal Infallibility is no Novelty," which is regarded as one of the most learned and exhaustive treatises on this question (1871).

WHELAN, Peter, clergyman, b. in County Wexford, Ireland, in 1800; d. in Savannah, Ga., 5 Feb., 1871. He received a classical education in his native county, volunteered for missionary duty in the United States, finished his theological course in the diocesan seminary at Charleston, S. C., and was ordained by Bishop England in 1830. He was given charge of the eastern part of North Carolina, and in 1833 was transferred to Locust Grove church, a mission that embraced northeastern Georgia, where he remained until 1850. He administered the diocese of Savannah from 1859 till 1861, and as administrator took part in the eighth provincial council of Baltimore, where he was offered the vacant see, but declined. During the civil war he was general chaplain at all the stations in Georgia from Anderson to Tybee. In this capacity his devotion to the National prisoners was very marked, especially at Andersonville, where he shared with them all he possessed, even to his wearing-apparel. He was engaged in administering the sacraments to the sick at Fort Pulaski when it was taken, and was sent a prisoner to the north. He was confined in Fort Lafayette for some time, and, on his release, returned to Georgia.

WHELAN, Richard Vincent, R. C. bishop, b. in Baltimore, Md., 28 Jan., 1809; d. there, 7 July, 1874. He was educated in Mount St. Mary's college, Emmitsburg, and afterward studied theology in the Seminary of St. Sulpice, Paris. He was ordained a priest in 1832, and after his return to the United States was appointed pastor of Harper's Ferry, at the same time attending neighboring missions. He was nominated second bishop of Richmond on 19 Dec., 1840, and consecrated at Baltimore by Archbishop Eccleson on 21 March, 1841. There were but 6,000 Roman Catholics and six priests in Virginia, and, in order to increase the number of the latter, he appealed for help to the societies for the propagation of the faith in Europe, receiving a liberal response. He founded schools at Martinsburg. In order to continue the supply of priests for his diocese, he purchased land near Richmond and erected a theological seminary. He established missions at Witheville, Summersville, Kingwood, and Lynchburg. In 1846 he went to Wheeling, where Roman Catholics were increasing in numbers, and labored as a simple priest on this mission. Feeling that his personal supervision was required to build up the church in western Virginia, he removed there, and never returned. He erected a cathedral at Wheeling, founded schools, and opened an ecclesiastical seminary in his own house, in which he trained young men for the priesthood. He attended the seventh provincial council of Baltimore in 1849. In 1850 the bishopric of Wheeling was created, and Dr. Whelan was made its first bishop. His efforts to develop Roman Catholicism in this district involved him in heavy debt, and in 1857 he went to seek assistance in Europe, where he obtained aid that enabled him to labor with renewed energy. He began a college at Wheeling in 1866, and opened several academies. He was present at the Vatican council in 1869-'70, and addressed that body on some of the most important questions before it. He opposed the definition of the dogma of papal infallibility, but submitted to the decision of the council, declaring that his opposition did not arise from disbelief in its truth, but from the fact that he believed its definition at the time inopportune. At the beginning of the administration of Bishop Whelan the diocese of Wheeling contained two churches and two priests, and was without Roman Catholic schools or institutions of any kind. At his death there were 48 churches, 40 stations where religious services were held, and 29 priests. It contained six academies for girls, four convents, a hospital, an orphan asylum, and a college. The Roman Catholic population had increased from less than 1,000 to 18,000.

+ Richard V. Whelan

WHELPLEY, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Stockbridge, Mass., in 1766; d. in New York city, 14 July, 1817. His parents removed to a farm in Stockbridge from Wilton, Conn. The son studied theology under Dr. Stephen West, was ordained to the Baptist ministry in 1792, and preached in Stockbridge and West Stockbridge till he took charge of an independent church in Green River, N. J. In 1798-1809 he was at the head of an academy in Morristown, N. J., and in 1806 he was received into the ministry of the Presbyterian church. In 1809 he opened a school in Newark, N. J., but in the latter part of the year failing health forced him to go to Savannah, Ga., where he supported himself by teaching. He returned to Newark in 1811, and in 1814 went to New York, where he had charge of a school for a short time, till his health failed utterly. Mr. Whelpley was the author of "Compend of History from the Earliest Times" (Philadelphia, 1808; new ed., 2 vols., New York, 1855); "Letters on Capital Punishment and War," addressed to Gov. Caleb Strong, (1816); and "The Triangle: a Series of Numbers upon Three Theological Points enforced from Various Pulpits in New York," a defence of the so-called New England theology (New York, 1817), besides single sermons, orations, and addresses. He also wrote occasional poems, including an ode on the death of George Washington, which was sung in Morristown at a commemorative service.—His son, Philip Melancthon, clergyman, b. in Stockbridge, Mass., 22 Dec., 1793; d. on Schooley's mountain, N. J., 17 July, 1824, was pastor of the 1st Presbyterian church in New York city from 1815 till his death. He acquired reputation as a pulpit orator, and published several occasional sermons.—Philip Melancthon's son, James Davenport, physician, b. in New York city, 23 Jan., 1817; d. in Boston, Mass., 15 April, 1872, was graduated at Yale in 1837, and entered the service of the geological survey of Pennsylvania under Henry D. Rogers, where he continued for two years. He was graduated at the medical department of Yale in 1842, and remained in New Haven until 1846, engaging in the study of science and in literary pursuits. Dr. Whelpley then settled in Brooklyn, N. Y., where he began to practise medicine; but failing health soon compelled him to relinquish that profession. In 1847 he removed to New York city, where he became editor and one of the owners of the "American Whig Review," to which he had been a contributor since 1845. While thus engaged he formed, about 1849, a project of establishing a commercial colony in Honduras, and in furtherance of this enterprise spent two years in San Francisco, purchasing and editing one of the daily papers there. His arrangements were disturbed by the presence of the filibuster, William Walker, and on going to Honduras he was detained by Walker for nearly a year and impressed into the service as a surgeon, during which time he suffered great privation. Finally he escaped to San Francisco, whence he returned early in 1857 to the east and again devoted himself to literary and scientific pursuits. He was a member of the American academy of arts and sciences, to whose transactions and to the "American Journal of Science" he contributed papers, principally on physics and metallurgy, giving the results of his researches. The most important of these is "Idea of an Atom suggested by the Phenomena of Weight and Temperature" (1845), in which he anticipated Michael Faraday's ideas as set forth in his "Thoughts on Ray Visions" (1846); and he was also the author of "Letters on Philosophical Induction" and "Letters on Philosophical Analogy," which discuss fundamental principles in scientific methods.

WHIPPLE, Abraham, naval officer, b. in Providence, R. I., 16 Sept., 1733; d. in Marietta, Ohio, 29 May, 1819. Early in life he commanded a vessel in the West Indian trade, but during the old French war in 1759-'60 he became captain of the privateer "Gamecock," and captured twenty-three French vessels in a single cruise. In June, 1772, he commanded the volunteers that took and burned the British revenue-schooner "Gaspé" in Narragansett bay. This was the first popular uprising in this country against a British armed vessel. In June, 1775, Rhode Island fitted out two armed vessels, of which Whipple was put in command, with the title of commodore. A few days later he chased a tender of the British sloop "Rose" off the Conanicut shore, capturing her after sharp firing. In this engagement Whipple fired the first gun of the Revolution on the water. He was appointed captain of the "Columbus" on 22 Dec., 1775, and afterward of the schooner "Providence," which captured more British prizes than any other American vessel; but she was finally taken, and Whipple was placed in command of a new frigate of the same name, in which, when Narragansett bay was blockaded by the British in 1778, he forced his way, in a dark and stormy night, through the enemy's fleet by pouring broadsides into it and sinking one of their tenders. At that time he was bound for France with important despatches that related to a treaty between the United States and that government, and after a successful voyage he returned in safety to Boston. In July, 1779, while commanding the "Providence" as senior officer, and with two other ships, he attacked a fleet of English merchantmen that were under convoy of a ship-of-the-line and some smaller cruisers. He captured eight prizes, and sent them to Boston. The value of these ships exceeded $1,000,000. In 1780 he went to Charleston, S. C., in an endeavor to relieve the city, which at that time was besieged by the British; but he was captured and held a prisoner until the close of the war. He subsequently became a farmer at Cranston, R. I., but in 1798 he connected himself with the Ohio company, and settled at Marietta.

WHIPPLE, Amiel Weeks, soldier, b. in Greenwich, Mass., in 1818; d. in Washington, D. C., 7 May, 1863. He studied at Amherst, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1841, was engaged immediately afterward in the hydrographic survey of Patapasco river, and in 1842 in surveying the approaches to New Orleans and the harbor of Portsmouth, N. H. In 1844 he was detailed as assistant astronomer upon the northeastern boundary survey, and in 1845 he was employed in determining the northern boundaries of New York, Vermont, and New Hampshire. In 1849 he was appointed assistant astronomer in the Mexican boundary commission, and in 1853 he had charge of the Pacific railroad survey along the 35th parallel. In 1856 he was appointed engineer for the southern light-house district and superintendent of the improvements of St. Clair flats and St. Mary's river. At the opening of the civil war he at once applied for service in the field, and was assigned as chief topographical engineer on the staff of Gen. Irvin McDowell. In this capacity he was the author of the first maps of that part of Virginia that were issued during the war, and performed creditable service at the first battle of Fredericksburg. Upon the second advance of the army he was attached, as chief topographical engineer, to the staff of Gen. George B. McClellan, but, being appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, was recalled in May, 1862, and assigned to the command of the defences of Washington south of Potomac river. His service here was so well performed that he received in orders the thanks of the president of the United States. His division was assigned in October, 1862, to the 9th corps, and took part in the movement down the eastern base of the Blue Ridge, upon the skirts of Lee's retreating army. At Waterloo his division was attached to the 3d army corps, and he led it at the battle of Fredericksburg. At the battle of Chancellorsville it was much exposed, and suffered more, probably, in that engagement than any other division of the army. He was shot on Monday, 4 May, 1863, when the battle was practically at an end, and, living three days, was appointed major-general of volunteers for gallantry in action. He had received the brevets of lieutenant-colonel for the Manassas campaign, colonel for Fredericksburg, brigadier-general for Chancellorsville, and major-general for services during the war—all in the regular army.—His son, CHARLES WILLIAM, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1868, and is now chief ordnance officer of the Department of the Missouri, with the rank of captain.

WHIPPLE, Edwin Percy, author, b. in Gloucester, Mass., 8 March, 1819; d. in Boston, Mass., 16 June, 1886. His father, Matthew, who died while Edwin was an infant, is said to have had "strong sense and fine social powers." His mother, Lydia Gardiner, was of a family in Gardiner, Me., noted for its mental gifts. She early removed to Salem, Mass., where her son was educated at the English high-school. Here he was noted for his precocity, and took high rank. At fourteen years of age he published articles in a Salem newspaper, and at fifteen, on leaving school, he became a clerk in the Bank of general interest. In 1837 he was employed in the office of a large broker's firm in Boston, and soon afterward he was appointed superintendent of the news-room and of the Merchants' exchange in State street. He was an active member of the Mercantile library association, and one of a club of six that was an offshoot from it, and held its sessions, known as "The Attic Nights," for literary exercises and debate. There his command of the weapons of debate—his skill in intellectual fence and readiness of repartee, sustained by large stores of information and a subtle critical faculty—made him an acknowledged leader. In 1840 he delivered a poem before the Mercantile library association, portraying the manners and satirizing the absurdities of the day. He was introduced to the general public by a critical article, or rather panegyric, from his pen, on Macaulay, published in the "Boston Miscellany" for February, 1843, which drew from the great essayist a complimentary letter. The paper glows with enthusiasm, leading occasionally to exaggeration, but manifests a critical insight, and a sweep, energy, and vividness of style, that indicate the advent of a new force in literature. In October of the same year he gave a lecture before the Mercantile library association on "The Lives of Authors," after which he was continually sought for as a lecturer, till he abandoned the platform. He is said to have addressed more than a thousand audiences in the northern and middle states, from Bangor to St. Louis. The lectures, which embraced a wide range of topics, biographical, critical, and social, were of a philosophic cast, and abounded in fine analysis, shrewd observation, and acute insight, relieved by apt anecdote, epigrammatic wit, and poignant satire. Besides lecturing before lyceums, he addressed, on many occasions, the literary societies of colleges, as Brown, Dartmouth, Waterville, and Amherst; and in 1850 was the Fourth-of-July orator before the city authorities of Boston. Mr. Whipple was an early and frequent contributor to American reviews, and wrote numerous articles for the magazines and public journals. Some of his best writing is to be found in "Every Saturday," a weekly paper of which he was at one time editor, in pithy, thoughtful papers, condensing with rare skill the results of years of observation, reading, and reflection. His first published book was "Essays and Reviews" (2 vols., New York, 1848-'9). Among the best of its papers are those on "Byron," "English Poets of the Nineteenth Century," "South's Sermons," "Henry Fielding," and "Rufus Choate." The portraiture of the great New England advocate—one of those rare and unique men whose elusive genius seems to defy characterization, and baffle all attempts to label it and put it into any moral pigeon-hole—is one of the happiest examples of the writer's acute and discriminating analysis. Choate he pronounces "a kind of Mirabeau-Peel," who "combines a conservative intellect with a radical sensibility"; whose emotions, like well-trained troops, are "impetuous by rule." "A fiery and fusing imagination lies at the centre of his large and flexible nature, and is the chief source of his power."

Mr. Whipple's next work was "Literature and Life" (1849), a thin volume containing his lectures on "Authors," "Wit and Humor," "The Ludicrous Side of Life," "Genius," and others. In 1871 a new edition was published, containing several additional papers. In 1860 he resigned his post in the Merchants' exchange in order to devote himself exclusively to literary pursuits. In 1866 appeared his "Character and Characteristic Men," a work composed of lectures and essays, in which the various qualities that make up the complex web of character, and the subtle essence that constitutes the individuality of great men, are detected with penetrating vision and set forth in vivid language. The last paper, on "Washington and the Principles of the American Revolution," is a republication of the Fourth-of-July address already noticed. In 1871 was published "Success and its Conditions," the key-note of which is that "virtue is an aid to insight," and which enforces and illustrates the truth that sham, in a large sense, is never successful. In 1872 Mr. Whipple became literary editor of the "Globe," then a new daily paper in Boston, but resigned the place in the next year. In 1876 the "Literature of the Age of Elizabeth," a series of critical essays originally delivered at the Lowell institute, was published. In this work, which is a discussion of the merits and defects of the English dramatists, with also critical estimates of Sidney, Raleigh, Bacon, and Hooker, Mr. Whipple's genius reaches high-water mark. In 1877 he wrote for the "North American Review" a paper on George Eliot, which she and Mr. Lewes declared to be the most satisfactory criticism on her writings that had then appeared. In 1878 Mr. Whipple and James T. Fields compiled and edited the "Family Library of British Poetry." After Mr. Whipple's death was published his "Recollections of Eminent Men, with other Papers," with an introduction by Cyrus A. Bartol (Boston, 1887). In this volume are vivid portraits of Rufus Choate, Louis Agassiz, Ralph Waldo Emerson, John L. Motley, Charles Sumner, and George Ticknor; and to these are added a paper on Matthew Arnold; who is praised for the expansiveness, fertility, and subtlety of his intellect, his felicitous critical phrases and definitions, and the exquisite beauty of his style, but severely censured for his "moral and intellectual superciliousness" as a critic; and papers on Barry Cornwall and some of his contemporaries, and on the private life of George Eliot, who "allowed her understanding to adopt opinions which her deepest reason and affections repudiated." In the same year with the latter work was published "American Literature and other Papers," with a brief introduction by the poet Whittier. The volume contains five essays; the centennial review of "American Literature," published in "Harper's Magazine" in 1876, a masterpiece of condensation and of apt and discriminating criticism; "Daniel Webster as a Master of English Style," which had been prefixed to a collection of that statesman's principal speeches published in 1879; and papers on "Emerson and Carlyle," "Emerson as a Poet," and the "Character and Genius of T. Starr King." The last collection of Mr. Whipple's periodical papers was "Outlooks on Society, Literature, and Politics" (Boston, 1888).

Mr. Whipple was one of the very few men who have made the most of their natural gifts. Though chiefly self-educated in the popular sense of the term, his mental training and equipment were such as most college graduates might envy. He was chiefly distinguished for his critical faculty. Endowed by nature with a rare degree of acuteness, penetration, judgment, and sympathy, he developed and strengthened these faculties by ceaseless training and discipline, which made him a master in his chosen calling. Uniting a keen insight, that was "almost a species of mental clairvoyance," with the power of logical analysis, a tenacious memory with a playful imagination, and a grave spirit with a lively sensibility to the comic, he instinctively discriminated between the essential and the accidental, the wheat and the chaff, in letters, and set forth the reasons for his discrimination with a force and clearness that carried conviction to his readers. Pure and sensitive, however, as was his literary taste, his distinctive excellence was not so much his judgment upon the quality of a book as a more or less cunning work of art, as the revelation which he saw in it of the genius and character of the author. Like Sainte-Beuve, he sought to detect the man in his writing, his spiritual physiognomy, his originality and independence or slavery as a thinker, the atmosphere in which he lived, and the experiences of which the work was the product. Few critics have been influenced less by their idiosyncrasies and predilections, by the secret leanings which "haunt every man as his shadow," and warp the mind from absolute rectitude. Rarely blind to faults, he had a quick and keen eye for excellence, and when he erred it was on the side of leniency, never on that of excessive severity. Conscientious in all his statements, he carefully weighed his words, and never sacrificed the truth to epigram and brilliant effect. Few writers have been more painstaking. He was as fastidious and self-exacting when writing an ephemeral article for a newspaper as when preparing a paper for a review, often throwing into the fire three or four draughts in succession, because they did not satisfy his critical judgment. His style is said to have been formed on Macaulay's; but he was no copyist or imitator. If, as some will think, it is sometimes oratorical, and sometimes injured by an excess of antithesis and anecdote, the faults are accounted for by the fact that some of his most characteristic productions were written for delivery as lectures. Mr. Whipple had fine conversational powers. He had an inexhaustible fund of anecdote and illustration from history and literature, ready for instant use, and the felicity of his citations was only equalled by that of his original wit. "The effete of society," "the gentleman of wealth and pleasure," "the organ of distaste" (said of a certain journal), were some of his current sayings. Of Walt Whitman's "Leaves of Grass" he said: "It has every leaf except the fig-leaf." He had an even temperament, and was noticeably free from envy, jealousy, irritability, and other faults that too often deform the literary character. His married life was a contradiction to the popular notion concerning the hymeneal infelicity of literary men. In 1847 he married Miss Charlotte Hastings, in whom he found at all times an intellectual, congenial, and sympathetic companion. Personally Mr. Whipple was of spare figure and below medium stature, with a face of remarkable mobility and expressiveness, the large, lustrous eyes glowing with interest as he talked on favorite inspiring themes.

WHIPPLE, Henry Benjamin, P. E. bishop, b. in Adams, Jefferson co., N. Y., 15 Feb., 1822. He prepared for college, but, on account of feeble health, turned his attention to mercantile pursuits, and took an active interest in politics for several years. Upon deciding to study for the ministry, he followed a theological course under Dr. William D. Wilson, who was afterward professor in Cornell university. He was ordered deacon in Trinity church, Geneva, N. Y., 17 Aug., 1849, and ordained priest in Christ church, Sackett's Harbor, N. Y., 16 July, 1850, both by Bishop De Lancey. In the same year he became rector of Zion church, Rome, N. Y., where he remained seven years. In the spring of 1857 he removed to Chicago, Ill., and assumed the rectorship of the Church of the Holy Communion in that city. This position he held until his election to the episcopate. He was consecrated the first bishop of Minnesota in St. James's church, Richmond, Va., 13 Oct., 1859. In 1860 he took an active part in organizing the Seabury mission, out of which has grown Seabury divinity-school; St. Mary's Hall, a school for girls; and Shattuck school for boys—all at Faribault, Minn. Having many Indians within his jurisdiction and in the neighboring territories, he has devoted his energies largely to their improvement, education, and evangelization. He is known among the tribes as "Straight Tongue." He is one of the original members of the Peabody education fund. For many years he has been a recognized authority on all questions relating to the vexed Indian problem, and he is often consulted by the U. S. government in such matters. He is a member of the government commission for the consolidation of Indian tribes that are capable of civilization, and has been able to do much in this direction. In northern Minnesota 1,500 Christian Chippewa Indians are gathered on White Earth reservation engaged in agriculture and cattle-raising. He attended the third Pan-Anglican council at Lambeth palace in 1888, and took part in the funeral services of Bishop Harris, of Michigan, in Westminster abbey. One of the principal buildings in Faribault college is called Whipple Hall in his honor. Racine gave him the degree of D. D. in 1859. He has written much for the press and periodicals on the Indian question, and has also published sermons, addresses, and charges.

WHIPPLE, John Adams, inventor, b. in Grafton, Mass., 10 Sept., 1822. While a boy he was an ardent student of chemistry, and on the introduction of the daguerreotype process into this country he was the first to manufacture the chemicals that were used in it. His health having become impaired through this work, he devoted his attention exclusively to photography, in connection with which he made many useful inventions and improvements. He prepared his plates and brought out his pictures by steam, invented crayon daguerreotypes, and crystalotypes, or daguerreotypes on glass, and, with the aid of the fifteen-inch equatorial telescope of the Harvard college observatory, under the direction of Prof. William C. Bond, took a daguerreotype of the moon's surface, for which he was complimented by the Royal academy of arts and sciences of London, and on 17 July, 1850, photographed Alpha Lyra, which is said to have been the first successful experiment in stellar photography. He received the prize medal at the World's fair, London, and a silver medal at the Crystal palace, New York.

WHIPPLE, Squire, civil engineer, b. in Worcester county, Mass., 16 Sept., 1804; d. in Albany, N. Y., 15 March, 1888. He earned sufficient money by teaching to educate himself at Hartwick seminary and Fairfield academy, and was graduated at Union college in 1830. Having acquired a fondness for mechanical pursuits as a boy in his father's cotton-factory, he now turned his attention to civil engineering, and was successively a rod-man and leveller on the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. In 1840 he designed and built the first model of a scale for weighing canal-boats, and subsequently he built the first weigh-lock scale on the Erie canal. He began his career as a bridge-builder in 1840 by designing and patenting an iron-bridge truss. During the next ten years he built several bridges on the Erie canal and the New York and Erie railroad. In 1852-'3 he built a wrought- and cast-iron bridge over the Albany and Northern railroad, and by his work acquired the title of the "father of iron bridges." He obtained a patent for his lift draw-bridge in 1872, and in 1873-'4 built the first one over the Erie canal at Utica. Since that time the Whipple iron bridges have stood in the foremost rank. He possessed a fine cabinet of models, instruments, and apparatus, mostly made by himself, illustrating the different branches of physical and mechanical science. Mr. Whipple was elected an honorary member of the American society of civil engineers in 1868. He was the author of "The Way to Happiness" (Utica, 1847), and a "Treatise on Bridge-Building" (1847; enlarged ed., New York, 1873).

WHIPPLE, William, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Kittery, Me., 14 Jan., 1730; d. in Portsmouth, N. H., 28 Nov., 1785. His father, William, a native of Ipswich, Mass., was bred as a maltster, but, removing to Kittery, engaged in a seafaring life for several years. The son was educated at a public school in his native town, and afterward became a sailor, having command of a vessel before he was twenty-one years of age. He engaged in the European, West India, and African trade, and brought large numbers of negro slaves to this country, but afterward, during the Revolution, liberated those that belonged to him. In 1759 he abandoned the sea entirely and entered into business in Portsmouth with his brother Joseph, which connection lasted till about two years previous to the Revolution. At an early period of the contest between the colonies and Great Britain he took a decided part in favor of the former. He was elected a delegate from New Hampshire to the Continental congress in 1775, taking his seat in May, was re-elected, 23 Jan., 1776, took his seat on 29 Feb. following, and signed the Declaration of Independence in July. He was re-elected to congress in 1778, and declined to be chosen again, but was a member of the state assembly in 1780-'4. He was commissioned a brigadier-general in 1777, commanded a brigade of New Hampshire troops at the battles of Saratoga and Stillwater, and, after the surrender of Burgoyne, signed the articles of capitulation with Col. James Wilkinson on behalf of Gen. Horatio Gates. Gen. Whipple was afterward selected as one of the officers under whose charge the British troops were conducted to their place of encampment on Winter hill, near Boston. In 1778 he participated in Gen. Sullivan's expedition to Rhode Island, having command of the detachment of militia from New Hampshire, but the expedition failed of success, and he resigned his military appointment, 20 June, 1782. In 1780 he was appointed a commissioner of the board of admiralty, which post he declined. He was state superintendent of finances in 1782-'4, appointed judge of the supreme court, 20 June, 1782, and justice of the peace and quorum throughout the state in December, 1784, and acted in this capacity till his death.

WHIPPLE, William Denison, soldier, b. in Nelson, Madison co., N. Y., 2 Aug., 1826. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1851, and became 2d lieutenant in the 3d infantry on 9 Sept. of that year. After six years of uneventful service in New Mexico, he participated in the Gila expedition against the Apaches in 1857, the Navajo expedition of 1858, and the defence of Fort Defiance, N. M., in 1860. He became 1st lieutenant in December, 1856, and on the opening of the civil war was on quartermaster's duty at Indianola, Tex. After the capture of the U. S. property he escaped through the enemy's lines, was commissioned captain and assistant adjutant-general, and in that capacity was present at the battle of Bull Run and at the headquarters of the Departments of Pennsylvania and Virginia, respectively, to June, 1862, when, becoming lieutenant-colonel and additional aide-de-camp, he was on duty in the Middle Department and 8th army corps, and as chief of staff to Gen. Cadwallader. He was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers on 17 July, 1863, and assigned as chief of staff to Gen. George H. Thomas, being present during the operations near Chattanooga, the siege of Atlanta, the battles of Missionary Ridge, Resaca, Kenesaw Mountain, and Nashville and at the headquarters of the Department of the Cumberland in 1853-'5. He received the brevets of brigadier- and major-general in the regular army on 13 March, 1865, for gallant service in the Atlanta campaign and battles before Nashville. Since the war Gen. Whipple has been on duty as assistant adjutant-general at the headquarters of the principal military divisions, and in 1873-'81 as aide-de-camp to the general of the army. He was promoted colonel in the adjutant-general's department, 28 Feb., 1887.

WHISTLER, John, soldier, b. in Ulster, Ireland, about 1756; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 3 Sept., 1829. He ran away from home when a boy, enlisted in the British army, and served under Gen. Burgoyne during the war of the Revolution. Upon his return to England he was honorably discharged, and soon afterward, forming an attachment for a daughter of Sir Edward Bishop, a friend of his father, he eloped with her, and, coming to this country, settled at Hagerstown, Md. He shortly afterward entered the U. S. army, served in the ranks, and was severely wounded in the disastrous campaign against the Indians in 1791. He was promoted captain, 1 July, 1797, and in the summer of 1803 was sent with his company of the 1st infantry from Detroit to the head-waters of Lake Michigan, where, before the close of the year, he completed Fort Dearborn on the site of the city of Chicago. Having attained the brevet rank of major, he was appointed in 1815 military store-keeper at Newport, Ky., and afterward at Jefferson barracks, near St. Louis, where he remained till his death.—His son, William, soldier, b. in Maryland in 1780; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 4 Dec., 1863, was appointed a lieutenant of infantry, 8 June, 1801, and took part in the battle of Maguaga, Mich., 9 Aug., 1812. He was promoted captain in December, 1812, major of the 2d infantry, 28 April, 1826, lieutenant-colonel of the 7th infantry, 21 July, 1834, and colonel of the 4th infantry, 15 July, 1845. He retired from the service on 9 Oct., 1861. At his death he was the oldest army officer in the United States, with the exception of Gen. Winfield Scott.—William's son, Joseph Nelson Garland, soldier, b. in Green Bay, 19 Oct., 1822, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1846, and entered the army as 2d lieutenant of the 8th infantry, but six months later was transferred to the 3d infantry. He served in the war with Mexico, being engaged in the siege of Vera Cruz, the principal battles of the campaign that followed, and the capture of the city of Mexico. He was promoted 1st lieutenant in June, 1852, in 1861 was captured in Texas by the Confederates and paroled as a prisoner of war, and promoted captain in May, 1861. He was then on duty at the U. S. military academy as assistant instructor of infantry tactics till March, 1863. His services in the volunteer army date from May, 1863, when he was made colonel of the 2d New York artillery. He served in the Richmond campaign, participating in the battles of Spottsylvania, North Anna, Tolopotomy, Cold Harbor, and the assaults on Petersburg, where he was wounded during the siege. From July, 1864, till September, 1865, he commanded a brigade in the defences of Washington. In December, 1865, he was mustered out as brevet brigadier-general of volunteers. In September, 1866, he was transferred to the 31st infantry, and in March, 1869, to the 22d infantry. In February, 1874, he was promoted lieutenant-colonel of the 5th infantry, and in May, 1883, he became colonel of the 15th infantry. At the time of his retirement, 19 Oct., 1886, he was in command at Fort Buford, Dak.—William's brother, George Washington, engineer,

b. in Fort Wayne, Ind., 19 May, 1800; d. in St. Petersburg, Russia, 7 April, 1849, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1819, appointed a 2d lieutenant in the corps of artillery, and was afterward, till 1821, employed on topographical duty and part of the time at Fort Columbus. From 2 Nov., 1821, till 30 April, 1822, he was assistant professor at the U. S. military academy, and he was employed in 1822-'6 in connection with the commission that was engaged in tracing the international boundary between Lake Superior and the Lake of the Woods. He was made 1st lieutenant in August, 1829, and was on topographical duty almost continually till 31 Dec., 1833, when he resigned from the army. With Jonathan Knight, William Gibbs McNeill, and Ross Winans, he examined the railroads of England on behalf of the directors of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and afterward engaged in the construction of that road, the Boston and Albany, and other railroads. In 1834 Lieut. Whistler became engineer to the proprietors of locks and canals at Lowell, and from 1834 till 1837 he gave much of his time to the reproduction, for the Boston and Albany railroad, of a locomotive that was imported from the works of George and Robert Stephenson, at Newcastle, England. In 1837 he removed to Stonington, Conn., to take charge of the Stonington railroad, and from 1840 till 1842 he was chief engineer of the Boston and Albany railroad, with his headquarters at Springfield, Mass. In 1842 he went to Russia to act as engineer for the contemplated railroad to unite St. Petersburg and Moscow. Not only was the road to be built, but the iron for the track, the locomotives, cars, and everything appertaining to the road were to be manufactured under his supervision. In addition to the construction of railroads, he was also employed to build extensive dock-yards at St. Petersburg, and to improve the Russian harbors and rivers. In 1847, in recognition of his services, the Emperor Nicholas conferred upon Lieut. Whistler the decoration of the Order of St. Anne. He is buried at Stonington, Conn., but a monument was erected to his memory in Greenwood cemetery by American engineers.—George Washington's son, George William, engineer, b. in New London, Conn., in 1822; d. in Brighton, England, 24 Dec., 1869, began the practice of his profession as a civil engineer under his father in 1840. He was connected with various railroads in this country, and was superintendent of the Erie, and New York and New Haven railroads. In the winter of 1856 he went to Russia to take charge of the St. Petersburg and Moscow railroad under the Winans contract, and he continued there, with the exception of a short interval, till the spring of 1869, when he resigned in consequence of impaired health. He was specially noted for his knowledge of railway machinery and for executive ability in the management of railways.—Another son, James Abbott McNeill, artist, b. in Lowell, Mass., in 1834, was educated at the U. S. military academy, studied for two years under Charles Gabriel Gleyre in Paris, and in 1863 settled in London. He holds peculiar theories on art, which have been the subject of much criticism. In many of his later works especially he has made interesting experiments in color, and he frequently succeeds in producing extraordinary results with few and subdued colors. There is at times, however, a sacrifice of form to color impressions in his "arrangements" and "nocturnes." His more important paintings are "White Girl" (1862); "Coast of Brittany," "Last of Old Westminster," and "Westminster Bridge" (1863); "Princesse des Pays de la Porcelaine" (1865); "At the Piano" (1867); "Portrait of my Mother" (an "Arrangement in Gray and Black"), and portrait of Thomas Carlyle (1872); "Gold Girl," "Nocturne in Blue and Gold," and "Nocturne in Blue and Green" (1878); "Harmony in Gray and Green" (1881); "Nocturne in Blue and Silver," "Blue Girl," and "Entrance to Southampton Water" (1882); "Great Fire Wheel" (1883); "Harmony in Brown and Black" (1884); and "Arrangement in Black" (Lady Archibald Campbell) and "Arrangement in Gray and Green" (Miss Alexander), both exhibited at Munich in 1888. His skill in etching has gained for him a position among etchers that is even higher than that which he holds as a painter. Among his works in this branch of art are a series of plates on London, Venice, and Brussels. He has published "Ten O'Clock" (Boston, 1888). See an article by William C. Brownell, in "Scribner's Monthly" for August, 1879, and Frederick Wedmore's "Four Masters of Etching" (London, 1883).

WHITAKER, Alexander, clergyman, b. in Cambridge, England, in 1585; d. in Henrico county, Va., after 1613. His father, Rev. William Whitaker, was master of St. John's college, Cambridge. Alexander was graduated at that university, took orders in the Church of England, and for several years was rector of a parish in the north of England. He settled in Henrico county, Va., in 1611, and during the same year built one church, laid the foundations of another, and "impaled a fine parsonage with a hundred acres of land, calling it Rock Hall." His letters, in which he expresses his great surprise that more of the English clergy did not engage in missionary work, testify also to his usefulness and energy. He baptized Pocahontas, and subsequently officiated at her marriage to John Rolfe. (See POWHATAN.) Mr. Whitaker published "Good News from Virginia," which was one of the first books that were written in that colony (London, 1613).

WHITAKER, Ephraim, clergyman, b. in Fairfield, Cumberland co., N. J., 27 March, 1820. He was graduated at Delaware college in 1847 and at Union theological seminary in 1851, and since that date has been pastor of the 1st Presbyterian church, Southold, Long Island, N. Y. He has been stated clerk of the Long Island presbytery since 1851, moderator of the synod of New York and New Jersey in 1860 and in 1861, has been a councillor of the Long Island historical society since 1862, and is a vice-president of the Suffolk county historical society and a founder of Southold academy. He received the degree of A. M. from Yale in 1867, and of D. D. from Delaware college in 1877. Dr. Whitaker has contributed constantly to the magazines for fifty years, and his writings in book-form include "New Fruits from an Old Field" (New York, 1865); "A Collection of Original Hymns" (printed privately, 1872); "History of Southold from 1640 till 1740" (1881); "Old Town Records" (1882); and "Bi-Centennial Celebration of Suffolk County, N. Y." (Babylon, L. I., 1883).

WHITAKER, Nathaniel, clergyman, b. on Long Island, N. Y., 22 Feb., 1732; d. in Woodbridge, Va., 21 Jan., 1795. He was graduated at Princeton in 1752, and from that year until 1761 was pastor of a Presbyterian church at Chelsea, near Norwich, Conn. He was then deputed by the Connecticut branch of the Scotch society for the advancement of learning to visit England, Scotland, and Wales, to obtain donations for the establishment of an institution for the education and christianization of the North American Indians. He was accompanied by Rev. Samson Occom, an educated Indian of the Mohegan tribe. The mission met with favor in both Scotland and England, the Earl of Dartmouth, then secretary of American affairs, generously promoting their object by his benefactions. George III., it is said, contributed £400 to the cause. Dr. Whitaker returned with an endowment of £11,000, which was devoted to "Moor's Indian charity-school." (See WHEELOCK, ELEAZAR.) After his return from Europe, Dr. Whitaker was pastor in Salem for many years, officiating in what was known as the Tabernacle church, which he built and owned. He was an ardent Whig, zealously supporting the cause of the colonists during the Revolution. He subsequently removed to Maine, and finally to Virginia, where he passed his later life. Many of his sermons were published and extensively circulated throughout New England. They include two "Discourses on Reconciliation" (London, 1768), and two "Discourses on Toryism" (Newburyport, Mass., 1777).—His grandson, Daniel Kimball, editor, b. in Sharon, Conn., 13 April, 1801; d. in New Orleans, La., 10 April, 1881, was graduated at Harvard in 1820, studied law, and, removing to South Carolina, became the partner of John Lyde Wilson, of that state. He practised with success, but his taste was for literature, and he became the founder and editor of several periodicals that included the "Southern Literary Journal," "Whitaker's Magazine," and the "Southern Quarterly Review," which he founded in Charleston, S. C., in 1841, and conducted successfully until the civil war. He removed to New Orleans in 1866, where he founded and edited for many years the "New Orleans Monthly Review." He was corresponding secretary of the New Orleans academy of sciences. Mr. Whitaker united with the Roman Catholic church in 1878.—His wife, Mary Scrimzeour, author, b. in Beaufort district, S. C., 22 Feb., 1820, is the daughter of Rev. Samuel Furman, of South Carolina. She was educated in Edinburgh, contributed her first poems to the Scottish press under the auspices of Thomas Campbell, and was favorably reviewed by the critics of that city. She married in 1837 John Miller, a Scotch attorney, who died three months afterward. Mrs. Miller then returned to this country, and in 1849 married Mr. Whitaker. Her publications include many magazine articles, a collection of "Poems" (Philadelphia, 1850), and "Albert Hastings," a novel (1868).—Their daughter, Lily C., poet, b. in Charleston, S. C., about 1850, was educated in New Orleans, contributed to the "Southern Quarterly," under her father's direction, and has written for the New Orleans press. She has published "Donata, and other Poems" (New Orleans, 1880).

WHITAKER, Ozi William, P. E. bishop, b. in New Salem, Mass., 10 May, 1830. He was graduated at Middlebury college, Vt., in 1856, was principal of the high-school in North Brookfield, Mass., for nearly four years, and then entered the General theological seminary, New York, where he was graduated in 1863. He was ordered deacon in Grace church, Boston, Mass., 15 July, 1863, by Bishop Eastburn, ordained priest in St. Stephen's chapel, Boston, 7 Aug., 1863, by the same bishop, went at once to Nevada, and was made rector of St. John's, Gold Hill. He returned to the east in 1865, and became rector of St. Paul's church, Englewood, N. J. Mr. Whitaker went to Nevada again in 1867, and became rector of St. Paul's church, Virginia City. He was elected missionary bishop of Nevada by the general convention in New York in 1868, and consecrated in St. George's church, New York, 13 Oct., 1869. He received the degree of D. D. from Kenyon college, Ohio, in the same year. Bishop Whitaker was elected assistant bishop of Pennsylvania and translated in 1886. Upon the death of Bishop Stevens, 11 June, 1887, he became bishop of Pennsylvania. He attended the third Pan-Anglican council in London in 1888. He has published occasional sermons.

WHITAKER, Walter C., soldier, b. in Shelby county, Ky., in August, 1823; d. in Lyndon, Ky., 9 July, 1887. He received his education at Bethany college, West Virginia, under the presidency of Alexander Campbell, and had begun the study of law, when, at the opening of the war with Mexico, he entered the regiment of Kentucky volunteers as a lieutenant and served with gallantry. At the end of the war he resumed his legal studies, and soon afterward he opened an office at Shelbyville, Ky., devoting himself chiefly to criminal law, in which he won reputation. He also carried on a large farm, and took an active part in politics. He was a member of the state senate in 1861, when Kentucky was invaded by the Confederate army, which, early in September, took possession of Columbus. He offered the resolution, which was almost unanimously adopted, "that the governor be requested to call out the military force of the state to expel and drive out the invaders." This resolution terminated the sham neutrality the state had undertaken to uphold. Soon afterward Senator Whitaker entered the military service as colonel of the 6th Kentucky infantry, which was mustered in early in September, and moved to meet Gen. Simon B. Buckner's advance to Muldraugh's hill. From that time till the close of the war his service was constant. He took an active part in the battle of Shiloh, in which his regiment lost 103 killed or wounded, and also in the battle of Stone river, and on 25 June, 1863, he was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers. At Chickamauga his brigade was in the reserve corps that marched upon the field at the critical moment and repelled the assault of the enemy on the National right. At the capture of Lookout Mountain he was wounded, but he continued on the field. He was subsequently in all the engagements of the Atlanta campaign and the battle of Nashville, and was promoted brevet major-general for gallant services. At the end of the war he returned to the practice of his profession at Louisville, and became connected with some of the most famous criminal trials in that region. He was a man of marked individuality of manner and character, and of an impetuous temper, which involved him in numerous personal difficulties, and led to his becoming for a time an inmate of an insane asylum. But in his later years he fully recovered his health, and had his share of legal practice.

WHITCHER, Frances Miriam, author, b. in Whitestown, Oneida co., N. Y., 1 Nov., 1811; d. there, 4 Jan., 1852. She was the daughter of Lewis Berry. While only two years old, and ignorant of the alphabet, she learned to recite long pieces of poetry, and she began very early to make rhymes, one of her earliest efforts being a parody on "My Mother." She was educated in the village schools, and in 1846 became a contributor to "Neal's Saturday Gazette." She sent to the latter publication many poems, and "Widow Bedott's Table-Talk," her best-known work; and to "Godey's Lady's Book" "Aunt Maguire" and "Letters from Timberville." She also wrote for other journals. On 6 Jan., 1847, she married the Rev. Benjamin W. Whitchee, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal church, and in the following spring she removed with her husband to Elmira, N. Y. While Mrs. Whitchee was at the height of her fame as a humorous author, and while her writings were everywhere in demand, she was assailed with vituperation and personal insult by those who fancied that they had unwittingly served as models for her sketches. So high ran the tide of angry feeling in Elmira that it soon became apparent that Mr. Whitchee's usefulness as a clergyman would find fewer obstacles in some other parish. In the autumn of 1850 Mrs. Whitchee returned to Whitestown, and soon afterward she began to suffer severely from the disease that caused her death. Before leaving Elmira she had begun the story of "Mary Elmer," and continued it in her old home, but died before it was completed. In addition to her literary ability, Mrs. Whitcheer was a clever caricaturist, and illustrated the "Table Talk" when it first appeared in the "Gazette." After her death her writings were collected in two volumes: "The Widow Bedott Papers, with an Introduction by Alice B. Neal" (New York, 1855), and "Widow Spriggins, Mary Elmer, and Other Sketches, by Mrs. F. M. Whitcheer; Edited, with Memoir, by Mrs. M. L. Ward Whitcheer" (1867).

WHITCOMB, James, senator, b. near Windsor, Vt., 1 Dec., 1795; d. in New York city, 4 Oct., 1852. His father removed to Ohio and settled near Cincinnati when James was quite young. The boy prepared himself to enter Transylvania university, where he maintained himself by teaching during his vacations. On leaving college he entered a law-office, and in 1822 was admitted to the bar of Fayette county, Ky., where he practised for two years. He then removed to Bloomington, Ind., where he soon made a reputation in his profession, and in 1826 was appointed prosecuting attorney of his circuit. In discharging the duties of this office he travelled over a large extent of country, and became acquainted with many men of note. In 1830 and 1833 he was elected to the state senate, where he did much to stay the progress of the "internal improvement" fever that was then at its highest point. In October, 1836, he was appointed a commissioner of the general land-office. He was re-appointed by President Van Buren, and continued to serve until the end of the latter's term. Early in 1841 he returned to Indiana and opened a law-office in Terre Haute. Business came quickly, and he soon acquired a lucrative practice. He was nominated for governor in 1843 by the Democrats, and elected by 2,013 majority. In 1846 he was re-elected by nearly 4,000 majority. When he entered office Indiana was loaded down with a debt upon which no interest had been paid for years; when he left office the debt had been adjusted, and the public credit was restored. He also, by his efforts, created a public sentiment that demanded the establishment of benevolent and reformatory institutions, and he awakened the people to the importance of establishing common schools and providing a fund for their maintenance. During his term of office he raised five regiments of infantry that represented the state in the Mexican war. The legislature of 1849 elected him to the U. S. senate for the full term, beginning in March of that year, but he was unable, owing to feeble health, to discharge his senatorial duties as he wished, and died of a painful disease when he had served little more than half his term. In 1843 he wrote a pamphlet entitled "Facts for the People," which is considered by many one of the most effective arguments against a protective tariff that has ever been written. As a lawyer Gov. Whitcomb ranked high. It was his custom in presenting a case to the jury first to give his opponent's side of the question, that he might the easier demolish it afterward. Thomas A. Hendricks said: "Gov. Whitcomb . . . declared what he believed to be the truth, and trusted to its influence upon men's minds to bring them into common action. He led legislators because it was safest for them to follow. His manner was grave and serious, his voice was full and musical, and his delivery almost without gesture."

WHITCOMB, John, soldier, b. in Lancaster, Mass., in 1713; d. there, 17 Nov., 1785. He won renown as colonel of Massachusetts troops in the campaigns against Crown Point, Ticonderoga, and Montreal—1755, 1758, and 1760—and was one of the Provincial committee of war in 1756. Though uneducated, and never self-seeking, he became a noted leader of the people, and in 1773 was chosen a member of the council. Feb. 5, 1775, the Provincial congress appointed him a general officer. In that capacity his energy was shown in the pursuit of the British forces on their retreat from Concord, 19 April. Jan. 3, 1775, he was elected "first major-general of the Massachusetts army," and during the battle of Bunker Hill had command at Lechmere Point. It was expected that Whitcomb's name would be among the brigadier-generals first announced by the Continental congress. He, however, was not so commissioned until 5 June, 1776, when Washington proposed to have him relieve Gen. Artemas Ward. Whitcomb declined the commission, excusing himself because of age.

WHITE, Albert Smith, senator, b. in Bloomington Grove, Orange co., N. Y., 24 Oct., 1803; d. in Stockwell, Tippecanoe co., Ind., 4 Sept., 1864. He was graduated at Union in 1822, in the class with William H. Seward. After studying law he was admitted to the bar in 1825, and soon afterward removed to Indiana. In March, 1829, he opened an office in Lafayette, where, and in the neighboring town of Stockwell, he resided until his death. During the session of 1828-'9 he reported the proceedings of the Indiana legislature for an Indianapolis journal, the first work of the kind that had been done in the state. In 1830-'1 he was assistant clerk of the Indiana house of representatives, and from 1832 till 1835 he served as its clerk. In 1832 he was a candidate for congress in opposition to Edward A. Hannegan, but was defeated. Four years later he was elected, serving from 4 Sept., 1837, till 3 March, 1839. The year before he had been an elector on the Whig ticket. In 1839 Mr. White was elected to the U. S. senate as the successor of Gen. John Tipton. There were three candidates, and he was not chosen until the 36th ballot. In the senate he opposed the annexation of Texas, as well as every other measure that tended to extend the area of slavery. He was also active in securing grants of land to aid in the extension of the Wabash and Erie canal. On the expiration of his senatorial term in 1845 he resumed the practice of law, but soon abandoned it to become actively engaged in the construction of railroads. He was president of the Indianapolis and Lafayette road from its organization until 1856, and for three years was also at the head of the Wabash and Western railway. In 1860 Mr. White was elected to congress as a Republican, and served from 4 July, 1861, till 3 March, 1863. He was made chairman of a select committee whose duty it was to consider the question of compensated emancipation, and reported a bill appropriating $180,000,000 to pay loyal owners for their slaves, and $20,000,000 to aid in the colonization of the freedmen. This measure was recommended and supported by Mr. Lincoln with all the influence of his office. In presenting the bill, Mr. White accompanied it with an elaborate report on slavery as a social and political problem. He contended that the white and black races should be separated, and the latter colonized in the equatorial regions of America. He also assured the south that if his proposition were not accepted, their slaves would ultimately be taken from them without compensation. Mr. White, at the close of his term, failed to secure a renomination, mainly on account of his action on this question. He was named by the president one of three commissioners to adjust the claims of citizens of Minnesota and Dakota against the government for Indian depredations. On the death of Caleb B. Smith, 7 Jan., 1864, President Lincoln appointed Mr. White U. S. judge for the district of Indiana, but he lived to discharge the duties of the office only a few months.

WHITE, Alexander, legislator, b. in Rappahannock county, Va., in 1738; d. in Woodville, in the same county, in September, 1804. He was remarkable for his eloquence and patriotism and took an active part in the political agitation that preceded the Revolution. He sat as a delegate in the Continental congress in 1786-'88, was elected a representative from Virginia in the 1st congress, and re-elected to the 2d, serving from 4 March, 1789, till 2 March, 1793.

WHITE, Alexander, merchant, b. in Elgin, Scotland, 13 March, 1814; d. in Lake Forest, Ill., 18 March, 1872. He was one of the early settlers of Chicago, where he arrived in the spring of 1837. Until 1857 he was a merchant, being the first dealer in Chicago in fine-art goods. From 1857 till 1867 he was engaged in real estate investments, establishing the great auction sales that have played an important part in the city's development. Retiring from business in 1867 to devote himself to the collection of flowers and paintings, he purchased an estate at Lake Forest, which he made among the most artistic in the west. In 1859 he built in his Chicago residence the first private art-gallery in Illinois, exhibiting his paintings for the benefit of the city. In 1866 he sold this collection at auction, and in 1869 he opened a gallery at his residence at Lake Forest with 160 works of art. Returning from Europe with a third collection when the great fire of 1871 occurred, his losses induced him to sell his treasures at auction the same year in New York city. His artistic taste found further expression in the cultivation of flowers, especially of camelias and orchids, his collection being recognized as the most complete in the northwest.

WHITE, Alexander, lawyer, b. in Franklin, Robertson co., Tenn., 16 Oct., 1816. He was taken to Alabama when five years of age, and educated there and at the University of Tennessee, but he volunteered in the Creek and Seminole war in 1836, and therefore was not graduated. He subsequently studied law with his father, John White (1784-1842), who was one of the circuit and supreme court judges of Alabama. On his admission to the bar in 1838 he practised at first as the associate of his father, and afterward (1841-'55) as the partner of Lewis E. Parsons at Talladega. He was elected to congress as a Union Whig after an exciting contest in a Democratic district, and served from 1 Dec., 1851, till 3 March, 1853. In 1856 he removed to Selma, and in 1860 he supported Bell and Everett for president and vice-president. He earnestly opposed secession, but decided to act with his state when that event became inevitable. At the close of the war he was a member of the convention to frame a new constitution for Alabama, and he was elected to the general assembly of the state in 1872. In the following year he was chosen to congress as a Republican, and served from 1 Dec., 1873, till 4 March, 1875. In the latter year he was appointed an associate justice of the U. S. court for the territory of Utah. After holding the office for a brief term he returned to Alabama, and in 1875 removed to Dallas, Tex., where he practises his profession.

WHITE, Andrew, clergyman, b. in London, England, about 1579; d. there, 27 Dec., 1656. He was educated at Douay college, France, where he was ordained priest in 1605. After his return to England in 1606 he was arrested, with sixteen other priests, and sentenced to perpetual banishment. He entered the Society of Jesus on 2 Feb., 1609, returned to England at the risk of his life, and was engaged in missionary duties there until 1619. He was subsequently professor of theology and Hebrew in Valladolid and Seville, and of divinity in Douay and Liège. In 1633 he was chosen by the Jesuit general, Mutius Vitelleschi, to accompany Lord Baltimore to this country, with some other Jesuits. After landing he devoted himself to the conversion of the Piscataway and Patuxent Indians, as well as to those in the neighborhood of the new settlements. He returned to Europe subsequently, and brought back more missionaries. Father White learned the language of the Indians, and compiled a grammar, vocabulary, and catechism. They were all supposed to be lost, until Father William McSherry discovered the catechism in the Jesuit archives at Rome. Father White was summoned to sit in the first colonial assembly of Maryland; but his request to be excused from taking part in secular affairs was granted. The "Extracts from the Letters of the Missionaries," appended to his "Relatio Itineris in Marylandiam," give some very interesting details about his labors and success among the Indians of Patapaco, Piscataway, and Patuxent. In 1644 he was seized by a band of Claiborne's soldiers and sent in irons to England, where he was imprisoned on a charge of violating the law concerning "missionary popish priests." After great suffering he was released and banished from the country. He petitioned his superiors to be allowed to go to Maryland; but his request being refused, on the ground of his age and infirmities, he returned to England under an assumed name, and was there engaged in missionary duties. Further accounts of him are vague and uncertain, although the place and date of his death are given in the official records of the Jesuit order. He wrote "Relatio Itineris in Marylandiam," which, with "Declaratio coloniae Domini Baronis de Baltimore" and "Excerpta ex Diversis Litteris Missionariorum ab anno 1635 ad annum 1638," has been published, accompanied by a translation, by the Maryland historical society (Baltimore, 1874).

WHITE, Andrew Dickson, educator, b. in Homer, N. Y., 7 Nov., 1832. He was of New England parentage, studied one year at Hobart college, N. Y., and passed the remainder of his collegiate course at Yale, where he was graduated in 1853. After graduation he spent about two years in Europe, chiefly at Paris and Berlin, in the prosecution of historical studies. He was also attaché to the American legation in St. Petersburg for six months, and travelled on foot through many of the historical localities of the continent, especially in northern and western France.

He returned home in 1856, studied history for one year at Yale, and in 1857 was elected professor of history and English literature in the University of Michigan. In 1862 he resigned in consequence of impaired health, returned to Syracuse, where he had formerly resided, was elected to the state senate for that place, and was re-elected in 1864. While state senator he introduced bills that codified the school laws, created the new system of normal schools, and incorporated Cornell university. In 1867 he became first president of Cornell, which post he filled until failing health compelled him to retire in 1885. He visited Europe in 1867-'8 for the purpose of examining into the organization of the principal schools of agriculture and technology and of purchasing books and apparatus for his university at the request of its trustees. In January, 1871, he was appointed one of the U. S. commissioners to Santo Domingo, and aided in preparing the report of the commission. He was president of the Republican state convention of New York in October, 1871, and was U. S. minister to Germany from 1879 till 1881. From his own resources President White contributed about $100,000 to the equipment of Cornell university, and on 19 Jan., 1887, he endowed the new school of history and political science in that institution with his historical library numbering 30,000 volumes, besides 10,000 valuable pamphlets and many manuscripts, all of which cost him more than $100,000. As a permanent tribute to him the board of college managers decided to designate the new school as "The President White school of history and political science." Besides contributions to periodicals, he has published "Outlines of a Course of Lectures on History" (Detroit, 1861); "A Word from the Northwest" (London, 1863), in response to strictures in the American "Diary" of Dr. William Howard Russell; "Syllabus of Lectures on Modern History" (Ithaca, 1876); "The Warfare of Science" (New York, 1876); "The New Germany" (1882); "On Studies in General History and in the History of Civilization" (1885); and "A History of the Doctrine of Comets" (1886).—His cousin, Edwin, artist, b. in South Hadley, Mass., 21 May, 1817; d. in Saratoga Springs, N. Y., 7 June, 1877, began to paint when he was a boy, was elected an associate of the National academy in 1848, and in the following year became a full academician. In 1850, and again in 1869, he went abroad, and studied in Paris, Rome, Florence, and Düsseldorf. He returned to the United States in 1875, and opened a studio in New York. He executed a large number of paintings, most of them historical. These include "Washington resigning his Commission," which was bought by Maryland for $6,000, and now in Annapolis; "Milton's Visit to Galileo"; "Requiem of De Soto"; "Pocahontas informing Smith of the Conspiracy of the Indians"; "Old Age of Milton" (1848); and "First Printing of the Bible." Among his portraits are those of Elihu Burritt and S. Wells Williams. He bequeathed his "Antiquary" to the Metropolitan museum (New York), "Leonardo da Vinci and his Pupils" (1868) to Amherst college, and an unfinished picture of the signing of the compact on the "Mayflower" to Yale. The New York historical society owns his "Murillo sketching the Beggar-Boy" (1865); the Museum of fine arts, Boston, his "Interior of the Bargello, Florence" (1875); and his "Age's Revery" (1847) is at the U. S. military academy, West Point.

WHITE, Anthony Walton, soldier, b. in New Brunswick, N. J., 7 July, 1750; d. there, 10 Feb., 1803. He was descended from Anthony White, a royalist, who, after the execution of Charles I., removed to Bermuda and became connected with the government of the islands, of which his son,

Anthony, and grandson, Leonard, were chief justices. Leonard's son, Anthony, removed to this country and married Elizabeth, daughter of Gov. Lewis Morris, of New Jersey. Their son, Anthony Walton, received his education under the immediate direction of his father, who was a man of great wealth and the holder of several important offices. Until the age of twenty-five his time was employed in study and in assisting his father in the management of his large estates. In October, 1775, he obtained a commission as major and aide-de-camp to Gen. Washington. On 9 Feb., 1776, he was commissioned by congress as lieutenant-colonel of the 3d battalion of New Jersey troops, and he was actively engaged in the service at the north till 1780, being successively appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 4th regiment of light dragoons in the Continental army, 13 Feb., 1777, lieutenant-colonel commandant of the 1st regiment, 10 Dec., 1779, and colonel, 16 Feb., 1780. At this time he was ordered by Washington to take command of all the cavalry in the southern army, and upon his own personal credit equipped two regiments, with which to operate against Lord Cornwallis in South Carolina. On 6 May, 1780, with the remnant of Maj. Benjamin Huger's cavalry, he crossed Santee river and captured a small party of British; but while waiting at Lanneau's ferry to recross the river he was surprised and defeated by Col. Banastre Tarleton, and he and many of his troops were taken prisoners. In 1781 he was ordered to join the army under Lafayette in Virginia, and on his march to that state had several successful encounters with Col. Tarleton. He was present with Gen. Anthony Wayne in the movement of that commander before Savannah on 21 May, 1782; and, on the evacuation of that place, returned to Charleston, S. C., where he became security for the debts of the officers and men of his regiments, who were in want of almost all the necessaries of life. These debts he was subsequently obliged to pay at enormous sacrifices of his own property, and, on returning to the north at the close of the war, his financial ruin was completed by entering into speculation at the persuasion of military friends. In 1793 he removed from New York, where he had resided for about ten years, to his native town, and in the following year was appointed by President Washington general of cavalry in the expedition against the western insurgents. Gen. White died at a comparatively early age, and was buried in the grounds of Christ church, in his native place. See "Memoir of Brig.-Gen. Anthony Walton White," by Anna M. W. Woodhull (Newark, 1882).

WHITE, Charles, clergyman, b. in Randolph, Vt., 28 Dec., 1795; d. in Crawfordsville, Ind., 29 Oct., 1861. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1821, studied at Andover in 1821-'3, and was pastor of the Congregational church in Thetford, Vt., in 1825-'9, and of the Presbyterian church at Cazenovia, N. Y., in 1829-'33. From 1834 till 1841 he was pastor of the Presbyterian church at Owego, N. Y., and from 1841 till 1861 he was president of Wabash college, Crawfordsville, Ind. He received the degree of D. D. from Union in 1840. Besides many sermons, he published "Essays in Literature and Ethics" (Boston, 1853).

WHITE, Charles Abiathar, geologist, b. in North Dighton, Mass., 26 Jan., 1826. He removed to Iowa in 1839, and was graduated at Rush medical college in 1863. Three years later he became state geologist of Iowa, which appointment he held until 1870, and in 1867-'73 he was professor of natural history in the Iowa state university. In 1873 he was called to the same chair in Bowdoin, but he resigned two years later, and during 1874 was geologist and paleontologist to the U. S. geographical and geological surveys west of the 100th meridian under Lieut. George M. Wheeler. He then passed to the service of the survey under Maj. John W. Powell in 1875, and in 1876 to that under Ferdinand V. Hayden, with whom he remained until 1879. Dr. White had charge of the palæontological collections in the U. S. national museum in 1879-'82, and in 1881 was detailed to act as chief of the artesian wells commission upon the Great Plains under the auspices of the U. S. agricultural department. Since 1882 he has been connected with the U. S. geological survey, first as geologist, and since 1883 as palæontologist in charge of the division of mesozoic invertebrates. His knowledge of his specialty has gained for him a reputation as an authority that is unequalled in certain branches of fossil life. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Iowa college, and he holds an honorary curatorship in the U. S. national museum. He is a member of scientific societies, was president of the Biological society of Washington in 1883-'4, and was elected a vice-president of the American association for the advancement of science in 1888. His writings include nearly 200 papers, of which the most important are included in the reports of the various surveys with which he has been connected, also a work on the cretaceous invertebrates of Brazil, which were collected by the Imperial geological commission, under the direction of the late Charles F. Hartt, to form vol. vii. of the "Archives of the Brazilian National Museum" (Rio de Janeiro, 1887). See "Annotated Catalogue of the Published Writings of Charles Abiathar White, 1860-1885," by John B. Marcou (Washington, 1885).

WHITE, Charles Ignatius, R. C. clergyman, b. in Baltimore, Md., in 1807; d. in Washington, D. C., 1 April, 1877. He was graduated at St. Mary's college, Baltimore, in 1823, and became a Roman Catholic priest. He was at the time of his death, and had been for twenty years preceding, the pastor of St. Matthew's church in Washington, D. C. He edited the "Catholic Almanac" in 1834-'57, and founded and edited the "Religious Cabinet" in 1842, a monthly magazine, which was replaced in 1843 by the "United States Catholic Magazine." This again was replaced in 1849 by a weekly paper, the "Catholic Mirror." He translated and edited Jaime Lucio Balme's "Protestantism and Catholicity compared in their Effects on the Civilization of Europe" (New York, 1850); also Chateaubriand's "Genius of Christianity" (1856); and wrote a "Life of Mrs. Eliza A. Seton" (1853).

WHITE, Daniel Appleton, jurist, b. in the part of Methuen which is now Lawrence, Mass., 7 June, 1776; d. in Salem, Mass., 30 March, 1861. He was graduated at Harvard in 1797, was teacher of the Medford grammar-school in 1797-'9 and Latin tutor in Harvard in 1799-1803. He began the study of law at Cambridge, was admitted to the bar in 1804, and engaged in practice in Newburyport, where he resided till January, 1817, when he removed to Salem. He was a member of the Massachusetts legislature in 1810-'15, was chosen to congress in 1814, but declined to serve, and was elected judge of probate of Essex county, Mass., which office he held for thirty-eight years. He was for many years an active member of the Essex institute, to which he gave 8,000 volumes, and of the Massachusetts historical society. Judge White was the author of a "Eulogy on George Washington" (Haverhill, 1800); "View of the Jurisdiction of the Court of Probate in Massachusetts" (Salem, 1822); "Eulogy on Nathaniel Bowditch" (1822); and "New England Congregationalism, in its Origin and Purity" (1861); and aided John Pickering in preparing his edition of Sallust (1805). See a memoir of Judge White by James Walker, written for the Massachusetts historical society (1863), and also one by George W. Briggs for the Essex institute (1864).

WHITE, David Nye, journalist, b. in Wareham, Mass., 22 Aug., 1805; d. in Sewickley, Pa., 1 April, 1888. He was descended from Peregrine White, and his father, Ebenezer, served through the Revolutionary war. He removed with his parents to Ohio soon after the war of 1812; was a printer in Canton, Ohio, and Rochester, N. Y., in December, 1827, removed to Pittsburg, Pa., and in 1841 purchased the Pittsburg "Gazette," of which he was also editor. He was opposed to slavery, and, despairing of accomplishing anything to benefit the slaves through the existing political parties, he published a call in 1855 for a county convention to form a new party. The call had few signers, but, when the convention met, every district in the county was represented by a duly elected delegate. A ticket was nominated, and from this beginning, it is claimed, sprang the Republican party. Mr. White was collector of internal revenue of the 23d district of Pennsylvania for four years, a member of the state house of representatives three years, and a delegate at large to the Constitutional convention of 1873-'4.

WHITE, Edward Douglas, statesman, b. in Tennessee in March, 1795; d. in New Orleans, La., 18 April, 1847. He removed with his father, James, who was subsequently appointed judge of western Louisiana, to Attakapas parish, La., in 1799. He was educated at the University of Tennessee, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began to practise at Donaldsonville, but, on being appointed to a judgeship in New Orleans, he removed thither. He was elected to congress for three consecutive terms, and served from 7 Dec., 1829, till 15 Nov., 1834, when, having been elected governor, he resigned. He was governor of Louisiana in 1834-'8, afterward removed to a sugar-plantation near Thibodeaux, and was again elected as a Whig to congress, serving from 2 Dec., 1839, till 3 March, 1843. He was on the steamer "Lioness" when she was set on fire by an explosion of gunpowder, 19 May, 1833, and narrowly escaped death.—His son, Edward Douglas, jurist, b. in Lafourche parish, La., 3 Nov., 1845, was educated at Mt. St. Mary's college, Emmitsburg, Md., and the Jesuit's college in New Orleans. During the civil war he served in the Confederate army. He then studied and practised law, was a state senator in 1874-'8, and judge of the Louisiana supreme court in 1878-'80, and on 29 May, 1888, was elected U. S. senator for the term beginning on 4 March, 1889.

WHITE, Emerson Elbridge, educator, b. in Mantua, Portage co., Ohio, 10 Jan., 1829. He was educated at Ewinsburg academy and the University of Cleveland, taught in the former institution, and was afterward an instructor of mathematics in Cleveland university, and principal of the Central high-school in that city. He became superintendent of the public schools of Portsmouth, Ohio, in 1856, state commissioner of common schools in 1863, and was president of Purdue university, Lafayette, Ind., in 1876-'83, and since that time has been superintendent of schools in Cincinnati, Ohio. He was president of the Ohio teachers' association in 1863, of the National superintendents' association in 1866, of the National education association in 1872, and of the National council of education in 1884-'6. Mr. White was editor and proprietor of the "Ohio Educational Monthly" from 1861 till 1875, and of the "National Teacher" from 1870 till 1875, writer of the memorial to congress on the National bureau of education, and author of the accompanying bill that was introduced by James A. Garfield, and subsequently passed. He has published several school text-books, and a work entitled "Elements of Pedagogy."—His nephew, Emory Calvin, traveller, b. in Monterey, Allegan co., Mich., 15 Oct., 1858, was educated at Michigan university and at Purdue university, where he taught for three years. He then became superintendent of schools at Albion, Ind., but resigned in order to accept the presidency of the American college at Callao, Peru. After filling this post for a time, he relinquished it for the sake of studying the ruins of the Incas, among which he spent three years, excavating, photographing, and surveying. He then traversed the upper Amazon, visited Bolivia, Chili, Brazil, the Argentine Republic, and Spain, in search of further information regarding the Inca and pre-Inca races, returning to the United States in 1886, and is writing histories of Peru, Chili, the Argentine Republic, and Brazil.

WHITE, Francis J., soldier, b. in New York city in 1842; d. in San Francisco, 29 Aug., 1875. He was the eldest son of James H. White, who was at one time judge of the superior court of New York. Francis received a good education, and early in life contributed articles to magazines. At the opening of the civil war he joined the 10th New York regiment, participated in the battle of Bull Run, and was subsequently on the peninsula with Gen. Benjamin F. Butler. He then served under Frémont, and in October, 1861, at the head of his "prairie scouts," recaptured Lexington, Mo. In the autumn of 1861 he was transferred to the Army of the Mississippi, and in the autumn of 1862 he followed Porter, the guerilla chief, for thirteen days and routed his band. At one period of the war he was provost-marshal and judge-advocate-general in central Missouri, and in the closing years of the contest he was governor of the eastern shore of Maryland. He was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, 13 March, 1865, and was offered a captaincy in the regular army, which he declined. After serving a short time in Texas, he removed to St. Louis, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and elected to the legislature. He subsequently went to California, where he resided till his death, which was the result of disease contracted during the war.

WHITE, George Leonard, educator, b. in Cadiz, Cattaraugus co., N. Y., 20 Sept., 1838. He was the son of a blacksmith, and while attending school assisted his father in the shop. When he was fourteen years old his father's health gave way, and the support of the family devolved upon him and his sisters. He conducted his father's business, but studied in leisure hours, removed to Chillicothe, Ohio, and began to teach. In 1862 he enlisted in the 73d Ohio regiment, and fought at Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Lookout Valley, and Lookout Mountain. At the close of the war he entered the employ of the Freedmen's bureau, but in 1868 he resigned to give his entire time to the work of Fisk university. Mr. White had heard the simple negro songs that came into being during the days of slavery, and he resolved to form a band of his best voices to sing these songs in the large cities of the north in aid of the university. His means were limited, but, embarking his all in the enterprise, he left Nashville with his jubilee singers on 6 Oct., 1871. By May, 1872, he had remitted to the college $20,000. The troupe was everywhere received with enthusiasm, and a second tour netted as much as the first. Early in 1874 they went to Europe, where a like reception met them. They sang before Queen Victoria and nearly every crowned head on the continent, and returned with a gain of $50,000. The total sum that was realized to the institution was $155,000. With the funds thus acquired twenty-five acres on a commanding eminence near Nashville have been purchased, and a fine building has been erected, which has been called Jubilee Hall.

WHITE, George Savage, clergyman, b. in Bath, England, in 1784; d. after 1839. He studied at Chestnut college, and was ordained a clergyman of the Church of England at Lady Huntingdon's chapel, Brighton, in 1809. He afterward came to this country and was a minister in Rhode Island. His publications include "Christian Memorial: containing God's Abundant Grace and Providential Kindness to the Author," and "Memoir of Samuel Slater, the Father of American Manufactures" (2d ed., Philadelphia, 1846).

WHITE, Harry, soldier, b. in Indiana county, Pa., 12 Jan., 1834. He received a collegiate education, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1855, and practised at Indiana, Pa., till the beginning of the civil war, when he entered the National service as major of the 67th Pennsylvania infantry. While in the army he was elected a state senator, serving in the winter of 1862-'3. He afterward returned to his command, was captured by the Confederate troops, and retained as a prisoner sixteen months, but escaped and reached the National lines near Atlanta in October, 1864. He returned to his command, served till the end of the war, was promoted to a colonelcy, and was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers, 2 March, 1865. He was re-elected to the senate of Pennsylvania in 1865, and served by successive elections till 1874, being speaker at the close of the term of 1871. In 1872 he was elected a delegate-at-large to the State constitutional convention, and he served in congress from Pennsylvania in 1877-'81, having been chosen as a Republican.

WHITE, Henry, clergyman, b. in Wilbraham, Mass., 3 Aug., 1790; d. in Garland, Me., 8 Dec., 1858. He was graduated at Bangor theological seminary in 1823, ordained over the Congregational church at Brooks and Jackson, Me., 19 Oct., 1825, and was pastor in various towns in that state and New Hampshire till 7 Nov., 1858. He published "Early History of New England, illustrated with Numerous Early Incidents" (Concord, 1841).

WHITE, Henry Clay, educator, b. in Baltimore, Md., 30 Dec., 1850. He was graduated at the University of Virginia in 1870, and was professor of chemistry in the Maryland institute, Baltimore, and then in St. John's college, Annapolis, Md., in 1871-'2. In the same year he was science lecturer in the Peabody institute, Baltimore, and in the latter year he was appointed professor of chemistry in the University of Georgia, which post he still holds. Since 1880 he has been state chemist of Georgia. In 1881-'2 he was president of the Association of official chemists of the United States, and in 1888 he became chief chemist of the Georgia state experimental station. He received the degree of Ph. D. from the University of Virginia in 1877, and is a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science. Dr. White has published scientific addresses, reports on the chemistry of the cotton-plant and on commercial fertilizers, "The Complete Chemistry of the Cotton-Plant" (Macon, 1873), and, with William Gibbs McAdoo, "Elementary Geology of Tennessee" (Nashville, 1874).

WHITE, Horace, journalist, b. in Colebrook, N. H., 10 Aug., 1834. He was graduated at Beloit college, Wisconsin, in 1853. In 1837 his father, who was a physician, removed to Beloit with his family. After his graduation he engaged in journalism. He was for many years connected with the Chicago "Tribune," and from 1864 till 1874 was its editor and one of its chief proprietors. Conjointly with Edwin L. Godkin he has since 1883 edited the New York "Evening Post." Mr. White has edited Frederic Bastiat's "Sophismes économiques" (Chicago, 1869), and Luigi Cossa's "Scienza delle finanze" (New York, 1888).

WHITE, Hugh, soldier, b. in Dauphin county, Pa., in 1737; d. in 1822. He was a captain in the Pennsylvania line from 19 April, 1775, till 1778, when he was promoted to a colonelcy. He was one of the first commissioners of Lycoming county, and a member of the Pennsylvania assembly in 1795, 1796, and 1803. He served as colonel of Pennsylvania troops in 1812.—His son, Robert Gray, jurist, b. in Selinsgrove, Pa., 21 Jan. 1807; d. in Millsboro', Pa., 6 Sept., 1875, was graduated at Jefferson college in 1826, studied law, and practised in Tioga county, Pa. He was a member of the State constitutional convention of 1838, treasurer of Tioga county in 1841 and 1843, and elected president-judge of the 4th judicial district of Pennsylvania in 1851 and 1861, retiring in 1871.

WHITE, Israel Charles, geologist, b. in Monongalia county, W. Va., 1 Nov., 1848. He was graduated at West Virginia university in 1872, and took a graduate course in geology and chemistry in 1875-'6 in Columbia school of mines. In 1875 he was appointed assistant on the second geological survey of Pennsylvania, where he remained until 1884, and since that year he has been connected with the U. S. geological survey. He was called to the chair of geology in the West Virginia university in 1877, and still retains that appointment. Prof. White was the first geologist to harmonize the Pennsylvania and Ohio coal-measures, and in 1882 he recognized as belonging to the Salina formation rocks in Montour and Columbia counties that had previously been classified either with the Clinton or Lower Helderberg groups. He was also the first to apply the anticlinal idea to the successful location of natural gas and oil wells, and announced his theory in 1885. Prof. White is a member of the American philosophical society and a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science, and has published papers in their transactions and in the "American Journal of Science." He is also the author of nine volumes of the reports of the geological survey of Pennsylvania.

WHITE, James, pioneer, b. in Iredell county, N. C., in 1737; d. in Knoxville, Tenn., in 1815. He served as a soldier during the Revolution, and receiving his pay from North Carolina in a land-warrant, located it, in the summer of 1787, on the northern bank of the Holston river about four miles below the mouth of the French Broad. Here he erected a fort, built a grist-mill, and began a settlement. The place was then on the extreme frontier, and a treaty with the Cherokees being held there in 1791, it attracted the attention of Gov. William Blount, who at once decided to make it the capital of the southwest territory. It was laid out into lots, named Knoxville, and soon attracted to itself a population, whose purchase of his property made White a wealthy man. In September, 1793, the fort, which contained 300 stand of U. S. muskets, and a large amount of ammunition, was threatened with attack from a body of 1,500 Cherokees. In the absence of Gov. Blount and Gen. Sevier, White assumed command of the forty settlers, and prepared for a desperate resistance. The Indians came within eight miles of the fort, and then, alarmed by the near approach of Sevier and his riflemen, suddenly retreated. Mr. White was a member of the territorial legislature, one of those that founded the state of "Franklin" (see SEVIER, JOHN), served as territorial delegate in congress in 1794-'5, and, on the admission of Tennessee into the Union in 1796, was elected to the state senate, and soon afterward chosen the speaker of that body. He held this position till December, 1797, when he resigned to make place for ex-Gov. William Blount, who, for alleged treason, had been expelled from the U. S. senate. In November, 1813, as brigadier-general of Tennessee volunteers, he led a successful attack on the Creek Indians at Hillabee Town.—His son, Hugh Lawson, b. in Iredell county, N. C., 30 Oct., 1773; d. in Knoxville, Tenn., 10 April, 1840, had meagre facilities for education. At the age of fourteen he accompanied his family to the remote backwoods, and there soon afterward began the study of law in a small log office. A war with the Cherokees breaking out when he was seventeen years old, he volunteered as a private under Gen. Sevier, and was with him when he gave that nation its last crushing defeat at the battle of Etowah. Young White doubtless decided that battle, for in the crisis of the fight he levelled his rifle upon their leading chief, King Fisher, and mortally wounded him, whereupon the savages scattered in all directions. At the close of the war he went to Philadelphia to study the classics and mathematics, and read law in the office of James Hopkins in Lancaster, Pa. Then he returned to Knoxville and began practice. For a short time he was private secretary to Gov. Blount. At the age of twenty-eight he was appointed a justice of the supreme court of Tennessee, which office he held for six years, and until he received the appointment of U. S. district attorney. In 1809 he was elected to the state senate, and during the same year he was again appointed to the bench of the supreme court. In 1820 he was again chosen a state senator, and he served in this capacity till 1825. During the session of 1807 he compiled the land laws of the state, and in 1817 he drafted the act against duelling. In 1815 he was elected president of the Bank of Tennessee at Knoxville. In 1822, with Judge Burnett, of Ohio, he had been chosen by Kentucky to adjust the military land claims of Virginia. In October, 1825, Judge White was elected to the U. S. senate to succeed Gen. Andrew Jackson, who had resigned. The first important effort of Judge White in the senate was on the Panama mission, in which he opposed the measure on constitutional grounds. He delivered an able speech, 16 April, 1826, on the apportionment of the judiciary. He opposed a general system of internal improvements by the government, favored a protective tariff, prevented the recharter of the U. S. bank, and ardently supported the action of President Jackson. He served many years on the committee of Indian affairs as its chairman, and urged the policy of removal of the Indians west of the Mississippi. On 16 Feb., 1835, Judge White made his speech in favor of limiting executive patronage, which was regarded as an attack upon the administration. This effort was followed by an able argument against Thomas H. Benton's proposition to expunge from the record resolutions of censure that had been passed against the president. Judge White had voted against these, and had then defended the conduct of the president, but regarded it as unconstitutional to obliterate the record. He was in favor of so amending the resolution as to declare the resolutions of censure "rescinded, repealed, reversed, and declared null and void." From this time the breach between him and the executive became impassable. The convention that had assembled at Baltimore, 20 May, 1836, nominated Martin Van Buren unanimously for president. The fifteen votes of Tennessee were cast by a single citizen of the state, who happened to be in the city; not a single delegate had been sent by Tennessee. Both branches of the assembly of that state, on 16 and 17 Oct., 1835, pronounced in favor of Mr. White, and he accepted the nomination for president. In the elections of 1824 and 1828 Gen. Jackson had practically the entire vote of the state, and the contest was now between him and Judge White, who carried the state by a majority of nearly 10,000. He also secured the electoral vote of Georgia. In the course of three years the enemies of the judge gained the legislature and passed resolutions of instructions that he could not in conscience obey, and he therefore resigned his seat. In the following year the Whigs, under the lead of Gen. Harrison, placed Judge White upon their electoral ticket, but his failing health did not permit him to make the canvass. "A Memoir of Judge White, with Selections from his Speeches and Correspondence," was issued by Nancy N. Scott, one of his descendants (Philadelphia, 1856).

Hugh White

WHITE, John, clergyman, b. in Stanton, St. John, Oxfordshire, England, in 1575; d. in Dorchester, England, 21 July, 1648. He was a kinsman of Bishop John White, whom Queen Elizabeth deprived of the see of Winchester on account of his Romanizing tendencies. The younger John was educated at Winchester and at Oxford, where he became a perpetual fellow in 1595, and in 1606 was appointed rector of Holy Trinity church, Dorchester, which post he held for forty years. In 1624 he projected the new colony of Massachusetts for those who could not conscientiously conform to the discipline and ceremonies of the Church of England, and in 1630 he succeeded in establishing at Mattapan, Mass., which they renamed Dorchester, a party of 140 Puritans from Dorsetshire and the neighboring counties. He became one of the assembly of divines in 1643, and rector of Lambeth in 1645. He was known as the "Patriarch of Dorchester." Edward Everett says of him: "Like Robinson in reference to Plymouth, John White never set foot on the soil of Massachusetts, but he was the most efficient promoter of the undertaking, which resulted in the settlement not merely of our ancient town, but of the colony." See "Dorchester in 1630-1776, and 1855," Edward Everett's "Orations and Speeches" (3 vols., Boston, 1859). White published "The Planter's Plea, or the Grounds of Plantations Examined" (London, 1630); "A Way to the Tree of Life" (1647); and "Commentary on the Three First Chapters of Genesis" (1656).

WHITE, John, English lawyer, b. in Pembroke-shire, Wales, in 1590; d. in London, England, 29 Jan., 1645. He was educated at Jesus college, Oxford, actively engaged against the royalists, and in 1640 became member of parliament for Southwark. In that body he was chairman of the committee on religion, and, says Lord Clarendon, "was notoriously affected against the church." He drew up the first charter of the Massachusetts colony in 1628, which was confirmed by the crown with powers of government in 1629. He is buried in Temple Court, London, and on his tomb is inscribed:

"Here lies a JOHN, a burning, shining light, Whose name and words and actions all were WHITE."

He owed his name of "Century White" to his book, "The First Century of Scandalous, Malignant Priests" (London, 1643). He also wrote "Speech concerning the Trial of Twelve Bishops" (1641); "Speech concerning Episcopacy" (1641); and "The Looking-Glass" (1643 or 1644).

WHITE, John, clergyman, b. in Watertown, Mass., in 1677; d. in Gloucester, Mass., 17 Jan., 1760. He was graduated at Harvard in 1698, afterward was chaplain at Fort Saco, and on 21 April, 1703, became minister of Gloucester, Mass., which pastorate he retained till his death. He published "New England's Lamentation for the Decay of Godliness" (Boston, 1734; London, 1735), and a "Funeral Sermon on John Wise" (1725).

WHITE, John, soldier, b. in England; d. in Virginia about 1780. He was of Irish parentage, and became a surgeon in the British navy, but, leaving the service, he came with his family to this country and settled in Philadelphia. He entered the Revolutionary army as a captain, and was soon promoted colonel of the 4th Georgia battalion. It is claimed that during the siege of Savannah, with a small body of men, by a successful stratagem, he made prisoners of Capt. French and 111 British regulars on Ogeechee river, about twenty-five miles from Savannah, and also the crews of five vessels, forty in number, and 130 stand of arms. He was wounded at the assault of Spring-hill redoubt, 9 Oct., 1779, and obliged to retire from the army.

WHITE, John, member of congress, b. in Kentucky in 1805; d. in Richmond, Ky., 22 Sept., 1845. He received an academical education, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised at Richmond, Ky. He served by successive elections in congress from 7 Dec., 1835, till 3 March, 1845, and was speaker of the 27th congress. He was then appointed judge of the 19th judicial district of his native state, but soon died by his own hand.

WHITE, John Blake, artist, b. near Eutaw Springs, S. C., 2 Sept., 1781; d. in Charleston, S. C., 24 Aug., 1859. He began the study of law in Columbia, S. C., but in 1800 went to England with Washington Allston. After four years of study with Benjamin West, he returned to the United States in 1804. The following year he proceeded to Boston to practise his art, but, not finding sufficient encouragement, he returned to Charleston and finished the study of law. In this profession he achieved success, and was repeatedly elected to the legislature of South Carolina. Although practising art only as an amateur, he produced several creditable historical paintings, among which are "Battle of Eutaw Springs" (1804); "Battle of Fort Moultrie" (1806); "Battle of New Orleans" (1816); and "Marion inviting the British Officer to Dinner" and "Mrs. Motte presenting the Arrows" (1836). He received from the South Carolina institute in 1840 a gold medal for the best historical painting, was elected an honorary member of the National academy in 1847, and was also the recipient of numerous other honors. Among his portraits are those of Charles C. Pinckney, Keating L. Simmons, John C. Calhoun, and Gov. Henry Middleton. He was also noted for his literary attainments, and was the author of the dramas "Foscari, or the Venetian Exile" (1805); "Mysteries of the Castle" (1806); "Modern Honor" (1812); "Triumph of Liberty, or Louisiana preserved" (1819); and "Intemperance" (1839). He has been regarded as the pioneer of literature and art in the south.—His son, Edward Brickell, architect, b. in Charleston, 29 Jan., 1806; d. in New York city, 10 May, 1882, entered the U. S. military academy in 1822, and was graduated four years later. He served in the army for ten years, resigning in 1836, and during that time was frequently detached for engineering duties. Settling in Charleston, he followed successfully his profession as an engineer, being engaged in the building of various railroads. He erected also numerous residences, built Trinity church in Charleston, and designed the monument to Col. William Washington, at Eutaw Springs, and that to William G. Simms, in Charleston. He entered the Confederate army, and served throughout the war. In 1865 he removed to New York, where he remained until his death.—Another son, Octavius Augustus, physician, b. in Charleston, 8 Feb., 1826, was graduated at the College of South Carolina in 1846, and at South Carolina medical college two years later. He began and continued the practice of medicine with success, until the opening of the civil war, when he received the commission of surgeon in the Confederate army. At the close of the war he removed to New York, where he has since resided. He is a member of the New York academy of medicine, and other medical societies. Dr. White first introduced the practice of superficial incisions within the os uteri for the relief of stenotic dysmenorrhœa. He also invented the "hysterotome," an instrument for practising safe incision within the neck of the womb; also novel instruments for the cure of hernia and varicocele, and a new form of laryngoscope. His contributions to medical literature include "New Method of operating for Radical Cure of Hernia" (1851); "Transfusion, with Successful Results, in Cases of Flooding" (1853); "A New and Safe Treatment in Stenotic Dysmenorrhœa" (1855); "Bradycote Treatment of Yellow Fever" (1858); "Report on the Yellow-Fever Epidemic of Wilmington, N. C." (1862); "Varicocele and its Radical Cure" (New York, 1872); "Report on the Yellow-Fever Epidemic in Savannah, Ga." (1876); and "Observations on the Pulse, introducing an Original Instrument of Precision (the Hemarumascopé) for the Demonstration of Arterial and Venous Currents" (1877).

WHITE, John Silas, educator, b. in Wrentham, Mass., 3 Feb., 1847. He served as a private in the 42d Massachusetts infantry during the last year of the civil war, was graduated at Harvard in 1870, was sub-master of the Boston Latin-school in that year, master of the same in 1871-'4, and then founded Brooks academy, Cleveland, Ohio, of which he was head-master in 1874-'80. From the latter year he has been head-master of Berkeley school, New York city, and since 1888 president of the Berkeley lyceum association. From June, 1873, till September, 1874, Mr. White was on a tour of observation from the Boston Latin-school, visiting schools in Europe and studying school systems, and was correspondent of the Boston "Daily Advertiser" on educational topics. In 1879 he received the degree of LL. D. from Trinity. He has contributed occasionally to periodicals, and has published "Boys' and Girls' Plutarch" (New York, 1883); "Boys' and Girls' Herodotus" (1884); and "Boys' and Girls' Pliny" (1885).

WHITE, John Williams, educator, b. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 5 March, 1849. He was graduated at Ohio Wesleyan university in 1868, was professor of Greek and Latin at Willoughby college in 1868-'9, held a similar professorship at Baldwin university in 1869-'71, and from 1871 till 1874 was professor of Greek in the same institution. He visited Europe in 1871-'2, was tutor in Greek at Harvard in 1874-'7, and assistant professor from 1877 till 1884, when, on the death of Prof. Evangelinus A. Sophocles, he was appointed full professor of Greek. He received the degrees Ph. D. and A. M. from Harvard in 1877. He is also one of the two editors of "College Series of Greek Authors," is a member of American and foreign learned societies, and member of the committee in charge of the American school of classical studies at Athens. Prof. White published "Œdipus Tyrannus of Sophocles" (1873); "First Lessons in Greek" (1876); "First Four Books of Xenophon's Anabasis" and "Selections from Xenophon and Herodotus," as joint editor with William W. Goodwin (1877); and "Greek and Latin at Sight" and "Schmidt's Rhythmic and Metric of the Classical Languages" (Boston, 1877); "Stein's Summary of the Dialect of Herodotus" (1880); and the "Realia of Greek Literature" (1882).

WHITE, Joseph M., congressman, b. in Franklin county, Ky., 10 May, 1781; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 19 Oct., 1839. He was carefully educated, studied law, and settled in Pensacola, Fla., where he gained success by his familiarity with French and Spanish, which enabled him to obtain clients from settlers of both these nationalities. He was chosen to congress as a Democrat in 1824, and served till 3 March, 1837, but was defeated at the next election. During his career in congress he was known as an eloquent speaker and debater. He published "New Collection of Laws, Charters, etc., of Great Britain, France, and Spain, relating to the Concessions of Lands with the Laws of Mexico," etc. (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1839).

WHITE, Julius, soldier, b. in Cazenovia, Madison co., N. Y., 29 Sept., 1816; d. in South Evanston, Ill., 12 May, 1890. He removed to Illinois in 1836, where he was engaged in commercial pursuits. In 1849 he was a member of the Wisconsin legislature. He was made collector of customs at Chicago, Ill., in the spring of 1861, but resigned that office on his appointment as colonel of the 37th Illinois volunteers, then known as the Frémont rifle regiment. He commanded it during Gen. John C. Frémont's expedition to southwest Missouri in the autumn of 1861, and was afterward placed at the head of a brigade, accompanying Gen. Samuel R. Curtis into Arkansas during the succeeding winter. He participated in the battle of Pea Ridge, and his appointment of brigadier-general of volunteers dated from that battle, 9 June, 1862. He was then assigned to the Department of the Shenandoah, and was subsequently ordered to report to Gen. John E. Wool. He was at Martinsburg in September, 1862, and, when that town became untenable, retired to Harper's Ferry, where he volunteered to serve as second in command under his inferior officer, Col. Dixon S. Miles, who was in charge of that post. When Harper's Ferry was surrendered, on 15 Sept., 1862, to Gen. Ambrose P. Hill, he became a prisoner of war, but was released on parole. He was then placed under arrest by the U. S. government, and, at his own request, a court of inquiry was called, which found that he acted with capability and courage. He resigned in 1864, and on 13 March, 1865, was brevetted major-general of volunteers. He resumed his business in Illinois.

WHITE, Peregrine, the first white child born in New England, b. on the "Mayflower," in Cape Cod harbor, 20 Nov., 1620; d. in Marshfield, Mass., 22 July, 1704. His father, William, and his mother, Susanna, were passengers in the "Mayflower." Peregrine became a citizen of Marshfield, Mass., where the court gave him 200 acres of land in "consideration of his birth." He was of "vigorous and comely aspect," and filled several minor civil and military offices in that town. During his early life he is described as "extravagant," but "much reformed in his later years, and died hopefully." Peregrine's father died shortly after his arrival in this country, and two months afterward his mother, Susanna, married Edward Winslow. Theirs was the first English marriage in New England. She was therefore the first mother and the first bride in the country; her husband, Edward Winslow, was its first provincial governor; and her son by her second marriage, Josiah Winslow, was the first native governor of the colony.

WHITE, Phillips, member of the Continental congress, b. in New Hampshire about 1730; d. there after 1783. He was chosen to the Continental congress in 1782, taking his seat 3 Dec. of that year. The only record of his appearance in that body is his vote on the motion made by Edmund Rutledge in January, 1783, "that congress having, on 20 Dec., 1782, directed the secretary of foreign affairs to transmit to the executive authority of Rhode Island an authenticated state of the several applications for foreign loans, and the result thereof, it be resolved that the foregoing motion be postponed." On the question of commitment Mr. White voted in the affirmative.

WHITE, Pliny Holton, clergyman, b. in Springfield, Conn., 6 Oct., 1822; d. in Coventry, Vt., 24 April, 1869. He adopted the profession of law, was admitted to the bar of Windham county, Vt., in 1843, and practised there till 1853. He was editor of the Brattleborough, Vt., "Eagle" in 1851-'2, and of the "Express" at Amherst, Mass., in 1857-'8. In February, 1859, he was ordained pastor of the Unitarian church at Coventry, Vt. He was a member of the Vermont legislature in 1862-'3, chaplain of the senate in 1864-'6, and at the time of his death president of the Vermont historical society. He contributed frequently to the newspapers, and is the author of a "History of Coventry" (Irasburg, Vt., 1858).

WHITE, Richard Grant, author, b. in New York city, 22 May, 1821; d. there, 8 April, 1885. His ancestor, John White, came from England in 1636, and was a settler of Cambridge, Mass., and Hartford, Conn., and his grandfather, Calvin (1763-1853), was rector of St. James's parish in Derby, Conn., but afterward became a Roman Catholic, although he did not enter the priesthood of that church. He was a Tory and just escaped hanging by the mob because he "refused to shout 'Property and liberty!'" Richard Grant's father, Richard Mansfield White, intended his son for the church, but after his graduation at the University of the city of New York in 1839

he studied medicine and afterward law, and was admitted to the bar in 1845. His literary tendencies drew him from law, and he soon became a contributor to the New York "Courier and Enquirer," where his musical, dramatic, and art criticisms attracted attention. From 1845 till 1859 he was connected with this journal, and he served as its editor in 1854-'9. He was a founder in 1846-'7 of "Yankee Doodle," and also a founder in 1860 of the "World," from which he withdrew in 1861. During the civil war he wrote a series of letters to the London "Spectator," signed "A Yankee," which were of much service to the National cause. For nearly twenty years he was chief of the U. S. revenue marine bureau in the district of New York, which post he resigned in 1878. He wrote for magazines, contributed articles to cyclopædias, and edited the "Illustrated Record of the New York Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations" (1854), and "Poetry, Lyrical, Narrative, and Satirical of the Civil War" (1866). On the publication of John Payne Collier's folio manuscript emendations of Shakespeare (1852), Mr. White contributed a series of papers to "Putnam's Magazine," in which he denied the value of the emendations. The acumen and style of these articles elicited general admiration, and their subtle and vigorous criticism gave him a place among the most learned Shakespearean scholars. His publications are an "Appeal from the Sentence of the Bishop [Onderdonk] of New York" (New York, 1845); "Biographical and Critical Hand-Book of Christian Art" (1853); "Shakespeare's Scholar" (1854); "The Works of William Shakespeare," an annotated edition (12 vols., Boston, 1857-'65); "Essay on the Authorship of the Three Parts of Henry the Sixth" (Cambridge, 1859); "National Hymns," an essay, with selections from the hymns written for a prize of $600 offered by a national committee, which was not awarded (New York, 1861); "Memoirs of William Shakespeare, with an Essay toward the Expression of his Genius, and Account of the Rise and Progress of the English Drama" (Boston, 1865); "The New Gospel of Peace according to St. Benjamin," an anonymous political satire (Cambridge, 1866); "Words and their Uses, a Study of the English Language" (New York, 1870: revised ed., 1872); "The American View of the Copyright Question" (1880); "Every-Day English" (1881); "England Without and Within" (1881); "The Riverside Edition of the Works of William Shakespeare" (3 vols., Cambridge, 1883); "The Fate of Mansfield Humphrey," a novel (1884); and a series of articles on the "Failure of the Public School System in the United States." His last literary labor was the gathering of several Shakespeare articles that had appeared in periodicals, which were completed and published after his death, under the title of "Studies in Shakespeare" (Boston, 1885). The part that is devoted to glossaries and lexicons is of special interest to scholars.—His son, Stanford, architect, b. in New York city, 9 Nov., 1853, was educated in his native city in public schools and under private tutors. He studied architecture under Charles D. Gambrill and Henry H. Richardson, and was chief assistant of that firm when they built Trinity church, Boston. During 1878-'80 he studied in Europe, and in 1881 he entered into partnership with Charles F. McKim and William R. Mead. Mr. White has made all of the designs for the architectural work of the statues by Augustus St. Gaudens, notably the pedestal of the Farragut monument in Madison square, New York city (see illustration), and that of the Lincoln statue in Chicago. He has furnished many designs for book-covers, and those of the "Century" and "Scribner's Magazine" were by him. The University of the city of New York conferred on him the degree of A. M. in 1882. He is a member of the Tile club, the American institute of architects, and other artistic and professional organizations.

WHITE, Samuel, senator, b. in Wilmington, Del., in 1770; d. there, 4 Nov., 1809. He was carefully educated, early engaged in local politics, and from 1801 until his death was U. S. senator from Delaware, having been chosen as a Federalist. During the trial of Timothy Pickering before that body in 1809, on the charge of the embezzlement of public funds, Mr. White defended him in the words: "The accused is not in default, but under the awful visitation of God; and, as he is deranged, our proceedings scarcely deserve the name of a mock trial." Wilson Cary Nicholas, then congressman from Virginia, called out: "I will not submit to hear our proceedings called by the name of a mock trial." Whereupon Mr. White at once replied: "It is a mock trial, and I am ready to give the gentleman, if he is offended, satisfaction at any time or place." The sentiment in favor of duelling was so strong at that time that it does not appear on the records that the president of the senate administered any rebuke to the contestants. Mr. White had a national reputation as a marksman, and performed remarkable feats in shooting. He ardently opposed slavery, and was a popular and influential member of the Federalist party.

WHITE, Stephen Van Culen, banker, b. in Chatham county, N. C., 1 Aug., 1831. His father was a Quaker and opposed to slavery, and as he declined to do police duty to prevent negroes holding meetings at night after the Nat Turner insurrection, was compelled to leave the state. He moved his family by wagon to Greene (now Jersey) county, Ill., when Stephen was six weeks old, and engaged in farming. The son was graduated at Knox college, Ill., in 1854, studied law in St. Louis with Benjamin Gratz Brown and John A. Kasson, was admitted to the bar, 4 Nov., 1856, and began practising in Des Moines. He soon acquired high rank as a lawyer, and was retained in many important cases before the U. S. court. In 1861, in the case of the United States vs. Hill, he successfully defended the only treason case that was ever tried in Iowa, and in 1863 he saved to investors many millions of dollars, which the state courts had repudiated, by a successful argument in the U. S. supreme court in the case of Gelpke vs. Dubuque, involving the constitutionality of municipal bonds issued in aid of railroads. In 1864 he was acting U. S. district attorney for Iowa, and attended to all the civil and criminal business of the government. In 1865 he removed to New York and engaged in banking, and in 1882 he organized the banking-firm of S. V. White and Co. He was elected representative in congress from Brooklyn in 1886, and was appointed a member of the committee on post-offices and post-roads. Mr. White has been noted as a banker for his large and bold operations in the interest of the Delaware, Lackawanna, and Western railroad. He has long been a member and trustee of Plymouth church, is an expert astronomer, owns a private observatory, and on the organization of the American astronomical society, in 1883, was elected its first president.

WHITE, Thomas, Canadian statesman, b. in Montreal, 7 Aug., 1830; d. in Ottawa, 21 April, 1888. His father, a native of Ireland, carried on business as a merchant in Montreal for many years. The son was educated at the high-school of that city, afterward engaged for several years in mercantile pursuits, and then became attached to the editorial staff of the Quebec "Gazette." In 1853, with Robert Romaine, he established the Peterborough "Review," with which he remained connected till 1860, when he entered upon the study of law at Cobourg. In 1864, with his brother Richard, he became proprietor of the "Spectator" at Hamilton, where he remained till 1870. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the Ontario legislature in 1867, and for the Dominion parliament three times, being first elected for Cardwell in 1878. He was re-elected in 1882, and again in February, 1887. In 1885 Mr. White became a member of Sir John A. Macdonald's cabinet, with the portfolio of minister of the interior, and soon afterward he visited the northwest in his official capacity, instituted an inquiry into the causes of the insurrection under Louis Riel, and arranged for the restoration of the functions of government, which had been temporarily suspended. He was managing editor at one time of the Montreal "Gazette," representative for several years of the Montreal board of trade in the Dominion board, member for three years of the executive committee of the Dominion board, and represented that body for five years in the National board of trade of the United States. He was in favor of such special trade relations between different parts of the British empire as would strengthen the bond of union between the mother country and the colonies. He was one of the most popular members of the cabinet, and was highly regarded even by his political opponents.—His brother, Richard, b. in Montreal, 14 May, 1834, established with Thomas the Peterborough "Review" in 1853, purchased the Hamilton "Daily Spectator" in 1864, and in 1870 the Montreal "Gazette," the oldest newspaper in the Dominion. He is the managing director of the "Montreal Gazette" printing company. In addition to the daily and weekly editions of the "Gazette," the company publishes the "Legal News," the "Montreal Law Reports," the "Montreal Medical and Surgical Journal," and the "Educational Record." Mr. White is actively connected with various financial and industrial associations, has been a member of the city government of Montreal, and during the prevalence of small-pox in that city did much to alleviate the condition of the people and to stop the progress of the epidemic.

WHITE, William, P. E. bishop, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 4 April, 1748; d. there, 17 July, 1836. His father, Col. Thomas White, removed to Philadelphia from Maryland in 1745, and married Esther, widow of John Neuman, and daughter of Abraham Hewlings, of Burlington, N. J., 7 May, 1747. There were two children of this marriage, William, and Mary, who became the wife of Robert Morris. William entered the English department of the College and academy of Philadelphia at the age of seven, and at ten the Latin-school. He was graduated in 1765, and soon began his theological studies, which he completed in 1770. In October of this year he sailed for England to obtain holy orders, bringing such testimonials that, although he was several months under the required age, he obtained from the archbishop of Canterbury a faculty allowing him to be ordained. He was ordered deacon in the Chapel royal, St. James's palace, Westminster, 23 Dec., 1770, by Dr. Young, bishop of Norwich, acting for the bishop of London, who had episcopal oversight of all the colonies, and was ordained priest in the chapel of Fulham palace, 25 April, 1772, by the bishop of London. He sailed for this country, where he arrived on 13 Sept., and soon afterward became assistant minister of Christ and St. Peter's churches. On 11 Feb., 1773, he married Mary, daughter of Capt. Henry Harrison, mayor of Philadelphia. Within a few years he became rector of the united parishes of Christ, St. Peter's, and St. James's. The degree of D. D. was given him by the University of Pennsylvania in 1782, it being the first honorary degree of that college. All the clergy of Philadelphia sided with the colonies during the Revolution, none more zealously than Dr. White. Upon the occupation of Philadelphia by the British forces, he removed in September, 1777, to Harford county, Md., but he returned after the evacuation, and resumed his duties. Then began the long and trying struggle to sustain the life of the church, in which he took an active part. Almost despairing of success in obtaining the episcopate, which was essential to the reorganization of the church, Dr. White, in August, 1782, put forth a pamphlet with the title "The Case of the Episcopal Churches Considered" (Philadelphia, 1782), in which he advocated the appointment of superintendents, with similar powers, to take the place of bishops in the government of the church. This plan, which found favor largely in the middle and southern states, was bitterly opposed by the clergy of Connecticut, and negotiations for peace having advanced to the point of probability, the pamphlet was withdrawn from circulation, and the plan was abandoned. On 27 March, 1784, the clergy of the city of Philadelphia, and lay representatives from its parishes, met in Dr. White's study to take steps for the organization of the church in Pennsylvania, which meeting resulted in the assembling of a council in Christ church, 26 May, 1784, the first council in which laymen had been represented. Proposals were sent out to the churches in other states to meet in general convention, Dr. White's letters helping largely in bringing about this result. The first meeting of that body was held in New York in October, 1784, though delegates were sent only on the authority of their several parishes. On Tuesday, 27 Sept., 1785, clerical and lay deputies from several states met in Christ church, Philadelphia, and organized as a general convention, of which Dr. White was chosen president. Steps were taken at once by the appointment of committees to draft a constitution for the church, and to prepare a schedule of necessary alterations in the liturgy. Dr. White made the original draft of the constitution, and also prepared an address to the archbishops and bishops of the Church of England, asking for the episcopate at their hands. He was also largely instrumental in giving shape to the liturgy and offices of the Prayer-Book which were to be submitted to the authorities of the Church of England with the address. At the convention of the diocese of Pennsylvania in 1786 he was elected its first bishop, and sailed for England in company with Dr. Samuel Provost, of New York, seeking consecration, arriving in London, 29 Nov., 1786. After many delays, and the passage of a special enabling act by parliament, he was, with Dr. Provost, at last consecrated in the chapel of Lambeth palace, 4 Feb., 1787, by the archbishops of Canterbury and York, and the bishops of Bath and Wells, and Peterborough. He reached Philadelphia again on Easter Sunday, 7 April, 1787, and entered upon his trying duties, not the least of which concerned the recognition of the consecration of Bishop Seabury, in all of which his mild temper and broad charity were effective in restoring peace and harmony to the councils of the church. He was appointed chaplain to congress in 1787, which office he held till 1801. Besides his episcopal duties, he was foremost in many public charities and enterprises, and held the presidency of the Philadelphia Bible society, dispensary, Prison society, Asylum for the deaf and dumb, and Institution for the blind. He died at the advanced age of eighty-eight, after living to see the church in the states thoroughly organized and rapidly growing, and consecrating eleven bishops. His remains were buried in the church-yard of Christ church, but in December, 1870, were removed and placed beneath the floor of the chancel. The centennial anniversary of his consecration was appropriately celebrated in Lambeth palace, London, and in Christ church, Philadelphia. Besides the "Pastoral Letters" of the house of bishops (1808-1835), five addresses to the trustees, professors, and students of the General theological seminary (1822-'9), and episcopal charges, Bishop White published "Lectures on the Catechism" (Philadelphia, 1813); "Comparative View of the Controversy between the Calvinists and the Arminians" (2 vols., 1817); "Memoirs of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States of America" (1820; 2d ed., with continuation, New York, 1835); and "Commentary on Questions in the Ordination Offices" and "Commentary on Duties of Public Ministry" (1 vol., 1833). His "Opinions on Interchanging with Ministers of Non-Episcopal Communions, Extracted from his Charges, Addresses, Sermons, and Pastoral Letters," appeared in 1868. See his life by Rev. Dr. Bird Wilson (Philadelphia, 1839). Portraits of Bishop White have been painted by Gilbert Stuart, Thomas Sully, and Henry Inman. The accompanying vignette is copied from a drawing by James B. Longacre.

WHITE, William, Canadian official, b. in London, England, 6 Jan., 1830. He was educated at Burlington House school, Hammersmith, and entered the English civil service in 1846, but resigned in 1854, and the same year entered the Canadian post-office department. He became its secretary in 1861 and deputy postmaster-general in July, 1888. Mr. White was appointed a member of the royal commission to inquire into the organization of the Canadian civil-service commission in June, 1880. He is lieutenant-colonel of the 4th battalion, and commanded the Canadian team at the matches of the National rifle association at Wimbledon, England, in 1884, when it won the Kolopore cup. He has published "Post-Office Gazetteer of Canada" (Ottawa, 1872), and "Annals of Canada" in the "Canadian Monthly Magazine."

WHITE, William Charles, dramatist, b. in Boston, Mass., in 1777; d. in Worcester, Mass., 2 May, 1818. He was the son of a merchant, but left the counting-room for the stage in 1796, appearing as Norval in the Federal street theatre, Boston, Mass. At the same time he produced a tragedy called "Orlando," but, meeting with small encouragement, turned his attention to law, and opened an office in Providence, R. I., in 1800. He returned to the stage for a few months in the same year, but finally abandoned it in 1801, and for a short time was an editor of the "National Ægis." In 1811 he became county attorney. He published and produced the plays "The Country Cousin" (Boston, 1810), and "The Poor Lodger" (1810). He is the author of a "Compendium of the Laws of Massachusetts" (3 vols., 1810).

WHITE, William N., horticulturist, b. in Walton, N. Y., in 1819; d. in Athens, Ga., 14 July, 1867. He settled in Athens, Ga., where he became a bookseller, and for many years previous to his death edited the "Southern Cultivator," the only agricultural paper that sustained itself during the civil war. Mr. White was an authority in practical agriculture and all matters relating to farming. He published "Gardening for the South, or the Kitchen and Fruit Garden" (New York, 1856), and "Scientific Gardening" (1866).

WHITEAVES, Joseph Frederick, Canadian naturalist, b. in Oxford, England, 26 Dec., 1835. He began the study of zoölogy when about twenty years of age, and later that of the invertebrate palæontology of the Jurassic rocks in the immediate vicinity of his native city. He published some of the results of his investigations in palæontology in the "Report of the British Association for the Advancement of Science" for 1860, and in the "Annals and Magazine of Natural History" (London, 1861). He removed to Canada in 1861, from 1863 till 1876 was scientific curator and recording secretary to the Natural history society of Montreal, and contributed many articles on Canadian zoölogy and palæontology to its journal, the "Canadian Naturalist and Geologist." During 1867-'73 he prosecuted five deep-sea dredging expeditions in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the last three under the auspices of the department of marine and fisheries of the Dominion government. Large numbers of marine invertebrates were collected by him, among them several species that had not previously been found in America. He published articles descriptive of the result of these investigations in the reports of the department of marine and fisheries, in the "Canadian Naturalist," the "Annals and Magazine of Natural History" of London, and the "American Journal of Science." He first joined the geological survey of Canada in 1874, was elected palæontologist and zoölogist to the survey in 1876, and subsequently became one of the assistant directors. He has published illustrated monographs on the invertebrate fossils of the upper cretaceous rocks of Vancouver and adjacent islands, on those of the middle cretaceous rocks of the Queen Charlotte islands, of the Guelph formation of western Canada, of the Laramie and cretaceous rocks of the Bow and Belly river districts, and on the fossil fishes of the Devonian rocks of eastern Canada. In addition to annual reports of the survey, he has contributed papers to the transactions of various learned societies.

WHITEFIELD, George (whit'-field), clergyman, b. in Gloucester, England, 27 Dec., 1714; d. in Newburyport, Mass., 30 Sept., 1770. His father, an innkeeper, died, leaving the son an infant of two years in charge of the mother, who sent him to the public school. When fifteen years old he refused to attend school longer, going to work in the hotel. At this period he composed sermons and in other ways exhibited the bent of the future orator, and at the age of eighteen he embraced an opportunity to enter Pembroke college, Oxford, as a servitor. He had already entered on a life of religious zeal and self-denial, and he now sought the counsels of Charles Wesley, and adopted the rules of the Methodists. He visited the sick in the almshouse and the prisoners in the jail, and reclaimed some to a life of piety. The bishop of Gloucester, on 20 June, 1736, ordained him deacon before he had taken his degree. He returned to Oxford, was graduated and remained to continue his studies and his ministrations among the prisoners, leaving in August to officiate for two months as chaplain of the Tower of London.

Whitefield

He preached also in Bristol and elsewhere, affecting great audiences to tears and repentance. Already certain of the clergy began to close their pulpits to him on account of his teachings of the new birth and his religious enthusiasm and association with dissenters, while his admirers offered him profitable charges in London or Bristol. At the summons of John and Charles Wesley, who were in this country, he sailed on 10 Jan., 1738, for Georgia, arriving in Savannah on 18 May. He saw the need of the colony for material aid, and especially for an orphan house, as many settlers had died from the effects of the climate, leaving destitute families, and to raise a fund for this purpose, as well as to receive priest's orders, on 8 Sept. he left Savannah for England. The doctrines of regeneration and justification by faith and the ecstatic sentiments in his recently published "Journals" caused the clergy who had formerly been friendly to Whitefield to withhold their countenance. Only four pulpits in London were still open to him. His powers of eloquence drew large assemblages, and in the Countess of Huntingdon and her aristocratic friends he found influential patrons. He was ordained priest in January, 1739. The trustees of Georgia presented him with the living of Savannah and granted him 500 acres of land as a site for the orphan house. Going to Bristol, he preached in the prison when the churches were refused to him, and on 28 Feb. began to address congregations of colliers (which sometimes numbered 20,000 persons) in the open air, at Kingswood, where Wesley followed him and founded the first Methodist church and school. From that time most of Whitefield's sermons were delivered to out-door meetings. Every newspaper reviled him, ministers denounced him from their pulpits, and no fewer than fifty pamphlets were published in condemnation or defence of his teachings in the year 1739. Wherever he preached in England or Wales he made a collection for his orphan school. On 25 Aug., 1739, he took passage for Philadelphia. Instead of going to Georgia, he remained in that city, preaching in the churches and from the court-house steps in a way that wonderfully revived the religious life of that place. Thence he went to New York city, where the Episcopal pulpits were denied him, but other denominations welcomed him, and for the first time he held services in dissenting meeting-houses. In a few weeks he returned to Philadelphia and set out for his parish in Georgia, preaching in every village on the way, and reaching Savannah on 20 Jan., 1740. His collections for the orphan house amounted to £2,530, besides many gifts in kind. He gathered about forty children in a hired house, and in March began the building of the orphanage, which he named Bethesda. He returned to Philadelphia in April, and in August, complying with a request from Benjamin Colman, William Cooper, and other Boston ministers, he made a tour into New England, where he met with a cordial reception, except from the conservative part of the clergy, who condemned his emotional methods, and began the long controversy with the Revivalists or New Lights. Churches were not large enough to hold his auditors, and he therefore spoke on the common. He preached in other towns, made large collections, returned to Savannah in December, and early in 1741 sailed for England. On 25 Nov., 1741, he married in Wales a widow named Elizabeth James, who proved an uncongenial wife. His influence in England was less than when he worked in harmony with the other Methodists, and was further impaired by his writings, especially an assault on the theological principles of Archbishop John Tillotson. He gathered a congregation in opposition to Charles Wesley's at Bristol, and in London preached in a large edifice that his friends built, called the Tabernacle. In August, 1744, he embarked for this country, landed in Maine, and on reaching Boston opened a series of services at 6 A. M., with 2,000 or more hearers. Afterward he went to Savannah, but finding his health failing, visited the Bermuda islands in March, 1748. Thence, in July, he went back to England, where he became chaplain to Lady Huntingdon, and preached in her chapel to the nobility and others. He revisited Scotland in 1750, spent the winter of 1750-'1 in London, made a short visit to Ireland, where he was badly used, and went to Savannah in October, 1751. He returned to England in 1752, made his fifth voyage to this country by way of Lisbon in 1754, and labored energetically, with astonishing results. He returned to England again in 1755, success attending his labors everywhere during 1755-'60. His health was much impaired for two years. Whitefield embarked for the sixth time for America in 1763, returned to England in 1765, where he spent the next four years, laboring according to his ability and state of health, in consecrating new chapels provided by Lady Huntingdon, and striving to promote peace and concord in the Methodist body. He made his seventh and last visit to this country in September, 1769, and for a time preached with his accustomed energy in Georgia and New England; but death, from an attack of asthma, came suddenly at the last. Whitefield's coffin may still be seen

"Under the church on Federal street."

He was, with the aid of Lady Huntingdon, the founder of the Calvinistic Methodists. He preached about 18,000 times, yet only eighty-one of his sermons have been printed, and these are for the greater part the productions of his immature years. His voice was so clear that congregations of 25,000 people could distinctly hear his sermons in the open air, and his elocution and gestures formed the model of orators and actors in his day. His two journals of his "Voyage from London to Savannah," extending from 28 Dec., 1737, till 7 May, 1738, were printed without his leave by friends (London, 1738). Subsequently he published the "Journal from his Arrival at Savannah to his Return to London," and the "Journal from his Arrival at London to his Departure from thence on his Way to Georgia," which was supplemented by a "Continuation of the Journal during the Time he was detained by the Embargo" (1739). The "First Two Parts of his Life, with his Journals," appeared in a revised and abridged form (1756). His "Letters, Sermons, Controversies, and Tracts" were published (6 vols., 1771-'2). Chief among his many biographies are "Memoirs of the Life of the Rev. George Whitefield," by his friend the Rev. Dr. John Gillies (1772); "Sermons," with memoir by Samuel Drew (1833); "Life and Times of Whitefield," by the Rev. Robert Philip (1838); and a "Life," by the Rev. Luke Tyerman (2 vols., 1876). See also "The History of the Religious Movement of the Eighteenth Century, called Methodism," by the Rev. Dr. Abel Stevens (1861).

WHITEHEAD, Cortlandt, P. E. bishop, b. in New York city, 30 Oct., 1842. He was graduated at Yale in 1863, ordered deacon at the close of a three years' theological course in the Philadelphia divinity-school, on 21 June, 1867, in Trinity church, Newark, N. J., by Bishop Odenheimer, and ordained priest in St. Mark's chapel, Black Hawk,

Col., 7 Aug., 1868, by Bishop Randall. After serving as a missionary in Colorado three years he returned to the east, and became rector of the Church of the Nativity, South Bethlehem, Pa., where he remained until his elevation to the episcopate. He received the degree of D. D. from Union college in 1880. During his rectorship at Bethlehem he was assistant secretary of the diocese of central Pennsylvania for eleven years, and twice a deputy to the general convention from that diocese. He was consecrated bishop of Pittsburg in Trinity church, Pittsburg, 25 Jan., 1882. Bishop Whitehead attended the third Pan-Anglican council in London in 1888.

WHITEHEAD, William Adeel, historian, b. in Newark, N. J., 19 Feb., 1810; d. in Perth Amboy, N. J., 8 Aug., 1884. He left school in his thirteenth year and entered a bank, but afterward became a surveyor, and in 1828 made a survey of the island of Key West, Fla. He then engaged in commercial pursuits there, and was U. S. collector of customs from 1830 till 1838, when he removed to New York and became a stock-broker. He was connected with the New Jersey railroad and transportation company from 1849 till 1871, except in 1855-'9, when he was treasurer of the New York and Harlem railroad, and in 1871 he became treasurer of the American trust company of New Jersey, at Newark. He was a commissioner of public schools in the latter city in 1859-'71, and in 1872 was president of the city board of education. He was a founder and president of the Newark library association, and, on the organization of the New Jersey historical society in 1845, became its corresponding secretary, which office he held till his death. He was also a member of numerous other historical and antiquarian societies. Of the "Collections" of the State historical society he is author of vol. i., "East Jersey under the Proprietary Governments" (New York, 1846); vol. iv., "Papers of Lewis Morris, Governor of New Jersey," with a memoir and notes (1852); and vol. v., "Analytical Index to the Colonial Documents of New Jersey, in the State Paper Office in England" (1858). He edited, in part, vol. vi., "Records of the Town of Newark" (1864), and wrote the supplement to that volume, entitled "Historical Memoir on the Circumstances leading to and connected with the Settlement of Newark" (1866). His other writings include "Biographical Sketch of William Franklin" (1848); "Contributions to the Early History of Perth Amboy" (1856); and numerous papers in the "Proceedings" of the New Jersey historical society, all the volumes of which were edited by Mr. Whitehead during his secretaryship.

WHITEHILL, Robert, congressman, b. in Pequea, Lancaster co., Pa., 29 July, 1738; d. in Lauther Manor, Cumberland co., Pa., 8 April, 1813. He received a common-school education, and in 1770 purchased from the proprietaries of Pennsylvania two tracts of land in Lauther Manor, where in 1771 he erected the first stone house. He was a member of the Philadelphia convention of July, 1776, which approved the Declaration of Independence and adopted a state constitution and bill of rights, and also of the convention that ratified the U. S. constitution, and the one that adopted the state constitution of 1790. He served often in either branch of the legislature, holding a seat in the lower house during the stormy sessions of 1798-1800, and subsequently being speaker of the senate during the impeachment trial of the judges of the state supreme court of Pennsylvania. He was a member of four successive congresses, serving from 2 Dec., 1805, till 3 March, 1813.

WHITEHORNE, James, artist, b. in Wallingford, Rutland co., Vt., 22 Aug., 1803; d. in New York city, 31 March, 1888. He began to study at the National academy about 1826, was elected an associate member in 1829, and an academician in 1833. In 1838-'44 he was recording secretary of the academy. He devoted himself to portrait-painting, executing a large number of works, notably the portrait of Silas Wright that is now in the city-hall, New York. He made also the design for the well-known mezzotint engraving, "Henry Clay addressing the Senate," published about 1846.

WHITEHOUSE, Henry John, P. E. bishop, b. in New York city, 19 Aug., 1803; d. in Chicago, Ill., 10 Aug., 1874. He was graduated at Columbia in 1821, and at the Protestant Episcopal general theological seminary, New York city, in 1824. He was ordained deacon by Bishop William White in St. James's church, Philadelphia, on 26 Aug., 1827, and immediately entered upon his ministry in Reading, Pa., from which in 1830 he was called to St. Luke's parish, Rochester, N. Y., where he remained fifteen years, attaining wide reputation as a pastor and preacher; was rector of St. Thomas's church, New York city, from 1844 till 1851, when he was elected

assistant bishop of Illinois, to which see, on the death of Bishop Philander Chase, he succeeded on 20 Sept., 1852. While in England in 1867, Bishop Whitehouse delivered the opening sermon before the first Pan-Anglican conference at Lambeth palace, by invitation of the archbishop of Canterbury, and it was due to the advice of Bishop Whitehouse that invitations were extended to the American bishops. Oxford gave him the degree of D. D. and Cambridge that of LL. D., while Columbia had given him that of LL. D. in 1865. Bishop Whitehouse was one of the most accomplished prelates of the Episcopal church, possessing versatility of talent with great learning. He was a brilliant orator and conversationalist. "Not one in ten thousand," says Bishop Henry W. Lee, of Iowa, in his memorial sermon, "had such ready command of words and such precision of diction as mark his written and spoken productions." His views had great weight in the house of bishops, and among foreign communions his influence did much to secure greater consideration for his own church. In the Cheney case, which precipitated the formation of the Reformed Episcopal church (see CHENEY, CHARLES EDWARD), he defended the church's standard of baptismal doctrine. He was the first bishop of his church to advocate the adoption in this country of the cathedral system, which he did in his first diocesan address. Though highly cultured and deeply learned, he left no published works other than his annual addresses contained in the journals of the diocese of Illinois from 1853 to 1873.

WHITEHOUSE, James Horton, designer, b. in Handsworth, Staffordshire, England, 28 Oct., 1833. He was educated at King Edward's school.

in Birmingham, and came to this country in his youth. He soon found employment as a designer and engraver in the house of Tiffany and Co., with whom he has since remained continuously. Many of the best-known art-pieces of silver-ware that have been produced in this country were designed by him, among them the Bryant vase, which was presented to the poet on his eightieth birthday, and is to be seen in the Metropolitan museum of art in New York city, also the silver casket presented to Bishop Horatio Potter on 25 Nov., 1879, the twenty-fifth anniversary of his consecration. The elaborate design of the latter was wrought by the repoussé process, the golden enrichments are carved by hand, and the damaskeening was richer and costlier than any similar work ever produced in this country. The third seal of the United States, which is now in use in Washington, was designed by him. (See illustration.) The first seal was made under President Washington's immediate direction, while the second was a failure. Mr. Whitehouse has designed numerous national medals, as well as most of the U. S. corps badges that were made during the civil war, also the beautiful memorial brasses in the tower of St. James's church, Lenox hill, New York city. He is a recognized authority on art, and is frequently consulted in the technicalities of art-work, the various applications of art, and on heraldry.

WHITELEY, Richard Henry, congressman, b. in Ireland, 22 Dec., 1830. He was taken to Georgia in 1836, and engaged in the manufacturing business in early boyhood, but in 1860, having studied law, was admitted to the bar. He opposed secession, but served in the Confederate army in 1861-'5. In 1867 he was chosen as a Republican to the State constitutional convention, and in the following year he was a Republican candidate for congress and was appointed solicitor-general of the southwestern circuit. In February, 1870, he was elected U. S. senator, but not admitted to a seat. Meanwhile he and his Democratic opponent had been contesting the congressional election of 1868, and the seat was finally awarded to Mr. Whiteley in February, 1871, at the close of the session. He served from this time till 1875, and was a defeated candidate for the two following congresses.

WHITELEY, Robert Henry Kirkwood, soldier, b. near Cambridge, Md., 15 April, 1809. He was appointed from Delaware to the U. S. military academy, where he was graduated in 1830, and, being assigned to the 2d artillery, served in various arsenals and garrisons, including that of Fort Moultrie, S. C., in 1832-'3, during the threatened nullification troubles. He was promoted 1st lieutenant, 28 Dec., 1835, brevetted captain, 19 July, 1836, for gallant conduct in the Florida war, and in 1838 was transferred to the ordnance. He was promoted captain in 1842, and commanded successively the arsenal at Baton Rouge, La., that in St. Louis, Mo., the New York ordnance depot, and the arsenal at San Antonio, Tex., till the last-named was seized by the state on its secession in 1861. During the civil war he was in charge of the New York arsenal till 1862, and then of Alleghany arsenal, Pa., which latter post he held till his retirement from active service on 14 April, 1875. He became major, 3 Aug., 1861, lieutenant-colonel, 1 June, 1863, and colonel, 6 April, 1866, and on 13 March, 1865, was brevetted colonel and brigadier-general.

WHITELOCKE, John, British soldier, b. in England about 1757; d. after 1808. He entered the army, and by promotions became colonel in 1793. When in that year the planters in the French part of Santo Domingo petitioned the British government for a protectorate, the governor of Jamaica received orders to occupy the island, and despatched, on 9 Sept., 1793, an expedition of 700 men under command of Col. Whitelocke. He landed on 19 Sept. at Jeremie, but was routed in an attack on Tiburon. After receiving re-enforcements, he took St. Marc, Logane, and Arcahay, and made a second attack on Tiburon, by which nearly the whole western coast, except Port au Prince, became subject to his control. Assisted by an auxiliary force from the Spanish part of the island, he besieged Port de Paix on the northern coast, and, after vainly trying to bribe the commander, Gen. Lavaux, to surrender, retired; but, after the arrival of re-enforcements from Jamaica, he soon gained advantages, and on 14 June, 1794, occupied Port au Prince. He was afterward in India, Egypt, and the Cape of Good Hope, and, being promoted lieutenant-general, he was chosen commander-in-chief of the British army on the river Plate. Gen. Beresford had capitulated in Buenos Ayres, 12 Aug., 1806, and the re-enforcements under Sir Samuel Auchmuty, arriving too late, had occupied Montevideo, 1 Feb., 1807. Whitelocke arrived in Montevideo in April, 1807, with 6,000 men, and, with the forces of Auchmuty and the remnants of Beresford's army, he soon had a body of 12,000 disciplined men under his command. Leaving a garrison of 2,000 in Montevideo, he marched with the rest to Maldonado, and, escorted by the fleet under Admiral Popham, landed on 28 June, 1807, in Ensenada, to the south of Buenos Ayres. On his march he was attacked in the Pass of Riachuelo, 1 July, by the Spanish army under Santiago De Liniers, and routing and outflanking the latter, he could have easily occupied the capital, but tarried on the battle-field. During the night the mayor of the city, Alzaga, intrenched the streets and gathered the routed troops, so that Liniers found the defence prepared and refused to surrender the city, when he was summoned by Whitelocke to do so on 3 July. The latter prepared everything for storming the city, and early on the 5th led his army in eight columns to the assault. The resistance was terrible in the barricaded streets and houses, and, after struggling the whole day, he retired with the loss of 1,100 killed and 1,500 prisoners. On 6 July the assault was renewed, but by noon the British forces were beaten and surrounded, with a loss of 2,000, and Whitelocke offered to capitulate. He was forced to submit to humiliating conditions, to evacuate the southern border of the river within forty-eight hours, and to return the city of Montevideo within two months in the state in which it was captured. The capitulation was ratified on 7 July, and complied with by the British commander, who left Montevideo on 1 Sept. with the last of his forces. On his arrival in England he was court-martialed and sentenced to be severely censured, and retired from service. The "Proceedings of the General Court-Martial and Defence of Gen. John Whitelocke" were published (2 vols., London, 1808.) See also "Narrative of the British Expedition to La Plata under Gen. Crawford" (1808).

WHITESIDE, Jenkin, senator, b. in Lancaster, Pa., in 1782; d. in Nashville, Tenn., 25 Sept., 1822. He removed to Tennessee, and became a lawyer of note in the early history of that state, giving special attention to the law of real estate, and acquiring a large property. On the resignation of Daniel Smith from the U. S. senate, Mr. Whiteside was elected to fill the vacancy, and served from 26 May, 1809, till 1 Sept., 1811, when he resigned and returned to the practice of his profession. He was a man of vigorous mind, but of uncouth and rugged manners.

WHITESIDE, Peter, patriot, b. in Puten, England, in 1752; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., in December, 1828. He came to Philadelphia, and was for many years one of the foremost merchants in that city, becoming the partner of Robert Morris. He was a friend of Washington, and at the opening of the Revolution declined the post of aide-de-camp on his staff. During the struggle he advanced a large part of his fortune to procure shoes for the Continental army. Subsequently Washington sent him on a mission to France to arrange for better commercial intercourse between that country and the United States. About the time that John Fitch and James Rumsey were trying their experiments on steam navigation, Whiteside and two friends constructed a side-wheel steamboat in Philadelphia, and tried it successfully on Schuylkill river. With Robert Morris, and his brother, William Whiteside, a wealthy tea-merchant, he sent out the first trading-ship from this hemisphere to the East Indies, the three realizing jointly $30,000 from the venture. In his house in Philadelphia he often entertained Washington, the French exiles, and other men of eminence.

WHITFIELD, Henry, clergyman, b. in England in 1597; d. in Winchester, England, after 1651. His father, an eminent lawyer, had destined him for the same profession, and after leaving the university he was entered at the Inns of court, but he subsequently took orders and was minister of Ockham, Surrey, where he also maintained another clergyman out of his private income, that he might devote himself to missionary labors in the adjacent country. He was much beloved by the Non-conformists, whom he protected from persecution, and finally, after twenty years in the established church, he publicly joined them, and resigned his charge on being prosecuted for a refusal to read the "Book of Lawful Sunday Sports." Disposing of his personal estate, he came to this country with Gov. Theophilus Eaton in 1637, accompanied by many of his former parishioners, and began the settlement of Guilford, Conn., the site of which he purchased from the Indians. The place was named for Guilford in Surrey, the native place of many of the colonists. In 1650 he returned to England, and, says Cotton Mather, "at the time of parting, the whole town accompanied him unto the water-side with a springtide of tears." On his return he became pastor at Winchester, England, where he probably remained until his death. Mr. Whitfield's residence in Guilford, known as the "old stone house," is shown in the illustration. It was built about 1639 to serve both as a dwelling and a fortification. According to tradition, the stone of which it is built was brought by Indians on hand-barrows across a swamp from Griswold's lodge, about eighty rods distant. The walls are three feet thick. The house was kept in its original form till 1868, when it underwent considerable renovation. Whitfield was the author of "Helps to stir up to Christian Duties" (London, 1634); "The Light appearing more and more toward the Perfect Day, or a Farther Discovery of the Present State of the Indians in New England" (1651); and "Strength out of Weakness, or a Glorious Manifestation of the Further Progresse of the Gospel among the Indians in New England" (1652). The last two works were reissued in Joseph Sabin's reprints (New York, 1865).

WHITFIELD, James, R. C. archbishop, b. in Liverpool, England, 3 Nov., 1770; d. in Baltimore, Md., 19 Oct., 1834. His father died when James was seventeen years old, and the boy left England for Italy with his mother, who was in delicate health. He engaged in mercantile pursuits in the latter country and in France, adding largely to the fortune that his father bequeathed him. After the issue of the decree of Napoleon ordering the imprisonment of such Englishmen as happened to be in France, he was arrested and detained at Lyons, where he became intimate with Dr. (afterward Archbishop) Maréchal, and his thoughts turned toward the priesthood. He began a course of theology under the guidance of his friend, and was ordained a priest in 1809. Some time afterward he returned to England, and was appointed parish priest of Cosby. He continued in this post until 1817, when, on the invitation of Archbishop Maréchal, he went to the United States. He was appointed pastor of St. Peter's church, Baltimore, and in 1825, by a special dispensation from Rome, received the degree of D. D. The same year he was partly instrumental in placing the institution of the Colored Sisters Oblate of St. Francis in a prosperous condition, and began to take a practical interest in the welfare of the negroes. When Archbishop Maréchal became feeble, Dr. Whitfield headed the list of proposed coadjutors. He was nominated bishop of Apollonia in partibus on 8 Jan., 1828, but the brief did not arrive in the United States until after the death of Archbishop Maréchal, and Dr. Whitfield was consecrated archbishop on 25 May of the same year. He was also appointed administrator of the see of Richmond. He spent his large private fortune in building churches, supplying priests, and erecting institutions of education and charity. When this resource failed him he appealed for help to the Society for the propagation of the faith, to the king of France, and to ecclesiastics and laymen of that country. Some of the letters that he wrote on these occasions have an important bearing on the history of the Roman Catholic church in the United States. In reply to his first appeal he received 32,000 francs, besides large sums for the support of St. Mary's college. He began to build the Baltimore orphan asylum, and made a visitation of every part of Maryland and Virginia where Roman Catholics resided. In the diocese of Richmond, which extended over 7,000 square miles, he found only three priests. He at once renewed his appeals to Europe for help, and the response that he received enabled him to remedy this state of things. He held the first provincial council of his suffragan bishops at Baltimore on 4 Oct., 1829. Its deliberations were directed by him, and, at his suggestion, thirty-eight decrees, regulating the conduct of the Roman Catholic clergy of the United States, the tenure of church property, and other important interests, were adopted. In 1834 he mansion. In 1833 he convened the second provincial council at Baltimore. In this council the mode of episcopal election was fixed, boundaries of dioceses were arranged, and steps were taken for the evangelization of the Indians and negroes of Liberia.

WHITFIELD, Robert Parr, palæontologist, b. in New Hartford, N. Y., 27 May, 1828. He is of English parentage, and was educated at home and at public schools. In 1835 he went with his family to England, but he returned in 1841, learned the trade of making spindles, and had charge of a factory of telegraphic and philosophic instruments in Utica, N. Y. In 1856 he was appointed assistant to James Hall, state geologist of New York, and in 1870 he became first assistant curator, with charge of the geology and palæontology in the New York state museum in Albany, and much of the work on the palæontology of the state natural history and regent's report of the New York state cabinet was done by him. In 1872 he began teaching geology in Rensselaer polytechnic institute at Troy, and in 1875 he was given the professorship of that branch, which he held until 1878. In June, 1877, he was appointed curator of the geological department of the American museum of natural history in New York city, which office he still fills. Wesleyan university conferred on him the degree of A. M. in 1882, and he has been since 1874 a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science. Prof. Whitfield has described a large number of new fossils, and has been very successful in studying the internal structure of fossil brachiopoda, many of which are published in the New York state palæontology. He has also reported on specimens gathered by the exploration under Clarence King, the palæontology of the Black Hills, and fossils from the geological surveys of Ohio, Wisconsin, Indiana, and other states, and is now engaged on the palæontology of New Jersey. The value of his work is greatly enhanced by the drawings of fossils that he has made. His publications, which include nearly thirty memoirs, besides frequent papers, have appeared in reports of the state surveys with which he has been connected, and in the "Bulletins of the American Museum of Natural History," of which six numbers under his editorship have been issued since 1881.

WHITING, Daniel Powers, soldier, b. in Troy, N. Y., 31 July, 1808. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1832, and assigned to the 7th infantry, with which he served in various garrisons, becoming 1st lieutenant, 8 June, 1836, and captain, 18 April, 1845. During the Mexican war he was engaged at Fort Brown, Monterey, Vera Cruz, and Cerro Gordo, where he was brevetted major. After serving against the Seminoles, on the frontier, and in the Utah expedition in 1859, he attained full rank on 20 Dec., 1860. He was in command of Fort Garland, Col., in 1861-'2, became lieutenant-colonel, 15 Feb., 1862, served on a board of examination at Annapolis, Md., in 1862-'3, and on 4 Nov., 1863, was retired "for disability, resulting from long and faithful service, and from sickness and exposure in the line of duty." He has published "The Army Portfolio," a series of lithographed views illustrating the Mexican war (Washington, 1849). It was intended to continue the series, but Col. Whiting's sketches were lost on a steamboat that sank in the Mississippi river.

WHITING, George Elbridge, musician, b. in Holliston, Mass., 14 Sept., 1842. He went to Hartford, Conn., at the age of fifteen, and there founded the Beethoven society. In 1862 he settled in Boston, and later in New York, where he studied with George W. Morgan. Afterward he went to Liverpool, and became the pupil of William T. Best, and he subsequently studied also in Berlin under Robert Radecke and others. After filling various engagements in Albany and Boston, he became, in 1874, organist of the Music hall in the latter city, and he was also for a time head of the organ department in the New England conservatory of music. In 1878 he became organist of the Music hall in Cincinnati, Ohio, and head of the organ department in the College of music, but after five years he returned to his old post in the New England conservatory. His compositions include a mass in C minor (1872); a mass in F minor (1874); "Dream Pictures" (1874); "The Tale of the Viking" (1878); "Leonora" (1880), three cantatas; some pieces for orchestra; and several songs. He has also composed music for the organ, and has published "The Organist" (Boston, 1870), and "The First Six Months on the Organ" (Boston, 1871).

WHITING, Henry, soldier, b. in Lancaster, Mass., about 1790; d. in St. Louis, Mo., 16 Sept., 1851. His father, John (1759-1810), fought in the Revolution, and at his death was colonel of the 5th infantry. The son became a clerk in the dry-goods store of Amos Lawrence in Boston, but on 20 Oct., 1808, entered the U. S. army as a cornet of light dragoons. He rose to be 2d lieutenant in 1809 and 1st lieutenant in 1811, became aide to Gen. John P. Boyd, and served with credit in the capture of Fort George, Upper Canada, 27 May, 1813. He was afterward aide to Gen. Alexander Macomb in 1815, promoted captain in 1817, and in 1821 transferred to the 1st artillery. After 1835 he served in the quartermaster's department, and on 6 July, 1846, he joined the army of Gen. Zachary Taylor as chief quartermaster. He was brevetted brigadier-general, U. S. army, on 23 Feb., 1847, for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle of Buena Vista. He was elected a regent of the University of Michigan in 1848. Gen. Whiting was the author of "Ontway, the Son of the Forest: a Poem" (New York, 1822); "Sannillac: a Poem," with notes by Lewis Cass and Henry R. Schoolcraft (Boston, 1831); "The Age of Steam"; and "Life of Zebulon M. Pike" in Sparks's "American Biography." He was co-author of "Historical and Scientific Sketches of Michigan" (Detroit, 1834), and edited George Washington's "Revolutionary Orders issued during the Years 1778, 1780, 1781 and 1782; selected from the MSS.

of John Whiting," his father (New York, 1844).—His son, HENRY MACOMB (1821-'53), also served in the Mexican war in the artillery, receiving the brevet of 1st lieutenant for gallantry at Buena Vista.

WHITING, Nathan, soldier, b. in Windham, Conn., 4 May, 1724; d. in New Haven, Conn., 9 April, 1771. His father, Samuel, who was first minister of Windham, died during the son's infancy, and the boy was brought up chiefly by his sister Mary and her husband, Rev. Thomas Clap, who became president of Yale in 1740. Nathan was graduated at that college in 1743, studied there for two years longer, and then became a merchant in New Haven, but accompanied the Connecticut troops to the siege of Louisburg in 1745 as an ensign, and in the same year was commissioned lieutenant. He then formed a business partnership with Thomas Darling, but at the beginning of the French war of 1755 he was appointed, in March of that year, lieutenant-colonel of the 2d Connecticut regiment. His command formed part of the garrison of Fort Edward, and on 8 Sept. he was with Col. Ephriam Williams when the latter was surprised by the French and Indians near Lake George. On the death of Williams the command devolved on Whiting, who led the retreat with much skill and coolness. He was promoted colonel in 1756, and served throughout the war. Col. Whiting was a representative in the Connecticut general assembly in 1769 and 1770, and at the time of his death was a candidate for the upper house. President Timothy Dwight says of him: "He was an exemplary professor of the Christian religion, and for refined and dignified manners and nobleness of mind has rarely been excelled." His portrait is in the rooms of the Connecticut historical society at Hartford.—His elder brother, John, soldier, b. in Windham, Conn., 20 Feb., 1706; d. there, 28 Aug., 1786, was graduated at Yale in 1726, and entered the ministry, but, removing to Newport, R. I., entered the military service of that colony, became captain, and in 1761 had risen to the rank of colonel. He participated in several campaigns against the French, and was wounded at the battle of Lake George in 1758. He afterward returned to Windham, and was made judge of probate there in 1775.

WHITING, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Boston, Lincolnshire, England, 20 Nov., 1597; d. in Lynn, Mass., 11 Dec., 1679. His father, John, was mayor of his native city. The son was graduated at Cambridge in 1616, entered the ministry, and officiated at Lynn, in Norfolk, and in Skirbeck, near his native place, but, after two prosecutions for non-conformity, he emigrated to this country, where he was the first minister of Lynn, Mass., serving from 8 Nov., 1636, till his death. He was a close student and an accomplished Hebrew and Latin scholar. "In his preaching," says Cotton Mather, "his design was not to please but to profit; to bring forth, not high things, but fit things." He published "Oratio quam Comitibus Cantab. Americanis" (1649); "Treatise on the Last Judgment" (1664); and a volume of sermons on "Abraham Interceding for Sodom" (1666). His second wife was the daughter of Oliver St. John, chief justice of England under Cromwell, and their son, SAMUEL (1633-1713), was graduated at Harvard in 1653 and became the first minister of Billerica, Mass. An "Elegy on the Rev. Samuel Whiting, of Lynn," by Benjamin Tompson, "ye renowned poet of New England," is printed in Cotton Mather's "Magnalia." See also "Memoirs of Rev. Samuel Whiting and of his Wife, Elizabeth St. John, with Reference to some of their English Ancestors and American Descendants," by William Whiting, LL. D. (printed privately, Boston, 1871).—His descendant, William, lawyer, b. in Concord, Mass., 3 March, 1813; d. in Boston, Mass., 29 June, 1873, was graduated at Harvard in 1833, and, after teaching at Plymouth and Concord, studied law in Boston and at Harvard law-school, where he was graduated in 1838. He then began practice in Boston, where he soon attained eminence at the bar, and was engaged in many important cases. In 1862 he became solicitor of the war department in Washington, where he served three years. In 1868 he was a presidential elector, and in 1872 he was elected to congress as a Republican, but he died before he could take his seat. Colby university gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1872. He left $5,000 to Harvard for a scholarship. Mr. Whiting was for five years president of the New England historic-genealogical society. His principal work is "The War Powers of the President and the Legislative Powers of Congress in Relation to Rebellion, Treason, and Slavery" (Boston, 1862; 10th ed., with large additions, 1863; 43d ed., 1871). In this he formulated views that he had urged at the opening of the civil war, namely, that the U. S. government had full belligerent rights against the inhabitants of seceded states, and without going beyond the constitution could confiscate their property, emancipate their slaves, and treat them as public enemies. These opinions were at first received with caution by most public men, but they were finally sanctioned and adopted by the government. The book had a large sale in this country and abroad. Besides this, he published various pamphlets, chiefly legal arguments before the U. S. courts, and a "Memoir of Rev. Joseph Harrington," prefixed to a volume of his sermons (Boston, 1854), and was the author of the privately printed memoir of his ancestor, Samuel, mentioned above.

WHITING, William B., naval officer, b. in Troy, N. Y., 13 Nov., 1813; d. in Milwaukee, Wis., 16 Dec., 1883. He was appointed a midshipman in the navy, 2 Feb., 1829, and cruised on the Pacific station in 1831-'4, principally engaged on surveys. He became a passed midshipman, 4 June, 1836, served on coast-survey duty in 1837-'43, in the frigate "Macedonian," on the coast of Africa, on surveying duty in 1843-'5, and at the naval observatory at Washington in 1845-'50, during which he drew plans of the defences of Vera Cruz preliminary to the expedition of the navy and Gen. Winfield Scott's army. He was again on the coast survey in 1851-'2, and cruised in the sloop "Vandalia," 1852-'6, measuring the coasts of China and Japan. He was placed on the reserved list by the notorious retiring board of 1855 because his entire service had been in surveying duty rather than the military duties of the naval profession. He was then attached to the U. S. naval observatory at Washington until 1871, where he rendered valuable services in astronomical work. In recognition of his scientific attainments, he was promoted to commander and captain in 1867, and to commodore in 1871. After this last promotion he was relieved from active duty.

WHITING, William Danforth, naval officer, b. in Boston, Mass., 27 May, 1823. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 1 March, 1841, and served in the sloop "Levant" in 1846-'7, at the capture of Monterey, Cal., when the American flag was first hoisted on that shore, 7 July, 1846. He attended the naval academy in 1847-'8, was graduated, and became a passed midshipman, 10 Aug., 1847. He was promoted to master, 1 May, 1855, and to lieutenant, 14 Sept., 1855, and was attached to the steam frigate "Niagara" when the first Atlantic cable was laid in 1857. He was executive of the sloop "Vandalia" at the capture of Port Royal in 1861, and commanded the steamer "Wyandotte" on the South Atlantic blockade and in the Potomac flotilla. Lieut. Whiting was promoted to lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862, and in the gun-boat "Ottawa" participated in the attacks on the defences of Charleston, engaged Battery Gregg and Fort Wagner, and assisted in the capture of the lower end of Morris island in 1863-'4. In 1864-'5 he commanded the "Savannah," in the Eastern Gulf station. He was commissioned a commander, 25 July, 1866, had the steamer "Tioga" on the coast of Maine and in the Gulf, was at the New York navy-yard in 1867-'9 and 1871-'2, and commanded the sloop "Saratoga" and the monitor "Miantonomoh" in the North Atlantic squadron in 1869-'70. He was promoted to captain, 19 Aug., 1872, and commanded the steam sloop "Worcester," flag-ship of the North Atlantic squadron, in 1871-'5. In the first year of that cruise he took out contributions of food and clothing from the American people for the relief of the French sufferers in the Franco-Prussian war. Owing to the want of means to transport these contributions to the needed districts in the east of France, the stores were taken to Liverpool and London, where a favorable market realized a much larger sum of money than that which was expended for the purchase of these stores in this country. The American relief committee in France also urged that the money was more needed than contributions in any other shape. He was present at New Orleans during the political excitement owing to the overthrow of the Packard government, and won the confidence of the citizens by wise measures, contributing to allay the excitement. On 11 June, 1878, he was appointed chief of bureau of navigation and office of detail, with the rank of commodore. Failing health and almost total blindness resulting from exposure incidental to the service compelled him to be relieved from this duty, 12 Oct., 1881, from which date he was placed on the retired list, with the rank of commodore, by special act of congress.

WHITING, William Henry Chase, soldier, b. in Mississippi about 1825; d. on Governor's island, New York harbor, 10 March, 1865. His father, Levi, a native of Massachusetts, was an officer of the regular army from 1812 until his death in 1852, when he was lieutenant-colonel of the 1st artillery. The son was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1845 at the head of the class in which were Charles P. Stone, Fitz-John Porter, and Gordon Granger. He was assigned to the engineer corps, and engaged in the construction of forts and internal improvements in the west and south, becoming a captain, 13 Dec., 1858. He resigned on 20 Feb., 1861, entered the Confederate service, and in June and July of that year was chief engineer, with the rank of major, of the Army of the Shenandoah, under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston. He was promoted brigadier-general on 27 Aug., 1861, and commanded the brigade whose timely arrival won the battle of Bull Run for the Confederates. He took part in the battle of West Point, Va., 7 May, 1862, was made a major-general in 1863, and built Fort Fisher, N. C., of which he took command in the autumn of 1864. He defended the fort during the unsuccessful attack by Gen. Benjamin F. Butler, and the successful one by Gen. Alfred H. Terry (q. v.), and on its capture was severely wounded and taken prisoner.

WHITMAN, Bernard, clergyman, b. in East Bridgewater, Mass., 8 June, 1796; d. in Waltham, Mass., 5 Nov., 1834. He early decided to enter the ministry, and earned money to defray his expenses by working in factories. He entered Harvard in 1818, but was rusticated for a breach of discipline in 1819, and, on joining a lower class at the expiration of a year, asked and received an honorable dismissal. He then taught and studied theology till 1824, when he was licensed to preach, and on 15 Feb., 1826, he was ordained pastor of the 2d church in Waltham, Mass., where he remained till his early death from consumption. This church had just dismissed an orthodox clergyman, who had carried with him a large part of the congregation, and thus Mr. Whitman was led to a bold exposition of Unitarian views which he had adopted some time before. His published sermon on "Denying the Lord Jesus" (Boston, 1827) went through several editions, was widely circulated, and placed him in the front rank of the defenders of his faith. He was also successful as a lecturer on temperance. His works include "Two Letters to the Rev. Moses Stuart on the Subject of Religious Liberty" (1831); "Village Sermons" (1832); and "Friendly Letters to a Universalist on Divine Rewards and Punishments" (1833).—His brother, Jason, b. in Bridgewater, Mass., 30 April, 1799; d. in Lexington, Mass., 25 Jan., 1848, was graduated at Harvard in 1825, studied theology, and was pastor of Unitarian churches at Saco, Me., in 1830-'4, at Portland in 1835-'45, and at Lexington from 1845 till his death. For one year, in 1834-'5, he was general secretary of the American Unitarian association. Besides numerous sermons, he published memoirs of his brother, Bernard (Boston, 1837), and their father, Deacon John Whitman, who lived to the age of 107 years (1843); "The Young Man's Assistant in Efforts at Self-Cultivation" (1838); "Young Lady's Aid to Usefulness" (3d ed., 1845); "Discourses on the Lord's Prayer" (1847); and, with William E. Greely, "A Brief Statement of the Unitarian Belief" (1847). See a sketch of his life contained in a volume of his sermons (1849).

WHITMAN, Ezekiel, jurist, b. in East Bridgewater, Mass., 9 March, 1776; d. there, 1 Aug., 1866. He lost his parents in early life and was brought up by his uncle, Rev. Levi Whitman, of Wellfleet, who opposed his desire to go to sea and induced him to prepare for Brown university, where he was graduated in 1795 after supporting himself during his course by teaching. He then studied law, was admitted to the bar of Plymouth county in 1799, and removed to the district of Maine, where he practised in Turner, and after 1807 in Portland. He was an unsuccessful Federalist candidate for congress in 1806, but was elected two years later, and served in 1809-'11. In the election of 1810 he and William Widgery had each 1,639 votes, and at a second trial the latter was successful. Mr. Whitman then devoted himself to his large practice and was a member of the executive council of Massachusetts in 1815-'16 and of the Constitutional convention of 1819. In 1817-'23 he was again in congress. On the admission of Maine to the Union he became a judge of its court of common pleas, serving from 1822 till 1841, and in 1841-'8 he was chief justice of the state. In 1852 he retired to his native place. Judge Whitman was one of the last of the "old-school" lawyers in his state. He presided in court with much dignity, and his judicial opinions, which were reported by John Shepley in volumes xxi.-xxix. of "Maine Reports," are characterized by simplicity and directness of application. In congress he attacked Gen. Andrew Jackson severely for his course in Florida, spoke earnestly against striking out the clause to prohibit slavery from the bill to admit Missouri to the Union, took an active part in discussions on the tariff, and in 1818 spoke in favor of a bankrupt law. He was the author of a pamphlet, "Genealogy of the Descendants of John Whitman" (printed privately, Portland, 1832).

WHITMAN, Marcus, pioneer, b. in Rushville, Ontario co., N. Y., 4 Sept., 1802; d. in Wailatpu, Ore., 29 Nov., 1847. He was educated under private tutors, studied in Berkshire medical institution, Pittsfield, Mass., and in 1834 was appointed by the American board a missionary physician to Oregon. Dr. Whitman, Rev. Henry N. Spaulding, and their young wives, set out in 1836, and, journeying slowly westward, crossed the Rocky mountains by the South Pass through which John C. Frémont's party penetrated six years later. Mrs. Whitman and Mrs. Spaulding were the first white women to cross the mountains. On 2 Sept. the party arrived at Fort Walla Walla. Whitman had insisted on bringing one wagon with him despite assertions that the route was impassable for wheels, and by thus opening a wagon-road he led the way for emigration. The Hudson bay company's officers at Fort Hall, whose interest it was that no American settlers should be allowed to enter Oregon, and who had turned away many trains of intending emigrants, had vainly tried to dissuade him from his attempt. After several years' residence in the country, Dr. Whitman, seeing that the purpose of the British was to discourage American colonization of the territory by spreading reports of its inaccessibility and at the same time to fill it with English emigrants, resolved to visit Washington and lay the matter before the U. S. government. In October, 1842, the rejoicing at the English fort at Walla Walla over the approach of a large party of English colonists, and the knowledge that the Webster-Ashburton treaty was then under consideration, impelled him to lose no time, and he set out within twenty-four hours for the east on horseback after much opposition from his associates. With him were one companion and a guide, with three pack-mules. On 3 Jan., 1843, they reached Bent's fort, on Arkansas river, after undergoing many hardships, and soon afterward Whitman arrived at St. Louis, where he learned that the Ashburton treaty had been ratified already and that it left the Oregon question unsettled. On 3 March he was in Washington, where the information that he gave the government served to show how valuable Oregon was notwithstanding the efforts of interested persons to prove that it was inaccessible. Had it not been for him the United States might have given up Oregon to England as comparatively worthless. He was also earnest in his endeavors to show how easily it could be reached, and on his return in 1843 he led back a train of 200 wagons to the valley of the Columbia. Others followed in great numbers, and this "army of occupation" went far toward securing Oregon to this country. Four years later, Dr. Whitman, with his wife, two adopted children, and ten others, was massacred by the Cayuse Indians. See "Oregon: the Struggle for Possession," by William Barrows (Boston, 1884).

WHITMAN, Sarah Helen, poet, b. in Providence, R. I., in 1803; d. there, 27 June, 1878. She was the daughter of Nicholas Power, of Providence, and in 1828 married John W. Whitman, a Boston lawyer, after whose death in 1833 she returned to her native city and devoted herself to literature. Mrs. Whitman was well known for her conversational powers. She was an admirer of Edgar A. Poe, with whom, about 1848, she entered into a conditional engagement of marriage. Though it was broken off soon afterward, her friendly feeling for Poe did not cease, and inspired several of her poems, notably the elegy "Resurgamus." Mrs. Whitman contributed to magazines prize essays on literary topics, including critical articles on European writers, and many poems, which have been admired for their tenderness, melody, and philosophic spirit. She published in book-form a collection of these, entitled "Hours of Life, and other Poems" (Providence, 1853), and "Edgar A. Poe and his Critics," in which she defended her friend's character from harsh aspersions (New York, 1860). She was often called on for occasional poems, and one of these she read at the unveiling of the statue of Roger Williams in Providence in 1877. Parts of her "Fairy Ballads," "The Golden Ball," "The Sleeping Beauty," and "Cinderella" (1867) were written by her sister, ANNA MARSH POWER. After Mrs. Whitman's death a full collection of her "Poems" appeared (Boston, 1879).

WHITMAN, Walt, or Walter, poet, b. in West Hills, Long Island, N. Y., 31 May, 1819. He was educated in the public schools of Brooklyn and New York city, and learned printing, working at that trade in summer and teaching in winter. Subsequently he also acquired skill as a carpenter. For brief periods he edited newspapers in New Orleans and in Huntington, L. I. In 1847-'8 he made long pedestrian tours through the United States, generally following the courses of the great western rivers, and also extended his journey through Canada. His chief work, "Leaves of Grass" (New York, 1855), is a series of poems dealing with moral, social, and political problems, and more especially with the interests involved in 19th century American life and progress. In it he made a new and abrupt departure as to form, casting his thoughts in a mould the style of which is something between rhythmical prose and verse, altogether discarding rhythm and regular metre, but uttering musical thoughts in an unconventional way which is entirely his own. Expecting the opposition and abuse with which his volume was assailed, he speaks of it as a sortie on common literary use and wont, on both spirit and form, adding that a century may elapse before its triumph or failure can be assured. For thirty years Whitman has been correcting and adding to this work, and he says that he looks upon "Leaves of Grass" "now finished to the end of its opportunities and powers, as my definitive carte visite to the coming generations of the New World, if I may assume to say so." In the war Whitman's brother was wounded on the battle-field, which led to the poet's at once hastening to join him in the camp, where he afterward remained as a volunteer army nurse at Washington and in Virginia in 1862-'5. His experiences during this service are vividly recorded in "Drum-Taps" (1865) and "Memoranda during the War" (1867). His fatigue and night-watching in 1864 brought on a serious illness, from which he has never entirely recovered. In 1870 he published a volume of prose essays called "Democratic Vistas," a new edition of which has been issued by Walter Scott (London, 1888), with a preface written by Whitman in April of the same year. In this volume he explains that he uses the word "Democrat" in its widest sense as synonymous with the American form of government. From 1865 till 1874 Whitman held a government clerkship in Washington. In February, 1873, the lingering effects of his nursing fatigues and illness during the war culminated in a severe paralytic attack. He left Washington for Camden, N. J., and was recovering when in May of the same year his mother died somewhat suddenly in his presence. This shock caused a relapse. He abandoned Washington and has continued to reside at Camden. Mr. Whitman has been called "the good gray poet." His admirers, especially in England, have been extravagant in their praise of his works, comparing him with the best of the classic writers, and in this country Ralph Waldo Emerson said on the appearance of "Leaves of Grass": "I find it the most extraordinary piece of wit and wisdom that America has yet contributed. . . . I find incomparable things incomparably said." On the other hand, the peculiar form of his writings prevents their popularity, and their substance has been widely regarded as of no value. "Leaves of Grass" has even been condemned for indecency on account of its outspokenness, and when a complete edition of the work was published (Boston, 1881) the Massachusetts authorities objected to its sale in that state on the ground of immorality. Besides the works already mentioned, Whitman has published "Passage to India" (1870); "After All, not to Create Only" (1871); "As Strong as a Bird on Pinions Free" (1872); "Two Rivulets," including "Democratic Vistas" and "Passage to India" (1873); "Specimen Days and Collect" (1883); "November Boughs" (1885); and "Sands at Seventy" (1888). A selection of his poems, by William M. Rossetti, was published (London, 1868). Besides the complete edition of "Leaves of Grass" that has been mentioned, another, edited by Prof. Edward Dowden, has since been issued (Glasgow, Scotland). A popular selection, with introduction by Ernest Rhys, was published by Walter Scott (London, 1886). See "The Good Gray Poet, a Vindication," by William D. O'Connor (New York, 1866), and "Notes on Walt Whitman as Poet and Person," by John Burroughs (1866).

WHITMARSH, Caroline Snowden, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 1 June, 1827. At the age of five she was hurried home from the Ursuline convent in Charlestown, Mass., by the mob that destroyed it, and afterward, being a delicate child, attended school but little. She has written and compiled about twenty-three volumes, chiefly religious and educational. In 1870 she married James Guild, of Roxbury. Her books include "Violet" (Boston, 1855); "Daisy" (1856); "Never mind the Face" (New York, 1856); and the "Summer-House Series" on scientific subjects (7 vols., Boston, 1859-'64). She has compiled "Hymns for Mothers and Children" (2 series, Boston, 1860); "Hymns of the Ages," the first series with Mrs. Anne E. Guild (3 series, 1859-'64); and "Prayers of the Ages" (1867).—Mr. Guild's first wife, ANNE (1826-'68), whose maiden name was Gore, was a co-worker of Miss Whitmarsh, and the author of "Grandmother Lee's Portfolio" (Boston, 1857).

WHITMER, David, Mormon elder, b. in Harrisburg, Pa., 7 Jan., 1805; d. in Richmond, Mo., 25 Jan., 1888. He moved to Ontario county, N. Y., when a youth, and in 1829 was engaged in farming near Palmyra, N. Y., when Oliver Cowdery, the village school-master, told him that he intended to visit Joseph Smith and examine the alleged discovery of golden plates that bore upon their face curious inscriptions that no one could read. In June, 1829, Cowdery and Smith called upon Whitmer, and, by instruction from an angel of the Lord, as claimed by Smith, requested Whitmer to go into the woods near by. On reaching a secluded spot they all engaged in prayer, when suddenly a very brilliant light filled the space around them. A moment later an angel appeared, and also a table on which were several golden plates that they were told to examine. They were commanded to bear witness of their experience to the world. This they have done by prefixing a statement to each copy of the "Book of Mormon," where it is stated that they, "through the grace of God and our Lord Jesus Christ, have seen the plates which contain this record, which is the record of the people of Nephi." In June, 1838, Mr. Whitmer withdrew from the Mormon church, taking with him the original manuscript of the "Book of Mormon," and settled in Richmond, Mo., where he resided until his death, a useful and respected member of the community. In 1887 he issued "An Address to all Believers in Christ," in which, among his reasons for withdrawing from the Mormon church, were the ordaining of high-priests in 1831, the compiling of a book of doctrines and covenants in 1835, the publication of many revelations that were made, the organization of a band of Danites in 1838 at Far West, and the revelations that favored polygamy. He claimed to "believe in the doctrine of Christ as it is taught in the New Testament and the 'Book of Mormon,' the same gospel being taught in both these books." In the "Book of Mormon" is a positive command that "not any man among you have save it be one wife; and concubines shall he have none; for I the Lord delight in the chastity of woman." He was a faithful believer in Mormonism to the end, declaring during the last few hours of his life: "I want to say to you, the Bible and the record of the Nephites [the 'Book of Mormon'] is true, so you can say that you have heard me bear my testimony on my death-bed." He was the last of "the three witnesses" to the divine authenticity of the record of the Nephites. See "Early Days of Mormonism," by James Harrison Kennedy (New York, 1888).

WHITMORE, Edward, British soldier, b. in England in 1691; d. off Plymouth, Mass., 10 Dec., 1761. He was probably a son of Arthur Whitmore, of York, England. He served in the war of the Austrian succession, and was made lieutenant-colonel of the 36th regiment in 1747. He was promoted in July, 1757, colonel of the 22d regiment, and next year was made brigadier-general. He was at the siege of Louisburg in 1758, and, after the surrender of the town, was left there as military governor. On a voyage to Boston in December, 1761, the ship put into Plymouth harbor to seek shelter from contrary winds, and Gen. Whitmore, going on deck at midnight, accidentally fell overboard and was drowned. His body was taken up next morning near the "Gurnet" and carried to Boston in the same vessel. On Wednesday, 16 Dec., he was buried with military pomp in the king's chapel. See Richard Brown's "History of the Island of Cape Breton" (London, 1869); Francis Parkman's "Montcalm and Wolfe" (Boston, 1885); and William H. Whitmore's "Old State-House Memorial" (Boston, 1887).

WHITMORE, William Henry, genealogist, b. in Dorchester, Mass., 6 Sept., 1836. He is the son of a Boston merchant, was educated in the public schools of that city, and has devoted the leisure of his business life to antiquarian research and authorship. For eight years he was a member of the Boston common council, of which he became president in 1879, and he is a trustee of the Boston public library. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Harvard and Williams in 1867. About 1868 he was one of the patentees of a machine for making cube-sugar, and in 1882 he patented one for making hyposulphite of soda. His "Ancestral Tablets" (Boston, 1868) is an invention of great use to genealogists, being a set of pages cut and arranged to admit the insertion of a pedigree in a condensed form. He was a founder of the "Historical Magazine" in 1857, of the Prince society in 1858, and of the Boston antiquarian society in 1879, to which the Bostonian society succeeded. Mr. Whitmore has been an editor of the "New England Historical and Genealogical Register," in which many of his papers first appeared, and "The Heraldic Journal," which he established in 1863. He has edited "The Poetical Works of Winthrop Mackworth Praed" (New York, 1860); "The Hutchinson Papers," with William Appleton (2 vols., Boston, 1865), "Dunton's Letters" (1867), and the "Andros Tracts" (3 vols., 1868-'74), the last three being for the Prince society; and the "Records" of the Boston record commission, which he established in 1875 (19 vols., with others ready for the press); and he was co-editor of "Sewall's Diary," writing all the local notes (Boston, 1875-'82). He prepared the "Laws of Adoption," his codification being passed by the legislature almost unchanged in 1876; a "Revision of the City Ordinances," with Henry W. Putnam (1882); and a "Report on the State Seal," which was accepted by the legislature in 1885. He reprinted in fac-simile the "Laws of Massachusetts of 1672" (Boston, 1887). Mr. Whitmore has contributed to various magazines, native and foreign, and is the author of many genealogies, the most important of which are the families of Temple, Lane, Norton, Winthrop, Hutchinson, Usher, Ayres, Payne, Whitmore, Lee, Dalton, and Wilcox. His other works comprise "Handbook of American Genealogy" (Albany, 1862), reprinted with additions as "The American Genealogist" (1868); "The Cavalier Dismounted," an essay (Salem, 1864); the "Elements of Heraldry" (Boston, 1866); "Massachusetts Civil List, 1636-1774" (Albany, 1870); "Copp's Hill Epitaphs" (Albany, 1878); "History of the Old State-House," issued by the city of Boston (1882); and "Life of Abel Brown," the engraver (Boston, 1884).

WHITNEY, Adeline Dutton Train, author, b. in Boston, Mass., 15 Sept., 1824. She is the daughter of Enoch Train, founder of a line of packet-ships between Boston and Liverpool, and a cousin of George Francis Train. She was educated chiefly in Boston, and at the age of nineteen married Seth D. Whitney, of Milton, Mass. Mrs. Whitney has patented a set of "Alphabet Blocks," which are now in general use. Besides contributing to magazines for the young, she is the author of "Footsteps on the Seas," a poem (Boston, 1857); "Mother Goose for Grown Folks" (New York, 1860; revised eds., Boston, 1870 and 1882); "Boys at Chequasset" (Boston, 1862); "Faith Gartney's Girlhood" (1863); "The Gay-worthys" (1865); "A Summer in Leslie Goldthwaite's Life" (1866); "Patience Strong's Outings" (1868); "Hitherto" (1869); "We Girls" (1870); "Real Folks" (1871); "Pansies," poems (1872); "The Other Girls" (1873); "Sights and Insights" (1876); "Just How: a Key to the Cook-Books" (1878); "Odd or Even" (1880); "Bonnyborough" (1885); "Homespun Yarns" and "Holy-Tides" (1886); and "Daffodils" and "Bird-Talk" (1887). The last three are volumes of verse.

WHITNEY, Anne, sculptor, b. in Watertown, Mass., 2 Sept., 1821. She was educated by private tutors, and early manifested a love for poetry and sculpture, the latter becoming gradually an absorbing pursuit. Her poetical writings were collected in a volume entitled "Poems" (New York, 1859). In the same year she opened a studio in her native place, and subsequently making several visits to Europe, studied there four years, producing two of her best works during that time. On her return in 1873 she established a studio in Boston, where she has since remained. She has executed portraits and ideal works in groups, busts, medallions, and statues, including a statue of Samuel Adams, of which two copies, one in bronze and one in marble, are respectively in the capitol at Washington and in Boston (1863); "Roma" (1865); "Africa," a colossal recumbent figure of a woman, illustrating the civil war in the United States (1873); a statue of Harriet Martineau, belonging to Wellesley college (1883); and the fountain of "Leif Erikson" (1886). The last was unveiled in Boston, 29 Oct., 1887, and the statue above the fountain represents the Norse-Icelandic discoverer of America as a man of physical beauty and vigor, in the costume of the ancient Scandinavian warrior. (See the accompanying illustration.)

WHITNEY, Asa, manufacturer, b. in Townsend, Mass., 1 Dec., 1791; d. in Philadelphia, 4 June, 1874. His opportunities for education were meagre, and, after spending several years in his father's blacksmith-shop, he went in 1812 to New Hampshire, and soon became so capable as a machinist that his employer sent him to Brownsville, N. Y., to superintend the erection of machinery in a cotton-factory. Here he remained till 1830, carrying on a business in machine- and forge-works, when he was appointed assistant superintendent of the Mohawk and Hudson railroad, and became superintendent the following year. Resigning this post in 1839, he was elected canal commissioner of New York state, and for two years superintended the enlargement and management of the Erie canal and its branches. In 1842 he removed to Philadelphia and entered into the manufacture of locomotives with Matthew W. Baldwin, but withdrew from the partnership in two years. Soon afterward he became president of the Morris canal company, for which he applied special machinery to a series of inclined planes worked by steam, by which means its boats could pass elevations. He took out patents on 22 May, 1847, for the corrugated plate car-wheel, and the curved corrugated plate wheel, and began their manufacture with his son George as partner. On 25 April, 1848, he patented his process for annealing car-wheels. It consisted in placing the wheels, soon after they were cast, in a heated furnace, where they were subjected to a further gradual increase of temperature, and were then slowly cooled for three days. The discovery of this process of annealing, as applied to chilled cast-iron wheels, marked an era in the history of railroads. It enabled them with safety to increase both loads and speed. Previous to this discovery it was impossible to cast wheels with solid hubs, and therefore impossible to secure them rigidly to the axle. Now the whole wheel was easily cast in one piece, and capable of being forced securely upon the axle at a pressure of forty tons. Over ten million car-wheels are now in use in this country, and this principle of annealing is applied in some form to every wheel that is made of chilled cast-iron. On 19 March, 1850, he patented the tapered and ribbed corrugated wheel. For many years he made from 50,000 to 75,000 car-wheels per annum. The business is still carried on by the firm of A. Whitney and Sons. In 1860 Mr. Whitney was made president of the Reading railroad, but he resigned in a year from failing health, after contributing largely to the success of the road. He gave liberally during his life, and among other public bequests he gave $50,000 to found a professorship of dynamical engineering in the University of Pennsylvania, $12,500 to the Franklin institute, and $20,000 to the Old men's home in Philadelphia.

WHITNEY, Asa, merchant, b. in 1797; d. in Washington, D. C., in August, 1872. He was in mercantile business in New York city. He recognized the necessity of a railroad to the Pacific, was the first to suggest its feasibility, and from 1846 till 1850 urged it upon congress, the legislatures of several states, and the public, by personal influence and his writings. He was finally instrumental in securing appropriations in 1853 for the first surveys of the northern, southern, and middle routes, and lived to see communication opened from sea to sea in 1869. He was the author of "A Project for a Railroad to the Pacific" (New York, 1849), and "A Plan for a Direct Communication between the Great Centres of Populations of Europe and Asia" (London, 1851).

WHITNEY, Eli, inventor, b. in Westborough, Mass., 8 Dec., 1765; d. in New Haven, Conn., 8 Jan., 1825. During the Revolutionary war he was engaged in making nails by hand. Subsequently, by his industry as an artisan and by teaching, he was able to defray his expenses at Yale, where he was graduated in 1792. In the same year he went to Georgia under an engagement as a private tutor, but, on arriving there, found that the place had been filled. He then accepted the invitation of the widow of Gen. Nathanael Greene to make her place at Mulberry Grove, on Savannah river, his home while he studied law. Several articles that he had devised for Mrs. Greene's convenience gave her great faith in his inventive powers, and when some of her visitors regretted that there could be no profit in the cultivation of the green seed-cotton, which was considered the best variety, owing to the great difficulty of separating it from the seed, she advised them to apply to Whitney "who," she said, "could make anything." A pound of green seed-cotton was all that a negro woman could at that period clean in a day. Mr. Whitney up to that time had seen neither the raw cotton nor the cotton seed, but he at once procured some cotton from which the seeds had not been removed, although with trouble, as it was not the season of the year for the cultivation of the plant, and began to work out his idea of the cotton-gin. He was occupied for some months in constructing his machine, during which he met with great difficulty, being compelled to draw the necessary iron-wire himself, as he could obtain none in Savannah, and to manufacture his own iron tools. Near the end of 1792 he succeeded in making a gin of which the principle and mechanism are both exceedingly simple. Its main features are a cylinder four feet long and five inches in diameter, upon which is set a series of circular saws half an inch apart and projecting two inches above the surface of the revolving cylinder. A mass of cotton in the seed, separated from the cylinder by a steel grating, is brought into contact with the numerous teeth on the cylinder. These teeth catch the cotton while playing between the bars, which allow the lint, but not the seed, to pass. Beneath the saws is a set of stiff brushes on another cylinder revolving in the opposite direction, which brush off from the saw-teeth the lint that these have just pulled from the seed. There is also a revolving fan for producing a current of air to throw the light and downy lint that is thus liberated to a convenient distance from the revolving saws and brushes. Such are the essential principles of the cotton-gin as invented by Whitney and as it is still used; but in various details and workmanship it has been the subject of many improvements, the object of which has been to pick the cotton more perfectly from the seed, to prevent the teeth from cutting the staple, and to give greater regularity to the operation of the machine. By its use the planter was able to clean for market, by the labor of one man, one thousand pounds of cotton in place of five or six by hand. Mrs. Greene and Phineas Miller were the only persons that were permitted to see the machine, but rumors of it had gone through the state, and before it was quite finished the building in which it was placed was broken into at night and the machine was carried off. Before he could complete his model and obtain a patent, a number of machines based on his invention had been made surreptitiously and were in operation. In May, 1793, he formed a partnership with Mr. Miller, who had some property, and went to Connecticut to manufacture the machines; but he became involved in continual trouble by the infringement of his patent. In Georgia it was boldly asserted that he was not the inventor, but that something like it had been produced in Switzerland, and it was claimed that the substitution of teeth cut in an iron plate for wire prevented an infringement on his invention. He had sixty lawsuits pending before he secured a verdict in his favor. In South Carolina the legislature granted him $50,000, which was finally paid after vexatious delays and lawsuits. North Carolina allowed him a percentage for the use of each saw for five years, and collected and paid it over to the patentees in good faith, and Tennessee promised to do the same thing, but afterward rescinded her contract. For years—amid accumulated misfortunes, lawsuits wrongfully decided against him, the destruction of his manufactory by fire, the industrious circulation of the report that his machine injured the fibre of the cotton, the refusal of congress, on account of the opposition of southern members, to allow the patent to be renewed, and the death of his partner—Mr. Whitney struggled on until he was convinced that he should never receive a just compensation for his invention. In 1791 the amount of cotton that was exported amounted to only 189,500 pounds, while in 1803, owing to the use of his gin, it had risen to more than 41,000,000 pounds. Despairing of gaining a competence, he turned his attention in 1798 to the manufacture of fire-arms near New Haven, from which he eventually gained a fortune. He was the first manufacturer of fire-arms to effect the division of labor to the extent of making it the duty of each workman to perform by machinery but one or two operations on a single part of the gun, and thus made interchangeable the parts of the thousands of arms in process of manufacture at the same time. His first contract was with the U. S. government for 10,000 stand of muskets to be finished in about two years. For the execution of this order he took two years for preparation and eight more for completion. He gave bonds for $30,000, and was to receive $13.40 for each musket, or $134,000 in all. Immediately he began to build an armory at the foot of East Rock, two miles from New Haven, in the present village of Whitneyville, where, through the successive administrations from that of John Adams, repeated contracts for the supply of arms were made and fulfilled to the entire approbation of the government. The construction of his armory, and even of the commonest tools, which were devised by him for the prosecution of the business in a manner peculiar to himself, evinced the fertility of his genius and the precision of his mind. The buildings became the model upon which the national armories were afterward arranged, and many of his improvements were transferred to other establishments and have become common property. His advance in the manufacture of arms laid this country under permanent obligations by augmenting the means of national defence. Several of his inventions have been applied to other manufactures of iron and steel and added to his reputation. He established a fund of $500 at Yale, the interest of which is expended in the purchase of books on mechanical and physical science. In 1817 he married a daughter of Judge Pierpont Edwards. Robert Fulton said that "Arkwright, Watt, and Whitney were the three men that did most for mankind of any of their contemporaries," and Macaulay said: "What Peter the Great did to make Russia dominant, Eli Whitney's invention of the cotton-gin has more than equalled in its relation to the power and progress of the United States." See "Memoir of Eli Whitney," by Denison Olmsted (New Haven, 1846).

WHITNEY, James Amariah, lawyer, b. in Rochester, N. Y., 30 June, 1839. He removed in childhood with his parents to Maryland, Otsego co., N. Y., where he received a common-school education, and began life as a farmer, but in 1860-'5 studied chemistry, mechanics, and engineering without a master, and in the latter year became a writer of specifications in the office of a firm of patent solicitors. In 1868 he became an editor of the "American Artisan," and took an active part in organizing the New York society of practical engineers, of which he was president for several years. In 1869-'72 he was professor of agricultural chemistry in the American institute, and in the latter year he established himself as a solicitor of patents. In 1876 he was admitted to practice in the U. S. circuit courts. Iowa college gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1880. Besides numerous essays on scientific, mechanical, legal, and political subjects, Mr. Whitney is the author of a monograph on "The Relations of the Patent Laws to the Development of Agriculture" (New York, 1874); "The Chinese and the Chinese Question" (1880; enlarged ed., 1888); "Shobab, a Tale of Bethesda," a poem (1884); "Sonnets and Lyrics" (1884); "The Children of Lamech," a poem (1885); and "Poetical Works" (2 vols., 1886).

WHITNEY, Josiah Dwight, geologist, b. in Northampton, Mass., 23 Nov., 1819. He was graduated at Yale in 1839, and then spent six months in the chemical laboratory of Dr. Robert Hare in Philadelphia. In 1840 he joined the survey of New Hampshire as assistant geologist under Charles T. Jackson, and remained connected with that work until May, 1842, when he went abroad. For five years he travelled on the continent of Europe, and pursued chemical, geological, and mineralogical studies. On his return to this country in 1847 he engaged in the geological exploration of the Lake Superior region, and with John W. Foster was in the same year appointed by the U. S. government to assist Charles T. Jackson in making a geological survey of that district. Two years later the completion of the survey was intrusted to Foster and Whitney, who published "Synopsis of the Explorations of the Geological Corps in the Lake Superior Land District in the Northern Peninsula" (Washington, 1849), and "Report on the Geology and Topography of a Portion of the Lake Superior Land District in the State of Michigan" (part i., Copper Lands, 1850; part ii., The Iron Region, 1851). On the completion of this work he travelled for two years through the states east of the Mississippi for the purpose of collecting information with regard to the mining and mineral interests in this country. His results were issued as "The Metallic Wealth of the United States described and compared with that of other Countries" (Philadelphia, 1854). In 1855 he was appointed state chemist and professor in the Iowa state university, and was associated with James Hall in the geological survey of that state, issuing "Reports on the Geological Survey of Iowa" (2 vols., Albany, 1858-'9). During 1858-'60 Prof. Whitney was engaged on a geological survey of the lead region of the upper Missouri in connection with the official surveys of Wisconsin and Illinois, publishing, with James Hall, a "Report on the Geological Survey of the State of Wisconsin" (Albany, 1862). He was appointed state geologist of California in 1860, and engaged in conducting a topographical, geological, and natural history survey of that state until 1874, when the work was discontinued by act of legislature. Besides various pamphlets and annual reports on the subject, he issued six volumes under the title of "Geological Survey of California" (Cambridge, 1864-'70). In 1865 he was appointed professor of geology in Harvard, which chair he still retains, with charge of its school of mining and practical geology. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Yale in 1870. Prof. Whitney was one of the original members of the National academy of sciences named by act of congress in 1863, but he has since withdrawn from that body. He is also a member of other scientific bodies, both at home and abroad. In addition to contributing to the "American Journal of Science," the "North American Review," and similar periodicals, he has translated Berzelius's "Use of the Blowpipe" (Boston, 1845), and is the author of "The Yosemite Guide-Book" (San Francisco, 1869). Prof. Whitney has made a specialty of collecting a library of geological and geographical books. Mount Whitney, the highest mountain in the United States, was named in his honor.—His wife, Louisa Goddard, b. in Manchester, England, 17 Dec., 1819; d. in Cambridge, 13 May, 1882, is the author of "The Burning of the Convent: a Narrative of the Destruction of the Ursuline School on Mount Benedict, Charlestown, by One of the Pupils" (Cambridge, Mass., 1877), and "Peasy's Childhood: an Autobiography" (1878).—His brother, William Dwight, philologist, b. in Northampton, Mass., 9 Feb., 1827, was graduated at Williams in 1845, and obtained a clerkship in a banking-house in Northampton. This occupation he followed for three years, and devoted his leisure to the study of languages, particularly Sanskrit. In 1849-'50 he studied under Prof. Edward E. Salisbury at Yale, and in 1850 he went to Germany and studied at the University of Berlin under Franz Bopp and Albrecht Weber, and at the University of Tübingen under Rudolf Roth. With the latter he prepared an edition of the "Atharva Veda Sanhita" (Berlin, 1856), for which he copied the text from the manuscripts in the Royal library in Berlin, and collated it with other copies in the libraries of Paris, London, and Oxford. In 1854 he was appointed professor of Sanskrit at Yale, and in 1870 of comparative philology also at that university, and he still retains the combined chair. Prof. Whitney delivered a series of lectures before the Smithsonian institution in 1864, which he repeated in extended form before the Lowell institute in Boston, and then published as "Language and the Study of Language" (New York, 1867). He was elected a member of the American oriental society in 1849, was its librarian in 1855-'73, its corresponding secretary in 1857-'84, and since then its president. His contributions to its "Journal" have been very large, and of its volumes vi.-xii., half the contents were written by him, including a translation of the "Sūrya Siddhānta," with notes and appendix, being a Hindoo treatise on astronomy (1860); text, with notes, of the "Atharva Veda Prātiçākhyā" (1862); the text, with English versions, notes, and native commentary, of the "Taittiriya Prātiçākhyā" (1871), which gained for him the Bopp prize from the Berlin academy as the most important Sanskrit publication of the preceding three years; the "Index Verborum to the Atharva-Veda" (1881); and reviews of Karl R. Lepsius's phonetic alphabet and of the opinions of Jean B. Biot, Albrecht Weber, and Max Müller on Hindoo astronomy. He was also a contributor to the great Sanskrit dictionary of Böhtlingk and Roth (7 vols., St. Petersburg, 1853-'67). Prof. Whitney ranks as one of the foremost Sanskrit scholars of his time, and his text-books have been awarded high praise for their exact statements of general grammatical doctrine. In the science of language, of which his expositions and classifications are accepted as authoritative, he claims that the development of speech is by the acceptance of conventional signs, and that its beginnings were imitative, in lieu of the view advanced by others who contend that language was spontaneously generated in the mind and coexistent with thought. The degree of Ph. D. was conferred on him by the University of Breslau in 1861, and that of LL. D. by Williams in 1868, William and Mary in 1869, and Harvard in 1876, while that of J. U. D. was given him by St. Andrews, Scotland, in 1874, and Litt. D. by Columbia in 1886. He was the first president of the American philological association in 1869, and in 1865 was elected to the National academy of sciences. Besides his membership in many other scientific bodies, both at home and abroad, he is a correspondent of the Berlin, Turin, Rome, and St. Petersburg academies, the Institut of France, and is a foreign knight of the Prussian order "Pour le mérite." Prof. Whitney has written for the "North American Review," the "New Englander," and similar periodicals, and various articles in cyclopædias, and has contributed to the transactions of societies of which he is a member many papers, of which may be mentioned (besides those included in his Oriental and linguistic studies) "Contributions from the Atharva Veda to the Theory of Sanskrit Verbal Accent" (1856); "On the Jyotisha Observation of the Place of the Colures and the Date derivable from It" (1864); "On Material and Form in Language" (1872); "Darwinism and Language" (1874); "Logical Consistency in Views of Language" (1880); "Mixture in Language" (1881); "The Study of Hindoo Grammar and the Study of Sanskrit" (1884); "The Upanishads and their Latest Translation" (1886). His other works, several of which have been translated into one or more languages, include "Compendious German Grammar" (New York, 1869); "German Reader in Prose and Verse" (1870); "Oriental and Linguistic Studies" (1st series, 1873; 3d series, 1875); "Life and Growth of Language" in the "International Scientific Series" (1876); "Essentials of English Grammar" (Boston, 1877); "Sanskrit Grammar, including both the Classical Language and the Older Dialects of Veda and Brahmana" (Leipsic, 1879); and "Practical French Grammar" (1886). At present he is superintending editor of the "Dictionary of the English Language" in course of preparation by the Century company in New York.

WHITNEY, Myron W., singer, b. in Ashbury, Mass., 5 Sept., 1836. He went to Boston at the age of sixteen and made his first appearance there in 1858 at a Christmas performance of the "Messiah" that was given by the Handel and Haydn society. After about ten years of concert-singing he went to Florence, Italy, where he studied with Luigi Vanucini, and then to London to become a pupil of Alberto Randegger. He then filled various engagements and attracted attention especially by his rendition of the part of Elijah at the Birmingham festival. In 1876 he was the principal solo-singer at the opening exercises of the Centennial exhibition in Philadelphia. Since that year he has sung in his native country, and has appeared in nearly all the May festivals held in different cities of the Union. For several years he was a member of the Boston ideal opera company. He possesses a fine bass voice of nearly three octaves compass, and is especially noted as an oratorio-singer.

WHITNEY, Peter, clergyman, b. in Northborough, Mass., 6 Sept., 1744; d. there, 29 Feb., 1816. He was graduated at Harvard in 1762, and on 4 Nov., 1767, ordained pastor at Northborough, where he remained till his death. He was the author of a "History of the County of Worcester" (Worcester, 1793); single sermons; and papers in the "Memoirs of the American Academy."—His son, PETER (1770-1843), was graduated at Harvard in 1791, had charge of the church at Quincy, Mass., from 1800 till his death, and published various discourses.—The second Peter's son, George, clergyman, b. in Quincy, Mass., 2 July, 1804; d. in Jamaica Plain, Mass., 2 April, 1842, was graduated at Harvard in 1824 and at the divinity-school in 1828, and from 1831 till his death was pastor of churches in Roxbury. He published "Some Account of the Early History and Present State of the Town of Quincy, Mass." (Boston, 1827), of which he was preparing an enlarged edition at the time of his death.—George's brother, Frederic Augustus, clergyman, b. in Quincy, Mass., 13 Sept., 1812; d. in Brighton, Mass., 21 Oct., 1880, was graduated at Harvard in 1833 and at the divinity-school in 1838, teaching in the mean time. After doing missionary work, he was pastor at Brighton, Mass., in 1843-'59, and afterward lived in that town without a pastoral charge. He issued thirteen annual reports as chairman of the town school committee, and nine as president of the trustees of the Public library. Besides these, and various sermons, addresses, and contributions to current literature, he published "Historical Sketch of the Old Church at Quincy" (Albany, 1864), and "Biography of James Holton," founder of the Holton library, Brighton (Boston, 1865). He was also the author of various hymns, some of which are collected in Rev. Alfred P. Putnam's "Singers and Songs of the Liberal Faith" (Boston, 1875).

WHITNEY, Thomas Richard, author, b. in New York city in 1804; d. there, 12 April, 1858. He served two years in the assembly of the state in 1854-'5, and one term in congress in 1855-'7, having been elected by the American party. Mr. Whitney was editorially connected with the New York "Sunday Times" and other papers, and published "The Ambuscade," a poem (New York, 1845), and "Defence of the American Policy as opposed to the Encroachments of Foreign Influence, and especially to the Interference of the Papacy" (1856).

WHITNEY, William Collins, secretary of the navy, b. in Conway, Mass., 15 July, 1841. His father, James S. Whitney, was at one time collector of the port of Boston, and in 1860 was a delegate to the Charleston convention. The son was graduated at Yale in 1863 and at Harvard law-school in 1865, and continued the study of law under Abraham R. Lawrence, in New York city, where he was admitted to the bar and practised his profession. In 1871 he assisted in the organization of the Young men's Democratic club, and was subsequently brought into notice by his active measures in the movement against the Tweed ring. He was made inspector of the city schools in 1872, and was defeated the same year as the candidate of the reformed Democracy for district attorney. In the following year he took an active part in the Tilden canvass. He was appointed corporation counsel of New York city in 1875, 1876, and 1880, and is credited with having saved the city several millions of dollars by his opposition to claims against the city treasury. He also put in practice a system for the protection of the legal rights of the corporation, which has proved of permanent value. He resigned this office in 1882, and on 5 March, 1885, was appointed secretary of the navy. Yale conferred the degree of LL. D. upon him in 1888. His administration has been marked by the completion of several vessels that form the nucleus of a new U. S. navy, in whose development he has taken much interest. Secretary Whitney's residence, at the corner of 5th avenue and 57th street, New York, is one of the finest in the city.

WHITON, John Milton, clergyman, b. in Winchendon, Mass., 1 Aug., 1785; d. in Antrim, N. H., 28 Sept., 1856. He was graduated at Yale in 1805, and was pastor of the Presbyterian church in Antrim, N. H., from 28 Sept., 1808, till 1 Jan., 1853, and then of the Congregational church in the neighboring town of Bennington till his death. He received the degree of D. D. from Princeton in 1848. Dr. Whiton wrote "Brief Notices of the Town of Antrim," in the "Collections of the New Hampshire Historical Society" (vol. iv., 1852); "Sketches of the Early History of New Hampshire, 1623-1833" (Concord, 1834); also statistical account of the Congregational and Presbyterian ministers of Hillsborough county, in the "New Hampshire Repository" for 1846. At the time of his death he was preparing a "History of Presbyterianism in New Hampshire."—His grandson, James Morris, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 11 April, 1833, was educated at the Boston Latin-school and at Yale, where he was graduated in 1853. He was rector of Hopkins grammar-school, New Haven, Conn., from 1854 till 1864, pastor of the 1st Congregational church, Lynn, Mass., 1865-'69, and of the North Congregational church, Lynn, 1869-'75. In 1876-'8 he was principal of Williston seminary, Easthampton, Mass., and pastor of the 1st Congregational church, Newark, N. J., in 1879-'85, and became pastor of Trinity Congregational church, Tremont, New York city, in 1886. He is regarded as a Christian evolutionist. His views regarding endless punishment were made the subject of an inquiry by a council of Congregational churches at Newark in 1879, the result being a vote of confidence and fellowship, notwithstanding his disavowal of that tenet. He has been a frequent contributor to religious journals, and, in addition to various school-books, has published "Select Orations of Lysias" (Boston, 1875); "Is Eternal Punishment Endless?" in which he maintains that endless punishment is not decisively revealed in the New Testament (1876); "Essay on the Gospel according to Matthew" (1880); "The Gospel of the Resurrection" (1881); "Early Pupils of the Spirit" (London, 1884); "The Evolution of Revelation" (New York, 1885); "The Divine Satisfaction" (London, 1886); and two series of discourses given in Congregational churches in England, entitled "Turning of Thought and Conduct" (London, 1887) and "The Law of Liberty" (1888).—His daughter, Mary Bartlett, educator, b. in New Haven, Conn., 17 Aug., 1857, was graduated at Smith college in 1879, taught in Newark high-school in 1881-'3, and has since been a teacher in Packer institute, Brooklyn, N. Y. She was the author with her father of "Six Months' Preparation for Reading Xenophon" (New York, 1885).

WHITSITT, William Heth, clergyman, b. near Nashville, Tenn., 25 Nov., 1841. He was graduated at Union university, Tenn., in 1861, and at the Southern Baptist theological seminary in 1869, meanwhile spending a year at the University of Virginia. He studied in 1869-'70 at the University of Leipsic, and in 1870-'1 at the University of Berlin, served for a short time as pastor of the Baptist church in Albany, Ga., and in 1872 was elected professor of ecclesiastical history in the Southern Baptist theological seminary, Louisville, Ky., which place he still holds. Mercer university gave him the degree of D. D. in 1874. Besides various contributions to reviews and other periodicals, he is the author of "History of the Rise of Infant Baptism" (Louisville, 1878); "History of Communion among Baptists" (1880); and "Origin of the Disciples of Christ, a Contribution to the Hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of Alexander Campbell" (New York, 1888).

WHITTAKER, Henry, author, b. in Radnorshire, Wales, 15 Oct., 1808; d. in New York city, 9 Feb., 1881. He came to New York in 1850, and became managing clerk in a law-office. He published "Practice and Pleading under the Code, Original and Amended, with Appendix of Forms" (New York, 1852; 3d ed., 1863; with a supplement, 1867), and "Analysis of Recent Decisions on Practice and Pleadings" (1863). — His son, Frederick, author, b. in London, England, 12 Dec., 1838, came to this country with his father in 1850, and studied architecture. During the civil war he was in the National cavalry service, rising to the rank of lieutenant and brevet captain. After the war he became a teacher and journalist. Concerning the circumstances of the battle in which Gen. George A. Custer met his death, he entered into a long and bitter controversy, through a congressional memorial and otherwise, which resulted in a military court of inquiry being held in Chicago in 1879, in which his version of the facts was virtually sustained. Since that controversy Mr. Whittaker has withdrawn from all literature save that of the popular order. He has written numerous stories for the New York "Ledger," and in March, 1884, he published in the New York "Tribune" a "Defence of Dime Novels, by a Writer of Them." He has published a "Life of Gen. George Armstrong Custer" (New York, 1876) and "Cadet Button," a novel (1878).

WHITTAKER, James, Shaker elder, b. in Oldham, England, 28 Feb., 1751; d. in Enfield, Conn., 20 July, 1787. He was brought up in the faith of the French prophets, and in his youth was placed in the care of Ann Lee, becoming her chief disciple. He accompanied her to America, and when she and her brother William died in 1784 he succeeded as the head of the church, which, under his active ministry, increased in New Lebanon, N. Y., Shirley, Harvard, and Woburn, Mass., Enfield, Conn., and other places.

WHITEMORE, Amos, inventor, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 19 April, 1759; d. in West Cambridge, Mass., 27 March, 1828. He was the son of a farmer, and, after working for several years as a gunsmith, formed a partnership with his brother and others for the manufacture of cotton and wool cards. After engaging in this business for a short time he invented a machine for puncturing the leather and setting the wires, an operation that had previously been performed by hand. In experimenting for this invention he met with the greatest difficulty in bending the wires to a given angle after they were finally fastened in the leather, and was on the point of giving up the attempt, when in a dream he discovered the method of effecting it. The invention was patented in the United States in 1797, and Mr. Whittemore went to England to secure his rights there, but was unsuccessful. In this country the invention was sold for $150,000, but afterward it was repurchased by his brother, Samuel, who then conducted the business. His last years were devoted to the construction of an orrery, in which every planet was to describe its own orbit, but he did not complete it.

WHITEMORE, Don Juan, civil engineer, b. in Milton, Vt., 6 Dec., 1830. He received his early education from his father, who was a lawyer, and then spent two terms at the Bakersfield academy. In 1847 he became an engineer, and in 1853-'7 was made chief assistant engineer of the La Crosse and Milwaukee railroad, after which he was chief engineer of the Southern Minnesota railway company. His health then failing, he accepted the place of chief assistant engineer of the Western railway of Cuba, but returned to the United States in 1861, and became chief assistant engineer of the La Crosse and Milwaukee railroad. In 1865 he was appointed chief assistant engineer of the Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul railway company, and in 1866 its chief engineer. At that time the road was only 275 miles, but it has steadily increased until it is now 5,675, being the largest railway under one ownership and management in the world. He has had charge of the construction of 2,700 miles of railway line and bridges, including those across Mississippi river at La Crosse, Minneapolis, and Sabula, and across Missouri river at Kansas City. During 1874-'5 he became much interested in the subject of hydraulic cement, and experimented with a product made from stone found near Milwaukee. From these investigations has resulted the establishment of works that now produce 400,000 barrels yearly. A switch-stand of his invention is now in use on more than one tenth the mileage of railways in the United States. The degree of C. E. was conferred on him by the University of Vermont in 1884, and that of Ph. D. by the University of Wisconsin in 1884. He is a member of scientific societies and was president of the American society of civil engineers in 1884.

WHITEMORE, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Boston, 1 Jan., 1800; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 21 March, 1861. He was apprenticed, at the age of fourteen, to a morocco-dresser in Charlestown, subsequently to a brass-founder, and then to a shoemaker in Boston. Becoming acquainted with the Rev. Hosea Ballou, he was led to study theology under his direction, and in April, 1821, became pastor of the Universalist church at Milford, Mass. In 1822 he removed to the church in Cambridgeport, the pastorate of which he resigned in 1831. At an early period in his career as a minister he was joint editor of the "Universalist Magazine," and in 1828 he established the "Trumpet," a Universalist newspaper in Boston, of which he was sole editor and proprietor for thirty years. He represented Cambridge repeatedly in the legislature, and was president of the Vermont and Massachusetts railway, and of the Cambridge bank for many years. Tufts college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1858. He published "Modern History of Universalism, from the Era of the Reformation to the Present Time" (Boston, 1830; enlarged ed., 1860); "Notes and Illustrations of the Parables" (1832); "Songs of Zion" (1836); "Commentary on the Revelation of St. John" (1838); "Guide to Universalism" (1839); "Commentary on the Book of Daniel" (1840); "The Gospel Harmonist" (1841); "Conference Hymns" (1842); "The Sunday-School Choir" (1844); "Life of Rev. Hosea Ballou" (4 vols., 1854-'5); and an "Autobiography" (1859).

WHITTHORNE, Washington Curran, senator, b. in Lincoln (now Marshall) county, Tenn., 19 April, 1825. He was graduated at East Tennessee university in 1843, studied law, and was licensed to practise. He was a member of the state senate in 1855-'8, and of the Tennessee house of representatives in 1859-'61. Mr. Whitthorne was on the Democratic electoral ticket in 1860, and delegate to the Baltimore convention. At the opening of the civil war he became assistant adjutant-general to Gen. Samuel R. Anderson's Tennessee brigade in the Confederate army, and served throughout the western Virginia campaign. He was adjutant-general of the state of Tennessee in 1862-'5, and was in the various campaigns of the Confederate army of Tennessee as aide on the staffs of Gen. Samuel R. Anderson, Gen. Marcus J. Wright, Gen. John C. Carter, and Gen. William J. Hardee. He was elected representative in congress from Tennessee in 1870, and served by re-election till 1883. He was appointed to the U. S. senate as a Democrat to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Howell E. Jackson, took his seat, 26 April, 1886, and was afterward elected to fill out the unexpired term. He had previously been elected to the house of representatives for the 50th congress. In the house Mr. Whitthorne was for six years chairman of the committee on naval affairs.

WHITTIER, John Greenleaf, poet, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 17 Dec., 1807. His parents were members of the Society of Friends, and to the principles and practices of this sect he always remained faithful, conforming even to its peculiarities of speech and garb in a community where such observance, by being singular, must often have been trying to a temperament so shy and sensitive as his. His first American ancestor came to Massachusetts in 1638, and the conversion to Quakerism took place in the second generation of the family, after the settlement of the Bay Colony, at a time when that sect was sternly persecuted. There may therefore be something of heredity in the unswerving constancy of Whittier to unpopular opinions. At the date of his birth Haverhill was still a farming village, one of the prettiest among the many pretty hamlets which then gave a peaceful charm to the rural scenery of Massachusetts. Born on a farm, Whittier's first occupations were those of a farmer's boy, driving the kine to and from pasture, riding to mill, fetching in wood for the undying kitchen-fire, and helping in the lighter labors of haying and harvest. He was thus early brought into that intimate communion with Mother Earth and with Nature which comes not by mere observation, and which gives such a peculiar charm of picturesque truth to so many of his poems. How much he thus learned and to how good profit he put it are visible in many of his poems, but especially in his "Snow-Bound," which, in addition to its other merits, has now also a historical value as a vivid picture of modes of life even then obsolescent and now almost as far away as those pictured by Homer. And not only will the scenery of New England, both outward and domestic, live in his verse, but it is worth remark that the nobler qualities of the Puritans have nowhere found such adequate literary expression since Milton as in this member of a sect which they did their utmost to suppress. Almost alone among American poets, he has revived the legends of his neighborhood in verse, and his "Floyd Ireson" is among the best of modern ballads, surpassed by none save Scott, if even by him. His schooling in other respects must have been scanty enough, since his only opportunity during boyhood would be the nearest district school (taught commonly by a college student younger than some of his rustic pupils), where he got such training in the simpler rudiments of knowledge as was possible under the conditions then existing. And this training, as usually in the country, was limited to the winter months, when farm-work was necessarily suspended. He has recorded his indebtedness during boyhood to Dr. Elias Weld, of Haverhill, who gave him the freedom of his library.

A farm-hand taught him shoemaking, the common occupation during winter in the fishing and farming villages along the coast, and by this means he earned enough to warrant his attending Haverhill academy during six months of 1827. He was now sufficiently learned, according to the simpler notions of those days, to be himself a teacher, and taught in the district school of West

Amesbury during the following winter. This supplied the means for another six months at the academy. In Whittier's case, as in that of so many other New Englanders, nothing is more characteristic or more touching than the persistent resolve to get the best education within their reach at whatever sacrifice.

The literary impulse in him must have been strong, for while yet in his nineteenth year he contributed anonymous verse to the poet's corner of the "Free Press," a journal edited by W. L. Garrison in Newburyport, and enjoyed the furtive bliss of print. Garrison saw signs of promise in these immature experiments, sought out the author, and gave him the precious encouragement of praise and sympathy. This led to a lasting friendship, and, with the traditions of his sect, may have had some influence in preparing Whittier to enlist in the anti-slavery crusade which began with the establishment of the "Liberator" in 1831, and afterward caught so much of its inspiration from his fervid lyrics. The ambition to become a poet was awakened in him appropriately enough by a copy of Robert Burns's poems, which fell into his hands in his fourteenth year.

His father dying, he carried on the farm for the next five years, and in 1835 was sent to the general court from Haverhill. During all these years he had been an industrious writer, seeking an outlet in all directions and contributing poems to John Neal's "Yankee" and to the "New England Magazine," where the "Autocrat" began his admirable discourses. In 1829 he undertook the editorship of the "American Manufacturer" in Boston, and in 1830 succeeded George D. Prentice as editor of the "Haverhill Gazette" during the first six months of the year, and then of the "New England Weekly Review" in Hartford, Conn. This office he resigned in 1832 on account of failing health and returned home. In 1836 he became secretary of the American anti-slavery society, and afterward removed to Philadelphia, where for a year (1838-'9) he edited the "Pennsylvania Freeman." This he did with such sincerity that its printing-office was sacked and burned by a mob. At that time it required the courage of passionate conviction to maintain principles the noisier profession of which was to become profitable a few years later. Delicate as his organization was, Whittier faced many a brutal mob with unflinching composure. He was never a mere fanatic, but always quick to recognize and celebrate high qualities even in an adversary, as many of his poems show. He refused to follow Garrison in the renunciation of political action as one means of reform. In 1840 he took up his abode in Amesbury, a quiet village near his birthplace, and there (with the exception of six months spent at Lowell as editor of the "Middlesex Standard"), in the simple dignity of a frugal independence, the fruit of his own literary labors, he has lived ever since, and happily still lives, known and loved wherever our tongue is spoken. From 1847 to 1859 he contributed editorially to the "National Era," an anti-slavery newspaper published at Washington, in which "Uncle Tom's Cabin" was first printed.

In his seclusion Whittier was never idle, nor did he neglect his duties as a citizen while confirming his quality as a poet. Whenever occasion offered, some burning lyric of his flew across the country, like the fiery cross, to warn and rally. Never mingling in active politics (unless filling the office of presidential elector may be called so), he probably did more than anybody in preparing the material out of which the Republican party was made. When the civil war was impending he would have evaded it if possible by any concession short of surrender, as his "Word for the Hour" (January, 1861) shows. While the war continued he wrote little with direct reference to it, and never anything that showed any bitterness toward the authors of it. After it was over he would have made the terms of settlement liberal and conciliatory. He was too wise and too humane to stir the still living embers of passion and resentment for any political end however dear to him.

Of all American poets, with the single exception of Longfellow, Whittier has been the most popular, and in his case more than in that of any other the popularity has been warmed through with affection. This has been due in part to the nobly simple character of the man, transparent through his verse, in part to the fact that his poetry, concerning itself chiefly with the obvious aspects of life and speculation, has kept close to the highest levels of the average thought and sentiment. His themes have been mainly chosen from his own time and country—from his own neighborhood even—he deals with simple motives and with experiences common to all, and accordingly his scenery (whether of the outward or the inward eye) is domestically welcome to all his countrymen. He is never complex in thought or obscure in expression, and if sometimes his diction might gain in quality by a more deliberate choice, yet the pellucid simplicity of his phrase and the instant aptness of his epithet as often secure a more winning felicity through his frankness of confidence in the vernacular. His provincialisms of word or accent have an endearing property to the native ear, though even that will consent to a few of his more licentious rhymes. One feels that it is a neighbor who is speaking. Nor should the genial piety of his habitual thought and the faith that seeks no securer foothold than the Rock of Ages, on which the fathers stood so firmly, be overlooked among the qualities that give him a privilege of familiar entrance to a multitude of hearts and minds which would be barred against many higher, though not more genuine, forms of poetry. His religion has the sincerity of Cowper's without those insane terrors that made its very sincerity a torture. There are many points of spiritual likeness between the English and the American poet, especially in their unmetaphysicalized love of outward natures, their austerity tempered with playful humor, and in that humanity of tone which establishes a tie of affectionate companionship between them and their readers. Whittier has done as much for the scenery of New England as Scott for that of Scotland. Many of his poems (such, for example, as "Telling the Bees"), in which description and sentiment mutually inspire each other, are as fine as any in the language.

Whittier, as many of his poems show, and as, indeed, would be inevitable, has had his moments of doubt and distrust, but never of despair. He has encountered everywhere the moral of his inscription on a sun-dial, convinced that "there's light above me by the shade below." He, like others, has found it hard to reconcile the creed held by inheritance with the subtle logic of more modern modes of thought. As he himself has said:

"He reconciled as best he could Old faith and fancies new."

But his days have been "bound each to each with natural piety"; he has clung fast to what has been the wholesome and instructive kernel of all creeds; he has found consolation in the ever-recurring miracles, whether of soul or sense, that daily confront us, and in the expression of his own delight and wonder and gratitude for them has conveyed that solace to the minds and hearts of all his readers. One quality above all others in Whittier—his innate and unstudied Americanism—has rendered him alike acceptable to his countrymen and to his kindred beyond the sea. His first volume was "Legends of New England," in prose and verse (Hartford, 1831), which has been followed by "Moll Pitcher" (1832); "Mogg Megone" (Boston, 1836); "Ballads" (1838); "Lays of My Home, and other Poems" (1843); "Miscellaneous Poems" (1844); the first English edition of his poetry, entitled "Ballads, and other Poems," with an introduction by Elizur Wright (London, 1844); "The Stranger in Lowell" (1845); "Supernaturalism in New England" (New York and London, 1847); "Leaves from Margaret Smith's Journal" (Boston, 1849); "Voices of Freedom" (Philadelphia, 1849); a larger English collection of his "Poetical Works" (London, 1850); "Old Portraits and Modern Sketches" (Boston, 1850); "Songs of Labor, and other Poems," and "The Chapel of the Hermits, and other Poems" (1853); "A Sabbath Scene: a Sketch of Slavery in Verse" (1853); "Literary Recreations and Miscellanies" (1854); "The Panorama, and other Poems" (1856); "Complete Poetical Works" (2 vols., 1857); "Home Ballads and Poems" (1860); "Snow-Bound" (1862); a new edition of his "Complete Poetical Works" (1863); "In War Time, and other Poems" (1863); "National Lyrics" (1865); a collection of his "Prose Works" (2 vols., 1866); "The Tent on the Beach" (1867); "Among the Hills" (1868); an illustrated edition of his "Complete Poetical Works" (1868); one corresponding in typography with the "Prose Works" (1869); a volume of his "Ballads of New England" contains sixty illustrations by various artists (1869); "Miriam, and other Poems" (1870); "The Pennsylvania Pilgrim, and other Poems" (1872); "Hazel Blossoms" (1874); "Mabel Martin" (1875); a new collected edition of his "Poetical Works" comprising poems that he had written till the date of publication (1875); "Centennial Hymn" (1876); "The Vision of Echard, and other Poems" (1878); "The King's Missive, and other Poems" (1881); "Bay of Seven Islands, and other Poems" (1883); "Poems of Nature" (1885); and "St. Gregory's Guest, and Recent Poems" (1886). A final edition of his poetical and prose works has been supervised by himself, and includes his sister's poems (7 vols., 1888-'9). See a "Biography," by Francis H. Underwood (Boston, 1875; new ed., 1883), and "John G. Whittier: his Life, Genius, and Writings," by W. Sloane Kennedy (1882).—His sister, Elizabeth Hussey, b. near Haverhill, Mass., 7 Dec., 1815; d. in Amesbury, 3 Sept., 1864, although not a literary aspirant, was the author of poems marked by tenderness, grace, and rhythmic felicity. Several of them were included by her brother in his volume entitled "Hazel Blossoms." Like him, she was a member of the Society of Friends, and an ardent advocate of liberty. The engraving represents Whittier's home, Oak Knoll, in Danvers, Mass.

WHITTINGHAM, William Rollinson, P. E. bishop, b. in New York city, 2 Dec., 1805; d. in

Orange, N. J., 17 Oct., 1879. He was the son of English parents. His father, while actively engaged in business, found time for scholarly pursuits, while his mother, with a view to her son's education, made herself acquainted with the learned languages, and became so proficient in them that she gave lessons in Hebrew to divinity students. Young Whittingham had no instruction other than that he received at home until he was sent to the General theological seminary, where he was graduated in 1825. After being ordered deacon in 1827 he was assigned to missionary work in the neighborhood of Orange, N. J. He was ordained priest, 17 Dec., 1829, when he became rector of St. Mark's in the latter place. In 1831 he accepted the rectorship of St. Luke's, New York city, and remained there until 1835, when, after a voyage to Europe for his health, he was chosen professor of ecclesiastical history in the General theological seminary. This chair he occupied until 1840. In that year, after a spirited contest among the friends of several candidates, he was elected bishop of Maryland, and consecrated on 17 Sept. in St. Paul's, Baltimore. From his accession the diocese advanced rapidly in all that concerns church improvement, and his personal influence with both clergy and laity was as extraordinary as it was beneficent. Among several charitable and educational institutions that were founded through his efforts were St. James's college, Hagerstown, Md.; the Church home and infirmary, Baltimore; an order of deaconesses; and the Sisterhood of St. John in Washington. At the beginning of the civil war Dr. Whittingham's earnest advocacy of the Union cause separated him temporarily from the sympathies of many of his people, but his attitude then enabled him to labor more successfully for the unity of the church when the struggle had ended. In 1869 the diocese of Easton was set off from that of Maryland, and in 1870 Rev. William Pinkney, D. D., was appointed to relieve Bishop Whittingham of a part of his labors. In 1872 he represented the American church at the Lambeth conference, and subsequently he attended the meeting of Old Catholics at Bonn in a similar capacity. Bishop Whittingham was a pronounced high-churchman, although he is understood to have somewhat modified his opinions later in life. His peculiar views engaged him on several occasions in controversies with his clergy on points of church government. Among these were his presentation in 1876 for not bringing to trial the rector of Mount Calvary for reading prayers for the dead, and the earlier contest with Rev. Dr. Joseph Trapnell, of St. Andrew's, concerning the prior right of the bishop to celebrate communion at confirmations. During the war he had occasion to rebuke his clergy severely for omitting from the service the prayer for the president. For many years before his death Dr. Whittingham was an invalid. His last official act was performed on 7 Nov., 1878. At the time of his consecration he was the youngest of the American bishops; at his death he was the oldest but one, having been thirty-nine years in the episcopal office. He received the degree of S. T. D. from Columbia in 1827. Besides editing the "Family Visitor" and "Children's Magazine," monthly publications, and "The Churchman," issued weekly, he was the editor of "The Parish Library of Standard Works," with an introduction and notes (13 vols., 1828 et seq.); Jahn's "Introduction to the Old Testament," with Dr. Samuel H. Turner (1827); William Palmer's "Treatise on the Church of Christ" (2 vols., 1841); the "Commonitorium" of Vincent of Lérins, being a new translation with notes, etc. (1847); and "Ratramm on the Lord's Supper," with a revised translation (1848). He also contributed, with three other clergymen, to "Essays and Dissertations in Biblical Literature" (New York, 1829).

W. Whittingham.

WHITTLE, Francis McNeece, P. E. bishop, b. in Mecklenburg county, Va., 7 July, 1823. He was graduated at the Virginia theological seminary, Alexandria, in 1847, ordered deacon, 16 July, 1847, and ordained priest, 8 Oct., 1848. He was rector of Kanawha parish, Kanawha co., Va., in 1847-'9, of St. James, Northam parish, Goochland co. in 1849-'52, of Grace church, Berryville, in 1852-'7, and of St. Paul's, Louisville, Ky., in 1857-'68. He was elected assistant bishop of Virginia, 17 May, 1867, and consecrated in St. Paul's church, Alexandria, Va., 30 April, 1868. Upon the death of Bishop Johns, 4 April, 1876, he became bishop of Virginia. He received the degree of D. D. from the Theological seminary of Ohio in 1867, and that of LL. D. from William and Mary college in 1873. In 1877 the diocese of Virginia was divided, West Virginia being set off as a separate diocese. Bishop Whittle chose the old diocese.

WHITTLESEY, Abigail Goodrich, educator, b. in Ridgefield, Conn., 29 Nov., 1788; d. in Colchester, Conn., 16 July, 1858. She was a sister of Charles A. and Samuel G. Goodrich, was educated at Berlin, Conn., and married in 1808 the Rev. Samuel Whittlesey, who was pastor at New Preston, Conn., for several years, then was steward for a short time of the American asylum for the deaf and dumb at Hartford, and afterward was associated with her in conducting large female seminaries in Utica and Canandaigua, N. Y. She began in 1832, while in Utica, the publication of the "Mother's Magazine," which she edited till about 1850, and subsequently revived under the title of "The Magazine for Mothers and Daughters."

WHITTLESEY, Elisha, lawyer, b. in Washington, Conn., 19 Oct., 1783; d. in Washington, D. C., 7 Jan., 1863. He was brought up on a farm, received an academical education, studied law, and on his admission to the bar began practice in Canfield, Ohio, in 1806. He served as an aide-de-camp during the war of 1812-'15, was for sixteen years prosecuting attorney of his district, a member of the Ohio state house of representatives in 1820-'1, and served in congress from Ohio by successive elections from 1 Dec., 1823, till 9 July, 1833, when he resigned. He was one of the founders of the Whig party, was appointed by President Harrison in 1841 auditor of the post-office department, and by President Taylor in 1849 first comptroller of the treasury, from which post he was removed by President Buchanan in 1857, but he was reappointed by President Lincoln in 1861, and held office till his death. In 1845 he was appointed general agent and director of the Washington national monument association, and contributed greatly to the success of that enterprise.—His nephew, Charles, geologist, b. in Southington, Conn., 4 Oct., 1808; d. in Cleveland, Ohio, 18 Oct., 1886, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1831, and assigned to the 5th infantry. In 1832 he was stationed at Fort Howard, Wis., and, after serving in the Black Hawk war, he resigned on 30 Sept. of the same year. After studying law he followed that profession in Cleveland, and in 1836-'7 he was editorially connected with the Cleveland "Herald." In 1837 he was appointed assistant geologist of Ohio, under William W. Mather, and given charge of the topographical and mathematical parts of that survey, which disclosed the rich coal and iron deposits of eastern Ohio that are the foundation of its manufacturing industries. At this time he carefully examined and measured several of the works of the mound-builders, and his plans and notes of twenty of these remains were embodied in Davis and Squier's "American Monuments of the Mississippi Valley" (Washington, 1848). From 1847 till 1851 he was engaged by the U. S. government in making a mineralogical and geological survey of the region about Lake Superior and the upper Mississippi. Subsequently he was professionally engaged as a mining engineer in Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota, and in 1858 became associated in the geological work of the survey of Wisconsin. In February, 1861, he was enrolled in a company that tendered its services to Gen. Winfield Scott to escort the president-elect, Abraham Lincoln, to Washington. He was made assistant quartermaster-general on the staff of the governor of Ohio on 17 April, 1861, and during the western Virginia campaign acted as chief engineer of the Ohio troops. At the expiration of his three-months' service he was appointed, on 15 Aug., 1861, colonel of the 20th Ohio infantry, and detailed as chief engineer of the Department of Ohio, with charge of planning and constructing the defences of Cincinnati. He was present at Fort Donelson, where he led his regiment, and after the surrender was sent to the north in charge of over 10,000 prisoners. At the battle of Shiloh he commanded the 3d brigade of Gen. Lewis Wallace's division, but failing health compelled his retirement from active service, and he resigned on 19 April, 1862. He then resumed the geological exploration in the Lake Superior and upper Mississippi basin, and continued his literary labors. In 1867 he was active in the founding of the Western Reserve and northern Ohio historical society, of which he was president until his death. His bibliography included about 200 titles, and, in addition to his reports for the geological surveys, he published in the "Smithsonian Contributions" "Descriptions of Ancient Works in Ohio" (Washington, 1851); "On Fluctuations of Level in the North American Lakes" (1860); "Ancient Mining on the Shores of Lake Superior"

(1863); and "On the Fresh-Water Glacial Drift in the Northwestern States" (1866). He is also the author of "Life of John Fitch," in Sparks's "American Biography" (Boston, 1845); and "Early History of Cleveland and Vicinity" (Cleveland, 1867).

WHITTLESEY, Frederick, jurist, b. in Washington, Conn., 12 June, 1799; d. in Rochester, N. Y., 19 Sept., 1851. He was graduated at Yale in 1818, and was admitted to the bar in Utica, N. Y., in 1821. He settled in Rochester in 1822, was a member of the "Morgan committee," and conducted an anti-Masonic political newspaper in the canvass of 1828. He was treasurer of Monroe county in 1829-'30, representative in congress from New York in 1831-'5, vice-chancellor of the 8th judicial district of the state in 1839-'47, and judge of the supreme court of New York in 1847-'8. Judge Whittlesey was professor of law at Genesee college in 1850-'1. He published an address that he delivered at Rochester, 4 July, 1842, and pamphlets.

WHITTLESEY, Joseph H., soldier, b. in New York in 1821; d. in Seattle, W. T., 2 Aug., 1886. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1844, and assigned to the 2d U. S. dragoons, becoming 1st lieutenant, 18 Oct., 1847. He served in the military occupation of Texas and in the war with Mexico, and was brevetted 1st lieutenant for gallantry at Buena Vista in 1847. Until the opening of the civil war he was on duty in New Mexico and Oregon. As major of the 5th U. S. cavalry he served with the Army of the Potomac till May, 1862. During the remainder of the war Maj. Whittlesey was employed in organizing volunteer cavalry. He was retired from active service on account of disability resulting from exposure in the line of duty. He was employed on light duty until February, 1867, when he was ordered to inspect the educational institutions of the United States, for the purpose of devising a system of military instruction for colleges and universities with relation to a scheme for future National defence. He was professor of military science at Cornell in 1868-'70, and treasurer of the Soldiers' home, Washington, D. C., till 1881.

WHITTLESEY, Sarah Johnson Cogswell, author, b. in Williamston, Martin co., N. C., about 1825. She was graduated at La Vallie seminary, in Halifax county, N. C., in 1841. She removed to Virginia in 1848 and resides in Alexandria. Miss Whittlesey has written for the periodical press prose and verse, and among other works has published "Heart-Drops from Memory's Urn" (New York, 1852); "The Stranger's Stratagem, or the Double Deceit, and other Stories" (1860); "Herbert Hamilton, or the Bas Bleu" (1867); "Bertha, the Beauty: a Story of the Southern Revolution" (Philadelphia, 1871); and, with her brother, "Spring Buds and Summer Blossoms" (1888).

WHITTREDGE, Worthington, artist, b. in Springfield, Ohio, 22 May, 1820. When he was about twenty years of age he went to Cincinnati, where he soon began portrait-painting. In 1849 he visited Europe, going first to London and Paris, and then to Düsseldorf, where he was for three years a pupil of Andreas Achenbach. He studied also in Belgium and Holland, and in 1855 went to Rome, remaining there until 1859. In the latter year he returned to the United States and settled in New York, where he was elected an associate of the National academy in 1860, and an academician the following year. In 1874 he was president of the academy. He made a sketching tour to the west in 1865, accompanying Gen. John Pope on his tour of inspection. Mr. Whittredge is an alert student of nature, whose well-finished landscapes, though doubtless improved by his training abroad, are yet distinctively individual, with no mannerism resulting from foreign influence. His works, mostly pictures of American scenery, include "The Schützenfest" (1857); "The Roman Campagna" and "The Ruins of Tusculum" (1859); "The Old Hunting Grounds" (1864); "Berkeley's Seat, Newport" (1866); "The Rocky Mountains from the River Platte" (1868); "Forest Brook" (1873); "Trout Brook" (1875); "Twilight on the Hudson" and "Sunny Day in the Woods" (1883); "The Plains of Colorado" (1884); and "Afternoon in the Woods" and "A Brook among the Hills" (1887).

WHYTE, William Pinkney, senator, b. in Baltimore, Md., 9 Aug., 1824. His grandfather, Dr. John Campbell White, was a native of Ireland, who settled in Baltimore about 1800, and his mother was Isabella, daughter of William Pinkney. The son was educated by a private tutor and at Baltimore college. After serving about two years in the banking-house of Peabody, Riggs and Co., of which George Peabody had been the head, he studied law in Baltimore, and completed his course at Harvard, and in 1846 he was admitted to the bar of Maryland. He served in the legislature in the session of 1847, and in 1848 was appointed by John Y. Mason, secretary of the navy, as judge-advocate of a court-martial, of which Captains Farragut, Buchanan, Barron, and others were members, at the U. S. naval academy, Annapolis. He was elected comptroller of the treasury of Maryland in 1853, and in 1868 he was a delegate to the Democratic national convention at New York. When Reverdy Johnson became U. S. minister to Great Britain in 1868, Mr. Whyte was appointed to the U. S. senate by the governor of Maryland, to fill the vacancy that was thus created. He served until 3 March, 1869. In 1871 he was elected governor of governor, in the trial of the boundary dispute between Maryland and Virginia, which was submitted to the arbitration of Judge Jeremiah S. Black, ex-Gov. Charles J. Jenkins, of Georgia, and Senator James B. Beck, of Kentucky. In the autumn of 1881 he was elected mayor of Baltimore without opposition, and he served till November, 1883. In 1887 he was chosen attorney-general of Maryland, which office he now holds.

WIBERG, Andreas, Swedish clergyman, b. in Tuna, Helsingland, Sweden, 17 July, 1816; d. early in November, 1887. He was graduated at the University of Upsala in 1843, ordained the same year, and in 1843-'51 was a minister of the Lutheran state church of Sweden. In 1852 he united with the Baptist denomination, and immediately afterward he came to this country. In 1852-'3 he was colporteur evangelist in the service of the American Baptist publication society among sailors in New York and Swedish emigrants in the west, and in 1855 he was sent to Sweden by the same society as superintendent of colportage, and has labored there ever since. He has published, in Swedish, "Who is to be Baptized?" (Upsala, 1852); "Christian Baptism as set Forth in the Holy Scriptures," in English and Swedish (Philadelphia, 1854); "Translation of the Gospel according to St. Matthew, with Commentary" (Stockholm, 1858); "The Doctrine of the Holy Scripture on Sanctification" (1868); "The Doctrine of Justification" (1869); "Come to Jesus" (1869); "Unity of Christians" (1878); "The Victorious Reign of Christ" (Christiana, 1883); and "The Church" (1884). He edited "The Evangelist" from 1856 till 1873.

WICKERSHAM, James Pyle, educator, b. in Chester county, Pa., 5 March, 1825. He is of the fifth generation in direct descent from Thomas Wickersham, who in 1701 settled on a 1,000-acre tract of land in Chester county that had been deeded by William Penn in 1682 to his father-in-law, Anthony Killingbeck. The Wickersham family came from the parish of Bolney, county of Sussex, England. James received a good education in the public schools and at Unionville academy, near his birthplace. When he was sixteen years old he was teacher in a public school, and in 1845 he became principal of the Marietta (Pa.) academy. He was the first county superintendent of Lancaster county in 1854, and in 1855 he opened the normal school at Millersville, Pa., which in 1859 became the first state normal school in Pennsylvania. In 1866 he was appointed state superintendent of public instruction, and held that post for nearly fifteen years. He assisted in the organization of the Lancaster county educational association, and became its second president in 1863. He helped to organize the Pennsylvania state teachers' association, was its fourth president in 1855, assisted at the organization of the National educational association, and was its seventh president in 1865. He was twice elected president of the National department of school superintendents. In 1863 he raised a regiment of soldiers for three months' service, and commanded it during the Gettysburg campaign. Lafayette gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1871. In 1882 he was appointed U. S. minister to Denmark. He has written on educational subjects for magazines and newspapers. For ten years (1871-'81) he was editor of the "Pennsylvania School Journal." His "School Economy" (Philadelphia, 1864) and "Methods of Instruction" (1865) have been translated into the Spanish, French, and Japanese languages. His most elaborate work is the "History of Education in Pennsylvania" (1886).

WICKES, Lambert, naval officer, b. in New England about 1735; d. at sea on the banks of Newfoundland in 1778. He was among the first naval officers that were appointed in the war of independence, his first commission being dated 22 Dec., 1775. In the summer of 1776 he commanded the brig "Reprisal," and in a cruise to the West Indies he captured the British ships "Friendship" and "Shark" and the schooner "Peter." On his return in July he took Benjamin Franklin to France in the "Reprisal," which was the first American war-ship that ever visited Europe. On this cruise he captured two British brigs in November, 1776. After his arrival in France with his prizes, which were sold, he sailed on a cruise in the Bay of Biscay, where he captured several other English prizes. The British government remonstrated with France, then at peace with England, which necessitated mock sales of the prizes at sea. The French government was thereafter obliged to order the American cruisers to leave France. Wickes took command of the American squadron, consisting of the brig "Lexington," which had arrived from the United States, and the "Dolphin." Wickes captured fourteen vessels in five days in the Bay of Biscay and in the English channel, all of which were sent to France and sold in June, 1777. Wickes was afterward chased by a British ship of the line, and escaped by throwing his guns overboard. He continued his cruise toward this country in the "Reprisal" alone, as the little squadron had separated, and was lost in a storm on the banks of Newfoundland in 1778. All the crew of the "Reprisal" were lost with the ship except the cook.

WICKES, Stephen, physician, b. in Jamaica, Long Island, N. Y., 17 March, 1813. He is a descendant of Thomas Wickes, of the Massachusetts colony of 1635. He was graduated at Union college in 1831. In 1832 he entered the Rensselaer polytechnic institute, Troy, N. Y., where he studied chemistry and natural science one year, and afterward he was graduated in medicine at the University of Pennsylvania in 1834. He practised one year in New York, fifteen in Troy, N. Y., and since 1852 has been in Orange, N. J. He received the honorary degree of A. M. from Princeton in 1868, and is connected with medical and other learned societies, and is secretary of the New Jersey historical society. In February, 1886, he withdrew from the active labor of his profession, and has since devoted himself to literary work. He edited the "Transactions" of the Medical society of New Jersey from 1860 till 1882, also the old transactions of the same from 1766 till 1858, and has published "Topography of Orange" (Newark, 1859); "Water-Cure in Orange" (1861); "Memoirs of Thomas W. Blatchford, M. D., of Troy" (1866); "Memorial Volume, First Presbyterian Church, Orange, N. J." (1870); "Living and Dying, their Physics and Psychics" (1874); "History of Medicine in New Jersey, and of its Medical Men to A. D. 1800" (1879); "Sepulture, its History, Methods, and Requisites" (1884); and "History of the Newark Mountains" (1888).—His brother, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Jamaica, N. Y., 31 Oct., 1814; d. in Orange, N. J., 10 Nov., 1870, was graduated at Yale in 1834, studied theology at Princeton and at New Haven theological seminary, and was ordained as an evangelist in 1839. He became pastor of the 1st Congregational church of Marietta, Ohio, in July, 1840, and after a successful pastorate of twenty-nine years resigned and was called to the Presbyterian church of Jamestown, N. Y., where he remained only about a year, owing to the failure of his health. He had been active in the formation of the Marietta Congregational conference and of the Ohio state conference, and was chosen moderator of the latter in 1853, and again in 1860. In 1849 he was elected a trustee of Marietta college, and he received the degree of D. D. from Wabash college in 1860. He published "Exposition of the Apocalypse" (New York, 1851); "The Son of Man" (Boston, 1868); "The Household" (1868); and "Economy of the Ages" (1869).

WICKHAM, John, lawyer, b. in Southold, Long Island, N. Y., 6 June, 1763; d. in Richmond, Va., 17 Jan., 1839. He was intended for the army, but after studying at the military academy of Arras, France, returned to this country, settled in Williamsburg, Va., and in 1785 began to practise law. He removed to Richmond in 1790, and for many years occupied a high place at the bar of that city, engaging, among other important cases, in the trial of Aaron Burr for treason against the U. S. government, in which he was counsel for the defendant. Of his and his associate counsel's efforts in this celebrated trial, the chief justice said: "The subject has been argued in a manner worthy of its importance. A degree of eloquence seldom displayed on any occasion has embellished solidity of argument and depth of research." Mr. Wickham continued in active practice until his death, and, although he declined political office, it is said he could have obtained any post in the gift of the people. John Randolph of Roanoke refers to him in his will as "My best of friends, without making any profession of friendship for me, and the wisest and best man I ever knew." Mr. Wickham was noted for his fine presence and courtly manners, which obtained for him the encomium of the poet Moore that "he was the only gentleman he had found in America, and would have graced any court in Europe."—His grandson, Williams Carter, soldier, b. in Richmond, Va., 21 Sept., 1820; d. there, 23 July, 1888, was educated at the University of Virginia, adopted the profession of law, served in the state senate, and was an active member of the "old-line" Whig party. At the beginning of the civil war he entered the Confederate army as captain, and became colonel of the 4th Virginia regiment, rising to the rank of brigadier-general. He served in most of the important battles of the Army of Northern Virginia, and was wounded three times, severely at Williamsburg. In 1864 he was a member of the Confederate congress. After the war he joined the Republican party, attaching himself to the conservative branch of that body. He was an admirer and advocate of Gen. Grant, supported him for the presidency, and exerted a pacific influence in the reconstruction of the state. From the first he opposed the adjustment of the state debt as proposed by the followers of William Mahone, and engaged in many controversies with that senator. He was chosen to the state senate in 1882-'3, and in the next election he was returned without opposition. At the time of his death he was a vice-president, general manager, and receiver of the Chesapeake and Ohio railroad.

WICKLIFFE, Charles A., politician, b. in Bardstown, Ky., 8 June, 1788; d. in Howard county, Md., 31 Oct., 1869. He was educated at the Bardstown grammar-school, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1809, and began practice in Bardstown. He soon achieved distinction as a lawyer. He was aide to Gen. Samuel Caldwell at the battle of the Thames, 5 Oct., 1813, was a member of the state house of representatives in 1814-'23, and sat in congress from Kentucky in 1823-'33, having been chosen as a Henry Clay Democrat.

He was then elected again to the state legislature, and was its speaker in 1834. In 1836 he was elected lieutenant-governor of his native state, and in 1839 he became acting governor. In 1841 he was appointed postmaster-general by President Tyler, holding the post till March, 1845, and in the latter year he was sent by President Polk on a secret mission to Texas in the interests of annexation. He was a member of the State constitutional convention of 1845, a member of the Peace congress in February, 1861, served again in congress in 1861-'3, having been chosen as a Union Whig, and was a delegate to the Chicago national Democratic convention in 1864. Mr. Wickliffe was wealthy, and his aristocratic bearing and contempt for the poorer classes won him the name of "the Duke."

WICKSTEED, Gustavus William, Canadian lawyer, b. in Liverpool, England, 21 Dec., 1799. He removed to Canada in 1821, began the study of law in 1825, was admitted as an advocate in 1832, and was made a queen's counsel in 1854. Mr. Wicksteed entered the public service in 1828, became law-clerk of the Canada assembly in 1841, and the same year was appointed one of three commissioners to revise the statutes and ordinances of Lower Canada. In 1856 he was chosen with Sir James B. Macaulay and others a commissioner to revise, consolidate, and classify the public general statutes of Canada, and in 1867 he became law-clerk of the house of commons. In addition to various indexes and tables of the statutes of Canada, he has published "Waifs in Verse" (Montreal, 1878).—His son, RICHARD JOHN, advocate and barrister, is assistant law-clerk and English translator in the Canadian house of commons.

WIDDIFIELD, John Henry, Canadian physician, b. in Whitechurch, Ont., 12 June, 1812. He was graduated as a physician and surgeon at the Royal college of surgeons, England, the Royal college of physicians, Edinburgh, Victoria university, Canada, and the College of physicians and surgeons of Ontario, and established himself in practice in Newmarket, Ont. He received the Reform nomination for the Dominion parliament in 1874, and again in 1882, but declined on both occasions. He was elected to the legislature of Ontario in 1875, re-elected in 1879, 1883, and 1886, and was ministerial "whip" under the Mowat government from 1877 till 1883, when he resigned.

WIDMER, Christopher, Canadian physician, b. in England in 1780; d. in Toronto, 2 May, 1858. As surgeon of the 14th light dragoons he served through nearly the whole of the peninsular campaign, and held the medal with five clasps. He removed to Canada during the war of 1812, settled in Toronto, and on 15 Aug., 1843, was appointed a member of the legislative council of Canada under a writ of summons from the crown.

WIERZBICKI, Felix Paul, author, b. in Poland; d. in California in 1861. He came to the United States on the failure of the Polish revolution of 1830, and, after teaching for a time, studied medicine and began to practise in Providence, R. I. He emigrated to California in 1848, and turned his attention to metallurgy, publishing one of the first books issued upon the mines of that state. At the time of his death he was employed in the San Francisco mint. He is the author of "The Ideal Man, a Conversation between Two Friends upon the Beautiful, the Good, and the True as manifested in Actual Life, by Philokalist" (Boston, 1841).

WIGFALL, Louis Trezevant, senator, b. in Edgefield district, S. C., 21 April, 1816; d. in Galveston, Tex., 18 Feb., 1874. He was educated at the College of South Carolina, but left before graduation to go, as a lieutenant of volunteers, to Florida, where he took part in the operations against the Indians. He subsequently studied law at the University of Virginia, was admitted to the bar, and removed to Marshall, Tex., where he practised his profession. He served in the lower branch of the Texas legislature in 1849-'50, and was a member of the state senate in 1857-'8, and again in 1859-'60. During the latter session he was chosen U. S. senator, and took his seat, 4 Jan., 1860. In that body he was among the ablest and most uncompromising defenders of the slave power. As he did not take his seat at the called session of the 32d congress, he was expelled on 11 July, 1861. In the mean time he had been present at the bombardment of Fort Sumter, as a member of Gen. Pierre G. T. Beauregard's staff. On the afternoon of the second day, 13 April, being on Morris island, and noticing that the fire from the fort had ceased and that the flag had been shot away, Col. Wigfall, with the approval of Gen. James Simons, in command of the forces on the island, embarked in a skiff, and set out across the bay. On reaching Fort Sumter, he made his way through an open port-hole inside the fortification, where he met Maj. Robert Anderson, and demanded the unconditional surrender of the fort, on the ground that the work was no longer tenable and that further resistance would be madness. After some parley, Maj. Anderson consented to have a white flag hoisted, and the surrender was an accomplished fact. Wigfall subsequently became colonel of the 2d infantry in the provisional Confederate army, and was promoted brigadier-general, 21 Oct., 1861. He commanded a brigade composed of three Texas regiments and one of Georgia troops until 20 Feb., 1862, when he resigned. Besides his military service, he also represented Texas in the provisional Confederate congress from February, 1861, till February, 1862. He was also senator in the Confederate congress from February, 1862, until the end of the war. He then went to England, where he resided for several years. In 1873 he settled in Baltimore. He died while visiting Texas on a lecturing tour. Gen. Wigfall was a forcible speaker, being remarkable for his impassioned style, and an ardent partisan, and took part in several duels.

WIGGER, Winand Michael, R. C. bishop, b. in New York city, 9 Dec., 1841. He was graduated in 1860 at the College of St. Francis Xavier in his native city, and studied theology at Seton Hall, N. J., where he remained several years. In October, 1862, he entered the seminary of Brignoli Sale, at Genoa, where he completed his divinity studies and won the doctor's cap. He was ordained priest in 1865, and returning to the United States became assistant at the cathedral at Newark, N. J. In April, 1869, he was appointed rector of St. Vincent's church, Madison, N. J., and remained there until May, 1873. After occupying the same office one year at St. John's, Orange, and two years at Summit, N. J., he returned to Madison, where he served as rector until Bishop Michael A. Corrigan was promoted coadjutor of New York in 1881. On the occurrence of this event, the diocese of Newark, over which Bishop Corrigan had presided, was reduced, the rest of the state being erected into the new see of Trenton. To the charge of the former Dr. Wigger was elected, being consecrated in October, 1881. Under his care the diocese, although small in extent, has increased in population, and now contains over 160,000 Roman Catholics, 105 churches, and 184 priests. There are also within its limits three colleges, eighteen seminaries for young ladies, 23,340 children in the parochial schools, and fourteen asylums and hospitals. Bishop Wigger received the degree of D. D. from the University of Sapienza, Rome, Italy, in 1869.

WIGGINS, Ezekiel Stone, Canadian meteorologist, b. in Queen's county, New Brunswick, 4 Dec., 1839. He became a teacher in Ontario, and in 1866 was appointed superintendent of schools for Prince Edward county. He was graduated at the Philadelphia college of medicine and surgery in 1868 and at Albert college, Ontario, in 1869, and in 1871 was appointed principal of the new institution for the education of the blind at Brantford, which post he resigned in 1874. From that year till 1878 he was principal of the Church of England college at St. John. He was an unsuccessful candidate for the Dominion parliament in 1878, and the same year was appointed to a permanent post in the civil service of Canada. In 1866-'7 he became involved in a controversy with the Universalists, and in the latter year published at Napanee his "Universalism Unfounded." He owes his notoriety chiefly to his predictions of storms, which for many years have been published by newspapers throughout the world. Occasionally his prognostications have been verified, but in the great majority of cases it has been otherwise. At best his successes in this department of meteorology were simply fortunate conjectures. His basis for the prediction of storms, the juxtaposition of planets, is not regarded by men of science as having any appreciable effect upon the atmospheric condition of the earth. He has published "Architecture of the Heavens" (Montreal, 1864).—His wife, Susan Anna Gunhilda, b. in Lakeside, Queens co., New Brunswick, 6 April, 1846, greatly aided by her writings and personal appeals in securing the passage of the bill to legalize marriage with a deceased wife's sister, through the Canadian senate. In recognition of her services in this particular her bust has been placed in the parliamentary library at Ottawa, Canada.

WIGGLESWORTH, Michael, clergyman, b. in England, 18 Oct., 1631; d. in Malden, Mass., 10 June, 1705. His father, Edward, arrived in New England with his family in 1638, and in October of that year removed from Charlestown to New Haven, where he resided until his death, in October, 1653. Michael was graduated at Harvard in 1651, and from 1652 till 1654 was a tutor there and studied theology, supplying the pulpit of Charlestown during the winter of 1653-'4; in 1655 he began to preach in Malden, where he was settled as the pastor in 1657 and remained there till his death. In 1663 he made a voyage to Bermuda in search of health, and during his absence an associate minister was ordained at Malden. His health prevented him from officiating in the pulpit for about twenty years, during which time he studied medicine and became a skilful physician. In 1686 he resumed his pulpit labors, continuing to practise as a physician. Cotton Mather delivered his funeral sermon. In it he says: "It was a Surprise unto us to see a Little, Feeble Shadow of a Man, beyond Seventy, Preaching usually Twice or Thrice in a Week; Visiting and Comforting the Afflicted; Encouraging the Private Meetings; Catechising the Children of the Flock; and managing the Government of the Church; and attending the Sick, not only in his own Town, but also in all those of the Vicinity." In 1662 Mr. Wigglesworth completed and published a poem entitled "The Day of Doom, or a Description of the Great and Last Judgment," in which he pictured in vivid colors the terrors of the judgment-day and the awful wrath of an offended God. Thus the poem recommended itself to the sternest of the Calvinists as well as to their children. The first edition consisted of eighteen hundred copies, which were disposed of in a little more than a year. In view of the small number of the population at that time, and its sparseness, this indicated a great success. The poem maintained its popularity, in the rural districts at least, till the time of the Revolution. It was twice reprinted in England (in 1671 in London, and in 1711 at Newcastle-upon-Tyne). Ten editions have been printed in this country, the last, with other poems and a memoir, edited by William Henry Burr (New York, 1867). In the same year when the "Day of Doom" was published, Mr. Wigglesworth wrote a poem entitled "God's Controversy with New England, written in the Time of the Great Drought, anno 1662, by a Lover of New England's Prosperity." This was not published till 1871, when it was printed in the "Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society." Afterward he issued a new poem, "Meat out of the Eater, or Meditations concerning the Necessity, End, and Usefulness of Affliction to God's Children" (1669; 6th ed., 1770). In 1670 he wrote an elegy on the death of his colleague, the Rev. Benjamin Bunker (printed in 1872, in the "New England Historical and Genealogical Register"). See a sketch of his life by John Ward Dean, with a fragment of his autobiography, some of his letters, and a catalogue of his library (Albany, 1871).—His son, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Malden, Mass., 15 Feb., 1689; d. in Ipswich Hamlet (now Hamilton), Mass., 3 Sept., 1768, was graduated at Harvard in 1707, studied medicine, and in March, 1710, began to practise in Ipswich Hamlet. The following December he returned to his native town and studied divinity. After preaching at Dracut and Groton for the next two years, he accepted a call at Ipswich Hamlet, and was ordained 27 Oct., 1714. There he remained until his death. He published, between 1727 and 1765, nine occasional discourses, besides "A Short Account of the Rev. Mr. Hale, of Newbury," in the "Christian History" (1744); a "Dudleian Lecture" (1760); and an account of a controversy "with the Fourth Church, about Admitting Persons from Neighboring Churches" (1765).—His son, Edward, educator, b. in Malden, Mass., in 1693; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 16 Jan., 1765, was graduated at Harvard in 1710, and studied theology. When Thomas Hollis, of London, established a professorship of theology at Harvard, Mr. Wigglesworth was chosen to occupy it, 24 Jan., 1722, and held the office during the rest of his life. In 1724 he was elected a member of the corporation of Harvard. Dr. Wigglesworth was one of the chief writers in the Whitefieldian controversy, and in 1745 wrote "An Answer to Mr. Whitefield's Reply to the College Testimony." In 1754 he delivered two lectures on the "Distinguishing Characters of the Ordinary and Extraordinary

Edward Wigglesworth

Ministers of Christ," which were called forth by Whitefield's preaching at Cambridge, and were printed by request of the students. He was for some time commissioner of the London society for propagating the gospel among the Indians, but resigned the office in 1755. In 1730 he received the degree of D. D. from Edinburgh university. Besides occasional sermons, his publications include "Sober Remarks on a Modest Proof of the Order and Government Settled by Christ and His Apostles in the Church" (1724); "A Seasonable Caveat against Believing Every Spirit," two lectures (1735); "An Inquiry into the Truth of the Imputation of Adam's First Sin to his Posterity" (1738); two lectures on "The Sovereignty of God in the Exercise of His Mercy" (1741); "Some Evidences of the Divine Inspiration of the Scriptures of the Old Testament, from the Testimony of Jesus Christ and His Apostles" (1755); the "Dudleian" lecture (1757); and "The Doctrine of Reprobation briefly Considered" (1763).—Edward's son, Edward, educator, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 7 Feb., 1732; d. there, 17 June, 1794, was graduated at Harvard in 1749, became tutor there in 1764, and succeeded his father as Hollis professor of theology. In 1779 he was chosen a fellow of the corporation. When the society in Scotland for promoting the gospel among the Indians of North America established a corresponding board in Boston, he was chosen secretary. In 1791 he resigned his professorship in consequence of a paralytic affection, and was made professor emeritus. He received the degree of D. D. from Harvard in 1786, and was an original member of the American academy of arts and sciences. He wrote "Calculations on American Population" (Boston, 1775); "Authority of Tradition Considered," being the Dudleian lecture for 1777; and "The Hope of Immortality," a sermon on the death of John Winthrop (1779).—Samuel's son, Edward, soldier, b. in Ipswich, Mass., 3 Jan., 1742; d. in Newburyport, Mass., 8 Dec., 1826, was graduated at Harvard in 1761. He engaged in commercial pursuits, and, in June, 1776, received a commission as colonel of a regiment to be raised in the counties of Essex, York, and Cumberland (of which the two latter are now included in the state of Maine). He took part in the operations of the American fleet on Lake Champlain under Gen. Benedict Arnold and Gen. Horatio Gates, being third in command. In the winter of 1777 he returned to his home in Newburyport to raise a second regiment, but such was "the distress of the times" that he was ordered to march to Ticonderoga before the full complement of men could be recruited. Col. Wigglesworth subsequently took part in the battle of Monmouth and other engagements, and in 1778 was made president of a court of inquiry that convened to investigate the surrender of Fort Montgomery and Fort Clinton on the Hudson by Gov. George Clinton. In 1779 he applied to Gen. Washington for leave to resign, which was granted. Gen. Washington afterward appointed him collector for the port of Newburyport, as his pecuniary prospects had been ruined by his devotion to his country, and in 1818 he was granted an annual pension of $240 by congress, through the influence of President Monroe, who had served with Col. Wigglesworth in the army in the Jerseys.—The second Edward's grandson, Edward, editor, b. in Boston, 14 Jan., 1804; d. there, 15 Oct., 1876, was graduated at Harvard in 1822, and at the law-school in 1825, studied law also with William Prescott, and was admitted to the Suffolk bar. After practising for a time, he entered his father's counting-room, thereafter devoting his time mainly to mercantile pursuits. He assisted Francis Lieber, from 1827 till 1834, in the preparation of the "Encyclopædia Americana" (13 vols., Philadelphia, 1828-'32). Intellectual and scholarly culture, with the oversight and administration of a large number of charitable, benevolent, and humane societies, of which he was a generous patron, divided in about equal measure the whole half century of Mr. Wigglesworth's mature life. He was the author of "Reflections," a collection of apothegms (Boston, 1885) that were published after his death.

WIGHT, Moses, artist, b. in Boston, Mass., 2 April, 1827. He was engaged in portrait-painting until 1851, when he went to Europe. After three years of study under Antoine A. E. Hébert and Léon Bonnat in Paris, he returned to the United States, but went abroad again in 1860, and a third time in 1865. His portraits include those of Alexander von Humboldt, Louis Agassiz, Charles Sumner, Edward Everett, and Josiah Quincy. Among his ideal works are "Sleeping Beauty," "Eve at the Fountain," "Lisette," "Confidants," "John Alden and Priscilla," and "Pet's First Cake."

WIGHT, Orlando Williams, author, b. in Centerville, Alleghany co., N. Y., 19 Feb., 1824; d. in Detroit, Mich., 19 Oct., 1888. He was educated at Westfield academy and Rochester collegiate institute, New York, engaged in literary work, and was afterward ordained to the Universalist ministry. He was settled in Newark, N. J., for three years, but in 1853 visited Europe, and afterward he engaged in literary work. Subsequently he studied medicine, receiving his degree at the Long Island college hospital in 1865, and practised in Oconomowoc, Wis., and then in Milwaukee. In 1874 he was appointed state geologist and surgeon-general of Wisconsin, and in 1878-'80 he was health commissioner of Milwaukee, also health officer of Detroit for several years. The degree of A. M. was conferred upon him by Yale in 1861. Dr. Wight has published "The Philosophy of Sir William Hamilton" (New York, 1853); "Life of Abelard and Héloïse" (1853; enlarged as "Lives and Letters of Abelard and Héloïse, 1861); and has translated Victor Cousin's "History of Modern Philosophy," with Frederick W. Ricord (2 vols., 1852), and "Lectures on the True, the Beautiful, and the Good" (1854); "Pascal's Thoughts" (1859); Balzac's novels, in part (6 vols., 1860); Henry Martin's "History of France," with Mary L. Booth (4 vols., 1863); and "Maxims of Public Health" (New York, 1884). He also edited and revised "Standard French Classics" (14 vols., 1858-'60), and edited "The Household Library" (18 vols., 1859 et seq.). He left a book of travels entitled "A Winding Journey around the World" (Detroit, 1888).

WIGHT, Peter Bonnett, architect, b. in New York city, 1 Aug., 1838. He was graduated at the College of the city of New York in 1855, and, after studying architecture for eighteen months, went to Chicago in 1858 to practise that profession, but returned the following year to his native city. Between 1862 and 1868 he built the New York academy of design (see vignette), the Yale school of the fine arts, and the Brooklyn mercantile library, now known as the Brooklyn library. In 1862 he planned the first army hospital that was built by the government during the civil war. In 1864 he erected the building of the Union square branch in New York city of the sanitary fair, and managed it until its close. Immediately after the Chicago fire in 1871 he removed to that city, and between 1872 and 1876 was chiefly engaged in the erection of commercial buildings to the value of nearly $2,000,000. Among the latter was the American express building, in executing which he was associated with Henry H. Richardson. In 1878 he retired partially from the more active pursuit of his profession, and practised mainly as a consulting architect, devoting his time to constructive engineering, and sanitary matters connected with building. In 1880 he organized the Wight fire-proofing company for the construction of fire-proof buildings, of which he is still the general manager and principal stockholder. In 1868 he invented the first improvement in the construction of fire-proof buildings. In 1874 he took out a patent for his method of rendering iron columns fire-proof, and he has since been granted three others for the same purpose. Other patents of his are for the construction of fire-proof ceilings in buildings ings in which wooden joists are used for floor - construction; for making iron floor - beams fire - proof when flat, hollow, tile floor - arches are used; for devices for automatically closing gates to swing-bridges; and for making terra-cotta coping for brick walls. Mr. Wight, besides frequently contributing articles on subjects connected with his specialty to various periodicals, has published a monograph on the "National Academy of Design Building," with photographic illustrations (New York, 1865), and "One Phase in the Revival of the Fine Arts in America" (Chicago, 1886).

WIGHTMAN, Valentine, clergyman, b. in North Kingston, R. I., in 1681; d. in Groton, Conn., 9 June, 1747. He was a descendant of Edward Wightman, the Baptist, who was burned for heresy in Lichfield, England, in 1612. After his ordination to the ministry in Rhode Island he removed in 1705 to Groton, Conn. He was the first Baptist minister in Connecticut, planted in Groton the first church of that denomination, and was active in establishing other churches throughout the state and in the city and state of New York. He was a scholarly man, as was evinced in a famous debate that he held at Lynn in 1727 with the Rev. John Bulkley, a minister of the standing order. The discussion was subsequently published. Mr. Wightman was also the author of a "Letter on singing Psalms" (1725).

WIGHTMAN, William May, M. E. bishop, b. in Charleston, S. C., 29 Jan., 1808; d. there, 15 Feb., 1882. He became an active Christian in April, 1825, began to preach in the same year, in 1828 was received on trial into the South Carolina conference, and ordained deacon by Bishop Soule, and elder by Bishop Hedding. From 1828 till 1833 he filled stations in South Carolina, then for two years was agent for Randolph Macon college, and for one year was professor of English literature in that institution. In 1839-'40 he was presiding elder of the Cokesbury district. He was a member of the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1840, and also of the famous conference of 1844, which resulted in the division of the church. From 1840 till 1854 he was editor of the "Southern Christian Advocate" in Charleston, and for the next five years he was president of Woodford college, S. C. In 1859 he was transferred to the Alabama conference, and became chancellor of the Southern university, which post he filled until July, 1867. In May, 1866, he was elected and ordained bishop at the general conference that met in New Orleans. He received the degree of D. D. from Randolph Macon college, and that of LL. D. from the College of Charleston. He edited the autobiography of Bishop William Capers, with an interesting memoir (Nashville, Tenn., 1858).

WIKOFF, Henry, author, b. in Philadelphia in 1813; d. in Brighton, England, 2 May, 1884. His father, a physician of Philadelphia, was owner of the township of Blockley, on Schuylkill river, and left a large fortune. The son was graduated at Union college in 1831, admitted to the Philadelphia bar, and in 1834 sailed for Europe, where his career was made notable by intimacy with many of the foremost men of his time, and he had the reputation of being better acquainted with important unwritten history than any other man of his day. In 1837 he was appointed attaché to the U. S. legation at London. He visited Paris soon afterward, and carried back to London to Joseph Bonaparte the jewelry and personal effects of Napoleon I., for which he received one of the first consul's silver drinking-cups. He received the cross of the Legion of honor from Napoleon III., whom he had visited in 1845, when the prince was imprisoned at Ham, and he also rendered valuable service during the days that followed the defeat at Sedan in 1870. Mr. Wikoff's title of "chevalier," by which he was commonly known, belonged to him as a knight-commander of the Spanish order of Ysabel la Católica, which was conferred by Queen Isabella of Spain. In 1849 he was editor of the "Democratic Review." In 1855 he was employed by Lord Palmerston as a secret agent of the British government in Paris. No man had a brighter diplomatic career before him, and no one ever threw it away so lightly. He last visited this country in 1880 to arrange for the publication of an autobiography, under the title of "Reminiscences of an Idler." He published "Napoleon Louis Bonaparte, First President of France: Biographical and Personal Sketches, including a Visit to the Prince at the Castle of Ham" (New York, 1849); "Life of Alfred, Count d'Orsay" (1849); "My Courtship and its Consequences," which is said to have been published first in London, and there "suppressed by the foreign office" (1855); "Adventures of a Roving Diplomatist" (1856); "A New-Yorker in the Foreign Office, and his Adventures in Paris" (London, 1858); and "The Four Civilizations" (1870).

WILBOUR, Charles Edwin, Egyptologist, b. in Little Compton, Newport co., R. I., 17 March, 1833. He received a classical education, and entered Brown, where he took a prize for proficiency in Greek, and was noted for his thorough acquaintance with the ancient and modern languages, but was not graduated, owing to delicate health. Having taught himself short-hand, when he had sufficiently recovered he went to New York city in 1854 and became connected with the "Tribune" as a reporter. He also studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1859. The following eighteen years were devoted to literary and journalistic work. In 1872 he began the study of Egyptian antiquities, and visited the principal libraries of the United States and Canada. Two years later he went abroad and spent much time in consulting the archaeological treasures of the British museum and the great libraries of the continent. He then became a co-laborer with Heinrich Karl Brugsch, commonly known as Brugsch Bey, and Gaston C. C. Maspero, in the field of Egyptology, accompanying the latter on five winter exploring expeditions up the Nile. Mr. Wilbour now (1889) continues the work, using his own dahabeeyah, or Nile boat. He has published "Rachel in the New World," from the French of Leon Beauvallet, with John W. Palmer (New York, 1856); a translation of Victor Hugo's "Les Misérables" (1862-'3); and "The Life of Jesus," from the French of Ernest Renan (1863).—His wife, Charlotte Beebee, b. in Norwich, Conn., 2 March, 1830, was educated at Wilbraham, Mass., and married Mr. Wilbour, 18 Jan., 1858. She was elected president of Sorosis in 1870, and five times re-elected. She was a founder of the club, devoted much time and thought to securing for it a permanent foundation, and was instrumental in organizing the Association for the advancement of women that was formed by it in 1873. She instituted lectures on health and dress reform, suggested and aided in preparing entertainments for various purposes, and assisted many women in obtaining public recognition. Since she has resided abroad she has maintained her interest in the elevation of her sex, and sought every opportunity to labor for it.

WILBUR, Hervey, author, b. in Wendell, Franklin co., Mass., in 1787; d. in Newburyport, Mass., 5 Jan., 1852. He studied theology and had charge of the Congregational church in his native town in 1817-'23, but afterward was principal of several schools for girls. He was a pioneer in the establishment of Bible classes, and was probably the first in this country to compile and publish a Bible-class text-book. He engaged in many literary and scientific labors, and was the author of a popular work on astronomy, the compiler of a "reference" Bible, and a lecturer on natural history and astronomy. He received the honorary degree of A. M. from Dartmouth in 1812. Mr. Wilbur published "A Discourse on the Religious Education of Youth" (2d ed., Boston, 1814); "A Reference Bible" (1828); "Elements of Astronomy" (New Haven, 1829); "Lexicon of Useful Knowledge" (New York, 1830); and "A Reference Testament for Bible Classes" (London, 1831).—His daughter, Anne Toppan, b. in Wendell, Franklin co., Mass., 20 June, 1817; d. near Marietta, Ohio, 14 Sept., 1864, was educated at Newburyport and elsewhere. After completing her studies, she taught music at New Hampton, N. H., Gorham, Me., and in schools in other places. She translated several volumes from the French and other languages, among them "The Solitude of Juan Fernandez" (Boston, 1851), and contributed chiefly fiction, under the name of "Florence Leigh," to various periodicals. In 1848 she edited the Boston "Ladies' Magazine" and the Lowell, Mass., "Ladies' Casket." After becoming Mrs. Joseph Wood, she published English versions of X. B. Saintine's "Queen of the Danube" and Edmond About's "La question Romaine" (Boston, 1859), and "Romance of a Mummy" (Columbus, 1860).—His son, Hervey Backus, philanthropist, b. in Wendell, Franklin co., Mass., 18 Aug., 1820; d. in Syracuse, N. Y., 1 May, 1883, was graduated at Amherst in 1838, and at the Berkshire medical institution, Pittsfield, Mass., in 1842. Meantime he studied engineering, and he subsequently practised medicine at Lowell and Barre, Mass. Being greatly impressed by the perusal of an account of Dr. Édouard Seguin's school for idiots at Paris, he received several idiot pupils into his own house at Barre in July, 1848, and organized the first school for idiots in the United States. By his own earnest personal studies and efforts, he thus developed the system of education for the weak-minded that has been adopted in every similar institution in this country, in Canada, and in some parts of Europe. In 1815 Dr. Hervey Backus prevailed upon the legislature of New York to establish an experimental school at Albany, which, under Dr. Wilbur's direction, was so successful as to be fully organized in 1854 as the State asylum for idiots at Syracuse. Dr. Wilbur remained in charge of this institution until his death. He published numerous reports and other papers on idiocy. A tablet with the following inscription has been placed on the walls of the asylum: "Hervey Backus Wilbur, M. D., the First in America to Attempt the Education of the Feeble-Minded; and the First Superintendent of this Asylum. By his Wisdom, Zeal, and Humanity he Secured its Permanent Establishment. To his Memory this Tablet is raised by the Board of Trustees."—Another son, Charles Toppan, physician, b. in Newburyport, Mass., 18 May, 1835, while a student of medicine became connected as a teacher with the New York state asylum for idiots, of which his brother was superintendent, and he was thus led to an investigation of the various forms of dementia. In 1858 he was called to assist in the organization of the Ohio state asylum for idiots at Columbus, and for some time he acted as its assistant superintendent. In 1859 he removed to Lakeville, Conn., and aided in the establishment of a school for feeble-minded children, which was afterward conducted by Dr. Henry M. Knight. In 1860 he was graduated at the Berkshire medical institution and returned to Ohio, settling at Marietta, where he began to practise. The following year he entered the volunteer service, and remained in the army until the end of the civil war as assistant surgeon and surgeon. In September, 1865, he took charge of the Illinois institution for the education of feeble-minded children at Jacksonville, and he was so successful in its management that the legislature subsequently voted the erection of larger and more appropriate buildings at a cost of $185,000. It was afterward removed to Lincoln, Ill. In 1883 he severed his connection with the institution, and the following year he opened a private asylum for the feeble-minded at Kalamazoo. During his connection with the Illinois asylum Dr. Wilbur was instrumental in establishing similar institutions in Iowa, Indiana, Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, and other western states. In January, 1882, he founded the "Philanthropic Index and Review," a monthly publication devoted to the interests of feeble-minded children, and the only periodical of the kind in existence.

WILBUR, John, Quaker preacher, b. in Hopkinton, R. I., 17 July, 1774; d. there, 1 May, 1856. He was the son of Quaker parents, and became a preacher of the society. He opposed the introduction of religious views that he deemed to be at variance with the original doctrines of his sect, and in 1838 was accused by several members of the Rhode Island yearly meeting of circulating in his conversation and writings opinions and statements derogatory to the character of the English Quaker, Joseph John Gurney, then on a visit to the United States. He was sustained by a large majority in his own monthly meeting (that of South Kingston, R. I.), but that body having been dissolved, and its members added to the Greenwich meeting, he was formally disowned by the latter in January, 1843, its action being subsequently confirmed by the quarterly meeting and the Rhode Island yearly meeting. His supporters were sufficiently numerous in Rhode Island and other parts of New England to form an independent yearly meeting, the members of which were known as Wilburites. Mr. Wilbur twice visited England, the second time in 1854. He published several polemical pamphlets, but his "Journal and Correspondence" (Providence, 1859) did not appear until after his death.

WILCOX, Cadmus Marcellus, soldier, b. in Wayne county, N. C., 29 May, 1826. He studied at Cumberland college, Nashville, his parents having removed to Tennessee during his infancy, then entered the U. S. military academy, and was graduated in 1846. He served through the war with Mexico, being engaged as acting adjutant of the 4th infantry in the siege of Vera Cruz and the battle of Cerro Gordo, and as aide to Gen. John A. Quitman in the storming of Chapultepec, where he earned the brevet of 1st lieutenant, and in the capture of the city of Mexico. He was promoted 1st lieutenant on 24 Aug., 1851, served as assistant instructor of tactics at the military academy from 1852 till 1857, then went to Europe for a year on sick-leave, was made captain of infantry on 20 Dec., 1860, and at the beginning of the civil war was on frontier duty in New Mexico. Resigning his commission on 8 June, 1861, he was appointed colonel in the provisional army of the Confederacy, and assigned to the command of an Alabama regiment. He joined Gen. Joseph E. Johnston's army with his regiment on 16 July, 1861, marched to Manassas to re-enforce Gen. Pierre G. T. Beauregard, and served with the Army of Northern Virginia till its final surrender, being promoted brigadier-general on 21 Oct., 1861, and major-general on 9 Aug., 1863. He commanded a brigade in Gen. James Longstreet's corps at the second Bull Run, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, and Gettysburg, and a division under Gen. Ambrose P. Hill, which resisted the repeated assaults of Gen. Winfield S. Hancock's troops at the battle of the Wilderness. Gen. Wilcox declined a brigadier-general's commission in the Egyptian army after the war. In 1886 he was appointed chief of the railroad division of the general land-office in Washington, D. C. He is the author of a book on "Rifles and Rifle-Practice" (New York, 1859), and the translator of "Evolutions of the Line, as practised by the Austrian Infantry and adopted in 1853" (1860).

WILCOX, Carlos, clergyman, b. in Newport, N. H., 22 Oct., 1794; d. in Danbury, Conn., 29 May, 1827. His father, a farmer, removed in 1798 to Orwell, Vt., where the son's youth was spent. He was a precocious child, and this, with an accident to his knee which unfitted him for agricultural labor, decided his parents to send him to college. He was graduated at Middlebury in 1813, and at Andover theological seminary in 1817, after some interruptions from an affection of the heart, which continued till it ended his life. He preached in several places in 1819-'20, though still in feeble health, and spent the years 1820-'2 in the house of a friend in Salisbury, Conn., writing on his long poem "The Age of Benevolence," which he had projected in college. He was pastor of the North church in Hartford, Conn., from 1824 till 1826, when he accepted a call to Danbury. His poem, "The Age of Benevolence," was to contain five books, of which he completed the first and parts of three others. The first was published separately (Salisbury, 1822), and fragments of the work appeared after his death in a volume of his "Remains," which contains also "The Religion of Taste," a poem that he read before the Yale Phi Beta Kappa society in 1824, fourteen sermons, and a memoir of the author (Hartford, 1828). His verses abound in accurate rural description.

WILCOX, Ella Wheeler, author, b. in Johnstown Centre, Wis., about 1845. She was educated in the public schools of Windsor and at the University of Wisconsin. In 1884 she married Robert M. Wilcox, of Meriden, Conn., and since 1887 they have resided in New York city. Mrs. Wilcox began to write for newspapers at an early age, has contributed much to periodicals, and has published in book-form "Drops of Water" (New York, 1872); "Maurine" (Milwaukee, 1875); "Shells" (1883); "Poems of Passion" (Chicago, 1883); "Mal Mou-lée," a novel (New York, 1885); and "Poems of Pleasure" (1888).

WILCOX, Leonard, senator, b. in Hanover, N. H., 29 Jan., 1799; d. in Orford, N. H., 18 June, 1850. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1817, studied law, and practised at Orford. He became a judge of the state superior court, 25 June, 1838, but infirm health forced him to resign on 20 Sept., 1840. After the resignation of Franklin Pierce from the U. S. senate, Judge Wilcox filled his seat for the remainder of the unexpired term, first by appointment of the governor and then by the choice of the legislature, being elected as a Democrat. He served from 7 March, 1842, till 3 March, 1843, was made a justice of the New Hampshire court of common pleas, 7 Dec., 1847, and on 26 June, 1848, was again placed on the bench of the superior court.

WILCOX, Phineas Bacon, lawyer, b. in Mid-dletown, Conn., 26 Sept., 1798; d. in Columbus, Ohio, 25 March, 1863. He was graduated at Yale in 1821, and practised law at Columbus, Ohio, for about forty years, paying particular attention to land-titles. He was the author of "Condensed Reports of the Superior Court of Ohio" (Columbus, 1832); "Ohio Forms and Practice" (1833); "A Few Thoughts by a Member of the Bar" (1836); "Reports of the Superior Court of Ohio," being vol. x. of the "Ohio Reports" (1842); "Digest of the First Twelve Volumes of Ohio Reports" (1844); "Practical Forms in Action, Personal and Real, and in Chancery" (2d ed., 1858); and "Practical Forms under the Code of Civil Procedure" (1862).

WILD, Edward Augustus, soldier, b. in Brookline, Mass., 25 Nov., 1825. He was graduated at Harvard in 1844, and on 21 April, 1861, became captain in the 1st Massachusetts regiment, with which he served in the peninsular campaign, being wounded at Williamsburg and Fair Oaks. He became major of the 32d Massachusetts, 24 July, 1862, lieutenant-colonel on 7 Aug., and colonel of the 35th on 20 Aug., and took part in the battle of South Mountain, where his left arm was shattered. After assisting Gov. John A. Andrew in raising and organizing colored troops in February-April, 1863, he was made brigadier-general of volunteers on 24 April, and, with the exception of a few months at the siege of Charleston, served in North Carolina, recruiting colored troops. In December he led an expedition through the eastern counties of the state, and on 18 Jan., 1864, he took command of the district of Norfolk and Portsmouth, Va. He commanded a brigade in the affair at Wilson's wharf, and was in front of Petersburg when he was placed under arrest on 23 June, 1864, for refusing to obey the order of his superior to relieve his brigade quartermaster and take another. The finding of the court-martial was set aside by the commanding general, and this action was subsequently confirmed by the judge-advocate-general at Washington. He afterward served on the expedition to Roanoke river in December, 1864, and then before Richmond till its capture, and in 1865 superintended the operations of the Freedmen's bureau in Georgia. On 15 Jan., 1866, he was mustered out of service. Since the war Gen. Wild has been engaged in silver-mining.

WILD, Joseph, Canadian clergyman, b. in Summit, Littleborough, Lancashire, England, 16 Nov., 1834. He entered the local ministry of the Primitive Methodists at the age of sixteen, became a travelling preacher, and at twenty-one emigrated to the United States. After travelling through the south and west as a preacher and lecturer, he was stationed as a minister of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1857 at Hamilton, Ont., remaining one year. He then took a three-years' course in theology at the Biblical institute at Concord, N. H., returned to Canada, preached for a year at Goderich, and in 1863 was settled at Orono, Me., whence he was transferred two years later to Belleville, Ont., where he was pastor of the Methodist church and bursar and professor of Oriental languages in Albert university. Wesleyan university of Ohio gave him the degree of D. D. in 1870. In 1872 he was called to Brooklyn, N. Y., and, after remaining the allotted three years, being dissatisfied with the itinerant system, he accepted a call to the Union Congregational church in the same city. In 1881 he was installed as pastor of the Bond street Congregational church, Toronto, where he still officiates. He is popular as a preacher, has the largest regular congregation in Canada, and his sermons are printed in the "Canadian Advance," and circulated in Great Britain and Australia, as well as in the Dominion. In 1888 he acted as chairman of the Congregational union of Ontario and Quebec. Dr. Wild is a large and successful cultivator of fruits. He has published "The Lost Ten Tribes" (New York, 1878); "How and When the World Will End" (1879); "The Future of Israel and Judah" (London, 1879); "Talks for the Times" (Toronto, 1886); and "Songs of the Sanctuary" (1886). Editions of most of his works have been issued in the United States and England as well as in Canada.

WILDE, Richard Henry, scholar, b. in Dublin, Ireland, 24 Sept., 1789; d. in New Orleans, La., 10 Sept., 1847. His father, Richard Wilde, a Dublin merchant, came to the United States in 1797, and died in 1802. The widow and son removed to Augusta, Ga., where he fitted himself for the bar and was admitted in 1809. He was elected attorney-general of Georgia, and then chosen to congress as a Democrat, serving one term, in 1815-'17. He returned to the bar, but sat again in congress from 7 Feb. till 3 March, 1825, being elected to fill a vacancy, and, after a defeat for the next congress, was a member again from 1827 till 1835. His best speeches were those on internal improvements (Washington, 1828), in opposition to the Force bill and to the removal of the deposits from the U. S. bank, and those on the tariff and the currency. His opposition to President Jackson made him unpopular with his constituents, and he was defeated in 1834, whereupon he went to Europe and remained there till 1840, engaged in scholarly pursuits. He devoted himself specially to Italian literature, chiefly in Florence, and, obtaining access to valuable private libraries, discovered some forgotten documents bearing on the life and times of Dante, and also a portrait of the poet that had been painted on the wall of the chapel of Bargello by Giotto, but covered for many years with whitewash. He also made a study of the life of Torquato Tasso, and became the friend of many Italian literary men. After his return to this country he was a member of the Whig state convention at Milledgeville, Ga., in 1842, but took no further part in politics. He removed to New Orleans in 1843, and, on the organization of the law department of the University of Louisiana, became its professor of constitutional law, which post he held till his death from yellow fever. Mr. Wilde's brother, James, who had been a subaltern officer in the Seminole war, interested him in Florida, and he began to write an epic whose scene was laid in that state. This was never finished, but a lyric that it contained, called "The Lament of the Captive," but now known by its first line, "My Life is like the Summer Rose," became widely popular. It was suggested by the story of Juan Orteiz, the last survivor of the ill-fated expedition of Panfilo de Narvaez. The verses appeared first in print about 1815 without Mr. Wilde's authorization, and were continually republished. Soon afterward it was said in the "North American Review" that they were translated from a Greek ode that purported to have been written by Alcæus. Scholars soon discovered that the latter was not genuine, and it was found that it was the work of Anthony Barclay, of Savannah, who had translated Mr. Wilde's song into Greek for his own amusement. The song was set to music by Charles Thibault. Mr. Barclay subsequently wrote an "Authentic Account of Wilde's Alleged Plagiarism," which was published by the Georgia historical society (Savannah, 1871). The story of the poem in its entirety was first told in "Our Familiar Songs" by Helen Kendrick Johnson (New York, 1881). Mr. Wilde's only published work is "Conjectures and Researches concerning the Love, Madness, and Imprisonment of Torquato Tasso," the fruit of his studies in Italy, a scholarly work, which is also valuable for the poetical translations from Tasso that it contains (2 vols., New York, 1842). He contributed an essay on "Petrarch" to the "Southern Review," and wrote poetry, original and translated, for the magazines. His translations from the Italian, Spanish, and French are graceful and correct. He left many manuscripts, including an unfinished "Life of Dante": a collection of translations of Italian lyrics, which he intended to publish with biographical sketches of the authors; and a completed poem of several cantos, entitled "Hesperia," which was edited by his son and issued after his death (Boston, 1867).

WILDE, Samuel Sumner, jurist, b. in Taunton, Mass., 5 Feb., 1771; d. in Boston, Mass., 22 June, 1855. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1789, studied law in his native place, and was admitted to the bar in 1792. After practising till 1794 in Waldoborough, Me., and till 1799 at Warren, Me., which he represented in the Massachusetts legislature in 1798-'9, he removed to Hallowell, Me. He served as a presidential elector in 1800 and 1808, was a state councilor in 1814, and a delegate to the Hartford convention in the same year, and from 1815 till his resignation in 1850 was a judge of the Massachusetts supreme court. In 1820, after the separation of Maine, he removed to Newburyport, Mass., and in 1831 he went to reside in Boston. Judge Wilde was a delegate to the State constitutional convention of 1820, and a member of the American academy of arts and sciences. He was one of the best nisi prius judges in the state, and possessed profound legal learning and great integrity. Bowdoin gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1817, Harvard in 1841, and Dartmouth in 1849. Judge Wilde published several orations. He married Eunice, daughter of Gen. David Cobb, and their daughter Caroline became the wife of Caleb Cushing. A discourse on his life by Rev. Dr. Ephraim Peabody, with the proceedings of the Boston bar, was published (Boston, 1855).

WILDER, Alexander, physician, b. in Verona, Oneida co., N. Y., 14 May, 1823. He attended the common schools, was self-educated in the higher branches, taught for some time, and was graduated in medicine at Syracuse in 1850. He was an editor of the Syracuse "Star" in 1852 and of the "Journal" in 1853, and took charge of the "New York Teacher" in 1856. In 1857 he went to Springfield, Ill., where he prepared the bill to incorporate the State normal university. Removing to New York city, he became connected in 1858 with the "Evening Post," on whose staff he remained for thirteen years. In 1871 he was elected an alderman of New York on the anti-Tweed ticket. He was president of the Eclectic medical society of New York in 1870-'1, of whose "Transactions" he edited two volumes (Albany, 1870-'1), and became secretary of the National association, whose annual "Proceedings" he has issued since 1876. In 1873-'7 he was professor of physiology in the Eclectic medical college of the city of New York, and from 1878 till 1883 he held successively the chairs of physiology and psychological science in the United States medical college. Dr. Wilder is a member of the American Akadêmê, a philosophical society, and editor of its "Journal," published in Orange, N. J. He has published many monographs, including "The Intermarriage of Kindred" (New York, 1870); "Plea for the Collegiate Education of Women" (1874); "Vaccination a Medical Fallacy" (1878); "Paul and Plato" (St. Louis, 1881); "Life Eternal" (Orange, N. J., 1885); and "The Ganglionic Nervous System" (1887). He has edited essays on "Ancient Symbol-Worship" (New York, 1873); Thomas Taylor's "Eleusinian and Bacchic Mysteries" (1875); Richard Payne Knight's "Symbolical Language of Ancient Art and Mythology" (1876); and "India: what can it Teach us?" by Max Müller (1883); and translated Iamblichus's work on "The Mysteries of the Egyptians, Assyrians, and Chaldeans," in "The Platonist."

WILDER, Burt Green, naturalist, b. in Boston, Mass., 11 Aug., 1841. He was graduated at the Lawrence scientific school in 1862 and at the medical department of Harvard in 1866. Meanwhile he served in the U. S. army as a medical cadet in 1862-'3 and as assistant surgeon and surgeon in the 55th Massachusetts volunteers in 1863-'5. In 1867 he was elected professor of physiology, comparative anatomy, and zoölogy in Cornell university, which chair he still holds, and he was also professor of physiology in the Medical school of Maine, Bowdoin college, in 1874-'84. His discovery in 1862 that silk might be drawn from a living spider to the extent of 150 yards at a time led to his further researches on the habits of the spider and the qualities and usefulness of the silk. Since 1880 he has devoted his attention mostly to studies on the vertebrate brain. He has also striven earnestly for the adoption of a uniform anatomical nomenclature, claiming that names should be as far as possible mononyms, and that in each language should be used the appropriate paronym of the Latin name rather than the Latin form. In 1887 he described the brain of cerotodus and showed that among vertebrates the proper cerebral hemispheres, the special organs of the mind, occupy five different positions relative to the olfactory tracts and bulbs, which are the direct continuations of the general brain axis and were probably the primitive and at first most important parts of the prosencephal. In brain publications he has insisted upon the morphological significance of the cavities, and upon the need of greater care and improved methods in dissection and preparation. In 1857 he described the slip system of notes, consisting of the brief statement of facts, ideas, or references to books, written lengthwise upon slips equal to the sixth part of a sheet of note-paper. He also uses these slips for correspondence, and in 1886 invented a note-wheel on the circumference of which they are filed. Prof. Wilder lectured at Harvard in 1868, at the University of Michigan in 1876-'7, at the Lowell institute, Boston, in 1866 and 1870, at the American institute, New York, in 1870-'3, and on the Cartwright foundation before the Alumni association of the College of physicians and surgeons in 1884. He is a member of scientific societies, presided over the section on biology of the American association for the advancement of science in 1885, and was president of the American neurological association in 1885. His bibliography includes nearly 100 technical papers in scientific and medical journals and in the publications of learned societies, also about 80 reviews and articles in magazines. He has published in book-form "What Young People Should Know" (Boston, 1875); "Emergencies: how to Avoid them and how to Meet them" (1879); "Health Notes for Students" (1883); and, with Prof. Simon H. Gage, "Anatomical Technology as applied to the Domestic Cat" (New York, 1882).

WILDER, Daniel Webster, journalist, b. in Blackstone, Mass., 15 July, 1832. He was graduated at Harvard in 1856, and became a lawyer and journalist. He has been an editor of the Leavenworth, Kan., "Conservative" and "Times," the Fort Scott "Monitor," the Rochester, N. Y., "Express," the St. Joseph, Mo., "Herald," and the "World," of Hiawatha, Kan. Mr. Wilder was one of the chief organizers of the Kansas historical society, and has served as its president. He was appointed surveyor-general of Kansas and Nebraska in 1863, and elected state auditor of Kansas in 1872 and 1874, and superintendent of insurance in 1887. He has published "Annals of Kansas" (Topeka, Kan., 1875).

WILDER, Marshall Pinckney, merchant, b. in Rindge, N. H., 22 Sept., 1798; d. in Boston, Mass., 16 Dec., 1886. He received a common-school education, and engaged in farming, but in 1819 became a partner of his father, who was a merchant in his native place. In 1825 he removed to Boston, where he established a wholesale business in West India goods, and in 1837 he became a member of the commission firm of Parker, Blanchard and Wilder. He acquired a large fortune, and served also as a director in many commercial or financial companies. Mr. Wilder served in the legislature in 1839, in the governor's council in 1849, and in the state senate, of which he was president, in 1850, and he was one of the founders of the Constitutional Union party in 1860, being chairman of the Massachusetts delegation to its National convention of that year, which nominated Bell and Everett. Throughout the war he was a firm supporter of the U. S. government. He took special interest in agriculture and horticulture, was president of the Massachusetts agricultural society for eight years, of the Norfolk agricultural society for twenty years, and for six years of the U. S. agricultural society, of which he was the founder. He was also a founder of the American pomological society, and became its president on its organization in 1848, continuing many years in office. The value of his researches in hybridization and fruit-culture were recognized not only in the United States but abroad. Mr. Wilder was also president of the New England historic-genealogical society from 1868 till 1886, and was a leader in the movement that gave to Boston the Natural history rooms and the Institute of technology. He published a large number of historical, agricultural, and other addresses, including those "On Laying the Corner-Stone of the First Massachusetts Horticultural Hall" (Boston, 1844); "On the 225th Anniversary of the Settlement of Dorchester" (1855); annual addresses before the Historic-genealogical society (1868-'73); lectures on "California" (1871) and "The Hybridization of Plants" (1872); "On the Progress and Influence of Rural Art" (1872); and addresses before the American pomological society (1848-'73) and the U. S. agricultural society (1852-'6).

WILDER, Samson Vryling Stoddard, merchant, b. in Bolton, Mass., in 1780; d. in Elizabeth, N. J., 2 April, 1865. He became a merchant in Boston, visited Europe in the interests of his business, where he formed the acquaintance of Rev. Rowland Hill and other eminent men, who enlisted his sympathies in the formation of Bible and tract societies, and in 1830 went to New York, where he engaged in banking. He was president of the American tract society in 1823-'42, and was connected with many similar organizations, from all of which he retired in 1842. He was the author of numerous religious tracts that were widely circulated. See "Records of the Life of S. V. S. Wilder" (New York, 1866).

WILDES, George Dudley, clergyman, b. in Newburyport, Mass., 19 June, 1819. He was fitted for Harvard, and became usher in mathematics at Chauncey Hall school, Boston. He was graduated at the Virginia theological seminary at Alexandria, was ordained deacon in New Bedford, Mass., in 1846, by the bishop of Kentucky, and at the same time invited to the professorship of mathematics at Shelby college, Ky. He was ordained priest in Dedham, Mass., in 1848, by Bishop Eastburn. After holding several charges, he became assistant at St. Paul's, Boston, and also supervisor of the Episcopal school of Massachusetts. Afterward he was at Brookline and then at Salem, where he became a member of the State board of education. At the outset of the civil war Dr. Wildes was instrumental in raising the 23d and 19th Massachusetts regiments, forming also the field hospital corps, volunteering as its head for service, and being commissioned a chaplain. Since 1867 he has been rector of Christ church, Riverdale, New York. He received the degree of A. M. from Harvard in 1855, of S. T. D. from Hobart in 1871, and that of D. D. from the College of Kansas in 1886. Since its organization in 1874 he has been general secretary of the church congress, being one of its original founders. In this capacity he has edited eleven volumes of papers and addresses (1872-'88). Dr. Wildes has published sermons and addresses, has edited Bishop Griswold's "Lectures on Prayer," and translated George Herbert's Latin poems.

WILDEY, Thomas, a founder of the Order of Odd-Fellows in the United States, b. in London, England, 15 Jan., 1783; d. in Baltimore, Md., 19 Oct., 1861. He came to this country in 1817, and labored in Baltimore as a maker of coach-springs. In 1819 he established in that city the first lodge of Odd-Fellows in the United States, and from 1825 till 1833 he was grand-sire of the grand lodge. A monument has been erected to his memory in Baltimore by members of the order.

WILES, Lemuel Maynard, artist, b. in Perry, Genesee co. (now Wyoming), N. Y., 21 Oct., 1826. In 1848-'51 he studied with William Hart in Albany, and Jasper F. Cropsey in New York. He followed his profession in Washington, D. C., Buffalo, Utica, and Albany, N. Y., and in 1864 opened a studio in New York. In 1875 he assumed the directorship of the College of fine arts in Ingham university, Le Roy, N. Y., and in 1888 he founded the Silver Lake art-school at Perry, N. Y. His works include "The Pillar of Fire," "Mount San Jacinto, California," "Ruins of the Cathedral of San Juan Capistrano, Cal.," "The Noon-day Retreat," "The Vale of Elms," "Snow-bound," and "A Song of the Sea."—His son, Irving Ramsay, artist, b. in Utica, N. Y., 8 April, 1861, studied painting at first under his father and afterward at the Art students' league, New York, and in 1882-'4 under Jules Joseph Lefebvre and Carolus Duran in Paris. He is known as a clever figure-painter, and his "Corner Table" gained the third Hallgarten prize at the Academy of design in 1886. He is a member of the Society of American artists, and the Water-color society.

WILEY, Calvin Henderson, clergyman, b. in Guilford county, N. C., 3 Feb., 1819; d. in Winston, N. C., 11 Jan., 1887. He was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1840, studied law, and was admitted to the bar soon after his graduation. He was elected to the state legislature in 1850, and again in 1852, and in the latter year was chosen the first state superintendent of common schools, to which post he was re-elected for six successive terms of two years each by an almost unanimous vote. So efficient was the system of public instruction under his administration that the schools were kept in operation during the entire period of the civil war, something which it is claimed did not occur in any other southern state. Having previously studied theology, he was licensed to preach by the presbytery of Orange in 1855, in 1869 was appointed general agent of the American Bible society for middle and eastern Tennessee, and in 1874 was transferred to North Carolina, South Carolina being included in his field of labor in 1876. During the civil war Mr.

Wiley was instrumental in establishing a publishing-house at Greensboro' to supply the state with text-books; also in organizing at Columbia, S. C., an educational association for the Confederacy, and in establishing a North Carolina state educational association, of whose journal he was one of the editors. He founded with William D. Cooke the "Southern Weekly Post" of Raleigh, which he also edited, published and edited the "Oxford Mercury," was one of the founders of the "North Carolina Presbyterian," and contributed to other journals. In addition to school-books, he published "Alamance, or the Great and Final Experiment," a novel (New York, 1847); "Adventures of Old Dan Tucker with his Son Walter" (London, 1851); "Utopia: a Picture of Early Life at the South" (Philadelphia, 1852); "Life in the South: a Companion to 'Uncle Tom's Cabin'" (1852); "Scriptural Views of National Trials" (Greensboro', 1863); and "Roanoke; or Where is Utopia?" (Philadelphia, 1886).

WILEY, Harvey Washington, chemist, b. in Kent, Jefferson co., Ind., 18 Oct., 1844. He was graduated at Hanover college in 1867, and was professor of Latin and Greek in 1868-'71 at Butler university, Indianapolis, also studying at Indiana medical college, where he received the degree of M. D. in 1871. After teaching science for a year in the Indianapolis high-school, he entered the Lawrence scientific school at Harvard, where he was graduated with the degree of S. B. in 1873, and then accepted the chair of chemistry at Butler university, which institution gave him the degree of Ph. D. in 1876. He studied chemistry at the University of Berlin in 1878, and during 1874-'83 was professor at the Agricultural college of Indiana (now Purdue university). He also held in 1881-'3 the office of state chemist of Indiana, and in 1883 he was appointed chemist of the U. S. department of agriculture in Washington, which place he has since held. Prof. Wiley is a member of scientific societies, and in 1886 was vice-president of the American association for the advancement of science, with charge of the section of chemistry. He was also in 1886 president of the Chemical society of Washington and of the Association of official agricultural chemists. His work has been chiefly in technology, and more especially in relation to food-products. The subjects of glucose and grape-sugar were very thoroughly studied by him while he was state chemist, and since his appointment in Washington he has investigated sorghum-sugar. Prof. Wiley has published presidential and college addresses, and his papers number more than fifty. These include the results of his researches, and have been published in scientific journals, the transactions of societies of which he is a member, and government reports.

WILEY, Isaac William, M. E. bishop, b. in Lewistown, Pa., 29 March, 1825; d. in Foochow, China, in November, 1884. At fourteen years of age he went to an academy to fit for college, hoping to be a minister, and in his eighteenth year he was licensed as lay preacher. Owing to impaired health, he gave up the idea of entering the ministry, and in 1844 he was graduated at the medical department of the University of the city of New York. In 1846 he began medical practice in western Pennsylvania, where he continued several years with success. In 1850 he offered himself as a minister to the Philadelphia conference, but there was no room for him. At this time Dr. John P. Durbin, hearing of his abilities as a physician and his desire to enter the ministry, induced him to go to China as medical missionary. At Foochow, in 1853, his wife died, and in the following year he brought back his motherless children to the United States. He entered the ministry in New Jersey, and, after filling pastorates for four years, became principal of Pennington seminary, which post he filled until 1863. In 1864 the general conference elected him editor of the "Ladies' Repository," published in Cincinnati. In 1872 he was made bishop. As a pastor Dr. Wiley was useful and highly respected, as principal of a seminary he was greatly beloved, and as an editor his taste was excellent and his style chaste. As a bishop he was prudent, deliberate, and clear, and seldom fell into any error either of the interpretation of constitutional or parliamentary law, or the selection of men for particular posts. He died in China on an episcopal tour to the missions that he had done so much to found. His death took place in a house on the very lot that he had occupied as a missionary thirty-two years before. Bishop Wiley received the degree of D. D. from Wesleyan university in 1864, and that of LL. D. from Ohio Wesleyan university in 1879. He published "The Fallen Missionaries of Fuh-Chau" (New York, 1858), and "Religion in the Family"; and among other works edited Rev. Thomas R. Birks's "The Bible and Moslem Thought" (Cincinnati, 1864); "The Life and Work of Earnest Men," by Rev. W. K. Tweedie (1864); and Friedrich Tholuck's "Christ of the Gospels and of Criticism" (1865).

WILHORST, Cora de, singer, b. in New York city, 16 Oct., 1835. Her maiden name was Withers, and her father belonged to a well-known New York family. Her maternal grandfather, David Dunham, was associated with Robert Fulton in the construction of the first steamboat. Cora was educated in her native city, studied music, and became separated from her family through her marriage with her music-teacher Henri, Comte de Wilhorst. She then appeared in concerts with Sigismund Thalberg, the pianist, her debut taking place at Newport, R. I., 21 Aug., 1856. She made her first appearance in opera at the New York academy of music as Lucia, 28 Jan., 1857. After visiting Paris and singing with Mario in "Don Pasquale," she returned to this country and began an operatic engagement in Philadelphia, 2 Nov., 1858. During the next four years Mme. de Wilhorst sang in the United States, opening the first opera-house in Cincinnati and the first music-hall in Chicago. She retired from the stage in 1860, but resumed her profession in Paris in 1869, singing in concerts. In 1870 she appeared in "Rigoletto" in that city, taking the place of Adelina Patti, who had gone to Russia. The Franco-Prussian war compelled her to give up a three-years' engagement to sing in the French capital. In February, 1871, she sang for the first time in Great Britain, appearing with Sims Reeves at the Crystal palace, Sydenham. She remained in England, taking part in oratorios, concerts, and festivals until 1874, when she married Oliver de Raucourt, and retired from the stage. In 1880 she returned to the United States, where she has since devoted herself to teaching singing. Mme. de Wilhorst claims to be the first American singer that began her operatic career in this country before studying abroad.

WILKES, Charles, naval officer, b. in New York city, 3 April, 1798; d. in Washington, D. C., 8 Feb., 1877. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 1 Jan., 1818, and was promoted to lieutenant, 28 April, 1826. He was appointed to the department of charts and instruments in 1830, and was the first in the United States to set up fixed astronomical instruments and observe with them. On 18 Aug., 1838, he sailed from Norfolk, Va., in command of a squadron of five vessels and a store-ship, to explore the southern seas. He visited Madeira,

Charles Wilkes

the Cape Verd islands, Rio de Janeiro, Tierra del Fuego, Valparaiso, Callao, the Paumotu group, Tahiti, the Samoan group (which he surveyed and explored), Wallis island, and Sydney in New South Wales. He left Sydney in December, 1839, and discovered what he thought to be an Antarctic continent, sailing along vast ice-fields for several weeks. In 1840 he thoroughly explored the Feejee group, and visited the Hawaiian islands, where he measured intensity of gravity by means of the pendulum on the summit of Mauna Loa. In 1841 he visited the northwestern coast of America and Columbia and Sacramento rivers, and on 1 Nov. set sail from San Francisco, visited Manila, Sooloo, Borneo, Singapore, the Cape of Good Hope, and St. Helena, and cast anchor at New York on 10 June, 1842. Charges preferred against him by some of his officers were investigated by a court-martial, and he was acquitted of all except illegally punishing some of his crew, for which he was reprimanded. He served on the coast survey in 1842-'3, was promoted to commander, 13 July, 1843, and employed in connection with the report on the exploring expedition at Washington in 1844-'61. He was commissioned a captain, 14 Sept., 1855, and when the civil war opened was placed in command of the steamer "San Jacinto" in 1861 and sailed in pursuit of the Confederate privateer "Sumter." On 8 Nov., 1861, he intercepted at sea the English mail-steamer "Trent," bound from Havana to St. Thomas, W. I., and sent Lieut. Donald M. Fairfax on board to bring off the Confederate commissioners, John Slidell and James M. Mason, with their secretaries. The officials were removed to the "San Jacinto," in which they were taken to Fort Warren, in Boston harbor. The navy department gave Capt. Wilkes an emphatic commendation; congress passed a resolution of thanks, and his act caused great rejoicing throughout the north, where he was the hero of the hour. But on the demand of the British government that Mason and Slidell should be given up, Sec. Seward complied, saying in his despatch that, although the commissioners and their papers were contraband of war, and therefore Wilkes was right in capturing them, he should have taken the "Trent" into port as a prize for adjudication. As he had failed to do so, and had constituted himself a judge in the matter, to approve his act would be to sanction the "right of search," which had always been denied by the U. S. government. The prisoners were therefore released. In 1862 Wilkes commanded the James river flotilla, and shelled City Point. He was promoted to commodore, 16 July, 1862, and took charge of a special squadron in the West Indies. He was placed on the retired list because of age, 25 June, 1864, and promoted to rear-admiral on the retired list, 25 July, 1866. For his services to science as an explorer he received a gold medal from the Geographical society of London. The reports of the Wilkes exploring expedition were to consist of twenty-eight quarto volumes, but nine of these were not completed. Of those that were published, Capt. Wilkes was the author of the "Narrative" of the expedition (6 vols., 4to, also 5 vols., 8vo, Philadelphia, 1845; abridged ed., New York, 1851), and the volumes on "Meteorology" and "Hydrography." Admiral Wilkes was also the author of "Western America, including California and Oregon" (Philadelphia, 1849), and "Theory of the Winds" (New York, 1856).

WILKES, George, journalist, b. in New York city in 1820; d. there, 23 Sept., 1885. In 1850 he became co-editor, with William T. Porter, of the "Spirit of the Times" in New York, and subsequently he was proprietor of that paper. He was well known as a politician, and travelled repeatedly in Europe. In April, 1870, he received from the emperor of Russia the grand cross of the Order of St. Stanislas for his services in suggesting to the Russian government an overland railway to China and India by way of Russia. In addition to contributions to periodicals, he published "History of California, Geographical and Political" (New York, 1845), and "Europe in a Hurry" (1852).

WILKES, Henry, Canadian educator, b. in Birmingham, England, 21 June, 1805; d. in Montreal, Canada, 17 Nov., 1886. He removed to Canada in 1820, was graduated at Glasgow university, Scotland, in 1833, studied in the Glasgow theological academy, and was pastor of the Albany street Congregational church in Edinburgh in 1833-'6. He was pastor of the Congregational church, Montreal, from 1836 till 1871, principal and professor of theology in the Congregational college of British North America in 1870-'83, and from 1883 till his death professor of theology and church history in this institution. He represented the Colonial missionary society, London, England, in 1836-'83. The University of Vermont gave him the degree of D. D. in 1850, and McGill college, Montreal, that of LL. D. in 1870. Dr. Wilkes published numerous sermons and addresses, and "The Internal Administration of the Congregational Churches" (Montreal, 1858).

WILKESON, Samuel, manufacturer, b. in Carlisle, Pa., in 1781; d. in the mountains of Tennessee in July, 1848. His father, John, a native of Ireland of Scotch descent, came to this country in 1760, settled in Delaware, and served against the British in the war of the Revolution. The son received few educational advantages, and worked on a farm till about 1806, when he began his career as a builder and owner of vessels and a trader on Lake Erie and elsewhere. During the war of 1812 he supplied Gen. William Henry Harrison with transports for the use of the troops in invading Canada. In 1814 he settled in Buffalo and engaged in business as a merchant. In 1819 he was an active advocate of the construction of the Erie canal, and in 1822 he was chiefly instrumental in securing the selection of Buffalo as its terminus. He was appointed first judge of the Erie court of common pleas in February, 1821, though he was without a legal education, was elected to the state senate in 1842, and served in that body and in the court for the correction of errors for six years. In 1836 he was elected mayor of Buffalo. He erected and put in operation a furnace in Mahoning county, Ohio, the first in this country to "blow in" on raw bituminous coal and smelt iron with that fuel uncooked, built the first iron-foundry in Buffalo, and established in that city the business of manufacturing steam-engines, stoves, and hollow-ware. He favored a system of gradual and compensated emancipation of the slaves, and advocated the colonization of the negroes on the west coast of Africa. He afterward removed to Washington, the headquarters of the American colonization society, over which he presided, for two years edited its organ, the "African Repository," directed the affairs of the colony of Liberia, establishing commercial relations between it and Baltimore and Philadelphia, and gathered colonists wherever he could in the south.—His son Samuel, b. in Buffalo, N. Y., 9 May, 1817, was educated at Williams and Union, and was graduated at the latter in 1837. He was for twelve years a staff-writer on the New York "Tribune," and its war-correspondent in the Army of the Potomac, and was the editor and owner of the Buffalo "Democracy" and of the Albany "Evening Journal," having bought out Thurlow Weed in 1865. He has been secretary of the Northern Pacific railroad company since March, 1869.—The second Samuel's son, Bayard, b. in Albany, N. Y., 17 May, 1844; d. near Gettysburg, Pa., 1 July, 1863, in the first year of the civil war solicited and obtained a commission as 2d lieutenant in the 4th U. S. artillery. He served with his battery in and about Fortress Monroe and Norfolk, and took part in the battle of Fredericksburg. He was promoted captain of his battery, and commanded it at the battle of Gettysburg, where he was killed. He was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of artillery after his death for gallantry in battle.—Another son, Frank, b. in Buffalo, N. Y., 8 March, 1845, has contributed to the New York "Times," the New York "Sun," and other papers, and has published "Recollections of a Private Soldier in the Army of the Potomac" (New York, 1887).—Another son, SAMUEL, was one of the builders of Tacoma, on Puget sound.

WILKIE, Francis Bangs, journalist, b. in West Charlton, N. Y., 2 July, 1832. He was graduated at Union in 1857, during which period he had editorial charge of the "Daily Star" of Schenectady. Soon after he settled in Davenport, Iowa, where he established the "Evening News," and in 1861 became the war-correspondent of the "New York Times," having charge of all the military movements in the region west of the Alleghany mountains. He then became an editorial writer on the "Chicago Times" in 1864, which he held till the close of 1887. He was the correspondent of the latter during the Russo-Turkish war, and for several years was at the head of the European bureau of that journal. His published works are "Davenport, Past and Present" (Davenport, Iowa, 1858); "The Iowa First" (Dubuque, Iowa, 1862); "Walks about Chicago, and Army and Miscellaneous Sketches" (Chicago, 1871); "The Chicago Bar" (1872); "Sketches beyond the Sea" (1879); "History of the Great Inventions and their Influence on Civilization" (Cincinnati, 1883); "The Gambler," a novel (Chicago, 1888); and "Pen and Powder" (Boston, 1888). He signs his articles "Poliute."

WILKINS, Isaac, clergyman, b. in Withywood, Jamaica, W. I., 17 Dec., 1742; d. in Westchester, N. Y., 5 Feb., 1830. His father, Martin, who at one time held a seat on the bench of the island, brought the son to New York in early youth to be educated. He was graduated at Columbia in 1760, was a member from the borough of Westchester of the New York colonial legislature in 1772, and for several years was actively and efficiently engaged in public affairs. He supported the loyalist side of the controversy with the mother country, wrote political pamphlets which appeared in the "Westchester Farmer," and thereby rendered himself odious to the Whigs. He was compelled by the Sons of Liberty to leave this country in 1775, and the British government conferred upon him a life annuity of £125. Mr. Wilkins returned to New York before the end of the war, sold his property in Westchester, and resided on Long Island until the return of peace. In 1784 he removed to Shelburne, Nova Scotia, purchased a farm, and took an active part in political affairs. He went to New York again in 1794, studied for the ministry, was ordained deacon in St. Peter's church, Westchester, in 1798, by Bishop Provost, and called to the rectorship, being ordained priest in the same church, 14 Jan., 1801, by the same bishop. He received the degree of D. D. from Columbia in 1811. He married Isabella, daughter of Lewis Morris.—His grandson, Lewis Morris, Canadian jurist, b. in Halifax, Nova Scotia, 24 May, 1801; d. in Windsor, Nova Scotia, 14 March, 1885, was the son of Lewis Morris Wilkins, who was a member of the house of assembly of Nova Scotia, a speaker of that body, and a judge of the supreme court. The son was graduated at King's college, Windsor, in 1819, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised at Windsor from 1823 till 1856, when he became judge of the supreme court of Nova Scotia, which post he held till 1876. Previous to his appointment to the judiciary, he had served in both branches of the Nova Scotia legislature.

WILKINS, John, pioneer, b. in Donegal, Lancaster co., Pa., 1 June, 1733; d. in Pittsburg, Pa., 11 Dec., 1809. His father, John, an early settler on Chiques creek, was an Indian trader, and took an active part against the Marylanders during the boundary difficulties, who offered £50 for his arrest. He was captured and taken to Annapolis jail, but subsequently released. John, the younger, removed to Carlisle in 1763, and ten years later to Bedford, engaging in mercantile pursuits. At the opening of the Revolution he organized a company of associators, and in 1776 was commissioned a captain in the Continental service, and was at Brandywine and Germantown. He was a member of the Pennsylvania constitutional convention of 15 July, 1776, from Bedford county. In November, 1783, he removed to Pittsburg, entered into business, and, upon the organization of Alleghany county, was appointed one of the associate judges of the court. He served as member of the supreme executive council in 1790, was chief Burgess of the borough of Pittsburg, commissioner of public buildings, and county treasurer from 1794 till 1803.—His son, William, b. in Carlisle, Pa., 20 Dec., 1779; d. in Homewood, Alleghany co., Pa., 23 June, 1865, attended Dickinson college for a short time, read law at Carlisle, and was admitted to the bar at Pittsburg on 28 Dec., 1801. He practised law there for more than fifty years, except when engaged in the performance of public duties. He was president of the common councils of the city in 1816-'19, was elected to the legislature in 1820, and was a candidate for speaker, but was defeated and made chairman of the judiciary committee. He resigned on 18 Dec., 1820, when he was appointed president-judge of the 5th judicial district of Pennsylvania. He held this office until 25 May, 1824, when he was made judge of the U. S. district court for western Pennsylvania. While on the bench in 1828, he was elected to congress, but declined to serve. In 1831 he was chosen U. S. senator for the full term of six years, and gave up the judgeship. He was a supporter of Andrew Jackson in opposition to John C. Calhoun's doctrines, and, as chairman of the senate committee, he reported the bill that passed congress, authorizing the president to use the army to suppress the nullification movement. In 1833 the electoral vote of Pennsylvania was cast for him for vice-president. In 1834 he was appointed minister to Russia. In 1842 he was again elected to the house of representatives, and served until 19 Jan., 1844, when he was made secretary of war by President Tyler. In 1855 he was chosen state senator from Alleghany county. At the opening of the civil war, although more than eighty years of age, he took an active interest in supporting the government as major-general of the home-guard, being always a staunch war Democrat. From 1805 until the time of his death he was active in any matter for the improvement of Pittsburg. In 1810 he helped to organize the Pittsburg manufacturing company, which in 1814 was incorporated as the Bank of Pittsburg, and he was its first president. He was interested in building the bridge across Monongahela river, and aided the Pennsylvania railroad in reaching the city of Pittsburg. His second wife was Matilda Dallas, daughter of Alexander James Dallas.

WILKINSON, James, soldier, b. in Benedict, Md., in 1757; d. near the city of Mexico, 28 Dec., 1825. He had just completed his studies for the medical profession when he enlisted in the army under Washington at Cambridge. There he soon formed a close intimacy with Col. Benedict Arnold and Capt. Aaron Burr, and, being given a captain's commission, joined Arnold in September, 1775, on his expedition into Canada. He was advanced to the rank of major, and in June, 1776, appointed to the staff of Gen. Horatio Gates. Subsequently he was promoted to a colonelcy, and appointed adjutant-general. In this capacity he was in the battle of Bemis's Heights on 19 Sept., 1777, and in the more important engagement of 7 Oct. Under cover of darkness, Col. John Hardin, of Kentucky, had penetrated the British lines and obtained an accurate view of their strength and position. He regained the American outposts, and there met Wilkinson, who was making the rounds with some boon companions. Hardin confided to him his discoveries, and begged he would at once make them known to Gen. Gates. This Wilkinson did, suppressing Hardin's name, and making himself the hero of the midnight adventure. The consequence was that when Burgoyne had surrendered, Wilkinson was made bearer of the tidings to congress, with a recommendation for his appointment as a brigadier-general. He was eighteen days on the way, and the news was a week old when he finally delivered his despatches. After several days a proposal was introduced into congress to present him with a sword, whereupon Dr. John Witherspoon dryly remarked: "I think ye'd better gie the lad a pair of spurs." This defeated the resolution, but congress, several weeks later, did appoint him a brigadier-general by brevet, and soon afterward secretary of the board of war, of which Gates was a member. Wilkinson was at this time deep in the Conway cabal, which proposed to elevate Gates to the chief command of the army, and the discovery of the conspiracy was due to his telling the secret in a convivial hour to Lord Stirling. Forty-nine army officers of his own grade petitioned congress to rescind his appointment as brigadier, and he at once resigned his brevet commission, retaining his rank of colonel. He was not again actively employed till toward the close of the war, when he served for a time as clothier-general of the army. He then emigrated to Lexington, Ky. Mississippi river was then closed to American commerce, and western produce was rotting on the ground for lack of a market. Wilkinson saw that he might realize a speedy fortune if he could obtain from the Spaniards an exclusive right to trade with New Orleans. Securing the good-will of the commandant of Natchez, by the present of a pair of thoroughbreds, he loaded a flat-boat with Kentucky produce, in the spring of 1787, and sent it boldly down the Mississippi, while he went by the land-route to New Orleans. The flat-boat preceded him, and was promptly seized by the authorities on its arrival; but it was quickly liberated on the appearance of Wilkinson, who secured an unlimited trading permission from the Spanish governor. The price he was to pay for this commercial concession and an annual pension of $2,000 was the betrayal of his country. In the entire district west of the Alleghanies great dissatisfaction then existed with the Federal government, in consequence of its inability to open the Mississippi to western commerce and its failure to protect the people against the raids of the savages. It was thought that advantage could be taken of this disaffection to sever the west from the east and erect it into a separate republic in close alliance with Spain. Thus divided, both republics would be weak, and neither would be dangerous to the Spanish possessions. Wilkinson went about the accomplishment of this treasonable project with consummate ability, and by June, 1788, by means of Spanish gold and Spanish promises, was able to count upon the support of a majority of the convention, which was to meet on the 28th of the ensuing July, to form a constitution for the new state of Kentucky. His work he now considered done; but Diego Gardoqui, the Spanish minister, desired the secession of the entire west, and despatched a messenger with corrupt overtures to John Sevier, leader of the settlers south of Kentucky. Sevier at once despatched a quick messenger to Isaac Shelby, at Danville, Ky., who, with the aid of Thomas Marshall and George Muter, succeeded in thwarting Wilkinson's treasonable designs in the convention. Wilkinson continued his efforts, but with no chance of success. His trading adventures not proving successful, he applied, in 1791, for reinstatement in the army. In December of that year he was appointed a lieutenant-colonel on the recommendation of Thomas Marshall, who justified the appointment by saying that so long as Wilkinson was unemployed he considered him dangerous to the public quiet, if not to the safety, of Kentucky. He took service in the western department under Gen. Anthony Wayne, but continued a treasonable correspondence with the Spanish officials, and there is proof that down to 1800 he was in receipt of a Spanish pension. His intrigues encouraged Spain to persist in the occlusion of the Mississippi, and they entailed twelve years of savage warfare upon the border settlements. Wilkinson performed good service against the northwestern Indians, and was promoted to a brigadier-generalship on 5 March, 1792, and to the supreme command of the army on the death of Wayne in 1796. He was made governor of Louisiana in 1805, and in the autumn of that year disclosed to the government the plan of Aaron Burr to erect a southwestern empire. Burr asserted, and Jackson believed, that he was implicated in this conspiracy, and the presumption is very strong that he was its originator. In 1811 he was court-martialed, charged with complicity with Burr, and with being in the pay of Spain, but was acquitted for lack of evidence, his subsequently published correspondence with the Spanish government, which conclusively shows his guilt, not being then accessible. In 1813 he was made major-general, and employed in the northern department, where he was not successful, owing to a disagreement with Gen. Wade Hampton. A court of inquiry exonerated him in 1815. He was discharged from the service at the close of the war, and removed to Mexico. His life he has, in part, related in his "Memoirs of My Own Times" (3 vols., Philadelphia, 1816). His treason is outlined in Humphrey Marshall's "History of Kentucky" (2 vols., Frankfort, 1824), and more fully related in Charles Gayarré's "Spanish Domination in Louisiana" (New York, 1854), and James R. Gilmore's "Advance-Guard of Western Civilization" (1887). See also Daniel Clark's "Proofs of the Corruption of Gen. James Wilkinson" (1809), and "Burr's Conspiracy Exposed and Gen. Wilkinson Vindicated" (1811).

WILKINSON, Jemima, religious impostor, b. in Cumberland, R. I., in 1753; d. in Jerusalem, Yates co., N. Y., 1 July, 1819. She was brought up as a Quaker, and at the age of twenty, having recovered after a severe fever and an apparent suspension of life, she claimed to have been raised from the dead, to have received a divine commission, and to be able to work miracles. She was shrewd and persuasive, and, having secured numerous followers, retired with them in 1789 to a tract of 14,000 acres which had been purchased in Yates county, N. Y., and which she named Jerusalem. She assumed the name of "Universal Friend," was accompanied by two "witnesses," Sarah Richards and Rachel Miller, and insisted on the Shaker doctrine of celibacy. The exercises of her religious meetings also resembled those of that sect. When she preached she stood in the door of her bed-chamber, wearing a waistcoat, stock, and white silk cravat. Though she recommended poverty, her dupes enabled her to live in luxury, and she owned lands that were purchased in the name of Rachel Miller. After her death the sect was entirely dispersed. See "History of Jemima Wilkinson," by David Hume (Geneva, N. Y., 1821).

WILKINSON, Jesse, naval officer, b. in Virginia about 1790; d. in Norfolk, Va., 23 May, 1861. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 4 July, 1805, and was commissioned a lieutenant, 10 April, 1810. During the war of 1812 he commanded the schooner "Hornet," which was used as a despatch-vessel on Potomac river in 1813-'15. He served at the Norfolk navy-yard in 1816-'18 and in 1820-'1, and in the intervening time commanded the "Hornet" and was on coast-survey duty. He was promoted to master-commandant, 18 April, 1818, commanded the brig "Spark," of Com. David Porter's flotilla, for the suppression of piracy in the West Indies in 1822-'3, and served at the Norfolk navy-yard in 1824-'5 and at Boston in 1826. He served in the "John Adams" in the West Indies against the pirates in 1827-'8, was promoted to captain, 11 March, 1829, and was at the navy-yard at Norfolk in 1829-'33. He commanded the frigate "United States," of the Mediterranean squadron, in 1835-'40, and the West India squadron, in the flag-ship "Macedonian," in 1840-'2, and was commandant of the Norfolk navy-yard in 1843-'7. In 1848-'9 he was commodore commanding the West India squadron in the flag-ship "Raritan." After this he served on boards and courts-martial until his death, though most of this period of his life was spent on leave or waiting orders.

WILKINSON, John, naval officer, b. in Norfolk, Va., 6 Nov., 1821. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 8 Dec., 1837, attended the naval school at Philadelphia, and became a passed midshipman, 29 June, 1843, served in the "Oregon" on special service in 1844-'5, and in the "Portsmouth" in 1845-'6. He was attached to the "Saratoga" in the later operations on the Gulf coast of Mexico, was commissioned a master, 25 June, 1850, and became lieutenant, 5 Nov., 1850. He served in the steamer "Southern Star," on the expedition to Paraguay, in 1858-'9, was on duty in the coast survey in 1860-'1, and when the civil war began resigned his commission, 20 April, 1861, and entered the Confederate navy as a lieutenant. He was assigned to duty in Fort Powhatan on the James river, and then ordered to command a battery at Acquia creek. In the spring of 1862 he was appointed executive of the ram "Louisiana," at New Orleans, in which he was taken prisoner at the capture of the city by Farragut. He was exchanged, 5 Aug., 1862, and on 12 Aug. left Richmond with funds and Confederate bonds with which to purchase and load a vessel in England with a cargo of war material. He there bought the steamer "Giraffe," in which he ran the blockade at Wilmington, N. C., having on board machinery to make Confederate paper-money. Shortly afterward the "Giraffe" was renamed the "R. E. Lee." He made regular trips from Wilmington to Bermuda with cotton, and back with cargoes of arms and military stores. In October, 1863, he was ordered to command an expedition to release the Confederate prisoners on Johnson's island; but the Canadian governor-general learned of the plot, and it was a failure. He served in the iron-clad "Albatross" in 1864, and in September had command of the "Chickamauga," in which he destroyed a great many merchant-vessels. In 1865 he had charge of the blockade-runner "Chameleon," which he took to Liverpool, where she was seized after the war, and delivered to the U. S. government. He has published "The Narrative of a Blockade-Runner" (New York, 1877).

WILKINSON, Morton Smith, senator, b. in Skaneateles, Onondaga co., N. Y., 22 Jan., 1819. He received an academical education, went to Illinois in 1837, was engaged for two years in railroad business, afterward returned to his native place, where he studied law, was admitted to the bar in Syracuse in 1842, and in 1843 began practice at Eaton Rapids, Mich. He removed to St. Paul, Minn., in 1847, was elected a member of the first territorial legislature in 1849, and was appointed one of a board of commissioners to prepare a code of laws for the territory. He was elected to the U. S. senate as a Republican in 1859, and held his seat till 1865, serving as chairman of the committee on Revolutionary claims, and as a member of the committee on Indian affairs. He was a delegate to the Baltimore convention of 1864 and to the Loyalists' convention of 1866 at Philadelphia, and served in congress from Minnesota from 4 March, 1869, till 3 March, 1871. He was a member of the state senate in 1874-'7, and afterward united with the Democratic party.

WILKINSON, William Cleaver, clergyman, b. in Westford, Vt., 19 Oct., 1833. He was graduated at Rochester university in 1857, and at the theological seminary there in 1859. In the same year he became pastor of the Wooster place Baptist church, New Haven, Conn., and he remained there until 1861, when he resigned, and made an extensive tour in Europe. After spending a year as tutor in modern languages in Rochester university, he accepted a call to the pastorate of the Mount Auburn Baptist church, Cincinnati, Ohio. Resigning this charge in 1866, he opened a school in Tarrytown, N. Y., where he still resides. In 1872 he was elected to the professorship of homiletics and pastoral theology in Rochester theological seminary, but in 1881 he retired from this office and has since devoted himself to literary work. He is counsellor of the Chautauqua literary and scientific circle, and dean of the department of literature and art in the Chautauqua university. He has also lectured at Wellesley college on English literature. Rochester gave him the degree of D. D. in 1873. Dr. Wilkinson has contributed extensively to periodicals, and has prepared text-books in languages for the Chautauqua university, which have been widely used (1882-'7). His other publications include "The Dance of Modern Society" (New York, 1869); "A Free Lance in the Field of Life and Letters" (1874); "The Baptist Principle" (Philadelphia, 1881); "Webster, an Ode" (New York, 1882); "Poems" (1883); and "Edwin Arnold as Poetizer and as Paganizer" (1884).

WILLARD, Abijah, soldier, b. in Lancaster, Mass., in 1722; d. in Lancaster, N. B., in 1789. He served at the capture of Cape Breton, was wounded in the campaign, and rose to the rank of captain. In 1774 he was appointed a mandamus councillor, and soon became an object of public indignation. While in Union, Connecticut, he was seized and confined, but was released on the signing of a declaration that was dictated by his captors. He commanded a Massachusetts regiment under Jeffrey Amherst, went to Halifax with the royal army in 1776, and at a late period of the Revolutionary war was on Long Island. In 1778 he was proscribed and banished, and in July, 1783, was in the city of New York, where he joined fifty-four other loyalists in a petition to Sir Guy Carleton for extensive grants of land in Nova Scotia. These petitioners are known as the "Fifty-five," and their petition caused much excitement in New York and St. John. In a controversy between "Viator" and a "Consistent Loyalist," published in London in 1784, his name often appears. On the one hand, it was said that as commissary he "saved the government several thousand pounds," and on the other he "saved to himself and nephew many thousand pounds more than they were worth when the rebellion began." Willard settled in New Brunswick, and was a member of the council. After his death his family returned to Massachusetts.

WILLARD, Emma, educator, b. in Berlin, Conn., 23 Feb., 1787; d. in Troy, N. Y., 15 April, 1870. She was a daughter of Samuel Hart, and a sister of Mrs. Almira Lincoln Phelps. She received her education at the village academy, and in Hartford, Conn., and began to teach at the age of sixteen. After serving as principal of various academies, she took charge of an institution in Middlebury, Vt., and in 1809 married Dr. John Willard, who was then U. S. marshal of Vermont. In 1814 she opened a boarding-school for girls in Middlebury, where she introduced new studies and made many improvements upon the ordinary methods of instruction. Deciding to establish a seminary for girls, she matured her plans in a treatise on the "Education of Women," which was published in the form of an address to the legislature in 1819, and in that year she opened a school in Waterford, N. Y., which was incorporated and in part supported by the state government. In 1821 she removed to Troy, N. Y., which town had offered her an appropriate building, and her school became known as the Troy female seminary. In 1825 Dr. Willard died, and the entire business management devolved upon her. She continued successfully until 1838, when she resigned, and was succeeded by her son, John Hart Willard, and his wife. In 1830 she travelled in Europe, and on her return she published her "Journal and Letters from France and Great Britain" (Troy, 1833), devoting her share of the proceeds of its sale, amounting to $1,200, to the support of a school in Greece, that had been founded mainly by her exertions, for the education of native female teachers. She was associated in this enterprise with Almira Lincoln Phelps, Sarah J. Hale, Lydia H. Sigourney, and others. In 1838 she married Dr. Christopher C. Yates, from whom she was divorced in 1843, and resumed her former name. For many years before her death she resided in Troy, N. Y., and directed her energy to the revision of her numerous school-books and to public labors in the cause of higher education. In 1846 she made a journey of 8,000 miles through the western and southern states, addressing teachers' conventions, and in 1854 she attended the World's educational convention in London. She is considered the pioneer in the higher education of women in this country, and educated about 5,000 pupils. Her school-books have had a large sale, and have been translated into many of the languages of Europe and Asia. Her publications include "The Woodbridge and Willard Geography and Atlases," comprising a universal geography and atlas, a school geography and atlas, an ancient geography and atlas, geography for beginners, and atlas (1823); "History of the United States, or Republic of America" (New York, 1828); "Universal History in Perspective" (1837); "Treatise on the Circulation of the Blood" (1846); "Respiration and its Effects, particularly as respects Asiatic Cholera" (1849); "Last Leaves of American History" (1849); "Astronomy" (1853); "Morals for the Young" (1857); and numerous charts, atlases, pamphlets, and addresses. She was the author of many poems, the best known of which is "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep." These were published in a volume, which was afterward suppressed (New York, 1830). See her "Life," by John Lord (New York, 1873).

Emma Willard

WILLARD, Frances Elizabeth, reformer, b. in Churchville, N. Y., 28 Sept., 1839. She was graduated at Northwestern female college, Evanston, Ill., in 1859, became professor of natural science there in 1862, and was principal of Genesee Wesleyan seminary in 1866-'7. The following two years she spent in foreign travel, giving a part of the time to study in Paris, and contributing to periodicals. In 1871-'4 she was professor of æsthetics in Northwestern university and dean of the Woman's college, where she developed her system of self-government, which has been adopted by other educators. Miss Willard left her profession in 1874 to identify herself with the Woman's Christian temperance union, serving as corresponding secretary of the National organization till 1879, and since that date as president. As secretary she organized the Home protection movement, and sent an appeal from nearly 200,000 people to the legislature of Illinois asking for the temperance ballot for women. On the death of her brother, Oliver A. Willard, in 1879, she succeeded him as editor of the Chicago "Evening Post." Since 1882 she has been a member of the executive committee of the Prohibition party. In 1886 she accepted the leadership of the White Cross movement in her own unions, which has obtained through her influence enactments in twelve states for the protection of women. In 1888 she was made president of the American branch of the International council of women, and of the World's Christian temperance union, which she had founded five years before. Besides many pamphlets and contributions to magazines and the press, Miss Willard has published "Nineteen Beautiful Years," a tribute to her sister (New York, 1863); "Woman and Temperance" (Chicago, 1883); "How to Win" (New York, 1886); and "Woman in the Pulpit" (Boston, 1888).

WILLARD, John, jurist, b. in Guilford, Conn., 20 May, 1792; d. in Saratoga Springs, N. Y., 31 Aug., 1862. He was graduated at Middlebury college in 1813, admitted to the bar in 1817, and he began the practice of law in Salem, Washington co., N. Y. On the elevation in 1836 of Esek Cowen to the bench of the supreme court, he was appointed judge and vice-chancellor of the 4th judicial district of New York, filling that office until the new organization of the judiciary under the constitution of 1846, when he was elected one of the justices of the supreme court. In 1854 he was a member of the court of appeals. In 1856 he was appointed by President Pierce one of the commissioners to examine into the validity of the California land-titles which were claimed under Spanish and Mexican grants. In 1861 he was chosen state senator by the votes of all parties, and, by his efforts in that body, the confusion in the laws respecting murder and the rights of married women was removed, and simple statutes were substituted in their place. The rapidity and ability with which he discharged his official duties, his uniform courtesy and kindness to the profession, his abhorrence of pettifoggery and chicanery, and the purity and integrity of his character as a judge and as a man, commanded universal respect and esteem, and did much to elevate the judiciary of his native state. Dartmouth gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1850. After his retirement from the bench he published "Equity Jurisprudence" (Albany, 1855); a "Treatise on Executors, Administrators, and Guardians" (1859); and a "Treatise on Real Estate and Conveyancing" (1861), works of great learning and ability. They are constantly cited with confidence, and received as authority both in the United States and in England.

WILLARD, John Dwight, jurist, b. in Lancaster, N. Y., 4 Nov., 1799; d. in Troy, N. Y., 16 Oct., 1864. After graduation at Dartmouth in 1819 he studied law, was admitted to the bar of New York about 1823, and began practice in Troy in 1826. He was editor of the Troy "Sentinel" for several years. He was judge of the court of common pleas and also of the New York circuit court, and served in the state senate. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Dartmouth in 1860, and by La Grange university of Kentucky in 1862. He left $10,000 to Dartmouth.

WILLARD, Simon, settler, b. in Horsemonden, Kent, England, in April, 1605; d. in Charlestown, Mass., 24 April, 1676. He was the son of Richard Willard, came to New England in 1634, and was a founder of Concord, of which he was clerk from 1635 till 1653. He represented it in the legislature from 1636 till 1654, and was assistant and councillor from 1654 till 1676. He removed to Lancaster in 1660, in 1672 to Groton, and on the dispersion of the inhabitants of that town by the Indian wars, in which he served as major of militia, settled in Salem. He became a magistrate, and died while holding a court in Charlestown. The Rev. Ebenezer Pemberton calls him "a sage patriot in Israel, whose wisdom assigned him a seat at the council-board, and his military skill and martial spirit entitled him to the chief place in the field." A letter from Maj. Simon Willard to the commissioners of the United Colonies in 1654 is contained in Thomas Hutchinson's "Collection of Original Papers relative to the History of the Colony of Massachusetts Bay" (Boston, 1769). See his "Life," by Joseph Willard (Boston, 1858).—His son, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Concord, Mass., 31 Jan., 1640; d. in Boston, Mass., 12 Sept., 1707, was graduated at Harvard in 1659, studied divinity, was ordained minister at Groton in 1663, and continued there until the Indian war of 1676. He became colleague with the Rev. Thomas Thacher, the first pastor of the Old South church in Boston, and continued in connection with that church until his death. A story illustrating his excellent delivery is told. His son-in-law, the Rev. Samuel Neal, preached for him in the Old South church, and the sermon being considered very poor, the congregation requested that he should not be invited to fill the pulpit. Mr. Willard borrowed the identical sermon and read it to the same audience, which immediately requested a copy for publication. On the retirement of Increase Mather from the presidency of Harvard, Mr. Willard, being vice-president, succeeded to the government of that college, serving in 1701-'27. He published numerous sermons, including "Sermon occasioned by the Death of John Leverett, Governor of Massachusetts" (Boston, 1679); "The Duty of a People that have renewed their Covenant with God" (1680); "Ne Sutor ultra Crepidam, or Brief Animadversions upon the New England Anabaptists' Late Fallacious Narrative" (1681); "Mourner's Cordial against Excessive Sorrow" (1691); "Peril of the Times displayed" (1700); and other treatises, and left "Expositions upon Psalms, Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians," and other compositions in manuscript, which were edited and published by Joseph Sewall and Thomas Prince, colleague pastors of the Old South church, with the title of

"A Compleat Body of Divinity in Two Hundred and Fifty Lectures on the Assembly's Shorter Catechism," in what is said to be the first miscellaneous folio volume that was published in this country (Boston, 1726).—Samuel's son, Josiah, jurist, b. in Massachusetts, 1 May, 1681; d. in Boston, Mass., 6 Dec., 1756, was graduated at Harvard in 1698, and was secretary of Massachusetts from June, 1717, until his death, being known as "the good secretary." He was judge of probate in 1731, and a member of the council in 1734.—Samuel's grandson, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Kingston, Jamaica, W. I., in 1705; d. in Kittery, Me., 25 Oct., 1741, was the son of John, who was graduated at Harvard in 1690, and was a merchant of Jamaica for several years. After graduation at Harvard in 1723, the son was appointed to the charge of a pastorate in Biddeford, Me., in 1730. See "The Minister of God approved: a Sermon at the Ordination of Mr. John Hovey, with a Funeral Sermon on Samuel Willard," by William Thompson, A. M., and a preface by Thomas Prentice (Boston, 1743).—The second Samuel's son, Joseph, clergyman, b. in Biddeford, Me., 9 Jan., 1738; d. in New Bedford, Mass., 25 Sept., 1804, was left fatherless at an early age, and made several coasting voyages. Through the generosity of friends he entered Harvard, was graduated in 1765, and in the next year was chosen tutor there, remaining until 1772. He was ordained colleague, with the Rev. Joseph Champney, of the 1st Congregational church in Beverly, Mass., on 25 Nov., 1772, and in 1781 was elected president of Harvard, serving until his death. His only publications were a few sermons, a Latin address on the death of Washington, prefixed to the Rev. David Tappan's "Discourse" (Cambridge, 1800), and mathematical and astronomical papers in the "Memoirs of the American Academy," and the "Transactions" of the Philosophical society. He was a sound Greek scholar, and left a Greek grammar in manuscript.—The second Samuel's grandson, Solomon, architect, b. in Petersham, Worcester co., Mass., 26 June, 1783; d. in Quincy, Mass., 27 Feb., 1862, worked in his father's carpenter-shop, and farmed till 1804, when he went to Boston, where he followed his trade. Subsequently he became an expert wood-carver, his first important work in that art being the colossal spread eagle that was placed on the old custom-house in Boston. He began to carve in stone in 1815, was employed in decorating many public buildings in Boston, and gave lessons in architecture and drawing. He was a founder of the Boston mechanics' institute. On 2 Nov., 1825, he was chosen architect and superintendent of Bunker Hill monument, his design having been accepted by the building committee in the following year. He was engaged on this work for the subsequent seventeen years, being frequently interrupted by want of funds and by disagreements in the committee in charge; but on 23 July, 1842, the top-stone of the monument was laid, and on the anniversary of the battle in 1843 its completion was celebrated in the presence of the president of the United States, his cabinet, and a large concourse of citizens from every part of the Union. Mr. Willard's other works include the U. S. branch bank, Boston, the plan of the soldiers' monument at Concord, Mass., the court-house at Dedham, Mass., and the Harvard monument in Charlestown, Mass. He introduced the free use of granite as a building material in this country, furnished the first granite paving-stones that were ever used in Boston, invented many ingenious plans for working stone, and, as carpenter, designer, architect, and builder, was greatly in advance of his contemporaries. See "Memoir of Solomon Willard," by William W. Wheildon (Boston, 1865).—Joseph's son, Sidney, educator, b. in Beverly, Mass., 19 Sept., 1780; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 6 Dec., 1856, was graduated at Harvard in 1798, where he was librarian in 1800-'5, and Hancock professor of Hebrew and other Oriental languages from 1807 until his resignation. In connection with this professorship he was also professor of the English language, and in 1827 the charge of the Latin department was assigned to him also. He studied theology and sometimes preached. He was mayor of Cambridge from 1848 till 1850, served frequently in the legislature, and was once a member of the executive council. He was a member of the Anthology club, and a founder of "The Literary Miscellany," established and edited the "American Monthly Review" (4 vols., 1832-'3), was editor of "The Christian Register," contributed to numerous periodicals, and published a "Hebrew Grammar" (Cambridge, 1817), and "Memoirs of Youth and Manhood" (2 vols., 1855).—Another son of Joseph, Joseph, author, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 14 March, 1798; d. in Boston, Mass., 12 May, 1865, studied at Phillips Exeter academy, was graduated at Harvard in 1816, studied law in Amherst, practised in Waltham and Lancaster, and settled in Boston in 1829. He became master of chancery in 1838, was appointed joint clerk with George C. Wilde, of the supreme court and court of common pleas of Suffolk county, and held these offices until 1856, when they became elective. He was then chosen clerk of the superior court for five years, and re-elected for a like term in 1861. Mr. Willard was corresponding secretary of the Massachusetts historical society from 1829 till 1864, and many years a trustee of the old Boston library. He was the author of "Topographical and Historical Sketches of the Town of Lancaster in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts" (Worcester, 1826); "Address to the Members of the Bar of Worcester County, 2 Oct., 1829" (Lancaster, 1830); "Address in Commemoration of the 200th Anniversary of the Incorporation of Lancaster, Mass., with an Appendix" (Boston, 1853); "The Willard Memoir, or Life and Times of Major Simon Willard, and Some Account of the Name and Family in Europe from an Early Day" (1858); "Naturalization in the American Colonies" (1859); and "Letter to an English Friend on the Rebellion in the United States and on the British Policy" (1862). He edited the fifth edition of the "Narrative of the Captivity and Removes of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson among the Indians" (Lancaster, 1828), and was the author of many addresses, pamphlets, and contributions to various magazines. He left, incomplete, a "Life" of Gen. Henry Knox.—Joseph's nephew, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Petersham, Mass., 19 April, 1775; d. in Deerfield, Mass., 8 Oct., 1859, spent his early life on his father's farm, and, receiving an injury in the back which unfitted him for agricultural labor, prepared for college, was graduated at Harvard in 1803. He was a tutor at Bowdoin in 1804-'5, studied theology there and in Cambridge, and in 1807 became pastor of the Congregational church in Deerfield, where he remained until he resigned in 1829, owing to loss of sight. He then conducted a school with his son-in-law in Hingham, Mass., for three years, and occasionally preached. He became a member of the American academy of arts and sciences in 1815, and received the degree of D. D. from Harvard in 1826. In addition to many pamphlets, sermons, and school-books, he published the "Deerfield Collection of Sacred Music" (1808); "Original Hymns" (1823); "Index to the Bible, with Juvenile Hymns" (1826); "The Franklin Primer" (1826); a "General Class-Book" (1828); "Sacred Poetry and Music Reconciled: a Collection of Hymns" (1830); and an "Introduction to the Latin Language" (1835).—The second Joseph's son, Sidney, soldier, b. in Lancaster, Mass., 3 Feb., 1831; d. in Fredericksburg, Va., 13 Dec., 1862, was graduated at Harvard in 1852, and studied and practised law in Boston. During the civil war he entered the National army, and was made major of the 35th Massachusetts regiment on 27 Aug., 1862, and fell at Fredericksburg, Va.

WILLARD, Simon, watch-maker, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 9 Jan., 1795; d. in Boston, Mass., 24 Aug., 1874. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1815, appointed 3d lieutenant of ordnance, and ordered to the Pittsburg arsenal, crossing the Alleghany mountains on foot. He resigned from the army on 1 May, 1816, and after an unsuccessful business career of seven years entered his father's clock-making establishment in Boston, and at the end of two years apprenticed himself to a mechanician in New York city. After learning the methods of constructing chronometers, he returned to Boston, where he established himself in business, occupying the same premises forty-two years, during which time he acquired a fortune. He constructed an astronomical clock that was for forty years the standard in his part of the city.

WILLARD, Sylvester David, physician, b. in Wilton, Conn., 19 June, 1825; d. in Albany, N. Y., 2 April, 1865. He was educated in the academy in his native town, graduated at Albany medical college in 1848, and acquired a large practice in that city. From 1857 till 1865 he was secretary of the New York state medical society, whose "Transactions" he edited, and he was president of the medical society of Albany county in 1858. He entered the National army as volunteer surgeon in 1862, and in 1865 became surgeon-general of the state of New York. Being directed by the legislature to report the condition of the insane in the state, Dr. Willard urged the necessity of erecting a large asylum for the poor, and a bill to establish such an asylum was in the state senate at the time of Dr. Willard's death. It afterward passed, and the institution was called the Willard asylum for the insane. It is one of the largest of the kind in this country. Both houses of the legislature passed resolutions of regret upon his death. Dr. Willard devoted much time to historical and antiquarian research, and was the author of many scientific papers, addresses, and contributions to medical journals. He published "Historical Address" (Albany, 1857); "Biographical Memoirs of Physicians of Albany County" (1857); "Memoir of Thomas Spencer, M. D." (1858); and "Annals of the Medical Society of the County of Albany, 1800-'51, with Biographical Sketches" (1864).

WILLAUMETZ, Jean-Baptiste Philibert (veel-o-metz), Count, French naval officer, b. in Belle-Isle-en-Mer, 7 Aug., 1763; d. in Suresnes, near Paris, 17 May, 1845. He entered the French navy in 1777, was with D'Estaing at Savannah in 1779, and De Grasse at Yorktown in October, 1781, and in the engagements with Lord Rodney off Dominica, 9 and 12 April, 1782. He served afterward in the Indian ocean. In 1802 he commanded the "Hercule" in Leclerc's expedition to Santo Domingo, and as commander of the station south of Mole St. Nicolas held in check the insurgents, whom, despite his instructions, he treated with humanity, and refused to cause the prisoners to be shot. After his promotion to rear-admiral he sailed on 14 Dec., 1805, with a division for Cayenne, Jerome Napoleon serving under him as post-captain. He pillaged the coast of British Guiana, and then turned to the north, his instructions being to destroy the cod-fisheries along the coast of Newfoundland; but on 20 Aug., 1806, the fleet was struck by a hurricane, which dismasted and dispersed all the vessels. Two were sunk near the coast of South Carolina, and two others reached Chesapeake bay, where they were condemned and sold. Jerome Napoleon sailed for France, and the admiral, with his remaining two ships, put into Havana for repairs. Here he received orders to abandon the expedition to Newfoundland, and to return to Brest. He was made a count by Napoleon, vice-admiral by Louis XVIII., and in 1832 retired and was created a peer of France. He published "Dictionnaire de marine" (2 vols., Paris, 1820).

WILLCOX, Albert Oliver, merchant, b. in New York city, 10 May, 1810. He was educated in the New York high-school, and embraced a mercantile career. Between 1835 and 1860 he was an active member of several anti-slavery societies. As chairman of the executive committee of one of these, he issued, on 3 Nov., 1838, an address containing the first proposal of political anti-slavery action. He was among the founders of the "National Era" in Washington, D. C., in 1844. He was engaged for many years before the war in extending the earliest mercantile agency, and in the dry-goods business, and has since followed the insurance business in New York city, and devoted himself to the public advocacy of woman suffrage.

WILLCOX, Orlando Bolivar, soldier, b. in Detroit, Mich., 16 April, 1823. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy, in 1847, eighth in a class of thirty-eight, among whom were Ambrose P. Hill and Ambrose E. Burnside, and was assigned to the 4th artillery. He served in the latter part of the Mexican war, on the plains, and in the final campaign against the Seminoles in 1856-'7, but resigned his commission on 10 Sept. of the latter year, studied law, and in 1858 was admitted to the bar at Detroit, Mich., where he practised till the opening of the civil war. He became colonel of the 1st Michigan regiment on 1 May, 1861, and his command was the first from the west to arrive at the seat of war. He was engaged in the capture of Alexandria, Va., and commanded a brigade at Bull Run, where he was wounded and captured. After confinement in Charleston and Columbia, S. C., till 17 Aug., 1862, during part of which time he was kept a close prisoner as a hostage for Confederate privateers that were on trial for their lives in New York, he was exchanged and commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers, to date from 21 July, 1861. He took part in the Maryland and Rappahannock campaigns, temporarily commanded the 9th army corps and the district of central Kentucky from 10 April till 9 June, 1863, had charge of the district of Indiana and Michigan during the draft riots, and then engaged in the operations in eastern Tennessee till March, 1864. He commanded a division in the 9th corps of the Army of the Potomac in the Richmond campaign, and on 1 Aug., 1864, was brevetted major-general of volunteers "for distinguished and gallant services in the several actions since crossing the Rapidan." At Petersburg his division was the first to break through, and received the actual surrender of the city. From 26 April till 28 July, 1865, he had charge of the district of Washington, N. C., and from 7 Aug., of that year, till 15 Jan., 1866, he commanded that of Michigan. On the latter day he was mustered out, and returned to the practice of law at Detroit, where he was also made U. S. assessor of internal revenue; but on 28 July, 1866, he was recommissioned in the regular army, as colonel of the 29th infantry, and on 2 March, 1867, he received the brevets of brigadier-general for Spottsylvania, and major-general for the capture of Petersburg. He was transferred to the 12th infantry on 15 March, 1869, was superintendent of the general recruiting service in New York city in 1873-'4, and commanded various posts and departments till his promotion to brigadier-general, 13 Oct., 1886. While in command of the Department of Arizona, he received the thanks of the territorial legislature on 19 Feb., 1881, for "his constant and vigilant care, his untiring effort and military skill in protecting the people and freeing the territory of Arizona from the cruel and brutal outrages of the hostile Indian tribes within the military department." On 16 April, 1887, he was placed on the retired list, at which time he was in command of the Department of the Missouri. Gen. Wilcox has published "Shoepack Recollections" (Boston, 1856), and "Faca, an Army Memoir, by Major March" (1857).

WILLEKENS, Jacobus, Dutch admiral, b. in Breda in 1571; d. in Ternate in 1633. He was in the employ of the East and West Indian company for years, and in 1620 presented to John Usseling, president of the board of directors, a memoir in which he advocated a combined attack on the Spanish possessions of the Atlantic and Pacific coast. Usseling commended the memoir to the directors, and in 1623 the expedition was decided upon. Willekens, being appointed commander-in-chief, directed the armament of two fleets. One, in command of Jacob L'Hermite-Clerk, sailed from Amsterdam, 29 April, 1623, to operate against Peru and Mexico, while the main fleet, under Willekens, was to attack Brazil, and sailed from Texel, 22 Dec., 1623. Early in June, 1624, he began operations against San Salvador da Bahia, and after his vice-admiral, Piet Hein (q. v.), had crossed the bar on 10 June and captured the Portuguese fleet, the city surrendered at discretion on the following day. Bishop Texeira preached the war against the heretics among the Indians, and the Portuguese, having rallied, besieged Willekens; but the latter repelled them, and led an expedition into the interior, on his return from which he was defeated by the Indians. Surrendering the command to Hein, he sailed, 24 Aug., 1624, for Amsterdam to obtain re-enforcements. He returned in June, 1625, but found Bahia abandoned by Hein and in the possession of a Spanish-Portuguese fleet, which he attacked. Being driven back, he sailed to the south, landing at intervals and destroying the Portuguese establishments. Chased by the Spanish fleet, he returned to Holland, where he learned of the new expedition that had been sent to Brazil under command of Hein in 1626 and sailed to his succor. He made a successful attack against Rio de Janeiro, which paid ransom, and joined Hein; but the two admirals disagreeing as to the chief command, they separated and Willekens returned to Amsterdam. He afterward commanded in the East Indies, dying at Ternate after a successful attack against Manila. Willekens's clerk wrote an account of the expedition to Brazil, and it was published in Dutch (Amsterdam, 1626), but is best known in the French version, entitled "Journal de l'expédition entreprise par ordre de nos seigneurs des États-Généraux, au Brésil, et du siège et de la capture de Bahia, sous les ordres de l'Amiral Jacob Willekens" (1629).

WILLET, Joseph Edgerton, educator, b. in Macon, Ga., 17 Nov., 1826. He was graduated at Mercer university in 1846 and elected in 1847 adjunct professor of natural philosophy and chemistry, but spent some time in the analytical laboratory of Yale college before fully taking up the duties of his chair. Since 1849 he has been engaged in teaching natural science in Mercer university, having been made full professor in 1848. During the civil war he was employed by the Confederate government to superintend the laboratory at Atlanta, in which all kinds of ammunition were manufactured, and in recent years he has served on the U. S. commission to investigate the habits, nature, and ravages of the cotton caterpillar. Prof. Willet has delivered a course of lectures on "Science and Religion," besides lecturing before agricultural societies. He is the author of a prize-book, "The Wonders of Insect Life" (1869).

WILLETT, Thomas, merchant, b. in England in 1611; d. in Barrington, R. I., 4 Aug., 1674. He came with Isaac Allerton from Leyden in 1630, and became a trader and sea-captain of Plymouth colony, but lived much of the time in New Amsterdam, and in 1650 acted as a commissioner on behalf of the New Netherlands to settle boundary disputes with New England. In 1651 he became a magistrate of Plymouth colony. He was the first to inform Peter Stuyvesant of the coming of a hostile English fleet in 1664. After the surrender he accompanied the officers that went to take possession of Albany as a mediator with the Indians, and on 12 June, 1665, was appointed by Gov. Richard Nicolls the first mayor of New York. On 23 Aug. he was nominated one of the commissioners of admiralty. He was a councillor under Gov. Richard Lovelace. When the Dutch retook the colony in 1673, his property in New York was confiscated, and he retired to New England.—His son, Thomas, soldier, b. in Plymouth, Mass., 1 Oct., 1646, was major commanding the militia of Queens county, and summoned them to meet the French under the Marquis Denonville in 1687. He was a councillor under Sir Edmund Andros, and was continued in the office under Gov. Henry Sloughter.—The first Thomas's great-grandson, Marinus, soldier, b. in Jamaica, L. I., 31 July, 1740; d. in New York city, 22 Aug., 1830, served with distinction as a lieutenant in Gen. James Abercrombie's expedition against Fort Ticonderoga in 1758, and participated in the capture of Fort Frontenac. He was one of the leaders of the Sons of Liberty in New York city, and on 6 June, 1775, prevented the sending of arms from the arsenal to the British troops in Boston harbor. He joined Gen. Richard Montgomery's force, was commissioned as captain, took part in the expedition against Canada, and remained in command of the post at St. John's after its capture. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 3d New York regiment, and was engaged in skirmishes near New York city in the spring of 1776. In August, 1777, he was second in command at Fort Stanwix, whence he led a sally against the main force of Col. Barry St. Leger, and thus gave the victory to the militia at Oriskany. He joined Gen. Washington's army in New Jersey in June, 1778, and in 1779 accompanied Gen. John Sullivan in his expedition against the Six Nations. From 1780 till the end of the war he commanded the forces in the Mohawk valley, encountering the irregulars of Sir John Johnson at Johnstown in the summer of 1781, and in February, 1783, conducting the last hostile movement against the British, which was an attempt to surprise the garrison at Oswego. He was elected to the state assembly after the peace, but vacated his seat in February, 1784, on being appointed sheriff of New York, which office he held till 1792. In the latter year he was offered the command and rank of a brigadier-general in the expedition against the western Indians, but declined. He was sent by President Washington in 1794 to the south on a mission to the Creek Indians, and brought Alexander McGillivray and his principal chiefs and warriors to New York, where they signed a treaty of peace. When De Witt Clinton was removed from the office of mayor of New York, in 1807, Willett was appointed in his place. In 1810 the section of the Republicans that became the Tammany party nominated him for lieutenant-governor in opposition to Clinton. On 24 June, 1812, he was secretary of a mass-meeting in favor of military preparations against the British. See "A Narrative of the Military Actions of Col. Marinus Willett," prepared chiefly from his manuscript journals by his son, William M. Willett (New York, 1831).—Marinus's son, William Marinus, author, b. in New York city, 3 Jan., 1803, entered the New York conference of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1823, and preached in eastern New York and Connecticut, and afterward in the limits of the Genesee conference, to which he was transferred in 1826 till 1833. In 1838 he became instructor in Hebrew at Wesleyan university, and in 1841-'2 was professor of Hebrew and biblical literature, and also edited the last numbers of the college magazine that was called the "Classic." In 1843 he founded the Biblical institute at Newbury, Vt., of which he was president till 1848. His life has since been spent in literary labor. He edited the "Newbury Biblical Magazine" in 1843-'4, and in 1882 the "New Bible Magazine," which was continued only through one volume. His works include "Scenes in the Wilderness: Authentic Narrative of the Labors and Sufferings of the Moravian Missionaries among the North American Indians" (New York, 1842); "A New Life of Summerfield" (Philadelphia, 1857); "The Life and Times of Herod the Great, as connected, Historically and Prophetically, with the Coming Christ" (Philadelphia, 1860); "Herod Antipas, with Passages from the Life of Jesus," a sequel to the last-named (New York, 1866); "The Messiah" (Boston, 1874); and "The Restitution of All Things" (New York, 1880).

WILLETTTS, Jacob, educator, b. in Fishkill, N. Y., in 1785; d. near Mechanic, Dutchess co., N. Y., 12 Sept., 1860. He was educated at the Friends' boarding-school near Mechanic, and on his eighteenth birthday became head teacher there. About 1813 he settled on the island of Nantucket, where with his wife he conducted a flourishing school for many years; but in 1824 they returned to Dutchess county and established a school near Mechanic, which they continued until 1852. He was an accomplished mathematician, and published text-books of geography, arithmetic, and book-keeping, which were much used throughout the country.—His wife, Deborah, b. in Marshfield, Mass., in 1789; d. near Mechanic, Dutchess co., N. Y., in 1880, was educated in the same school with Mr. Willetts, and married him in 1812. Her maiden name was Rogers, and she was a lineal descendant of the martyr of Smithfield. She was a skilful grammarian, and was often consulted on difficult questions by Gould Brown, who in the preface of his celebrated grammar acknowledged his indebtedness to her.

WILLEY, Austin, reformer, b. in Campton, N. H., 24 June, 1806. He was educated at Pembroke academy, studied at Bangor theological seminary, where he was graduated in 1837, and in 1839 became editor of the "Advocate of Freedom," an anti-slavery paper that had been established in the preceding year at Brunswick, Me., which he conducted until the abolition of slavery. He was also an early advocate of prohibition, and contributed to the adoption of the Maine law. He has published in book-form a "Family Memorial" (San Francisco, 1865), and "History of the Anti-Slavery Cause in State and Nation" (Portland, 1886).

WILLEY, Benjamin Glazier, author, b. in Conway, N. H., 1 Feb., 1796; d. in East Sumner, Me., 17 April, 1867. He was graduated at Bowdoin in 1822, studied theology with Rev. Asa Cummings, was ordained as colleague pastor, at Conway in 1824, and preached there for seven years, and subsequently at Milton and Farmington, N. H., and East Sumner, Me. His father, Samuel, was one of the first settlers of Conway, and his brother, who was also named Samuel, perished with all his family in the avalanche of 28 Aug., 1826. An account of this catastrophe is given in Mr. Willey's "Incidents in White Mountain History" (Boston, 1856), which was enlarged and republished under the title of "History of the White Mountains, together with many interesting Anecdotes, illustrating Life in the Backwoods" (New York, 1870).

WILLEY, Calvin, senator, b. in East Haddam, Conn., 15 Sept., 1776; d. in Stafford, Conn., 23 Aug., 1858. He studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1798, and began practice at Salford. He served in the state house of representatives for nine successive years and in the state senate for two years, was postmaster at Stafford Springs in 1806-'8, and afterward at Tolland till 1816, and for seven years filled the office of probate judge for the Stafford district. He was a presidential elector in 1824, voting for John Quincy Adams, and was elected a U. S. senator, serving from 9 Dec., 1825, till 3 March, 1831. At the end of his term he resumed practice at Stafford.

WILLEY, Henry, botanist, b. in Geneseo, N. Y., 19 July, 1824. He was educated at the normal school in Bridgewater, Mass., and afterward taught a farm-school for boys in Geneseo. Subsequently he studied law, and was admitted to the bar of the supreme court of New York in August, 1848. For several years he practised his profession, first in Geneseo, and then in Spencerport, N. Y. In 1858 he went to Massachusetts, and after teaching for several years settled in New Bedford as editor of the "Daily Evening Standard," which occupation he still continues. During this time he became interested in the study of lichens, of which he has made a collection, both of exotic and native species. His publications on lichology have been quite extensive, and, besides various reports to the national surveys of specimens submitted to him for examination, include "A List of North American Lichens" (New Bedford, 1872) and "An Introduction to the Study of Lichens" (1887). He is also the author of a "Willey Genealogy" (1888).

WILLEY, Waitman Thomas, senator, b. in Monongalia county, Va. (now W. Va.), 18 Oct., 1811. He was graduated at Madison college, Uniontown, Pa., in 1831, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1833. He was clerk of the county and circuit courts successively from 1841 till 1855, and a member in 1850-'1 of the Virginia constitutional convention. Mr. Willey was a delegate to the State convention that met at Richmond in February, 1861, and after the adoption of the ordinance of secession was elected by the Unionist legislature at Wheeling to occupy the seat in the U. S. senate that was vacated by James M. Mason, taking his seat on 13 July, 1861. He attended the convention that decided to create a new state, was chosen to represent West Virginia in the senate, and took his seat on 3 Dec., 1863. In the following year he was re-elected for the full term that ended on 3 March, 1871, and served as chairman of the committees on patents and on claims. In 1866 he was a delegate to the Loyalists' convention at Philadelphia, and in 1871 he was a member of the Constitutional convention of West Virginia. He has written for reviews and delivered lectures on various subjects, including a series on "Methodism" in 1853. Allegheny college gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1863.

WILLIAMS, Abram Pease, senator, b. near Portland, Me., 3 Feb., 1832. He attended academies in North Anson and Farmington, Me., removed to California in 1858, and, after engaging in mining, became a merchant at Mono Lake, but the Indians destroyed his property, and in 1861 he went to San Francisco, where he has since engaged in commerce. He has also devoted some time to agriculture and sheep-raising. Mr. Williams was the founder of the San Francisco board of trade, and for two years its president, and was first vice-president of the chamber of commerce of that city. In 1884-'8 he was chairman of the Republican state central committee. On 4 Aug., 1886, he was elected U. S. senator to fill the unexpired term of John F. Miller, deceased, succeeding George Hearst, who had been appointed by the governor. Mr. Williams served till 3 March, 1887, and was in turn succeeded by Mr. Hearst.

WILLIAMS, Alpheus Starkey, soldier, b. in Saybrook, Conn., 10 Sept., 1810; d. in Washington, D. C., 21 Dec., 1878. He was graduated at Yale in 1831, studied law there, and afterward spent some time in European travel, a part of his tour being in company with Edwin Forrest and Nathaniel P. Willis. In 1836 he began the practice of law in Detroit, Mich. In 1838 he was captain of a local militia company. In 1840 he was appointed judge of probate of Wayne county, and he held that post until 1844, when he was elected recorder of the city of Detroit. At the opening of the war with Mexico he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the 1st Michigan volunteer infantry, and served with credit until the close of hostilities, when he returned to Detroit and resumed the practice of law. In 1861, when the civil war began, he was one of the first to offer his services in support of the government, and as he had always been an active member of the Democratic party, his example had great influence. On 17 May, 1861, he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers. He at once entered upon his duties in the Army of the Potomac, and in the spring of 1862 was made commander of a division in the corps of Gen. Nathaniel P. Banks in the Shenandoah valley. During the retreat of the corps in May, 1862, he did himself great credit by his skill and courage. While still a brigadier-general he commanded, with ability and success, an army corps in the battles of South Mountain, Antietam, and Gettysburg. In the autumn of 1863 he was sent with his corps to Tennessee, and in the following spring, as division commander, he entered upon the Atlanta campaign. He took an active part in all the battles of that summer. At the head of the 20th corps he marched with Sherman to the sea, and at Savannah he was promoted to be brevet major-general of volunteers to rank from 12 Jan., 1865, being 39th on the list of such brevet appointments, though far in advance of them all in date of previous commission and in actual service. Perhaps his was the only instance during the civil war where an officer of his grade was placed in command of a corps, except in a momentary emergency. Notwithstanding this neglect to recognize his merits, Gen. Williams gave his best energies to his work. He shared in the campaign in the Carolinas and in the grand review at Washington, and was retained in service during the reconstruction era in Kentucky and Arkansas, until July, 1866, when he was honorably mustered out. He was soon afterward appointed U. S. minister to San Salvador, where he spent three years in diplomatic duties. He returned in 1870 to his old home, and was in that year an unsuccessful candidate for governor of Michigan. In 1874, and again in 1876, he was elected a representative in congress. He had established a reputation as an honest and independent legislator, when his career was cut short by death. During his second term in congress he was chairman of the committee on the District of Columbia, and did much to beautify the capital city.

WILLIAMS, Arthur Trefusis Heneage, Canadian soldier, b. at Penryn Park, Port Hope, Ont., 13 June, 1837; d. on Saskatchewan river, Northwest territory, 4 July, 1885. His father had been a commander in the British navy, and, subsequently removing to Canada, was a member of the Canada assembly from 1840 till 1848. The son was educated at Upper Canada college and Edinburgh university, and afterward spent several years in travel through Great Britain, Ireland, and the European continent. From 1867 till 1871 he represented East Durham as a Conservative in the Ontario legislature, and from 1878 till his death he sat for the same constituency in the Dominion parliament. He was appointed a lieutenant-colonel of militia in 1866, in 1880 commanded the Canadian rifle-team at Wimbledon, and in 1885 led the Midland battalion in suppressing the Northwest insurrection. He was present with his command at the battle of Batoche, and afterward went with Gen. Sir Frederick Middleton to Prince Albert, and thence to Battleford and Fort Pitt. From the last-named place he was sent in pursuit of Big Bear, an Indian chief who had joined Louis Riel, and while engaged in this service he contracted a cold which resulted in his death soon afterward.

WILLIAMS, Barney (the stage name of BERNARD FLAHERTY), actor, b. in Cork, Ireland, in 1823; d. in New York city, 25 April, 1876. He came to this country as a boy, and in 1836 was connected with the old Franklin theatre, New York. In 1845 he was the manager of the Vauxhall garden, in the Bowery, and after his marriage in 1850 he played, with his wife, in Irish comedy. After a successful visit to San Francisco in 1854 they went abroad in 1855, but returned to the United States in 1859, and filled a long engagement at Niblo's garden. In 1867 Williams became manager of Wallack's old Broadway theatre, and subsequently he played with success in this country, Great Britain, and Canada. Mr. Williams attained a wide reputation as an Irish comedian. Among his last plays were "The Emerald Ring," "The Connie Soogah," and "The Fairy Circle."—His wife, Maria Pray, b. in New York city in 1828, became a ballet-girl at fifteen years of age, performing at the Chatham theatre, and shortly afterward married Charles Mestayer. After his death she married Mr. Williams in 1850, and thereafter generally appeared with him, playing star engagements. She is a sister of Mrs. William J. Florence.

WILLIAMS, Benjamin, governor of North Carolina, b. in North Carolina in 1754; d. in Moore county, N. C., in 1814. He entered the Revolutionary army as a captain, and did good service at Guilford, for which he was promoted colonel. Col. Williams served many years in the legislature, sat in congress in 1793-'5, and was governor of his state in 1799-1802, and again in 1807-'8. In 1808-'9 he was a member of the state senate.

WILLIAMS, Catherine R. (ARNOLD), author, b. in Providence, R. I., about 1787; d. there, 11 Oct., 1872. She was a granddaughter of Oliver Arnold, attorney-general of the state of Rhode Island, and daughter of Capt. Alfred Arnold, and in 1818 married Mr. Williams; but the match was unfortunate, and, after a separation from her husband, she supported herself by literary work. She was the author of "Original Poems" (Providence, 1828); "Religion at Home" (1829); "Tales, National and Revolutionary" (2d series, 1830 and 1835); "Aristocracy" (1832); "Fall River, an Authentic Narrative" (1833); "Biography of Revolutionary Heroes" (1839); "Neutral French, or the Exiles of Nova Scotia" (1841); "Annals of the Aristocracy of Rhode Island" (2 vols., 1843-'5). See "Bibliographical Memoirs of Three Rhode Island Authors," by Sidney S. Rider (Providence, 1880).

WILLIAMS, Channing Moore, P. E. missionary bishop, b. in Richmond, Va., 18 July, 1829. He was graduated at the College of William and Mary in 1853 and at the theological seminary at Alexandria, Va., in 1855, ordered deacon in St. Paul's church, Alexandria, 1 July, 1855, and sailed for China as a missionary under Bishop Boone in November of that year. He was ordained priest in the mission chapel, Shanghai, China, by Bishop Boone, 11 Jan., 1857, and shortly afterward, by direction of the foreign committee, he was transferred to Japan. He was consecrated missionary bishop of China, with jurisdiction in Japan, in St. John's chapel, New York, 3 Oct., 1866. He received the degree of S. T. D. from Columbia in 1867. The convention of 1874 relieved him of the China mission, and changed his title to bishop of Yedo.

WILLIAMS, Charles Langdon, lawyer, b. in Rutland, Vt., in 1821; d. there, 10 Feb., 1861. He was graduated at Williams in 1839, admitted to the bar in 1842, and practised in Brandon, Vt., in 1844-'8, and afterward in Rutland. He published "Statistics of the Rutland County Bar," with biographical sketches (Brandon, Vt., 1847); "Statutes of Vermont" (Burlington, 1851); and vols. xxvii.-xxix. of "Vermont Supreme Court Reports" (Rutland, 1856-'8).

WILLIAMS, David, patriot, b. in Tarrytown, N. Y., 21 Oct., 1754; d. near Livingstonville, N. Y., 2 Aug., 1831. He enlisted in the Revolutionary army in 1775, served under Gen. Richard Montgomery at St. John's and Quebec, and continued in the army till 1779. During his service his feet were badly frozen, and this partially disabled him for life. With John Paulding and Isaac Van Wart, he was one of the captors of Maj. John André on 23 Sept., 1780. (See PAULDING, JOHN.) Many of the details of the capture are related in Williams's deposition that he made on the following day. Some time after the war he bought a farm near the Catskill mountains, that had been the property of Daniel Shays, leader of Shays's rebellion. Williams was very generous, and indorsed freely for his friends. The farm became heavily mortgaged, yet he succeeded in retaining it, and received also a pension of $200 a year from the government. The estate is now in the possession of his grandson, William C. Williams. Williams was given a silver medal by order of congress, and also received in New York city a cane that was made from the cheval-de-frise for obstructing the Hudson at West Point. In December, 1830, he visited New York by invitation of the mayor, who gave him a horse, harness, and carriage, and the pupils of one of the city schools presented him with a silver cup. A monument has been erected to his memory, by the state, at the stone fort near Schoharie court-house. The purity of the motives of André's captors has been called in question by some historians, but it has been vindicated by Horatio Seymour and Henry J. Raymond in addresses at Tarrytown in 1853, by Samuel J. Tilden and Chauncey M. Depew at the same place in 1880, and by Grenville Tremaine and Daniel Knower at Schoharie in 1876.

WILLIAMS, David Rogerson, soldier, b. in Robbins Neck, S. C., 10 March, 1776; d. in Lynch's creek, S. C., 15 Nov., 1830. He was graduated at Brown in 1797, studied law, and was admitted to the bar. In addition to his practice he conducted a large plantation. He served in congress in 1805-'9, and was again chosen in 1810 as Democrat, serving till 1813. In the latter year, on 9 July, he was appointed a brigadier-general in the regular army, but after seeing some service he resigned on 6 April, 1814, and in 1814-'16 was governor of the state. He was killed by accident at a new bridge over Lynch's creek.

WILLIAMS, Edward, English author, lived in the 17th century. He published "Virgo Triumphans, or Virginia richly and truly Valued" (London, 1650; 2d ed., "With Addition of the Discovery of Silkworms, etc.," 1650). The book is said by some authorities to be in substance the work of John Farrer, of Geding.

WILLIAMS, Edward P., naval officer, b. in Castine, Me., 26 Feb., 1833; d. in Yeddo bay, near Yokohama, Japan, 24 Jan., 1870. He was graduated at the U. S. naval academy, 10 June, 1853, and was commissioned a lieutenant, 16 Sept., 1855. During the first year of the civil war he served in the steamer "Paul Jones" on the South Atlantic blockade, and subsequently he was executive of the steamer "Powhatan." He was promoted to lieutenant-commander, 16 July, 1862. Williams was one of the volunteers that were called for by Admiral Dahlgren to storm Fort Sumter, and on the night of 8 Sept., 1863, commanded the first division of boats with sailors and marines in that attack. He was captured and sent as prisoner to Columbia, S. C., where he remained for one year until exchanged. He was promoted to commander, 25 July, 1866, served at the rendezvous at Boston, 1865-'6, and on ordnance duty at Boston and New York, 1866-'8. On 9 Feb., 1869, he took command of the steamer "Oneida" on the Asiatic station. He sailed from Yokohama at 4.30 P. M., 24 Jan., 1870, and at 6.30 P. M. his vessel was run down by the English mail-steamer "Bombay" and sank in fifteen minutes. The "Bombay" was not injured, and, after backing out to clear her sharp stem from the "Oneida," she steamed away without waiting to give assistance or heeding signals of distress. Twenty-two officers and 115 men were lost, 2 officers and 37 men were saved. Capt. Williams stood on the bridge and refused to leave his ship when he was urged to do so by those in the boat. The secretary of the navy said in his official report to congress that, after a thorough investigation of the collision, he concluded that the disaster was due to the recklessness and bad navigation of the English steamer. Another theory was that the captain of the "Bombay" mistook the "Oneida" for a rival merchant steamer of the American Pacific mail line, and ran into her purposely.

WILLIAMS, Edwin, author, b. in Norwich, Conn., 7 March, 1797; d. in New York city, 21 Oct., 1854. His father, Joseph, was extensively engaged as a shipping and importing merchant, and was a general of Connecticut militia. The son removed to New York, was for many years secretary of the American institute, and actively connected with the historical, geographical, and statistical societies. He contributed constantly to periodicals, published "The New York Annual Register" in 1830-'45, and was the author of "The Politician's Manual" (New York, 1832-'4); "New Universal Gazetteer" (1833); "Book of the Constitution" (1833); "New York as it Is" (1833); "Arctic Voyages" (1835); "The Fashionable Puzzler" (1835); "The Statesman's Manual" (1838, many editions: continued after his death by Benson J. Lossing); "Truths in Relation to the Erie Railroad" (1842); "Political History of Ireland" (1843); "Wheat Trade of the United States and Europe" (1846); "Presidents of the United States" (1849); and "The Twelve Stars of the Republic" (1850). With C. Edwards Lester he issued "The Napoleon Dynasty, or History of the Bonaparte Family" (1852).

WILLIAMS, Elisha, lawyer, b. in Pomfret, Conn., 29 Aug., 1773; d. in New York city, 29 June, 1833. He studied law with Judge Tapping Reeve in Litchfield, Conn., and with Chief-Justice Spencer, of Hudson, N. Y., was admitted to the bar in June, 1793, and began practice at Spencertown, N. Y., but removed to Hudson in 1800. In 1815 he founded the town of Waterloo, N. Y., which he named immediately after the battle of Waterloo, and in 1830, leaving the bar on account of feeble health, he removed there with his family. The expense of building the court-house in that town was borne chiefly by him. He exerted great political influence in Columbia county, N. Y., in the Federal party, was frequently elected to the assembly, and was an active member of the New York constitutional convention of 1821. Mr. Williams won a reputation which, during his lifetime, placed him at the head of American orators and high among the nisi prius lawyers of the country. His power over a jury was astonishing, and his delivery was remarkable for force and elegance.

In this respect he ranked, in his day, as the equal, if not the superior of Rufus Choate. In appearance Mr. Williams's form was erect, his shoulders were square, and he was more than six feet in height. His eyes were dark and sparkling and his forehead high and straight. His manners were courteous and bland.

WILLIAMS, Elkanah, physician, b. in Lawrence county, Ind., 19 Dec., 1822; d. in Hazlewood, Pa., 5 Oct., 1888. His father, Isaac Williams, was a captain in the war of 1812 and one of the earliest settlers of Indiana. The son was educated at Bedford seminary, the State university at Bloomington, and at Asbury university, where he was graduated in 1847. He took his medical degree at the University of Louisville in 1850, practised in Indiana, and in 1852-'3 spent eighteen months in the study of ophthalmology in Paris, London, Prague, Vienna, and Berlin. He returned to Cincinnati in 1855 and began practice as a specialist in diseases of the eye and ear, being the first regular physician in the United States to confine his practice strictly to those branches. Soon afterward he became associated as a clinical lecturer in Miami medical college, and in 1860 he was given the chair of ophthalmology, the first of the kind in the United States, and held it for many years. He was ophthalmic surgeon to the Commercial hospital in Cincinnati in 1862-'72, and early in the civil war was appointed assistant surgeon to the U. S. marine hospital, which post he held till the close of the war. He attended the international ophthalmic congress at Paris in 1862, where he read a paper on "Plusieurs questions de thérapeutique," and in 1872 attended a similar meeting at London. In 1876 he was elected president of the ophthalmic congress in New York. Dr. Williams was also elected president of the Ohio state medical society in 1875.

WILLIAMS, Ephraim, soldier, b. in Newton, Mass., 24 Feb., 1715; d. near Lake George, N. Y., 8 Sept., 1755. In early years he was a sailor, and made several voyages to Europe; but he afterward joined the army and served in Canada in the war of 1740-'8 against the French, attaining the rank of captain. In 1750 the government of Massachusetts granted him 200 acres of land in the present townships of Adams and Williamstown, upon which, in the following year, he erected Fort Massachusetts, and was appointed commander of the whole line of frontier posts west of Connecticut river. In 1755, on the renewal of the war between France and England, he led a regiment of Massachusetts troops to join Sir William Johnson, who was on his way to invade Canada. At Albany, under a presentiment of early death, he made a will leaving the bulk of his landed and other property to found a free school at Williamstown. On 8 Sept., 1755, at the head of 1,200 men, while making a reconnoissance of Baron Dieskau's advancing force, he fell into an ambuscade of the enemy near the head of Lake George, and, at the first volley, was shot through the head.

The funds that he left were allowed to accumulate for thirty years, when a free school was incorporated. The institution was afterward converted into a college, the first commencement of which was held on 2 Sept., 1795, when seventy-seven students were present, four of whom graduated. Col. Williams never married. In 1854 the alumni of Williams erected a monument (consisting of a huge boulder) to him near Lake George, on the spot where he fell. See illustration on preceding page.—Ephraim's brother, Thomas, physician, b. in Newton, Mass., 1 April, 1718; d. in Deerfield, Mass., 28 Sept., 1775, studied medicine in Boston, and settled in Deerfield, Mass., in 1739. In 1743 he was appointed surgeon in the army in the projected expedition into Canada, which failed to set out. He was afterward surgeon of the chain of forts that extended from Fort Drummer, Vt., to Fort Massachusetts at Hoosac or Adams, suffering much hardship and danger in visiting these posts, which were exposed to the onslaughts of the Indians. He was a surgeon in the army under Sir William Johnson at Lake George in 1755, and present at the skirmish on 8 Sept. of that year in which his brother, Col. Ephraim, was killed. Dr. Williams became lieutenant-colonel in 1756, serving on Lake George. His letters during that campaign are interesting and faithful histories of its events, and furnish many medical and military facts. When he resumed practice he was the only surgeon in his neighborhood, and was frequently called to Vermont and New Hampshire. He was a justice of the peace, judge of the court of common pleas and of probate, town-clerk for many years, and held many minor civil offices. He educated several students in the profession of medicine, and left a large and valuable library.

WILLIAMS, George Henry, jurist, b. in New Lebanon, Columbia co., N. Y., 23 March, 1823. He was educated at an academy in Onondaga county, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1844, and, removing to Iowa, began practice there. He was elected judge of the first judicial district of that state, serving from 1847 till 1852, and was a presidential elector in 1852. In 1853-'7 he was chief justice of Oregon territory, and he was reappointed to that office by President Buchanan, but declined. He was a member of the convention that framed the constitution of Oregon in 1858, and, having been elected U. S. senator from the state as a Union Republican, served from 4 Dec., 1865, till 3 March, 1871. He was a member of the joint high commission that in 1871 arranged the treaty of Washington for the adjustment of differences between Great Britain and the United States growing out of the Alabama claims, and was appointed by President Grant attorney-general of the United States, serving from 10 Jan., 1872, till 15 May, 1875. On 1 Dec., 1873, he was nominated by President Grant chief justice of the U. S. supreme court; but his nomination was not confirmed by the senate, and his name was withdrawn. He afterward practised law in Washington, D. C.

WILLIAMS, George Washington, author, b. in Bedford Springs, Pa., 16 Oct., 1849. He is a mulatto. He served in the civil war, was a lieutenant-colonel of artillery in the Republican army of Mexico in 1865-'7, and attended school at Newton Centre, Mass., until 1874. For a year he preached in Boston, but in 1875 he became a journalist. He was graduated at Cincinnati law college in 1877, spent two years in the office of Alphonso Taft, and in 1879-'81 was a member of the Ohio legislature. In 1880-'2 he was judge-advocate-general of the Grand army of the republic, and in 1885-'6 he was U. S. minister to Hayti. In 1888 he was a delegate to the world's conference of foreign missions at London, England, where his speech on "The Drink Traffic in the Congo" attracted much attention. He has edited "The Southwestern Review" at Cincinnati and "The Commoner" at Washington, and is the author of "History of the Negro Race in America from 1619 till 1880" (2 vols., New York, 1883); "History of the Negro Troops in the War of the Rebellion" (1887); and "History of the Reconstruction of the Insurgent States" (2 vols., 1889).

WILLIAMS, Henry Shaler, geologist, b. in Ithaca, N. Y., 6 March, 1847. He was graduated at the Sheffield scientific school of Yale in 1868, and received the degree of Ph. D. in 1871 from that university for advanced studies. Subsequently he became professor of palæontology in Cornell university, which chair he still holds, and he is also engaged in palæontological researches for the U. S. geological survey. Prof. Williams is a member of various scientific societies, and since 1882 has been a fellow of the American association for the advancement of science. His contributions to scientific literature include papers that have appeared in the "American Journal of Science," "The American Naturalist," the "Bulletins of the U. S. Geological Survey," and in the proceedings of the societies of which he is a member, and he is also the author of "Bones, Ligaments, and Muscles of the Domestic Cat" (New York, 1875).

WILLIAMS, Henry Willard, physician, b. in Boston, Mass., 11 Dec., 1821. He was educated in the schools of Boston and Salem, and from his seventeenth till his twenty-fourth year was engaged in mercantile business. He was graduated in medicine at Harvard in 1849, engaged in practice in Boston, Mass., and became distinguished as an oculist. He has been for twenty-five years ophthalmic surgeon to the Boston city hospital, was a lecturer in Harvard medical school in 1869-'71, and from that time has filled the chair of ophthalmology. Dr. Williams is connected with many medical societies, American and European, was for some years president of the American ophthalmological society, and at the International congress at London in 1872 was a vice-president. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Harvard in 1868. He published a "Practical Guide to the Study of the Diseases of the Eye" (Boston, 1862); "Recent Advances in Ophthalmic Science" (1866); "Optical Defects in School-Children" (1868); a Boylston prize essay; "Our Eyes and how to take Care of Them" (1871); and "The Diagnosis and Treatment of Diseases of the Eye" (1886).

WILLIAMS, James, soldier, b. in Hanover county, Va., in 1740; d. on King's Mountain, Gaston co., N. C., 8 Oct., 1780. He emigrated first to Granville county, N. C., and then to Little River, Laurens district, S. C., in 1773, and was a member of the Provincial congress of South Carolina in January, 1775. He was appointed a lieutenant-colonel of militia in 1776, commanded a detachment at the battle of Stono, 20 June, 1779, and defeated the British and Tories at Musgrove's Mills, 18 Aug., 1780. He led one of the attacking columns at the battle of King's Mountain, where he was killed.

WILLIAMS, James Douglas, governor of Indiana, b. in Pickaway county, Ohio, 16 Jan., 1808; d. in Indianapolis, Ind., 20 Nov., 1880. His parents were emigrants from Europe, and moved with him to Knox county, Ind., in 1818, and at the death of his father in 1828 the support of the family devolved on him. James was almost entirely self-taught. In 1843 he became a member of the legislature, and from that time till 1874 sat almost continuously in this body, either in the house of representatives or in the senate. He was a delegate to the National Democratic convention at Baltimore in 1872, was the Democratic nominee for U. S. senator from Indiana in 1873 against Oliver P. Morton, who was elected, and was then chosen to congress, serving from 6 Dec., 1875, till 1 Dec., 1876, when he resigned, having been elected governor of his state. He held this office till his death. Gov. Williams was a farmer, and his foremost object was the development of the agricultural interests of his state. He was one of the incorporators and president of the state board of agriculture, originated many of the laws that have perfected school and college facilities in Indiana, and was instrumental in establishing as law the right of widows in that state to hold their deceased husband's estates, when not in excess of $300, without administration. He was a man of the strictest integrity, plain and simple in his manner and attire, and was known as Blue-Jeans Williams, owing to his wearing trousers of that material.

WILLIAMS, James William, Canadian Anglican bishop, b. in Overton, Hampshire, England, 15 Sept., 1825. His father, Rev. David Williams, was for many years rector of Banghurst, Hampersetshire, and for two years occupied the post of assistant master in Leamington college. In 1857 he accepted an invitation to organize a school in connection with Bishop's college, Lennoxville, province of Quebec. He went to Canada, became rector of the school, and shortly afterward succeeded to the chair of classics and belles-lettres in the college, which post he continued to hold until his elevation to the episcopate. Under his direction both school and college took a high place. In 1863 Bishop Mountain, of Quebec, died, and the synod promptly selected Mr. Williams to succeed him in the see. At that time the jurisdiction of the bishop was very extensive. In 1793 it had extended over the whole of Upper and Lower Canada. From time to time its limits have been curtailed, and it is now confined to that part of the province of Quebec which extends from Three Rivers to the Straits of Bellisle and New Brunswick, on the shores of the St. Lawrence and east of a line drawn from Three Rivers to Lake Memphremagog. The new bishop of the diocese was consecrated at Quebec on 11 June, 1863. Bishop Williams is a close student of literature. As a pulpit orator he occupies a high place. The charges that he delivered to the clergy of the diocese of Quebec at the visitation held in Bishop's college, Lennoxville, in 1864, and in June, 1888, in Quebec city, at the close of his twenty-fifth year as bishop, attracted attention. His lecture on "Self-Education" (Quebec, 1865) and several papers before the Literary and historical society of that city have also been much admired. Dr. Williams, during the twenty-five years of his episcopacy, confirmed 11,176 persons, ordained 47 deacons and 43 priests, and consecrated 37 churches.

WILLIAMS, Jared Warner, senator, b. in West Woodstock, Conn., 22 Dec., 1796; d. in Lancaster, N. H., 29 Sept., 1864. He was graduated at Brown in 1818, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and in 1822 began to practise at Lancaster. He was a member of the state house of representatives in 1830-'1 and 1835-'6, and a member of the state senate in 1832-'4. Mr. Williams was elected to congress from New Hampshire as a Democrat for two successive terms, and served from 4 Sept., 1837, till 3 March, 1841. He was governor of New Hampshire in 1847-'9, and was appointed a United States senator from that state in place of Charles G. Atherton, deceased, serving from 12 Dec., 1853, till 3 March, 1855.

WILLIAMS, Jesse Lynch, civil engineer, b. in Westfield, Stokes co., N. C., 6 May, 1807; d. in Fort Wayne, Ind., 9 Oct., 1886. His ancestors, English Quakers, came to Maryland about 1700. His parents, who adhered to the same faith, removed to Cincinnati in 1814, and subsequently to a place near Richmond, Ind. The son was first a rod-man and then an engineer on the preliminary survey for the Miami and Erie canal, and continued in the service of the state of Ohio from 1824 till 1832, when he was appointed by Indiana chief engineer of the Wabash and Erie canal. In 1837 he became chief engineer of all the internal improvements of the state, including about 1,300 miles of canals, railroads, and other works. In 1853 he became chief engineer of the Fort Wayne and Chicago railroad, and in 1856, after its consolidation with other roads to form the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne and Chicago road, he became a director. From 1864 till his resignation in 1869 he was appointed annually a government director of the Union Pacific railroad and devoted himself to securing the best location through the Rocky mountains. He was chief engineer and receiver of the Grand Rapids and Indiana railroad in 1869-'71, and was connected with other roads. Mr. Williams was active in the councils of the Presbyterian church, and served as a director of the Theological seminary of the northwest from its organization till his death. A discourse on his life by the Rev. David W. Moffat, D. D., was printed privately (Fort Wayne, Ind., 1886).

WILLIAMS, John, clergyman, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 10 Dec., 1644; d. in Deerfield, Mass., 12 June, 1729. His grandfather, Robert, came to this country about 1638, settling in Roxbury, Mass. John was graduated at Harvard in 1683, ordained to the ministry in 1688, and settled as pastor in Deerfield, which, being a frontier town, was constantly exposed to the attacks of the Indians. On the night of 28 Feb., 1704, 300 French and Indians under the command of Maj. Hertel de Rouville took advantage of the unfaithfulness of the guards, surprised the garrison, and took 300 citizens captive, besides killing several, including two of Mr. Williams's children and a negro woman-servant. They then compelled him, his wife, and all his remaining children, except one, who was absent from home, to begin on foot the march toward Canada, in which they were accompanied by their fellow-settlers. Mrs. Williams fell exhausted on the second day of their journey, and was at once despatched with a tomahawk. After travelling about 300 miles they reached their destination, and, although Mr. Williams suffered many cruelties from his captors, he was finally redeemed by Gov. Philippe de Rigaud Vaudreuil, and returned to Boston in 1706, leaving his daughter Eunice still in captivity. He resumed his charge in Deerfield in the latter part of 1706 and remained there until his death. He also gave much time to scientific researches and left many manuscripts on these subjects. He published several sermons and a narrative of his captivity called "The Redeemed Captive" (Boston, 1707). See a "Biographical Memoir of Rev. John Williams, with Appendix, containing the Journal of his Son, Rev. Stephen Williams, during his Captivity," by Stephen W. Williams (Greenfield, Mass., 1837). This is in a great part a reprint of "The Redeemed Captive."—His son, Eleazer, clergyman, b. in Deerfield, 1 July, 1688; d. in Mansfield, Conn., 21 Sept., 1742, was graduated at Harvard in 1708, and from 1710 until his death was pastor at Mansfield. He published several sermons.—Another son, Stephen, clergyman, b. in Deerfield, Mass., 14 May, 1693; d. in Long Meadow, Mass., 10 June, 1782, was taken captive by the Indians in his eleventh year, and, with the other Deerfield prisoners, marched on foot to Canada. After being detained for about fourteen months he was bought from the Indians by the governor of Canada, and in November, 1705, was returned to Boston. His minute account of this experience is incorporated in the "Memoir of John Williams" that has been mentioned. He was graduated at Harvard in 1713, ordained to the ministry in 1716, and was pastor at Long Meadow, Mass., for sixty-six years. In the course of his ministry he served as chaplain in three different campaigns against the French and Indians, accompanying Sir William Pepperrell to Cape Breton and Sir William Johnson to Lake George during the old French war. He aided in establishing the mission among the Stockbridge Indians in 1734, of which John Sergeant, of Yale, was subsequently in charge. Dartmouth gave him the degree of D. D. in 1773. He published a "Sermon on the Ordination of John Keep" (1772).—John's daughter, Eunice, b. in Deerfield, 17 Sept., 1696; d. in Canada in 1786, was carried captive to Canada when she was in her eighth year. When her father was redeemed she was left among the Indians and no money could subsequently procure her release. She forgot the English language, adopted the Roman Catholic religion, married an Indian named John de Rogers, and conformed to Indian views and habits. She visited her relatives several times, but always refused to adopt English dress or civilized customs. The legislature of Massachusetts offered her a tract of land if she and her family would settle in New England; but she refused, saying that it would endanger her soul.—Her putative great-grandson, Eleazer, missionary, b. in Caughnawaga, N. Y., probably in 1787; d. in Hoganstown, N. Y., 28 Aug., 1858, is supposed to have been a grandson of Ezekiel Williams, an English physician, and Eunice's daughter. Their son, Thomas, married an Indian woman named Mary Ann Konwatewenteta on 7 Jan., 1779. Eleazer was sent to school at Long Meadow about 1800, and remained there nine years. He then studied three years under the Rev. Enoch Hale in Westhampton, Mass.

At the beginning of the second war with Great Britain he became superintendent-general of the Northern Indian department. At the battle of Plattsburg, 14 Sept., 1814, he was severely wounded. He subsequently officiated as lay reader among the Oneida Indians and took orders in the Episcopal church. About 1820 this tribe

sold lands to the state of New York and removed to Green Bay, Wis., Mr. Williams accompanying them. In 1846 the Society for the propagation of the gospel among the Indians gave money for his support as a missionary, which was withheld at the end of two years, the reports of his service not being favorable. He left Wisconsin in 1850 and settled at St. Regis. In February, 1853, an article by the Rev. John H. Hanson, D. D., appeared in "Putnam's Magazine," entitled "Have we a Bourbon among us?" The author had seen a published paragraph to the effect that "Eleazer Williams was none other than Louis XVII., the son of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette, who was born at Versailles, 27 March, 1785, and supposed to have died in the Temple." Dr. Hanson sought an interview with Williams, who assured him that he was convinced of his royal descent. In an interview he told Dr. Hanson that until he was thirteen or fourteen years of age his mind was a blank; but by a fall he recovered his intellect, though not his memory. He then said that in 1841, on a steamboat, the Prince de Joinville urged him to sign a solemn "abdication of the throne of France," which he refused to do. Dr. Hanson issued a volume entitled "The Lost Prince" (New York, 1854), intending to prove the identity of Williams with Louis XVII. Hanson's arguments in favor of Williams's Bourbon descent are that his baptism was not registered and that his putative mother once admitted that he was an adopted son. Many physicians attested that Williams was not an Indian, and he had a remarkable resemblance to the Bourbon family. The belief was general that the Dauphin was removed from prison and brought to America. Skenondough, an Indian, had made oath that the youth was brought by two French gentlemen to Lake George. Other evidences are the money that was sent from an unknown source to educate him, the De Joinville interview, which Williams recorded in his diary, and the marks on his body, which the Dauphin also bore. On the other hand, many Indians denied Skenondough's story, and Bishop Charles F. Robertson, Williams's literary executor, refutes from Williams's own papers the statement that he was educated with funds that were supplied by unknown persons, he having original bills to the contrary. Prince de Joinville denied the alleged interview with Williams, in a letter addressed to John Jay, of New York. Williams became interested in genealogical research in 1822 and assisted in preparing a life of Eunice Williams, and it is probable that his taste for investigation of historical subjects, with the knowledge of the doubtfulness of his parentage, created in his mind a sincere adherence to his singular delusion. He was an authority on Indian history, manners, and customs, and was thoroughly familiar with the labors of the early French missionaries. In 1846 he became a corresponding member of the New England historic-genealogical society. He is the author of "A Spelling-Book in the Language of the Seven Iroquois Nations" (Plattsburg, 1813); "A Caution against Our Common Enemy," in the Iroquois language (Albany, 1813; English translation, 1815); and a "Life of Te-ho-ra-gwa-negen, alias Thomas Williams" (printed privately, 1859). He also translated into Iroquois "The Book of Common Prayer" (New York, 1853).—John's grandson, Samuel, clergyman, b. in Waltham, Mass., 23 April, 1743; d. in Rutland, Vt., 2 Jan., 1817, was graduated at Harvard in 1761, where his proficiency in mathematical studies induced Prof. John Winthrop to select him to go as his companion to Newfoundland to observe the transit of Venus on 6 June of that year. Mr. Williams taught at Bradford while studying theology, was licensed to preach in 1763, and was pastor of the church in Bradford in 1765-'80. He continued his school while occupying this charge, and gave lessons in natural philosophy to Benjamin Thompson, afterward Count Rumford, who was an inmate of his family, and with whom he maintained a scientific correspondence in later years. He was Hollis professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Harvard in 1780-'8, lectured on astronomy to the senior class in 1785-'8, and in the last-named year, by request of the American academy of arts and sciences, went to Penobscot bay to observe a total eclipse of the sun. In the same year he was appointed by the colonial government to survey the western boundary of Massachusetts. In 1788 he resigned his professorship, and he was pastor in Rutland, Vt., from 1789 till 1795. He subsequently preached in Burlington, Vt., for about two years, but his later life was passed in Rutland, where he edited the "Herald." He surveyed the western boundary of Vermont in 1805 by appointment of the governor, and delivered a course of lectures in the University of Vermont not long after its establishment. The University of Edinburgh gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1785, and Yale the same honor in 1786. He was a member of several scientific bodies, here and abroad. He left many valuable manuscripts on philosophical, scientific, and mathematical subjects, and published, besides pamphlets and addresses, "The Rural Magazine," a monthly devoted to historical and literary subjects, and a "History of Vermont," a work of great labor and research (Rutland, 1794; 2 vols., 1809).—Samuel's son, Charles Kilbourne, jurist, b. in Cambridge, Mass., 24 Jan., 1782; d. in Rutland, Vt., 9 March, 1853, was graduated at Williams in 1800, practised law in Rutland, Vt., and became an eminent member of the state bar. During the second war with Great Britain he served in one campaign on the northern frontier. He was frequently in the legislature from 1809 till 1821, and again in 1849, state's attorney in 1814-'15, a judge of the supreme court in 1822-'4 and in 1829-'42, collector of customs for the state of Vermont in 1825-'9, and chief justice of the supreme court of Vermont in 1842-'6, at the same time occupying, ex officio, the position of chancellor of the state. He was president of the officers of censors in 1847, and governor in 1850-'2. With his retirement from that office he closed a public life of forty years. Early in his career he took great interest in the organization of the militia, and rose to the rank of brigadier-general. He was an active member of the Abolition party, and while governor of Vermont he approved the once celebrated habeas corpus act which had passed the legislature and was the beginning of the struggle in Vermont against slavery. In 1845 he became a corresponding member of the New England historic-genealogical society. In 1834 he received the degree of LL. D. from Middlebury. See a "Memoir" of him by Chief-Justice Isaac Redfield (Rutland, Vt., 1852).—A great-grandson of John, Stephen West, physician, b. in Deerfield, Mass., 27 March, 1790; d. in Laona, Ill., 9 July, 1855, was the son of Dr. Thomas Williams, a well-known physician in western Massachusetts. Stephen was educated in his native town, studied medicine under his father and, after attending a course of lectures at Columbia, settled in practice in Deerfield, and attained to success in his profession. In 1816 he turned his attention to the study of natural history and botany. With Edward Hitchcock and Dennis Cooley he explored the forests and valleys of Deerfield in search of plants that were subsequently collected in an herbarium. He lectured on medical jurisprudence before the Berkshire medical school in 1823-'31, and in 1838 became professor of materia medica, pharmacy, and medical jurisprudence in Willoughby university, Cuyahoga co., Ohio, which chair he resigned in 1853. In 1838-'9 he lectured at Dartmouth medical college. Dr. Williams was a member of many historical societies, president of the Franklin county, Mass., medical society, and vice-president of the Massachusetts medical society. He delivered many lectures on scientific subjects, and published, besides many pamphlets, "Report of the Indigenous Medical Botany of Massachusetts" (Deerfield, 1819); "Traditionary and Historical Sketch of the Indians who formerly resided in the Valley of the Connecticut," in the "Scientific Tract" series (1819); "Catechism of Medical Jurisprudence" (Northampton, Mass., 1833); "Biographical Memoir of Rev. John Williams" (Springfield, Mass., 1837); "American Medical Biography" (1845); and "The Genealogy of the Williams Family in America" (1847). He edited James Bedingfield's "Compendium of Medicine" (Deerfield, Mass., 1818).—John's first cousin, William, clergyman, b. in Newton, Mass., 2 Feb., 1665; d. in Hatfield, Mass., 29 Aug., 1741, was graduated at Harvard in 1683. He was settled as pastor of the church at Hatfield in 1685, and labored there for fifty-five years. He published numerous sermons and theological treatises, and commanded a wide influence in his community.—William's son, Elisha, clergyman, b. in Hatfield, Mass., 24 Aug., 1694; d. in Wethersfield, Conn., 24 July, 1755, was graduated at Harvard in 1711, studied law, settled in Wethersfield, Conn., and for several years was clerk of the state general assembly and a member of that body. After the Collegiate school of Connecticut (now Yale) was removed from Saybrook to New Haven, some of the students refusing to obey the rules of government, Mr. Williams was chosen to instruct such as wished to withdraw, and taught them at Wethersfield for two years. He was ordained to the ministry in 1721, and served the church at Wethersfield till 1726, when he became president of Yale, holding office till 1739. He subsequently represented Wethersfield again in the legislature, and was chosen a justice of the superior court. In 1745 he went to Cape Breton as chaplain of the Connecticut troops, and the next year, when an expedition was planned to Canada and a regiment of 1,000 men was raised in Connecticut, he was appointed its colonel. The troops were not called out, and in 1749 he went to England to solicit the royal government to pay the wages of the enlisted men that had held themselves in readiness to march for more than a year and a half. His mission was unsuccessful, but on his return he was employed in several public offices. Dr. Philip Doddridge, who was his intimate friend, said of him: "He possessed an ardent sense of religion, solid learning, and consummate prudence. I look upon him as one of the most valuable men on earth."—Elisha's son, Samuel Porter, clergyman, b. in Wethersfield, Conn., in 1779; d. in Newburyport, Mass., 23 Dec., 1826, was graduated at Yale in 1796, was ordained to the ministry, and in charge of the church at Mansfield, Conn., in 1807-'17. From 1821 until his death he was pastor at Newburyport. He published many sermons and addresses, a volume of which, with a memoir, appeared after his death (New Haven, 1827).—Another son of William, Solomon, clergyman, b. in Hatfield, Mass., 4 June, 1700; d. in Lebanon, Conn., 29 Feb., 1776, was graduated at Harvard in 1719, ordained pastor of the church in Lebanon in 1722, and held that charge until his death. Yale gave him the degree of D. D. in 1773. Dr. Williams possessed wide influence among the clergy of New England. In the course of his ministry he engaged in two important controversies. One, in 1741, was with Rev. Andrew Crosswell, on the "Nature of Justifying Faith," and the other with his relative, Jonathan Edwards, the elder, in 1751, on "The Qualifications Necessary to Lawful Communion in the Christian Sacraments." He had an extensive correspondence abroad and in this country. He published nineteen sermons (1729-'75).—Solomon's son, Eliphalet, clergyman, b. in Lebanon, 21 Feb., 1727; d. in East Hartford, Conn., 29 June, 1803, was graduated at Yale in 1743, and held a pastorate in East Hartford from his ordination in 1748 until his death. Yale gave him the degree of D. D. in 1782. He was a member of its corporation from 1769 till 1801, and published several popular discourses.—Eliphalet's son, Eliphalet Scott, clergyman, b. in East Hartford, Conn., 7 Oct., 1757; d. in Beverly, Mass., 3 Feb., 1845, was graduated at Yale in 1775, the same year became adjutant of a Connecticut regiment, and fought at the battles of Trenton and Princeton. He then enlisted in the navy, and participated in the engagement between the "Hancock" and the "Levant," in which Capt. Edward Hardy was shot down by his side. He settled in Maine in 1790, taught and was a farmer, and in 1799 was ordained to the ministry of the Baptist church. He was pastor of the church in Beverly, Mass., in 1803-'12, and was then dismissed at his own request, becoming a minister at large, with his residence in Boston. He gave liberally for the erection of churches, and to missions.—Another son of Solomon, William, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. in Lebanon, Conn., 18 April, 1731; d. there, 2 Aug., 1811, was graduated at Harvard in 1747, resided with his father and studied theology for about a year, and in 1755 attended his relative, Col. Ephraim Williams, on the expedition to Lake George. He became town-clerk of Lebanon in 1756, holding that office for forty-five years, was a representative in the assembly for more than fifty years, for many years speaker, and for more than ninety sessions was not absent more than five times, except during his service in congress in 1776-'7. He became colonel of the 12th regiment of militia in 1773, but resigned his commission in 1776 to accept a seat in congress, signing the Declaration of Independence on 4 July of that year. During a greater part of the war he was a member of the council of safety, expended nearly all his property in the patriot cause, and, abandoning his business, which was that of a merchant, went from house to house soliciting private donations to supply the army, and making speeches to induce a larger enlistment. He became an assistant, or councillor, in 1780, held office for twenty-four years, was judge of the county court of Windham, and judge of probate for Windham district for forty years. Although prudent and economical in many cases, he frequently devoted all the emoluments of his offices to benevolent objects. Throughout the war his house was open to the soldiers in their marches to and from the army, and in 1781 he gave up his dwelling to the officers of a detachment that was stationed for the winter in Lebanon. He was a member of the Connecticut convention in 1787 that ratified the constitution of the United States, strongly advocating its adoption. He married Mary, second daughter of Gov. Jonathan Trumbull.

WILLIAMS, John, member of the Continental congress, b. in Hanover county, Va.; d. in Granville county, N. C., in October, 1799. He was brought up to the trade of a house-carpenter, but removed to North Carolina, where he was admitted to the bar. In 1770, while attending court at Hillsborough, he was seized by the Regulators and severely beaten. He was one of the first judges under the state constitution in 1777-'90, and sat in the Continental congress in 1777-'8.

WILLIAMS, John, author, b. in London, England, about 1765; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 12 Oct., 1818. He was educated at the Merchant Tailors' school and intended for the church, but adopted literature instead, and, after acting as a translator for London booksellers, went to Dublin, Ireland, where he was connected with various journals. His violent denunciations of the government caused his prosecution, and he was fined heavily and judicially declared in 1797 to be "a common libeller." Soon afterward he came to the United States, where he edited a Democratic newspaper. He died in great poverty. Mr. Williams wrote under the pen-name of "Anthony Pasquin." He was the author of several plays; "Poems" (London, 1789); "Legislative Biography" (1795); "The Hamiltoniad" (Boston, 1804); "Life of Alexander Hamilton" (1804); and "The Dramatic Censor" (1811).

WILLIAMS, John, P. E. bishop, b. in Deerfield, Mass., 30 Aug., 1817. He entered Harvard at the age of fourteen, and after remaining there two years joined the junior class at Washington

(now Trinity) college, where he was graduated in 1835. He studied theology with Dr. Samuel F. Jarvis, and was ordained by Bishop Thomas C. Brownell in 1838. From 1837 till 1840 he served as tutor in Washington college, and he then spent a year in travel in England and France. On his return he became assistant minister of Christ church, Middletown, Conn., from which he was called to the rectorship of St. George's church, Schenectady, N. Y. While rector in Schenectady his influence was great in his parish, among the students of Union college, and he was nearly elected provisional bishop of New York on the suspension of Bishop Benjamin T. Onderdonk. In 1848, when he was but thirty-one years old, he was chosen president of Trinity college, and the announcement of his election was received with great enthusiasm, while his inaugural address showed the scholarly principles on which he considered all true education to be based. In connection with the presidency Dr. Williams held the professorship of history and literature. In 1851 Dr. Brownell, bishop of Connecticut, having asked that, on account of his growing infirmities, an assistant bishop might be elected, the diocesan convention chose Dr. Williams, and he was consecrated on 29 Oct. He was able to continue in charge of the college for two years, but in 1853, as his episcopal duties became more numerous and urgent, he felt obliged to retire from the presidency. Under his administration the college had increased in prosperity, its course of instruction had been developed, and its library funds had been increased. Owing to Dr. Williams's profound learning in theology and his gifts as a teacher, several graduates and others studying for holy orders had been for a few years under his care, and an informal theological department had grown up at the college. In 1854 a charter was obtained for the Berkeley divinity-school, and it was located at Middletown. In this school Bishop Williams has been from the beginning the dean and the principal instructor in doctrinal theology, in the history of the Reformation, and in the Prayer-Book, and his lectures at different times have covered the whole range of theological studies.

in 1885. For many years before that time the whole administration of the diocese had been in Bishop Williams's hands. In 1881 he was appointed the first lecturer at the General theological seminary, New York, on the Bishop Paddock foundation, and in the same year he delivered the first series of Bedell lectures at the seminary and college in Gambier, Ohio. At the general conventions of 1883 and 1886 he was chosen chairman of the house of bishops, and he has constantly served on important committees of the bishops and joint commissions of the convention. In 1884 he visited Scotland for the centenary commemoration of the consecration of the first bishop of Connecticut, and delivered the commemorative sermon in Aberdeen. Bishop Williams is a churchman of the type that was once represented by Dean Hook and Bishops Wilberforce and Wordsworth. Since his ordination he has been a diligent student of ecclesiastical history. He is remarkable for his genial manners to young men, and in an eminent degree exerts a personal influence over his students. His manner in the pulpit is dignified and impressive, and he is one of the most eloquent speakers in the Protestant Episcopal church, of which he is now the presiding bishop. He received the degree of D. D. from Union in 1847, Trinity in 1849, Columbia in 1851, and Yale in 1883, and that of LL. D. from Hobart in 1870. His literary works include many and valuable contributions to the "American Church Quarterly Review," the "Churchman," and other periodicals, a charge on "Everlasting Punishment" (1865), with many occasional sermons and addresses; "Ancient Hymns of Holy Church" (Hartford, 1845); "Thoughts on the Gospel Miracles" (New York, 1848); Paddock lectures on "The English Reformation" (1881); Bedell lectures on "The World's Witness to Jesus Christ" (1882); historical sermons in the "Seabury Centenary" (1885); and "Studies in the Book of Acts" (1888). He also edited, with additional notes, an American edition of Bishop Harold Browne's "Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles" (1864).

WILLIAMS, John Ethurhuld, Canadian clergyman, b. in Carmarthen, Wales, 19 Dec., 1817. He removed to Canada in 1833, was ordained a minister of the Methodist church in 1850, elected president of the London conference in 1874, was joint representative to the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal church of the United States in 1876, and was president of the united general conference in 1883 for the unification of the various branches of the Methodist church in Canada. He was joint representative at the centennial conference of the Methodist churches of the United States in 1884, and in 1885 was appointed general superintendent of the Methodist church in Canada. Victoria university gave him the degree of D. D. in 1877.

WILLIAMS, John Foster, naval officer, b. in Boston, Mass., 12 Oct., 1743; d. there, 24 June, 1814. He early adopted the life of a sailor, and in the spring of 1779 commanded the Massachusetts cruiser "Hazard," of fourteen guns, with which in that year he captured the "Active," eighteen guns, and performed other gallant exploits. In 1780 he was given the "Protector," another Massachusetts ship, with which, on 9 July, 1780, he fought the letter-of-marque "Admiral Duff," which blew up after an action of an hour and a half. After taking many prizes he had a running fight with the frigate "Thames" and narrowly escaped capture. He commanded the "Hazard" again in the unfortunate expedition to Penobscot river, in which that vessel with others was lost. Late in October he set out for a cruise in the West Indies, where he took valuable prizes; but, falling in with two ships of superior force, he was captured and remained a prisoner till the peace. From 1790 until his death he was in command of a revenue-cutter.

WILLIAMS, John Joseph, R. C. archbishop, b. in Boston, Mass., 27 April, 1822. He studied in his native city, and in 1833-'41 at the College of Montreal, where he was graduated in the latter year. He then followed a course in theology in the Sulpitina seminary in Paris, France, where he was ordained in 1845. He was stationed at the Boston cathedral till 1855, when he was appointed its rector, and in 1857 he was transferred to the pastorate of St. James's church in the same city. On 9 Jan., 1866, he was chosen coadjutor to Bishop Fitzpatrick and titular bishop of Tripoli, but before his consecration, which took place on 11 March, 1866, he had succeeded to the bishopric of Boston by the death of his superior. The new sees of Springfield and Providence were created from his original diocese in 1870 and 1872, respectively, and on 12 Feb., 1875, a new ecclesiastic province was established, embracing these dioceses and those of Portland and Burlington. Boston became the archiepiscopal see, and Bishop Williams was made archbishop, receiving the pallium from the hands of Archbishop McCloskey. During his administration many educational institutions have been established, of which the most important is the Sulpitian theological seminary, which was opened in 1884. In 1886 his diocese contained 320,000 Roman Catholics, 300 priests, and 167 churches.

WILLIAMS, John Mason, jurist, b. in New Bedford, Mass., 24 June, 1780; d. there, 28 Dec., 1868. He was graduated at Brown in 1801, studied law, and, on his admission to the bar in 1803, rose rapidly in his profession. He became associate justice of the court of common pleas in 1821, and its chief justice in 1839-'44. In 1844-'56 he was commissioner of insolvency. Among Judge Williams's published addresses are "Remarks on Animal Magnetism" (New York, 1837), and orations on the lives of Samuel Howe (Worcester, Mass., 1828) and Peter O. Thacher (Boston, 1843). He was also author of a pamphlet entitled "Nullification and Compromise" (New York, 1863).

WILLIAMS, John S., lawyer, b. in Lockport, N. Y., 14 Dec., 1825. He received a liberal education, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised in his native place and in Lafayette, Ind., where he settled in 1853. He was elected mayor of that town in 1856 and 1858, and for some time edited the Lafayette "Daily American." He recruited the 63d Indiana volunteers in the autumn of 1861, was commissioned as its colonel, and was with his regiment at the second battle of Bull Run, and till July, 1863, when he was compelled through illness to resign. He resumed practice, and in 1866 was appointed by President Johnson collector of internal revenue for the 8th district of Indiana, holding the office till the accession of a new administration in 1869. Subsequently he became the publisher of the Lafayette "Sunday Times." In April, 1885, President Cleveland appointed him 3d auditor of the U. S. treasury department.—His brother, George Burchell, financier, b. in Lockport, N. Y., 5 Dec., 1841, received his education at Lockport Union academy. In 1858 he removed to Lafayette, Ind., where he became largely interested in mercantile and manufacturing pursuits. He became supervisor of internal revenue for the state of Indiana in November, 1868, and in July, 1870, deputy commissioner of internal revenue at Washington, D. C., but resigned at the end of November, 1871, having been appointed by the Japanese government, at the suggestion of his own government, which had been requested to recommend some person who was qualified to assist in the organization of a financial system, to be counsellor to the imperial authorities in all matters relating to finance, and particularly upon banking, internal revenue, export and import duties, and economic and monetary matters. In 1873 he visited the United States and Europe on a financial mission for the imperial government, returning to Japan in the summer of the following year. He was again appointed a commissioner to Europe and the United States in October, 1875, and resigned the office of financial counsellor in November, remaining in Europe till June, 1876, when he retired from the Japanese service. He has since resided at Washington, D. C.

WILLIAMS, John Stuart, senator, b. in Montgomery county, Ky., in 1820. He was graduated at Miami university, Oxford, Ohio, in 1838, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and engaged in practice at Paris, Ky. He served in the war with Mexico, first as a captain and afterward as colonel, and was in command of the 4th Kentucky volunteers at the taking of the city of Mexico. After his return he resumed practice, and, engaged in agriculture and the breeding of fine stock, took an active part as a Whig in politics, served as a delegate to national conventions and as a presidential elector, and was in the legislature of Kentucky in 1851-'2. Although he had opposed secession, he raised a brigade for the Confederate army, received a commission as brigadier-general in 1862, and was serving under Gen. Joseph E. Johnston when the surrender took place. Going back to his home, he urged the people to renew their allegiance to the National government. He served again in the legislature in 1873-'4, and was elected a U. S. senator from Kentucky as a Democrat, and served from 4 March, 1879, till 3 March, 1885. Since that time he has been engaged in farming, in improving lands in southern Florida, and in promoting railways in the mineral regions of Kentucky.

WILLIAMS, John Wilson Montgomery, clergyman, b. in Portsmouth, Va., 7 April, 1820. He was graduated at Columbian college, Washington, D. C., in 1845, and subsequently at Newton theological seminary. After preaching for several years in Virginia, chiefly at Lynchburg, he was called to the pastorate of the 1st Baptist church of Baltimore, Md., where he still remains. He has been president of the Maryland tract society since 1870, vice-president of the Southern Baptist convention, several times moderator of the Maryland Baptist union association, and trustee of Columbian college (now university) since 1851. In 1866 that institution conferred upon him the degree of D. D. Besides several sermons, he has published "Pastor and People, a Lecture" (Washington, 1867); "Reminiscences of a Pastorate of Thirty-three Years" (1884); "Training of our Members in the Distinctive Principles of our Denomination a Duty and a Necessity" (Philadelphia, 1855); and "How to enlarge the Congregation," a tract (1887).

WILLIAMS, Jonathan, soldier, b. in Boston, Mass., 26 May, 1750; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 16 May, 1815. His father, of the same name, was a patriot of the Revolution. The son received a good education, entered a counting-house in Boston, and then made several voyages to the West Indies and to England. He was in the latter country in 1770 and 1773, and was intrusted by his grand-uncle, Benjamin Franklin, with political despatches to this country. He was also Franklin's secretary during the latter's residence in France as U. S. ambassador, and for part of the time served as U. S. commercial agent. While in France he studied military science, especially fortification. After his return to this country in 1785 he was for several years a judge of the court of common pleas in Philadelphia, but on 6 Feb., 1801, he was appointed major of the 2d regiment of artillery and engineers in the regular army, and on 4 Dec. he was made inspector of fortifications, and took command of the post at West Point, with the duties of instruction in his branches. On the establishment of the present military academy in 1802 he became its superintendent, but on 20 June, 1803, he resigned his commission on a question of rank. On 19 April, 1805, he returned to the army, at President Jefferson's request, as lieutenant-colonel and chief engineer, resuming also the superintendence of the academy. He planned and built most of the inner forts in New York harbor, including Fort Columbus, Fort Clinton (now Castle Garden), and Castle Williams, which was named for him. At the beginning of the war of 1812 Col. Williams claimed the command of the last-named work, and on being refused it by the secretary of war, resigned, 31 July, 1812. He then returned to Philadelphia, and was for several years vice-president and corresponding secretary of the American philosophical society. He was elected to congress in 1814, but died without taking his seat. Col. Williams has been called "father of the corps of engineers."

His full-length portrait is in the library of the U. S. military academy, among those of other superintendents and professors. He was the author of a memoir on "The Use of the Thermometer in Navigation" (Philadelphia, 1799), and translated "Elements of Fortification" (1801) and Kosciusko's "Manœuvres for Horse Artillery" (1808), besides contributing to the "Transactions" of the American philosophical society.—His son, Alexander John, soldier, b. in Philadelphia in 1790; d. in Fort Erie, Upper Canada, 15 Aug., 1814, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1811, and assigned to the engineers, but was made captain of artillery, 17 March, 1813. He commanded Fort Mifflin, Pa., in 1812-'14, and then engaged in the campaign on the Niagara frontier. During the defence of Fort Erie, while he was repelling the fourth assault of the enemy in a hand-to-hand encounter, a lighted port-fire in front of the British enabled them to direct their volleys on his company. He sprang forward, cut it off with his sword, and fell mortally wounded by a musket-ball.

WILLIAMS, Mary Bushnell, author, b. in Baton Rouge, La., in 1826. Her father, Judge Charles Bushnell, was a native of Boston, Mass. She was educated by Prof. Alexander Dimitry, married Josiah P. Williams, a planter of Rapides parish, and resided near Alexandria, on Red river, till 1869, when she removed to Opelousas. Her husband died, and their residence, "The Oaks," was destroyed during the Red river expedition in 1864. For some time during the civil war she was a refugee in Texas. She has contributed to periodical literature, and her poetry has been much admired, notably the verses entitled "The Serfs of Châteney." She has in preparation a volume of "Tales and Legends of Louisiana."

WILLIAMS, Nelson Grosvenor, soldier, b. in Bainbridge, Chenango co., N. Y., 4 May, 1823. He was educated at Utica academy, and spent one year at the U. S. military academy. At the beginning of the civil war he was appointed colonel of the 3d Iowa volunteers, and served in Missouri until March, 1862. He commanded the 1st brigade of the 4th division of the Army of the Tennessee at the battle of Shiloh, where a horse was killed under him, and was at the siege of Corinth. He was made brigadier-general on 29 Nov., 1862, but resigned soon afterward, owing to injuries received at Shiloh. In 1869 he entered the U. S. custom service in New York city.

WILLIAMS, Otho Holland, soldier, b. in Prince George county, Md., in March, 1749; d. about 1800. His ancestors were among the earliest settlers in Maryland from England after Lord Baltimore became proprietor of the province. Otho was left an orphan at twelve years of age, and a few years later placed in the clerk's office of Frederick, Md., whence he was transferred to the clerk's office at Baltimore. In 1775 he was appointed a lieutenant in a rifle corps that was raised in Frederick county. The company to which he was attached marched to Boston, and the captain having been promoted, young Williams succeeded to the command. When Fort Washington was attacked he was a major. He was severely wounded, taken prisoner, and carried to New York, where he was released on his parole. On suspicion that he would open a secret correspondence with Washington, he was apprehended and placed in confinement, where he suffered great indignities and cruelty. He was exchanged after fifteen months of imprisonment. During his captivity he was promoted to the command of the 6th regiment of the Maryland line, and after his exchange he participated in all the battles of that command. He acted as deputy adjutant-general of the southern army under Gen. Horatio Gates; and Gen. Nathanael Greene, on assuming command of that army, appointed Col. Williams adjutant-general. During Greene's celebrated retreat he led the light corps that acted as a rear-guard, and did efficient service. At a critical moment in the battle of Eutaw, Gen. Greene issued the order "Let Williams advance and sweep the field with his bayonets." He led a charge that gained him the highest honors of the day. Near the close of the war Williams was sent by Gen. Greene with despatches to congress, and he was promoted by that body to the rank of brigadier-general. On the cessation of hostilities, Gen. Williams settled in Baltimore, and was appointed by the governor collector of the port. He held that office under the governor's appointment until the adoption of the Federal constitution, and was then reappointed by Washington, retaining the office till his death. See memoir by Osmond Tiffany (Baltimore, 1851).

WILLIAMS, Peter, clergyman, b. in New Brunswick, N. J., about 1780; d. in New York city, 18 Oct., 1840. His father, Peter, a negro, was born a slave, became sexton of the 1st Methodist Episcopal church in New York, afterward engaged in trade, and was the principal founder of a church for colored Methodists. The son embraced Protestant Episcopal tenets with his pastor, the Rev. Thomas Lyell, was educated by the Rev. Richard C. Moore, became a lay reader, and in 1820 was ordained by Bishop John H. Hobart, and inducted as rector of an Episcopal church for people of his race. He published an "Oration on the Abolition of the Slave-Trade" (New York, 1808), and "Discourse on the Death of Capt. Paul Cuffee" (1817).

WILLIAMS, Reuel, senator, b. in Hallowell (now Augusta), Me., 2 June, 1783; d. in Augusta, Me., 25 July, 1862. He was educated at Hallowell academy, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1802, and practised in Augusta. He was a member of the state house of representatives in 1822-'6, then sat in the state senate for three years, and after that was in the house again till 1832. In 1836 he was a presidential elector on the Van Buren ticket. In the following year he was elected to the U. S. senate as a Democrat to fill a vacancy, taking his seat on 4 Sept., 1837. He opposed the Ashburton treaty, which adjusted the northeastern boundary. In February, 1842, in consequence of a resolution of the legislature, in which the Whigs had obtained a preponderance, he offered his resignation, and in the congress that began its sessions on 4 Dec., 1843, he was replaced by John Fairfield. He was the principal promoter of the railroad between Portland and Augusta, which afforded direct rail communication with Boston, and was its president from 1847, when the work was begun, and the chief manager after its completion in 1851 for about ten years. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Bowdoin in 1855.—His son, Joseph Hartwell, lawyer, b. in Augusta, Me., 15 Feb., 1814, was graduated at Harvard in 1834, and at the law-school in 1837, and practised his profession in Augusta till 1862. He married a sister of the Rev. Sylvester Judd. He was president of the state senate in 1857, and became acting governor on the resignation of Hannibal Hamlin in February of that year. Gov. Williams was nominated to the office of judge of the Maine supreme court in 1862, but declined. In 1864-'6 and 1874 he was a member of the legislature, serving in 1865-'6 as chairman of the committee on finance. He is the author of "A Brief Study in Genealogy," treating of the Cony family, to which his mother belonged (printed privately, Cambridge, 1885).—Reuel's nephew, Seth, soldier, b. in Augusta, Me., 22 March, 1822; d. in Boston, Mass., 23 March, 1866, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1842, commissioned as 2d lieutenant of artillery on 31 Aug., 1844, and as 1st lieutenant on 3 March, 1847, and during the Mexican war served as aide-de-camp to Gen. Robert Patterson, participating in all the principal battles, and gaining the brevet of captain for gallantry at Cerro Gordo. He was adjutant of the military academy in 1850-'3, and subsequently served in the adjutant-general's department till his death. He was promoted major on 11 May, 1861, and appointed a brigadier-general in the volunteer army on 23 Sept., and from 20 Aug., 1861, till 11 Nov., 1862, served as adjutant-general on the staff of Gen. George B. McClellan, being promoted lieutenant-colonel on 17 July, 1862. He was adjutant-general of the Army of the Potomac while it was commanded by Gen. McClellan, and continued to serve in that capacity under Gen.

Ambrose E. Burnside, Gen. Joseph Hooker, and Gen. George G. Meade, winning the brevet of colonel for gallant conduct at Gettysburg. His health was impaired by continued and arduous duties, and from November, 1864, till the close of hostilities he served on Gen. Ulysses S. Grant's staff as inspector-general of the army. He took part in nearly every important engagement, and received the brevet of major-general of volunteers on 1 Aug., 1864, for brave conduct in the field in the campaigns from Gettysburg to Petersburg, that of brigadier-general in the U. S. army on 13 March, 1865, for gallantry in the final campaign near Richmond, and that of major-general on the same date for gallant and meritorious services throughout the war.

WILLIAMS, Robert, clergyman, b. in England about 1745; d. in Norfolk county, Va., 26 Sept., 1775. He was a local preacher in John Wesley's society, and from him received permission to preach in this country under the direction of the regular missionaries. Arriving in New York city in October, 1769, he began his labors in the chapel there, then received a general license from Joseph Pilmoor in Philadelphia, assisted Robert Strawbridge in evangelistic work, and in 1772 entered Virginia as the apostle of Methodism. When he began by singing and preaching on the courthouse steps in Norfolk, his ecstatic manner caused the citizens to suspect his sanity, yet he soon made converts and organized a society. He was received into the travelling connection at the first general conference, which was held at Philadelphia in June, 1773, and in the following year married and located. He was the first to print Methodist books in this country, and gave a wide circulation to Wesley's sermons until the conference that admitted him appropriated the right of publication.

WILLIAMS, Robert, member of congress, b. in Surry county, N. C., 12 July, 1773; d. in Louisiana about 1820. His father, Maj. Joseph, was a Whig partisan who had many desperate encounters with the Tories during the Revolution. The son became a lawyer, and during the war acted as adjutant-general of the state. He also collected the acts of the general assembly from 1776. For many years he was a trustee and treasurer of the University of North Carolina. He was a member of congress for three terms, serving from 15 May, 1797, till 3 March, 1803, and was then appointed land commissioner for Mississippi. Retiring from that office in 1805, he went to Tennessee, and subsequently settled in Louisiana.—His cousin, Robert, lawyer, b. in Caswell county, N. C., about 1765; d. in Louisiana, was appointed governor of Mississippi territory by President Jefferson, filling that office from 1805 till 1809.—The second Robert's brother, Marmaduke, member of congress, b. in Caswell county, N. C., 6 April, 1772; d. in Tuscaloosa, Ala., 29 Oct., 1850, studied and practised law, was a member of the state senate in 1802, and served in congress three successive terms, entering the house when his cousin retired. After the conclusion of his last term he emigrated to Alabama in 1810. He was a delegate from Tuscaloosa county to the convention that framed the state constitution in 1819, and on its adoption was a candidate for governor, but was defeated by William W. Bibb, who had held that office in the territorial government. He was elected to the legislature in 1821, and was ten times re-elected. In 1826 he was appointed a commissioner to settle territorial accounts between Alabama and Mississippi, and he was judge of the county court from 1832 till 1842, when he was retired by limitation of age.—The first Robert's brother, John, senator, b. in Surry county, N. C., 29 Jan., 1778; d. in Knoxville, Tenn., 10 Aug., 1837, was appointed a captain in the 6th U. S. infantry in April, 1799, but resigned in June, 1800, studied law in Salisbury, N. C., was admitted to the bar in 1803, and removed to the vicinity of Knoxville, Tenn., where he entered into practice. In 1812 he raised a regiment of mounted volunteers, and conducted a victorious campaign against the Seminoles. On his return he was commissioned as colonel of the 39th U. S. infantry, and ordered to the Creek nation, where he was in the battle of the Horse-Shoe Bend of the Tallapoosa. Gen. Andrew Jackson's report of this action failed to do justice to his command in the opinion of Col. Williams, who from that time was Jackson's most powerful and determined adversary. He served till the close of the war with Great Britain, and was then elected U. S. senator from Tennessee to serve through the unexpired term of George W. Campbell, and was re-elected, serving from 4 Dec., 1815, till 3 March, 1823. He was in 1825 appointed chargé d'affaires in Central America, but remained in that post only six days. He was afterward a member of the state senate, and declined a seat on the supreme bench of Tennessee.—His wife, MELINDA, was a sister of Hugh L. White.—Another brother, Lewis, member of congress, b. in Surry county, N. C., 1 Feb., 1786; d. in Washington, D. C., 20 Feb., 1842, was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1808, and in 1813 entered political life as a member of the state house of commons. He was re-elected in 1814, and on 4 Dec., 1815, took his seat in congress, to which body he was returned twelve times, remaining a member until his death. John Q. Adams and other representatives pronounced eulogies on Mr. Williams, who was commonly styled "the father of the house."—Lewis's twin brother, Thomas Lanier, jurist, b. in Sussex county, N. C., 1 Feb., 1786; d. in Nashville, Tenn., 3 Dec., 1856, was graduated at the University of North Carolina with the valedictory. After studying law, he removed to Knoxville, Tenn. He was several times elected a representative and also a senator to the General assembly. For a short time he was one of the judges of the supreme court, and voluntarily relinquished that office to the regret of the bar. In 1836, on the establishment of corporate courts of equity jurisdiction in Tennessee, he was chosen chancellor and served as such for sixteen years. He was regarded as the father of equity jurisprudence in Tennessee, and during his long judicial career only one or two of his decisions were reversed.—John's son, Joseph Lanier, member of congress, b. in Tennessee, about 1800, resided in Knoxville, and was elected as a Whig to congress, and twice re-elected, serving from 4 Sept., 1837, till 3 March, 1843.

WILLIAMS, Robert, soldier, b. in Culpeper county, Va., 5 Nov., 1829. His grandfather, James Williams, served in the Virginia line in the Revolutionary war and also in command of Virginia troops during the war of 1812. Robert was educated at the local schools and at the U. S. military academy, where he was graduated and promoted to brevet 2d lieutenant in the 1st dragoons in 1851. He served at the cavalry-school for practice and with his regiment in Oregon for six years, in the mean time becoming 2d lieutenant in 1853, and 1st lieutenant in 1855. In 1857 he was assigned to duty as an assistant instructor in tactics at West Point. Having been appointed in May, 1861, captain and assistant adjutant-general, he served as such until October, when he was commissioned colonel of the 1st Massachusetts cavalry. He was engaged in operations at Hilton Head, S. C., in the attack on Secessionville, James island, S. C., and in central Virginia till October, 1862, when he resigned from the volunteer service and was assigned to duty at the war department, having become major and assistant adjutant-general in July of the same year. He afterward served as adjutant-general, respectively, of the Departments of the Missouri and of the Platte, and of the Division of the Missouri. He was promoted by seniority in his department to the rank of lieutenant-colonel in February, 1869, colonel, 1 July, 1881, and by brevet to the grade of brigadier-general, U. S. Army, 13 March, 1865, "for diligent, faithful, and meritorious services during the rebellion." Gen. Williams married the widow of Stephen A. Douglas. He has published professional papers in periodicals.

WILLIAMS, Roger, founder of Rhode Island, b. in Wales in 1599; d. in Rhode Island early in 1683. Little is known of his family or his early life. He seems to have been employed in some capacity by the great lawyer Sir Edward Coke, who placed him at the Charterhouse school in 1621, and afterward at Pembroke college, Cambridge, where he took a degree. He was admitted to orders in the Church of England, but soon became the friend and companion of John Cotton and Thomas Hooker, and adopted the most advanced views of the Puritan party. He embarked at Bristol, 1 Dec., 1630, in the ship "Lion," and on 5 Feb., 1631, arrived at Boston. He had then been recently married, but of his wife's early history very little is known. He was distinguished as an eloquent preacher and ripe scholar, and soon after his arrival in Massachusetts he was invited to the church at Salem, as assistant to the pastor, Mr. Skelton. But rumors of his heretical opinions were already abroad. It was said that he had declared the ministers at Boston blameworthy for not formally proclaiming their penitence for ever having lived in communion with the Church of England, and that he denied the right of magistrates to inflict punishment for Sabbath-breaking, or "any other offence that was a breach of the first table." In spite of opposition based upon these charges, Mr. Williams was settled, 12 April, 1631, as assistant or teacher in the Salem church. But he found his position there so uncomfortable that before the end of the summer he thought it best to seek shelter under the more tolerant jurisdiction of the Plymouth colony. At Plymouth he was settled in August, 1631, as assistant to the pastor, Ralph Smith. Here he made his first acquaintance with the chiefs of the Wampanoags and Narragansetts, and, being an excellent linguist, soon learned to talk in the language of these Indians. About this time he was first suspected of the "heresy of Anabaptism." For such an aggressive and vigorous thinker the field of action at Plymouth seemed too narrow, and in 1633 he returned to Salem, followed by several members of the congregation who had become devotedly attached to him. In 1634 he was settled as pastor of the church in Salem. There he soon got into trouble by denying the validity of the charter granted in 1629 by Charles I. to the Company of Massachusetts Bay. He maintained that the land belonged to the Indians, and not to the king of England, who therefore had no right to give it away. The promulgation of this view seemed dangerous to the founders of Massachusetts, who were in many ways incurring the risk of arousing the hostility of the king, and were therefore anxious to avoid offending him on such a point as this. It was likely to be interpreted in England as indicating an intention on the part of the settlers of Massachusetts to throw off their allegiance, and accordingly they hastened to condemn Mr. Williams and his views. This purely political question was complicated with disputes arising from Mr. Williams's advanced opinions on toleration. He maintained that "no human power had the right to intermeddle in matters of conscience; and that neither church nor state, neither bishop nor king, may prescribe the smallest iota of religious faith." For this, he maintained, "man is responsible to God alone." The ministers, with his friends, Cotton and Hooker at their head, sent a committee to Salem to censure him; but he denied their spiritual jurisdiction, and declared his determination to "remove the yoke of soul-oppression." In July, 1635, he was summoned before the general court at Boston, and in October he was ordered to quit the colony within six weeks, but permission was presently granted for him to remain until spring. It was then reported that many people in Salem, "taken with an apprehension of his godliness," repaired to his house for religious instruction, and that they meditated withdrawing from Massachusetts and founding a colony upon Narragansett bay, in which the principle of religious toleration should be strictly upheld. To prevent this movement, it was decided to send him back to England. He was again summoned to Boston, but refused to obey the summons, whereupon the magistrates sent to Salem a warrant for his arrest. He suspected what was coming, and left his home just before the officers arrived. He made his way through the wilderness to the wigwams of the Pokanokets. Their chief, Massasoit, granted him a tract of land on Seekonk river. There, in the spring, he was joined by friends from Salem, and they began to build; but, in order to avoid any complications with the Plymouth colony, they moved to the site of Providence, where they made their first settlement in June, 1636. This territory was granted to Mr. Williams by the Narragansett chiefs, Canonius and Miantonomoh. His influence over these Indians was great, and it soon enabled him to perform for the infant colonies a service that no other man in New England could have undertaken with any hope of success; he detached the powerful tribe of Narragansetts from the league that the Pequot sachem Sassacus was forming for the purpose of destroying all the English settlements. The effect of Mr. Williams's diplomacy was to leave the Pequots to fight without allies, and the English soon exterminated them. During the Pequot war the magistrates of the colony that had banished him sought his counsel, and he gave it freely. In 1638 he assisted John Clarke and William Coddington in negotiating the purchase of Aquidneck, or Rhode Island, for which the Indians were liberally paid. True to his principle of toleration, while he opposed the opinions of that restless agitator, Samuel Gorton, he refused to join in the movement for expelling him from Providence. In 1643 he went to England and obtained the charter for the Rhode Island and Providence settlements, dated 14 March, 1644. While in England he published his "Key into the Language of America" (London, 1643), a work of great value on the speech of the New England Indians. He also wrote and published anonymously his famous book "The Bloody Tenent of Persecution for Cause of Conscience" (London, 1644). In this book the doctrines of religious freedom are ably and attractively presented in the form of a dialogue between Truth and Peace. It was dedicated to the parliament, then waging war against the king, and it attracted general attention from its great literary merit as well as from the nature of the subject. It was answered by Mr. Cotton's book entitled "The Bloody Tenent washed and made White in the Blood of the Lamb" (London, 1647). After a while Mr. Williams published an effective rejoinder entitled "The Bloody Tenent made yet more Bloody by Mr. Cotton's Endeavor to wash it White" (London, 1652). The controversy was conducted on both sides with a candor and courtesy very rare in those times. While in London, in 1644, Mr. Williams also published a reply to Mr. Cotton's statement of the reasons for his banishment. This admirable book, a small quarto of forty-seven pages, entitled "Mr. Cotton's Letter Examined and Answered," is now exceedingly rare. Mr. Williams landed in Boston, 17 Sept., 1644, with a letter signed by several members of parliament, which was virtually a safe-conduct for his passage through Massachusetts territory. Through his exertions a treaty was made with the Narragansetts, 4 Aug., 1645, which saved New England from the horrors of an Indian war. In order to obtain the abrogation of the commission of William Coddington as governor of the islands of Rhode Island and Conanicut, Mr. Williams sailed in November, 1651, for England, in company with John Clarke. Through the aid of Sir Henry Vane this mission was successful. While in England, Mr. Williams spent several weeks at Vane's country house in Lincolnshire, and he saw much of Cromwell and Milton. At this time he wrote and published his "Hireling Ministry None of Christ's" (London, 1652), which is an able argument against an established church and the support of the clergy by taxation. In the same year he published "Experiments of Spiritual Life and Health, and their Preservatives." He returned to Providence in 1654 and took part in the reorganization of the colonial government in that year. He was chosen, 12 Sept., 1654, president of the colony, and held that office until May, 1658. During this time he secured the toleration of the Quakers, who were beginning to come to New England, and on this occasion he was again brought into conflict with the government of Massachusetts. A new charter was granted to Rhode Island, 8 July, 1663, under which Benedict Arnold was first governor and Roger Williams one of the assistants. This charter established such a liberal republican government that the Revolution in 1776 made no change in it, and it was not superseded until 1842. (See DORR, THOMAS WILSON.) Mr. Williams in 1663 was appointed commissioner for settling the eastern boundary, which had long been the subject of dispute with both Plymouth and Massachusetts. For the next fourteen years he was most of the time either a representative or an assistant. In 1672 he was engaged in his famous controversy with the Quakers, of whose doctrines and manners he strongly disapproved, though he steadfastly refused to persecute them. George Fox was then in Newport, and Mr. Williams challenged him to a public discussion of fourteen theological propositions. Fox left the colony before the challenge had been delivered to him, but it was accepted by three Quaker champions, John Stubbs, John Burnet, and William Edmundson. Mr. Williams, though seventy-three years of age, rowed himself in a boat from Providence to Newport, about thirty miles, to meet his adversaries. The debate was carried on for three days in the Quaker meeting-house, without changing anybody's opinion. Mr. Williams afterward wrote an account of the affair, and maintained his own view, in the book entitled "George Fox digged out of his Burrowes," a small quarto of 327 pages (Boston, 1676). A copy of this book is in Harvard college library. His last written document bears the date 16 Jan., 1683, and relates to the dispute about the Pawtuxet lands. In a letter written, 10 May, 1683, by John Thorndike, of Providence, to the Rev. Samuel Hubbard, he says: "The Lord hath arrested by death our ancient and approved friend, Mr. Roger Williams, with divers others here." His death must have occurred between 16 Jan. and 10

May, probably at Providence, as he was buried there. He was a man of wonderful strength and activity. In private life he was as gentle and kind as he was undaunted and pugnacious in controversy. His opinions and conduct in regard to toleration entitle him to a place among the foremost men of the world in the 17th century, and this is fully recognized in Prof. David Masson's work on Milton, where the history of modern liberalism is discussed with profound learning. See James D. Knowles's "Memoir of Williams" (Boston, 1834); William Gammell's "Life of Roger Williams" (1845); Romeo Elton's "Life of Roger Williams" (London, 1852); and Henry M. Dexter's "As to Roger Williams" (Boston, 1876). Dr. Dexter has recovered a lost tract by Williams, "Christenings make not Christians" (London, 1645), which he found in the British museum, and edited for Rider's historical tracts, No. 14, 1881.—A descendant, Betsey, b. in Cranston (now a part of Providence), R. I., in 1789; d. there, 27 Nov., 1871, inherited a farm of one hundred acres, by direct succession through five generations, from Roger Williams, and bequeathed it to the city of Providence to form the park that bears his name. The statue lately erected is shown in the illustration.

WILLIAMS, Samuel, pioneer, b. in Carlisle, Pa., 16 Oct., 1786; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 3 Feb., 1859. In his youth he learned the trade of a hatter, and removed with his parents to Chillicothe, Ohio, in 1807. He served in the war of 1812, and was with a detachment at River Raisin, Mich., when Gen. William Hull surrendered Detroit. An account of this military expedition, written by him, was published in 1870, entitled "Two Western Campaigns." In 1815 he was appointed by the surveyor-general of Ohio chief clerk of that office, which post he filled for thirty years. His familiarity with the public surveys was of great value to the service, and he compiled for the general land-office the "Instructions to Surveyors-General of Public Lands," which is still used, and of which several editions have been issued. He was one of the founders in 1845 of the Ohio Wesleyan university, and in 1843 of the Wesleyan female college at Cincinnati, of both of which he was for many years a trustee and patron, bequeathing to the former a valuable private library. He left in manuscript copious memoirs of his own life and times, and a genealogy of his family.

WILLIAMS, Thomas, clergyman, b. in Pomfret, Conn., 5 Nov., 1779; d. in Providence, R. I., 29 Sept., 1876. He studied for two years at Williams, then entered Yale, was graduated in 1800, and taught at Beverly, Mass., and Woodstock and Norwich, Conn., till 1803, when he opened a school for colored pupils in Boston, Mass. He was there licensed in order to act as chaplain of the almshouse, was sent to New York state as a missionary in the same year, and repeated his tour in 1804 and 1805, after being ordained as an evangelist on 16 May, 1804. From 1807 till his death, except while officiating as pastor at Foxborough, Mass., in 1816-'21, at Attleborough in 1823-'7, at Hebronville in 1827-'30, and at Barrington, R. I., in 1835, he resided mainly at Providence, and, while holding no charge, preached to colored people and others through the state of Rhode Island. He drafted the articles of faith and the rules of the Rhode Island evangelical consociation, and was its first scribe. Of his many printed sermons, some of which were signed by the pen-name "Demens Egomet," one was called "An Explicit Avowal of Nothingarianism," another had the title "Jehovah, or Uni-trini-tarianism," and others commemorated the first settlement of Rhode Island and the revival of religion in 1740. Several volumes of collected sermons were issued at various times.

WILLIAMS, Thomas, lawyer, b. in Greensburgh, Westmoreland co., Pa., 28 Aug., 1806. He was graduated at Dickinson college in 1825, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1828, and entered into practice at Pittsburg. He served in the state senate from 1838 till 1841. In 1861 he entered the state house of representatives, and after serving two years was elected to congress as a Republican, taking his seat on 7 Dec., 1863. He was twice re-elected, was a member of the committee on the judiciary during his entire period of service, and in March, 1868, acted as one of the managers of the impeachment of President Andrew Johnson.

WILLIAMS, Thomas, soldier, b. in New York state in 1815; d. in Baton Rouge, La., 5 Aug., 1862. He was appointed a cadet in the U. S. military academy from Michigan, graduated in 1837, and immediately commissioned as 2d lieutenant of infantry. He served in the Florida wars and during the Canadian rebellion on the northern frontier, was assistant professor of mathematics at the military academy in 1840-'1, being promoted 1st lieutenant on 5 Oct., 1840, and from 1844 till 1850 was aide-de-camp to Gen. Winfield Scott. During the Mexican war he was present at Vera Cruz and the other principal engagements of the war, receiving the brevet of captain for bravery at Contreras and Churubusco, and that of major for taking a gallant part in the battle of Chapultepec. He became a captain on 12 Sept., 1850, was engaged in operations against the Seminoles in Florida in 1856-'7 and in the Utah expedition in 1858, was promoted major on 14 May, 1861, and made a brigadier-general of volunteers on 28 Sept., 1861. He took part in the North Carolina expedition, and remained in command of Fort Hatteras till March, 1862, then took command of a brigade in the Ship island expedition, was engaged in opening the lower Mississippi in April and May, 1862, commanded in the first unsuccessful attack on Vicksburg, and projected and superintended the cutting of a canal that was designed to turn the course of the Mississippi away from that city. On the failure of this enterprise he was placed in command at Baton Rouge, where he successfully repelled the vigorous attack of Gen. John C. Breckinridge, and was killed in the moment of victory while leading to the charge an Indiana regiment whose field-officers had fallen.

WILLIAMS, Thomas H., senator, b. in Virginia, about 1795. He went to Pontotoc, Miss., soon after the Indians were removed from that region, and became a member of the state house of representatives. Mr. Williams was appointed by the governor, and afterward elected by the legislature, a U. S. senator, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of James F. Trotter, and served from 13 Dec., 1838, till 3 March, 1839.

WILLIAMS, Thomas Hill, U. S. senator, b. in North Carolina, about 1780; d. in Robertson county, Tenn., about 1840. He received an academical training, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and began practice, but became a clerk in the war department at Washington. In 1805 he was appointed by President Jefferson register of the land-office for the territory of Mississippi, and he was collector of customs at the port of New Orleans. He was a delegate to the convention that framed the state constitution of Mississippi, and was elected one of the first U. S. senators from that state. He was re-elected, and served from 11 Dec., 1817, till 3 March, 1829. During the session of 1820-'1 he voted for the Missouri compromise bill. He then removed to Tennessee, where he remained until the time of his death.

WILLIAMS, Thomas Scott, jurist, b. in Wethersfield, Conn., 26 June, 1777; d. in Hartford, 15 Dec., 1861. He was graduated at Yale in 1794, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1799, and began practice at Mansfield, Conn., but removed to Hartford in 1803. He was appointed attorney of the board of managers of the school fund in 1809, from 1813 till 1829 represented Hartford in the general assembly, and sat in congress in 1817-'19. In May, 1829, he was appointed an associate judge of the supreme court of errors and of the superior court, and in May, 1834, he was appointed chief justice, which office he held until the constitutional expiration of his term in 1847. After retiring from the bench he never resumed the practice of his profession further than to act occasionally as an arbitrator or referee. He was mayor of the city of Hartford from 1831 till 1835. For several years he had been president of the American tract society, and he was active in various other religious and benevolent organizations. He was a contributor to objects of benevolence, and bequeathed $28,000 to charitable institutions.

WILLIAMS, Sir William, British officer, b. in England about 1776; d. in Bath, England, 17 June, 1832. He was appointed ensign in the 40th foot in 1794, lieutenant in 1795, captain in 1799, major in 1802, and lieutenant-colonel in the 60th foot in 1809. He served at Corunna, Salamanca, and other battles during the campaign in the peninsula, and in 1814 in Canada, when he commanded at St. John's and at the posts in advance on Richelieu river, and was complimented in general orders for his services. He was appointed a knight commander of the Bath, 5 Jan., 1815, became a colonel in 1819, and a major-general in 1830.

WILLIAMS, William, publisher, b. in Framingham, Mass., 12 Oct., 1787; d. in Utica, N. Y., 10 June, 1850. He was a descendant in the fifth generation from the Puritan settler, Robert Williams, of Roxbury. His father's family removing to the village of New Hartford, Oneida co., in 1791, he was there apprenticed at the age of eleven to William McLean, a pioneer of printing and founder of the first newspaper in central New York. In 1800 he entered the establishment of Asahel Seward, his brother-in-law, in Utica, and upon coming of age formed a partnership with him under the firm-name of Seward and Williams. The works issued from their press were chiefly religious and instructive. They were also publishers of a newspaper which, under the name of the "Utica Patriot and Patrol," and other titles, strongly advocated De Witt Clinton and his canal policy, but ended in 1821 in a lawsuit and loss. Seward withdrew in 1824, leaving the business entirely to his partner, who indulged his anti-Mason proclivities in issuing a weekly paper entitled "The Elucidator," which was also a financial failure. In 1829 he published "Light on Masonry," which brought upon him the ill-will of the Masons. Mr. Williams was an elder in the Presbyterian church, and the organizer and superintendent of one of the earliest Sunday-schools in the country. During the cholera scourge in 1832 he gave his whole time to prescribing for the sick, distributing aid to the needy, and burying the dead, until he was taken dangerously ill toward the end of the plague. He raised a company of volunteers in 1813 for the relief of Sackett's Harbor, and served elsewhere in the war, remaining after its close as colonel of the militia regiment in Utica.—His son, Samuel Wells, sinologist, b. in Utica, N. Y., 22 Sept., 1812; d. in New Haven, Conn., 16 Feb., 1884, entered Rensselaer polytechnic institute at Troy in 1831. While in this school he accepted a proposal to go to China and take charge of a printing-office recently established there by the American board of missions. Arriving at Canton, 25 Oct., 1833, he found Dr. Robert Morrison, an Englishman, and Elijah C. Bridgman, an American, the only Protestant missionaries in China. He joined the latter as editor of the "Chinese Repository," which he both printed and edited until its conclusion in 1851. In all he contributed about 130 articles to this magazine. In 1835 he removed his office to the Portuguese colony of Macao in order to complete the printing of Dr. Walter H. Medhurst's Hokkeën dictionary, which had been left unfinished at the dissolution of the East India company's China branch, and the company's font of Chinese type was from this date placed entirely at his disposal. During the winter of 1837-'8 he began to print the "Chinese Chrestomathy," by Dr. Bridgman, to which he contributed one half. While this was in press he was also kept busy learning Japanese from some sailors, and with their aid made a version of the books of Genesis and Matthew in that language. In 1844 he returned to the United States by way of India, Egypt, Palestine, and Italy, and proposed to the secretary of the Presbyterian board of missions to assist them in obtaining a full font of Chinese type, from matrices to be cut in Berlin. His share of raising the necessary funds was performed by delivering many courses of lectures on China in various cities of the Union, and these, being amplified, were published under the title of the "Middle Kingdom," with a new map of the empire (2 vols., New York, 1848). The same year he returned with his wife to China and began at once a new Chinese dictionary, the completion of which was delayed, while he accompanied Com. Matthew C. Perry's two expeditions to Japan in 1853-'4, as Japanese interpreter, and materially assisted in concluding the treaty that opened that country to foreign commerce and civilization. In September, 1855, he was appointed secretary and interpreter to the U. S. legation in China. His "Tonic Dictionary of the Chinese Language in the Canton Dialect" was finished in August, 1856, eight years from its beginning and just before the destruction of the foreign factories at Canton, which with his press and more than 7,000 books, were burned in December of that year. He resigned his connection with the American board in 1857, and in the following year assisted the American envoy, William B. Reed, in negotiating a new treaty and the settlement of claims of Americans upon the Chinese government for losses at Canton and elsewhere. To Mr. Williams's abiding interest in the cause of missions was due the insertion in this treaty of a clause tolerating Christianity in China, a stipulation which was borrowed from his draft and inserted by each of the three allied European powers there assembled. The next year he accompanied Mr. Ward to exchange the ratifications on the first visit of Americans to Peking. When the legation returned to the south, Mr. Williams made a second visit to the United States. In 1862 he went with Anson Burlingame to Peking, where he resided with his family several years, in the course of which he built at his own expense and from his own designs the buildings that are still occupied by the U. S. legation in that capital. Besides his official duties, he found time to complete in these years his great work, "A Syllabic Dictionary of the Chinese Language," a quarto volume of 1336 pages, containing 12,527 characters and their pronunciations in four dialects. In order to superintend the printing personally, he spent the year 1873 in Shanghai, where it was stereotyped and published (1874) at the Presbyterian mission press, from the font of Chinese type, the funds for which he was instrumental in raising in 1846-'8. Much impaired in health, he returned in 1875, going back to China in 1876 to close his affairs there and resign his office of secretary and interpreter, the oldest commission at that time in the U. S. diplomatic service. During his term he had acted as chargé d'affaires nine times, amounting to nearly five years of service as acting minister. He was the oldest foreign resident in China at the date of his departure. In 1877 he was appointed professor of the Chinese language and literature in Yale, being the first professor of the sort in this country. In 1881 he was elected president of the American Bible society, and later in the year president of the American oriental society. In 1848 Mr. Williams received the degree of LL. D. from Union college. Besides the works already mentioned, he published "Easy Lessons in Chinese" (Macao, 1842); "English and Chinese Vocabulary" (1843); "Chinese Topography" (1844); and "Chinese Commercial Guide," based on a previous work (1844; 5th revised ed., Hong Kong, 1863); and completely rewrote, enlarged, and brought down to date his important work on "The Middle Kingdom" (2 vols., New York, 1883). See "The Life and Letters of S. Wells Williams," by his son, Frederick Wells Williams (New York, 1888).

WILLIAMS, Sir William Fenwick, bart., Canadian soldier, b. in Annapolis Royal, Nova Scotia, 4 Dec., 1800; d. in London, England, 26 July, 1883. He was graduated at Woolwich in 1821, and in 1825 became 2d lieutenant of artillery. In 1829 he was transferred to the East Indies, and was stationed in Ceylon, where he secured an appointment in the surveyor-general's office, and superintended the construction of several public works. He travelled much through India, visited Egypt, Syria, and Constantinople, and in 1839 he returned to England and rejoined his corps. He became captain in 1840, was sent to Turkey, and afterward was British commissioner to the conference at Erzeroum to settle the boundary-line between Persia and Turkey in Asia. In 1848 he was advanced to a lieutenant-colonelcy. During the Crimean war, when the Russians had driven the Turks under the walls of Kars, and it was feared that Prince Betutoff might follow up his success in Asia, Col. Williams was despatched as commissioner, and, going to Kars, proceeded immediately to reorganize the troops. He was appointed a lieutenant-general in the sultan's army under the name of Williams Pacha. After defending Kars for four months against the Russians, he met their commander, Gen. Mouravieff, at the head of a large force, on the heights above the city, and defeated him with great slaughter. Assisted by the Hungarian General Kmety, he did all in his power for the defence of Kars; but on 14 Nov. he capitulated. When the war was over, Williams returned to England. The queen created him a baronet, and decorated him with the ribbon of the Order of the Bath. A pension of £1,000 was granted him, and both houses of parliament thanked him. The sultan of Turkey conferred on "the hero of Kars" the rank of a pacha of the highest order, and the decoration of the Medjidieh. Napoleon III. created him a grand officer of the Legion of honor, besides presenting him with a diamond-hilted sabre. Oxford gave him the degree of D. C. L., the corporation of London invested him with the freedom of the city and a costly sword, and his native province of Nova Scotia gave him a sword costing 150 guineas. In July, 1856, he was given the command of the garrison at Woolwich, and elected to parliament for Calne. At the general elections in the following year he was again returned, but he retired in 1859. In the latter year he was appointed commander-in-chief of the forces in British North America. He was administrator of Canada from 12 Oct., 1860, to 22 Jan., 1861, during the absence of the governor-general, Sir Edmund Head. When Lieut.-Gov. Sir Richard Graves Macdonnell left Nova Scotia in 1865, Sir Fenwick Williams administered the government of that province. He was the first lieutenant-governor of Nova Scotia after the union of 1867, which post he held three months. On 2 Aug., 1868, he was made a full general, and in August, 1870, he was appointed governor-general of Gibraltar. That post he resigned in 1875. In October, 1877, he retired from the army, and in 1881 he was appointed constable of the Tower.

WILLIAMS, William George, engineer, b. in Philadelphia, 1 Jan., 1801; d. in Monterey, Mexico, 21 Sept., 1846. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1824, and entered the 7th infantry as 2d lieutenant. He was promoted 1st lieutenant, 30 April, 1833, surveyed the site for a fort on Pea Patch island, in Delaware river, in 1834, and was promoted brevet captain of staff in the topographical engineers on 28 Jan. in the same year. He surveyed the route for a ship-canal around the Falls of Niagara in 1835-'6, and performed similar services on Lake Champlain, at Charleston, S. C., and at Cincinnati, Ohio. He went in 1837 on a military reconnoissance to the country of the Cherokees, attained the rank of captain of engineers in 1838, and during the eight succeeding years was engaged in making triangulations and in constructing harbor works on Lake Erie. He was superintendent of the survey of the northwestern lakes and of the boundary between Michigan and Wisconsin, served under Gen. Zachary Taylor in the war with Mexico as chief of engineers, and was mortally wounded at the battle of Monterey, 21 Sept., 1846, dying the same day. He was an adept in painting, and his literary and scientific attainments were of a high order.

WILLIAMS, William R., clergyman, b. in New York city, 14 Oct., 1804; d. there, 1 April, 1885. His father, the Rev. John Williams, came from Wales in 1795, and was pastor of a Baptist church in New York from 1798 till his death in 1825. The son was graduated at Columbia in 1822, and studied law with Peter A. Jay, whose partner he became. Religious convictions caused him to leave that profession and to devote himself to the Christian ministry. He was ordained pastor of the Amity street Baptist church in 1832. In this relation he continued until his death, though often solicited to accept various chairs in colleges and theological seminaries. Dr. Williams's library was one of the largest and choicest private collections in the country. Though he was a man of very positive convictions, his temper was gentle and eminently catholic. He was one of the foremost leaders in the councils of his own denomination, and an active manager in the great societies that are supported by evangelical Christians in general, as the American tract society and the American Bible society. Columbia gave him the degree of S. T. D. in 1837, and he was a trustee of that college in 1838-'48. The degree of LL. D. was given him by Union in 1859. His chief works, besides many sermons and addresses, are "Miscellanies" (New York, 1850); "Religious Progress" (1850); and "Lectures on the Lord's Prayer" (1851). He was co-editor also of the "Baptist Library."

WILLIAMSON, Hugh, statesman, b. in West Nottingham, Pa., 5 Dec., 1735; d. in New York city, 22 May, 1819. He was graduated at the College of Philadelphia in 1757, studied theology, and was licensed to preach in 1759 in Connecticut. He was subsequently admitted to the presbytery of Philadelphia, and preached altogether about two years, but, partly in consequence of ill health, he was never ordained nor assumed a pastorate. He was professor of mathematics in the College of Philadelphia in 1760-'3, studied medicine at Edinburgh and Utrecht, where he took his degree, and on his return to this country practised successfully at Philadelphia. On 7 Jan., 1769, he was appointed one of a commission of the American philosophical society, to which he had been elected in 1768, to observe the transits of Venus and Mercury, his account of which is contained in vol. i. of the "Philosophical Transactions." In 1772 he visited the West Indies to procure aid for the academy at Newark, Del., and in 1773 he proceeded to England to solicit further assistance for that institution. He was examined in February, 1774, by the privy council on the subject of the destruction of the tea in Boston harbor, and other matters relating to the political state of the colonies. He afterward spent some time on the continent, and returned to this country in 1776, after the Declaration of Independence, bearing important papers.

In 1777 he engaged in mercantile pursuits in Charleston, S. C., with a younger brother, and subsequently he practised medicine at Edenton, N. C. He served as surgeon in the militia of North Carolina in 1780-'2, and rendered aid to the wounded at the battle of Camden. He was a member of the house of commons of North Carolina in 1782, was elected to the Continental congress in 1784, 1785, and 1786, and was a delegate to the convention that framed the constitution of the United States in 1787, as well as to the State convention to act upon it in 1789. He was elected to the 1st congress as a Federalist, re-elected to the second, and served from 19 March, 1790, till 2 March, 1793, when he removed to New York. He married there, devoted himself to literary pursuits, and was associated with De Witt Clinton in organizing the Literary and philosophical society in 1814. He was an advocate of the New York canal system, and an active promoter of philanthropic, literary, and scientific institutions. Dr. Williamson was a frequent contributor to the transactions of learned societies in Europe and the United States. He published a series of essays on "Paper Currency" in 1786; fugitive articles on "Languages in Politics" in the "American Museum"; "Observations on Navigable Canals," an essay on "Comets" in the "Transactions" of the Literary and philosophical society of New York; "Discourse on the Benefits of Civil History" (New York, 1810); "Observations on the Climate of America" (1811); and "History of North Carolina" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1812).

WILLIAMSON, Isaac Dowd, clergyman, b. in Pomfret, Vt., 4 April, 1807; d. in Cincinnati, Ohio, 26 Nov., 1876. He was a Universalist minister, on 10 Sept., 1829, at Townsend, Vt., was pastor at Albany, N. Y., from 1830 till 1837, and subsequently held charges in Baltimore, Md., New York city, Philadelphia, Mobile, Ala., Cincinnati, Ohio, Lowell, Mass., and Louisville, Ky. In 1873 he again became pastor at Cincinnati. He composed a large part of the ritual of the Order of Odd-Fellows, of which he was chaplain for many years. At different times he was editor of the "Gospel Banner," at Troy, N. Y., the "Religious Inquirer," at Hartford, Conn., the "Herald and Era," at Louisville, Ky., and the "Star in the West," at Cincinnati. He published "Argument for the Truth of Christianity" (New York, 1836); "Exposition and Defence of Universalism" (1840); "The Crown of Life, a Series of Discourses" (Boston, 1850); "Examination of the Doctrine of Endless Punishment" (Cincinnati, 1854); "The Philosophy of Odd-Fellowship" (1855); "The Philosophy of Universalism" (1866); and "Rudiments of Theological and Moral Science" (1870).

WILLIAMSON, Isaac Halsted, jurist, b. in Elizabethtown, N. J., in 1769; d. there, 10 July, 1844. He was educated at the local schools in his birthplace, studied law with his brother Matthias, and was admitted to the bar in 1791. Soon afterward he became prosecuting attorney for Morris county, and rose to a high rank at the bar of New Jersey. In 1817 he was elected to the assembly, and he was governor and chancellor of the state from 6 Feb., 1817, till October, 1830, as, previous to the adoption of the constitution in 1844, the governor was, ex-officio, chancellor. He was president of the convention that was called to revise the state constitution in 1844, and died soon after the convention adjourned.

WILLIAMSON, James, Canadian educator, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, 19 Oct., 1806. He was one of the founders of the "Edinburgh Presbyterian Review," and was ordained as a Presbyterian minister in 1845. In 1842 he became professor of mathematics and natural philosophy in Queen's college, Kingston, Canada, and he was afterward vice-principal, professor of astronomy, and for many years director of the Kingston Observatory. He has been given the degree of LL. D. by Glasgow university. Dr. Williamson has published "Inland Seas of North America" (Kingston, 1854), and abstracts of meteorological observations at Kingston, Canada.

WILLIAMSON, James Alexander, soldier, b. in Adair county, Ky., 8 Feb., 1829. He was educated at Knox college, Ill., but was not graduated, studied law, and was admitted to the bar, but was mustered into the military service of the United States, 8 Aug., 1861, as 1st lieutenant and adjutant of the 4th Iowa infantry. After the battle of Pea Ridge, where he was wounded, he was promoted to lieutenant-colonel of the regiment and immediately afterward he was made its colonel. At the battle of Chickasaw Bayou, near Vicksburg, on 28 Dec., 1862, he led the assault of Thayer's brigade on the enemy's lines and was seriously wounded. By order of Gen. Grant he was allowed to inscribe on the colors of his regiment "First at Chickasaw Bayou." He was present at the siege of Vicksburg, and immediately after the surrender was given command of the 2d brigade of the 1st division of the 15th army corps. Col. Williamson continued in command of a brigade or division until the capture of Savannah, when he was made a full brigadier-general of volunteers, 13 Jan., 1865, having previously been promoted by brevet on 19 Dec., 1864. He was also brevetted major-general of volunteers, 13 March, 1865. After the capture of Savannah he was ordered to St. Louis, Mo., to take command of the district of Missouri, where he remained until some time after the surrender of the armies of the Confederacy, when he was ordered to report to Gen. Grenville M. Dodge for duty in a military and inspecting expedition of posts in the northwest, on Laramie, Powder, and Bighorn rivers. While on this duty he was mustered out of the military service; but he did not receive the order until his return to St. Louis in October, 1865. Gen. Williamson then resumed his profession, and was commissioner of the general land-office from June, 1876, till June, 1881, and chairman of the public lands commission created by act of congress, 3 March, 1879. He was elected chairman of the Iowa delegation to the National Republican convention at Baltimore in 1864, but did not attend in consequence of his military duties, and he was again elected chairman of the delegation in 1868. He is now general solicitor for the Atlantic and Pacific railroad company.

WILLIAMSON, John, artist, b. in Toll Cross, near Glasgow, Scotland, 10 April, 1826; d. in Glenwood-on-the-Hudson, 28 May, 1885. His parents removed to this country when he was a child. For several years he followed his profession in Brooklyn, N. Y., where he was a member and secretary of the Art association. He was also one of the original members of the Artists' fund society, and in 1861 was elected an associate of the National academy. Many of his paintings are scenes near Hudson river and in the Catskills. They include "Trout Fishing"; "American Trout"; "Summit of Chocorua"; "Autumn in the Adirondacks"; "A Passing Shower, Connecticut Valley" (1869); "After the Storm, Blue Ridge" (1877); "In the Mohawk Valley" and "Sugar-Loaf Mountain" (1878); and "The Palisades" (1879).

WILLIAMSON, John, British physician, lived in the 18th and 19th centuries. He was a fellow of the Royal college of physicians of Edinburgh, and at one time surgeon to the Caithness Highlanders. In 1798 he went with his family to Jamaica, W. I., where he practised nearly fourteen years near Spanish Town, returning to his native country in 1812. During his absence he kept a journal of his cases and other topics of interest, which he utilized in the preparation of his "Medical and Miscellaneous Observations relative to the West India Islands" (2 vols., Edinburgh, 1817).

WILLIAMSON, Peter, Scottish author, d. in Edinburgh, Scotland, 19 Jan., 1799. He was kidnapped when a boy at Aberdeen, and sent to this country, but he afterward returned to Scotland, where he recovered damages from his captors. He passed much time among the Cherokees, and on his return amused the public with descriptions of their manners, assuming the dress of a chief and imitating a war-whoop. He instituted a penny-post at Edinburgh, for which, when it was assumed by the government, he received a pension, and he was also the first to publish a city directory. He was the author of "French and Indian Cruelty Exemplified" (Glasgow, 1758), and "A Brief Account of the War in North America" (1760).

WILLIAMSON, Robert Stockton, soldier, b. in New York in 1824; d. in San Francisco, Cal., 10 Nov., 1882. He was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1848, assigned to the topographical engineers, and took part in various surveys on the Pacific coast till 1856, when he became 1st lieutenant. From that time till the civil war he was on the staff of the commanding general of the Department of the Pacific, and in charge of military roads in southern Oregon, with meteorological observations on that coast. On 6 Aug., 1861, he was promoted captain, and, after reconnoissances on the lower Potomac till March, 1862, he was chief topographical engineer in the operations in North Carolina, being brevetted major, 14 March, 1862, for services at New Berne, and lieutenant-colonel on 26 April for the siege of Fort Macon. He then served with the Army of the Potomac, of which he was chief topographical engineer, from 21 Nov. till 21 Dec., 1862, and held that post in the Department of the Pacific from 9 Feb. till 3 March, 1863, when he was transferred to the corps of engineers, in which he was made major on 7 May. Afterward he served on the Pacific coast as superintending engineer of various surveys of rivers, harbors, and sites for fortifications. On 22 Feb., 1869, he was promoted lieutenant-colonel. Col. Williamson published "Report of a Reconnoissance and Survey in California in Connection with Explorations for a Railway Route to the Pacific" in vol. iii. of "Pacific Railway Reports" (Washington, 1853); "On the Use of the Barometer on Surveys and Reconnoissances" (New York, 1868); and "Practical Tables in Meteorology and Hypsometry," being an appendix to the foregoing (1869).

WILLIAMSON, Walter, physician. b. in Newtown, Delaware co., Pa., 4 Jan., 1811; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 19 Dec., 1870. He was graduated in medicine at the University of Pennsylvania in 1833, and in 1848 was professor of obstetrics in the Homœopathic medical college of Pennsylvania. In 1852 he was transferred to the chair of materia medica and therapeutics, which he resigned in 1855 on account of failing health. He held the chair of obstetrics again in 1857-'9, and in 1860 was made professor emeritus, which post he continued to hold in Hahnemann medical college when the Homœopathic college was merged in it. In 1869-'70 he lectured there on hygiene. Dr. Williamson was president of the American institute of homœopathy in 1846 and of the state homœopathic medical society in 1868. He was the author of "Instructions concerning the Diseases of Females, and the Conduct to be observed during Pregnancy, Labor, and Confinement" (Philadelphia, 1849), and "Diseases of Females and Children, and their Homœopathic Treatment" (1854; revised ed. by George N. Epps, London, 1857), and has contributed to the "Homœopathic Materia Medica of American Drug Provings" (Philadelphia, 1846), and to the "North American Journal of Homœopathy," of which he was an assistant editor. He also edited Dr. Joseph Laurie's "Parents' Guide" (1849).

WILLIAMSON, William Durkee, historian, b. in Canterbury, Conn., 31 July, 1779; d. in Bangor, Me., 27 May, 1846. He removed with his father in boyhood to Amherst, Mass., and entered Williams college, but was graduated at Brown in 1804. He studied law in Amherst, and began to practise in Bangor, Me., in 1807. Afterward he served as attorney for Hancock county in 1808-'16, and as a member of the Massachusetts senate in 1816-'20. On the separation of Maine from that state in 1820 he was the president of its first state senate, and he thus became acting governor on the resignation of Gov. William King. He was then elected to congress as a Democrat, and served in 1821-'3. In 1824-'40 he was probate judge for his county, and in 1838-'41 he was a bank commissioner. Gov. Williamson was for some time president of the Bangor bank, and a member of several historical and literary societies. Besides contributions to the "American Quarterly Register" and to the "Collections" of the Massachusetts historical society, he published a valuable "History of the State of Maine, from its First Discovery to the Separation" (2 vols., Hallowell, 1832; 2d ed., enlarged, 1839).

WILLIAMS-REBOLLEDO, Juan, Chilean naval officer, b. in Curacavi, province of Santiago, in 1826. His father was a companion of Admiral Cochrane. The son entered the naval service of his country, and at the opening of the war against Spain had obtained the rank of captain, and was in command of the corvette "Esmeralda." He was at anchor in the port of Papudo on 26 Nov., 1865, when the Spanish gun-boat "Covadonga" passed with despatches, and, after a short chase and half an hour's engagement, Williams captured her with about 110 men. For this victory he was raised to the rank of post-captain, and presented by the people with a sword of honor. He was later a member of the municipality of Valparaiso and elected to congress. When the war against Peru and Bolivia began, he commanded the Chilean fleet as rear-admiral, and on 29 March, 1879, occupied the Bolivian ports of Cobija and Tocopilla, establishing in April the blockade of Iquique with his flagship, the iron-clad "Blanco Encalada," and other vessels of the squadron. But after the destruction of the "Esmeralda" by the "Huascar," and the successful cruise of the Peruvian fleet, great discontent arose in Chili with the inactivity of their powerful squadron. According to Admiral Williams, this was caused by the condition of the bottoms of his ships and their defective machinery, so that he was unable to cope in speed with the Peruvian vessels. Owing to this and on account of ill health, Williams resigned in September, 1880, and was succeeded by Admiral Galvarino Riveros.

WILLICH, August, b. in Gorzyn, in the Prussian province of Posen, in 1810; d. in St. Mary's, Mercer co., Ohio, 23 Jan., 1878. His father, a captain of hussars during the Napoleonic wars, died when August was three years old. With an elder brother, the boy found a home in the family of Friedrich Schleiermacher, the famous theologian, whose wife was a distant relative. He received a military education at Potsdam and Berlin, and at eighteen years of age was commissioned 2d lieutenant of artillery in the Prussian army, becoming a captain in 1841. In 1846, in company with a number of the younger and more ardent officers of his brigade, he became so imbued with republican ideas that he tendered his resignation from the army in a letter written in such terms that, instead of its being accepted, he was arrested and tried by a court-martial. By some means he was acquitted, and afterward was permitted to resign. When the great revolution of 1848 threatened the overthrow of all European monarchies, Willich, with several former army friends, among whom were Franz Sigel, Friederich K. F. Hecker, Louis Blenker, and Carl Schurz, went to Baden and took an active part in the armed attempt to revolutionize Germany. After its failure, Willich and many of his compatriots became exiles. He escaped to Switzerland, but afterward made his way to England, where several of his fellow-exiles had also found refuge. Here he remained till 1853, devoting much of his time and labor to aiding his distressed countrymen to reach the United States. He had learned the trade of a carpenter while in England, and so earned a livelihood. Coming to the United States in 1853, he first found employment at his trade in the navy-yard at Brooklyn. Here his attainments in mathematics and other scientific studies were soon discovered, and he found more congenial work in the coast survey. In 1858 he was induced to go to Cincinnati as editor of the "German Republican," in which work he continued till the opening of the civil war in 1861. He enlisted, at the first call to arms, in the 1st German (afterward 9th Ohio) regiment, which within three days mustered about 1,500 men. He was at once appointed adjutant, and, on 28 May, commissioned major. This regiment afterward became one of the best in the service. In the autumn of 1861 Gov. Oliver P. Morton, of Indiana, who was raising a German regiment in that state, commissioned him as its colonel. This was the 32d Indiana infantry, famous in the Army of the Cumberland for its drill and discipline, as well as for its gallantry in action. Willich devoted himself to this regiment, and with such good results that, on 26 Nov., 1861, three companies, deployed as skirmishers, repelled in confusion a regiment of Texan rangers. This affair gave it a prestige that it retained to the end of the war. On 17 July, 1862, he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers. At the battle of Stone River, 31 Dec., 1862, he was captured almost before the action began, and was held a prisoner for several months. He was exchanged in season to take part, at the head of his brigade, in the battle of Chickamauga, 19 and 20 Sept., 1863, and from that time on he shared in all the movements and battles of the army, including the Atlanta campaign and the march to the sea and through the Carolinas. He was made brevet major-general, 21 Oct., 1865, and was mustered out of service, 15 Jan., 1866. On his return to Cincinnati he was chosen county auditor, which post he held for three years. He was visiting his old home in Germany at the beginning of the Franco-Prussian war, and at once offered his services to the king, whom he had before attempted to dethrone. His offer was gratefully acknowledged, but, on account of his advanced age, it was not accepted. He found consolation, if not more congenial occupation, in attending lectures on philosophy at Berlin. Returning to the United States, he chose St. Mary's, Ohio, as his residence.

WILLING, Thomas, lawyer, b. in Philadelphia, 19 Dec., 1731; d. there, 19 Jan., 1821. He was carefully educated at Bath, England, and, after reading law in the Temple, London, in 1754, became the head of the mercantile house of Willing and Morris, one of the largest in the country, his partner being Robert Morris, the financier of the Revolution. This partnership continued until 1793. During the Revolution this firm were the agents of congress for supplying naval and military stores. In 1755 he was elected a member of the common council of Philadelphia, and in 1759 was made alderman, but did not accept until 1761. On 2 Oct., 1759, he was made an associate justice of the city court, and on 28 Feb., 1761, became justice of the peace of the court of common pleas, quarter sessions, and orphans' court, and was re-appointed in 1764. On 4 Oct., 1763, he was elected by the common council mayor of the city, and from 14 Sept., 1767, till 1774 was an associate justice of the supreme court of Pennsylvania, and justice of the oyer and terminer, and general jail delivery. He was a leader in the movement against the stamp-act, and one of the committee to enforce the non-importation agreement of 1765. He presided at a mass-meeting held in Philadelphia, 18 June, 1774, to take action for a general congress of all the colonies, and was appointed one of the committee of correspondence. On 15 July he was chairman of a patriotic meeting in Carpenters' hall. He was afterward a member of the committee of safety, was elected a representative to the assembly on the "moderate men's" ticket in April, 1775, and was a delegate to the Continental congress in 1775-'6, being elected in the place of Joseph Galloway. In congress he voted against Richard Henry Lee's preliminary resolutions and the Declaration of Independence, because he considered the act premature and unnecessary, and the colonies not ready for independence. When the British took possession of Philadelphia in 1777, he remained during their occupation and held communication with Lord Howe. At a critical period of the war, in 1780, when there was great danger of the dissolution of the American army for want of provisions to keep it together, Willing and others in Philadelphia subscribed £260,000 toward the foundation of the Pennsylvania bank to procure the necessary supplies and to promote the recruiting service. Of this amount he subscribed £5,000. Upon the formation of the Bank of North America in 1781, which was the first bank chartered in this country, he was elected its president, and continued to serve until he resigned, 9 Jan., 1792. He was also first president of the Bank of the United States, which was organized in 1791. With his many public duties he united the business of an active and successful merchant.

WILLIS, Anson, lawyer, b. in Ulster county, N. Y., 28 Jan., 1802; d. in Portchester, N. Y., 14 Dec., 1874. He was self-taught, studied law, and was for forty years a resident of New York city, which he represented in the assembly in 1835-'6. Afterward he served two terms as judge of the 6th judicial district court in that city. During the civil war he was a zealous supporter of the U. S. government. Judge Willis published "Our Rulers and Our Rights, or Outlines of the United States Government" (Philadelphia, 1868), and left unfinished "Origin of all the Nations of the Earth."

WILLIS, Michael, Canadian educator, b. in Greenock, Scotland, in 1799; d. in Aberdeen, Banffshire, Scotland, 19 Aug., 1879. He was the son of the Rev. William Willis, who for nearly fifty years was a minister first in Greenock and then in Stirling. The son was educated at the University of Glasgow and at the Divinity hall, ordained minister of the Renfield street church, Glasgow, and about the same time was appointed professor of divinity for the secession branch of the Presbyterian church, to which both he and his father belonged. At the disruption in 1843 Mr. Willis accompanied the Free church, and soon afterward removed to Canada as a deputy of that body, and also to render assistance to the recently established Knox college, Toronto. He became professor of theology in that institution in 1845, which chair he filled till 1870, when he resigned. During the latter years of his connection with the college he was its principal. He did much to promote the cause of Presbyterianism in Canada, and was well known for his eloquence as a preacher. He published a volume of "Pulpit and College Discourses," and many pamphlets and sermons.

WILLIS, Nathaniel Parker, poet, b. in Portland, Me., 20 Jan., 1806; d. near Cornwall-on-the-Hudson, N. Y., 20 Jan., 1867. He came of a race of printers and publishers. His great-grandfather was a printer in Boston, his grandfather was the proprietor of the "Independent Chronicle," the "Potomac Guardian," and the "Sciota Gazette," which still exists in the town of that name, and his father, Nathaniel (1780-1870), established the "Eastern Argus" at Portland, Me., in 1803, afterward projected and conducted in Boston (in 1816-'26) the "Recorder," one of the earliest religious papers in the world, and also founded in 1827 the "Youth's Companion," which is said to be the first children's paper that was ever published, and which is still issued. The son was graduated at Yale in 1827. During his course at college he wrote under the pen-name of "Roy," for his father's paper, a series of religious narrative poems that found many readers, and he also gained the prize of fifty dollars offered for the best poem by the editor of "The Album." After leaving college, Willis edited for Samuel G. Goodrich, of Boston, two illustrated annuals, "The Legendary" (1828) and "The Token" (1829). During the last-mentioned year he established "The American Monthly Magazine," which ran a two years' career, and became merged in the "New York Mirror."

W. P. Willis

This weekly publication, devoted to art, literature, and society, established by Samuel Woodworth, was at this time conducted by George P. Morris. Its most readable articles were extracts from English periodicals. The accession of such contributors as Theodore S. Fay and Mr. Willis, with other able writers, changed the character of this paper and made it the chief organ of society and literature. In 1831 both Fay and Willis departed for the Old World and became weekly correspondents for their journal. Willis travelled over the greater part of Europe and into Asia Minor. William C. Rives, then U. S. minister at the court of France, attached him formally to his legation, which gave the young poet great facilities for information and travel and an entrance into distinguished society. In 1837 Mr. Willis married the daughter of Gen. William Stace, commandant of the Woolwich arsenal, and in the same year returned to this country. They settled in a romantic home, which the poet named Glenmary, near Owego, N. Y., for several years dispensing open-handed hospitality. In 1839 the author made a brief visit to England in the interest of his private affairs, and in 1844, on the death of his wife, Willis again crossed the Atlantic for the purpose of recruiting his shattered health. In 1846 he married the adopted daughter of Joseph Grinnell, of New Bedford, and settled on a small estate which he called Idlewild, near Cornwall-on-the-Hudson, seen in the vignette. From 1823, until 1842, with brief interruptions, he had continued his connection with the "Mirror." A short breach occurred between him and Morris in 1839, when Willis united his interest with that of William T. Porter to publish "The Corsair," a short-lived weekly. The then unknown William M. Thackeray was one of its regular contributors. On the discontinuance of the "Mirror," Morris and Willis issued the "New Mirror," but, having no success, their paper was changed in form and feature and became the successful "Home Journal," which still continues to prosper. Both editors conducted it until the time of their death. Although far from being handsome in person, Willis became known as a man of elegant manners who dressed in the extreme of fashion. His early career as a writer was one of remarkable success. His scripture versions quickly became popular and they were quoted from the pulpit. "Absalom" and "The Leper" were especial favorites. Among his secular pieces, "The Belfry Pigeon," "Unseen Spirits," and "Parrhasius the Painter" were included in most anthologies. As a prose writer of ease and elegance, Willis was justly admired. He was an observing traveller and knew how to present his adventures in glowing colors. As a man of society he attracted and charmed the fashionable world. To this day "Pencillings by the Way" can be read with pleasure, and his thoughtful "Letters from under a Bridge," written in the seclusion of Glenmary, continue to attract the attention of readers. But the elegance of Willis's prose was occasionally marred by frivolous conceits and affected Gallicisms in writing for effect by overstated simple truths, and he made merchandise of facts and opinions that he gleaned in private intercourse. These last transgressions eventually led to quarrels and personal encounters. Lockhart gave him a severe castigation in the "Quarterly Review," and, with Capt. Marryat, then editor of the "Metropolitan Magazine," he fought a bloodless duel. The ephemeral character of most of Willis's books is indicated by their titles; some were evidently revised collections of old magazine articles. During his stay in England he contributed to "Blackwood," the "New Monthly," and other periodicals. His early prose works, published in London, attracted a wide circle of readers, but the author's ambitious poems, "Melanie," "The Lady Jane," and "Lord Ivon's Daughter," were failures, as was also his novel, "Paul Fane." The two dramas, "Bianca Visconti" and "Tortosa, the Usurer," performed for several nights at the Park theatre, New York, strongly cast and well mounted, were without dramatic vigor and failed to interest the public. Willis was a careful elaborator, who retouched his manuscripts so continuously that he frequently found it necessary to make a fresh copy for the printers. On various occasions Willis delivered poems at college commencements, and in 1844, at the New York Lyceum, an address on fashion which was attended by Cooper, Irving, and other authors and poets of the day. Many a struggling aspirant for literary fame received aid and advice from Willis, who, as Halleck said, "was one of the kindest of men." Thackeray asserted that "it is comfortable that there should have been a Willis." Of his writings it has been remarked: "The prose and poetry of Mr. Willis are alike distinguished for exquisite finish and melody. His language is pure, varied, and rich, his imagination brilliant, and his wit of the first quality. Many of his descriptions of natural scenery are written pictures, and no other American author has represented with equal vivacity and truth the manners of the age." His publications include "Scripture Sketches" (Boston, 1827); "Fugitive Poetry" (1829); "Poem delivered before the Society of the United Brethren" (New York, 1831); "Melanie, and other Poems" (London, 1835; New York, 1837); "Pencillings by the Way" (London, 1835; New York, 1836); "Inklings of Adventure" (1836); "Bianca Visconti," a drama (1839); "Tortosa, the Usurer," a drama (1839); "Loiterings of Travel" (New York, 1839); "Al Abri, or the Tent pitched" (1839; London, 1840); "Letters from under a Bridge" (London, 1840); "Poems" (New York, 1843); "Lady Jane, and other Poems" (1844); "Dashes at Life with a Free Pencil" (1845); "Rural Letters"

(1849); "Life Here and There" (1850); "People I have Met" (1850); "Hurrygraphs" (1851); "Fun Jottings" (1853); "A Summer Cruise in the Mediterranean" (1853); "A Health Trip to the Tropics" (1854); "Out Doors at Idlewild" (1854); "Famous Persons and Places" (1854); "The Rag-Bag" (1855); "Paul Fane," a novel (1857); "Poems" (1858); and "The Convalescent" (1859). He also edited and compiled "Scenery of the United States and Canada" (London, 1840); "Scenery and Antiquities of Ireland" (1842); "A Life of Jenny Lind" (Philadelphia, 1851); and "Trenton Falls" (New York, 1851). His life has been written by Henry A. Beers in the "American Men of Letters" series (Boston, 1885), who has also issued "Selections" from his prose writings (New York, 1885).—His only son, BAILEY, was graduated at the Columbia college school of mines in 1878, and is now an assistant on the U. S. geological survey.—His brother, Richard Storrs, journalist, b. in Boston, Mass., 10 Feb., 1819, was graduated at Yale in 1841, and adopted literature as a profession. He has edited the "New York Musical World" and "Once a Week," contributed to current literature, and published "Church Chorals and Choir Studies" (New York, 1854); "Our Church Music; a Book for Pastors and People" (1855); and "Carols and Music Poems" (15 nos., 1860-'1). He contributed to "National Hymns" (1861) and to the American edition of the "Life of Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy" (1865).

WILLIS, William, lawyer, b. in Haverhill, Mass., 31 Aug., 1794; d. in Portland, Me., 17 Feb., 1870. He was graduated at Harvard in 1813, and after studying law was admitted to the Suffolk bar in January, 1817. Opening an office in Boston, he practised there till April, 1819, when his former preceptor, Prentiss Mellen, having been elected to the U. S. senate, invited Mr. Willis to take charge of his practice. In 1820, on the organization of the state of Maine, Mr. Mellen became its first chief justice, and then Mr. Willis continued his profession alone until 1835, when he became associated with William P. Fessenden. For twenty years this partnership continued. His tastes never led him toward court-practice, but rather toward conveyancing and other departments of real-estate business, in which he was considered unusually well informed and accurate. In 1855 he was elected to the Maine senate, and in 1859 he became mayor of Portland. He was chosen a Republican presidential elector in 1860, and the degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Bowdoin in 1867. He was a member of nearly all the state historical societies; including that of Massachusetts, of which in 1867 he was elected vice-president, and in 1855-'9 he was one of the vice-presidents of the New England historic-genealogical society. He became in 1828 a member of the Maine historical society, of which he was successively recording secretary, treasurer, and then president in 1856-'65. He was also chief editor of all the publications of the society. His publications include "The History of Portland, from its First Settlement, with Notices of the Neighboring Towns, and of the Changes of the Government in Maine, Portland" (2 parts, Portland, 1831-'3; enlarged ed. entitled "The History of Portland from 1632 to 1864," 1865); "Report of the Committee on the Riot in Portland" (1855); "Introductory Address before the Maine Historical Society" (1855); "Inaugural Address before the Maine Historical Society" (1857); "Genealogy of the McKinstry Family, with a Preliminary Essay on the Scotch-Irish Immigrations to America" (Boston, 1858); "Descriptive Catalogue of Books and Pamphlets relating to Maine" (New York, 1859); and "A History of the Law, the Courts, and the Lawyers of Maine from its First Colonization to the Early Part of the Present Century" (Portland, 1863). See "A Tribute to the Memory of Hon. William Willis," by Charles Henry Hart (Philadelphia, 1870).

WILLISTON, Ebenezer Bancroft, educator, b. in Tunbridge, Vt., in 1801; d. in Norwich, Vt., 27 Dec., 1837. He was a second cousin of George Bancroft. He spent three years at Dartmouth, and was graduated at the University of Vermont in 1823. He had already begun to teach in Capt. Alden Partridge's military academy in Norwich, Vt., where he was subsequently a professor. Feeble health forced him to spend most of the last nine years of his life at the south, where he was for some time president of Jefferson college, Miss. He published an edition of Tacitus (Hartford, Conn., 1826) and "The Eloquence of the United States" (5 vols., Middletown, Conn., 1827).—His son, EDWARD BANCROFT, a major in the 3d U. S. artillery, received four brevets for gallantry in the civil war.

WILLISTON, Samuel, philanthropist, b. in Easthampton, Mass., 17 June, 1795; d. there, 18 July, 1874. His father, Rev. Payson Williston (1763-1856), was graduated at Yale in 1783, was minister of Easthampton from 1789 till 1833, and published several sermons. The son began to study at Phillips Andover academy with a view to the ministry, but abandoned his purpose, owing to weakness of the eyes, and engaged in the manufacture of buttons, in which he gained a large fortune. This occupation was begun at his own home by his wife, and extended until many hundred women in the neighboring towns were employed in it under his superintendence. In 1831 Joel Hayden began to make buttons in Williamsburg, Mass., with machinery of his own invention, and, Mr. Williston entering into partnership with him, they continued the business there till 1848, when Williston bought Hayden's rights and removed the factory to Easthampton. Afterward he engaged also in the manufacture of suspenders. In 1840 he established at his native place Williston seminary, a preparatory school of high grade, to which he gave at various times about $270,000 and bequeathed $500,000 more. He also gave to Amherst $150,000, endowing professorships there in 1858-'9, gave liberally to Mount Holyoke female seminary, and three times erected a church at Easthampton, which was twice burned. His benefactions amounted to more than $1,500,000. He also did much to improve the appearance of his native town. In 1841-'3 Mr. Williston was a member of the Massachusetts legislature. His widow gave to the seminary that bears his name the Williston homestead to be used as the principal's house after her death, which occurred in 1885.

WILLISTON, Seth, clergyman, b. in Suffield, Conn., 4 April, 1770; d. in Guilford Centre, Chenango co., N. Y., 2 March, 1851. His father was a farmer and saddler, and the son assisted him in both occupations. He was graduated at Dartmouth in 1791, taught at Windsor and New London, Conn., and, after studying theology with Rev. Dr. Charles Backus at Somers, was licensed to preach in 1794. After occupying several pulpits in Connecticut temporarily, he went to Chenango county, N. Y., and labored as an evangelist, being ordained in 1797. He organized several churches, including that of Lisle, N. Y., where he became minister in 1799. On 4 July, 1810, Mr. Williston was installed over a Presbyterian church in Durham, N. Y., where he remained till his dismissal, at his own request, on 22 Dec., 1828, after which he preached in various places, chiefly in the state of New York, and also devoted much time to literature. Hamilton college gave him the degree of D. D. in 1838. Dr. Williston published "Address to Parents" (Suffield, Conn., 1799; Greenock, Scotland, 1802); "Sermons on Doctrinal and Experimental Religion" (1812); "Five Discourses on the Sabbath" (1813); "Vindication of Some of the Most Essential Doctrines of the Reformation" (1817); "Sermons on the Mystery of the Incarnation and the Special Influences of the Spirit" (1823); "Sermons adapted to Revivals" (1828); "Harmony of Divine Truth" (1836); "Discourses on the Temptations of Christ" (1837); "Christ's Kingdom not of This World," three discourses (1843); "Lectures on the Moral Imperfections of Christians" (1846); and "Millennial Discourses," which he sold for the benefit of missions (1848).

WILLS, James, philanthropist, b. in England about 1760; d. in Philadelphia about 1830. His father was in early life a coachman, but subsequently amassed a fortune in business in Philadelphia, which he bequeathed to his son. James was a member of the Society of Friends, and never married. He was well known as a grocer in Philadelphia, where his integrity and uprightness in business gained him the esteem of the whole community. He bequeathed to the "mayor and corporation of Philadelphia and to their successors forever" more than $122,000 to found "the Wills hospital for the relief of indigent blind and lame," giving preference to those in Philadelphia and vicinity. The corner-stone was laid on 2 April, 1832.

WILLSON, Forceythe, poet, b. in Little Genesee, Allegheny co., N. Y., 10 April, 1837; d. in Alfred, N. Y., 2 Feb., 1867. He was christened Byron Forceythe, but dropped the first name in early manhood. His father, Hiram Willson, a native of Vermont, had been a teacher, was afterward postmaster at Little Genesee, and was engaged in the lumber business there. In 1846 he placed his family and his household goods on a raft, and descended the Allegheny and Ohio rivers. They lived for six years at Covington, Ky., where Mr. Willson was the chief founder of the common-school system. Subsequently they removed to New Albany, Ind., where he died in 1859, leaving a comfortable fortune to his four children. Forceythe, the eldest, studied at Antioch and at Harvard, but failing health prevented him from finishing the course. He became an editorial writer for the Louisville "Journal," vigorously sustaining the National cause during the civil war, and his earliest poems also appeared in that paper. In 1864-'6 he lived in Cambridge, Mass., to superintend the education of a younger brother. He was a firm believer in spiritualism. His best-known poem is "The Old Sergeant," originally written as a carrier's address for the Louisville "Journal," 1 Jan., 1863, which tells a literally true story, even the names being genuine. He published a small volume, containing all of his poems that he cared to preserve (Boston, 1866).—His wife, Elizabeth Conwell, b. in New Albany, Ind., 26 June, 1842; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 13 Oct., 1864, married him in 1863. Her maiden name was Smith. A volume of her poems was printed privately in 1865. See an article by John James Piatt in the "Atlantic Monthly" for March, 1875.

WILLSON, James Renwick, clergyman, b. near Pittsburg, Pa., 9 April, 1780; d. in Coldenham, N. Y., 29 Sept., 1853. He was graduated at Jefferson in 1805 and licensed to preach as a Reformed Presbyterian in 1807. He then took charge of schools in Pennsylvania till 1817, when he became pastor of the Coldenham and Newburg congregations in New York, and, with the exception of a pastorate at Albany in 1830-'3, retained the former charge till 1840. In 1838 he had been appointed professor in the Eastern theological seminary, and retained his chair after the union with the Western seminary till 1851. He received the degree of D. D. in 1828 from the western University of Pennsylvania. He edited "The Evangelical Witness" in 1822-'6, the "Christian Statesman" in 1827-'8, and the "Albany Quarterly" in 1831-'3. In connection with the last he published a "History of the Church of Scotland." His other published works are "An Historical Sketch of Opinions on the Atonement" (Philadelphia, 1817); "Prince Messiah's Claims to Dominion over all Government" (Albany, 1832); "The Written Law" (1840); and many single sermons and addresses.—His son, James McLeod, clergyman, b. near Elizabeth, Allegheny co., Pa., 17 Nov., 1809; d. in Allegheny, Pa., 31 Aug., 1866, was graduated at Union in 1829, licensed by a Reformed presbytery in 1834, and from that year till 1862 held a pastorate in Philadelphia, being elected professor in the Reformed Presbyterian theological seminary at Allegheny in 1859. From Westminster college, Pa., he received the degree of D. D. in 1865. He was chairman of the committee that published "True Psalmody" (Philadelphia, 1859), and edited the "Covenant-er," a monthly, from 1845 till 1863, when it was consolidated with the "Reformed Presbyterian," of which he was co-editor till his death. Dr. Willson published "The Deacon" (Philadelphia, 1841); "Bible Magistracy" (1842); "Civil Government" (1853); "Social Religious Covenanting" (1856); and "Witnessing" (1861).—James McLeod's son, David Burt, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 27 Sept., 1842, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1860 and at Jefferson medical college in 1863, serving in the medical corps of the U. S. army from that date till 1865. He was then graduated at the Allegheny seminary in 1869, ordained as a Reformed Presbyterian, and was pastor in Allegheny from 1870 till 1875, when he was chosen to his present post in the seminary there as professor of theology. Besides publishing occasional addresses he edited an edition of "Lyman's Historical Chart" (Philadelphia, 1867), and since 1874 has been an editor of the "Reformed Presbyterian and Covenant-er" in Pittsburg.

WILLSON, Marcius, author, b. in West Stockbridge, Mass., 8 Dec., 1813. He was graduated at Union college in 1836 and became a teacher, but studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1839. A bronchial affection compelled him to relinquish both professions till 1849, when he became principal of Canandaigua academy, and remained there four years. Among his numerous educational works are "Civil Polity and Political Economy" (New York, 1838); "Perspective, Architectural, and Landscape Drawing" (1839); series of histories (1845-'54); two series of reading-books (New York, 1860-'72; Philadelphia, 1881-'2); spellers (1864-'70); "New System of Plane Trigonometry" (1874); "Mosaics of Bible History" (2 vols., 1883); "Mosaics of Grecian History" (1883); and "The Wonderful Story of Old," an illustrated work on the Bible (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1888).

WILMARTH, Lemuel Everett, artist, b. in Attleborough, Mass., 11 Nov., 1835. He studied at the academy in Munich under Wilhelm von Kaulbach in 1859-'63, and under Jean L. Gérôme at the École des beaux arts, Paris, in 1864-'7.

Since 1870 he has had charge of the schools of the National academy, of which he was elected an associate in 1871 and an academician in 1873. Among his works, principally genre pictures, are "Captain Nathan Hale" (1866); "Playing two Games at the same Time" (1867); "The Home Missionary" (1869); "Another Candidate for Adoption" (1871); "Guess what I have brought You" (1873); "Left in Charge" (1874); "Ingratitude" (1875); "Feat of Courage" (1876); "A Plea for the Homeless" (1877); "Pick of the Orchard" (1878); and "Jack's Return" (1879).

WILMARTH, Seth, inventor, b. in Brattleboro', Vt., 8 Sept., 1810; d. in Malden, Mass., 5 Nov., 1886. He became a machinist in Pawtucket, R. I., and in 1855 was appointed superintendent and master-mechanic of the Charlestown navy-yard. During the twenty years of his service there he made many valuable improvements in various departments, the most important being the large planer and the great lathe in the machine-shop, which were then the largest of their kind in the world, both bearing his name as inventor. Among his patents, numbering about twenty, were those for his revolving turrets, and for the hydraulic lift for raising the turret shafts on monitor vessels. Soon after the war the latter was submitted to the navy department, and was rejected as being of questionable utility, if not dangerous, its purpose having been efficiently accomplished by the means of a sledge-hammer and screw-wedge on many existing vessels. About 1873 the same plan was purchased by the U. S. government for $50,000.

WILMER, Lambert A., author, b. about 1805; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 21 Dec., 1863. In early life he edited the Baltimore "Saturday Visitor," and for many years afterward he was connected with "The Pennsylvanian," in Philadelphia. He was the author of a "New System of Grammar"; "The Quacks of Helicon" (1851); "Life, Travels, and Adventures of Ferdinand de Soto" (Philadelphia, 1858); and "Our Press-Gang, or a Complete Exposition of the Corruptions and Crimes of the American Newspapers" (1859).

WILMER, William Holland, clergyman, b. in Kent county, Md., 29 Oct., 1782; d. in Williamsburg, Va., 24 July, 1827. His ancestors were early settlers of Maryland, and his uncle, James J. Wilmer, a clergyman of the Episcopal church, was secretary of the first meeting of the clergy of the United States in 1783. On his motion the "Church of England in the colonies" adopted the name of the Protestant Episcopal church. William was educated at Washington college in Kent county, and was for some time occupied in mercantile pursuits. He was admitted to orders in 1808 by Bishop Claggett, and was rector of Chester parish, Md., in 1808-'12, and of St. Paul's, Alexandria, Va., in 1812-'22. He was elected rector of St. John's, Washington city, in 1816, but declined. In 1819 he began the publication of the "Washington Theological Repertory," and he continued in connection with it until 1826. During his pastorate in Alexandria he built the present St. Paul's church, was an originator of the Education society of the District of Columbia, and its president for several years, aiding in preparing for orders the first graduates of the Virginia Protestant Episcopal seminary, of which he was a founder. When it was removed from Fairfax Court-House to Alexandria in 1823, he was appointed professor of systematic theology, ecclesiastical history, and church polity, and he was chosen assistant rector of the Monumental church, Richmond, Va., in 1826, but declined. The same year he became president of William and Mary college, and rector of the church in Williamsburg, which posts he held till his death. Dr. Wilmer was very active and efficient in trying to resuscitate the Episcopal church in Virginia, and used his pen freely and effectually. He was a delegate to general conventions in 1821-'6, and president of the house of clerical and lay deputies. He received the degree of D. D. from Brown in 1820. He published numerous sermons on special occasions (1813-'20); many able articles in the "Theological Repertory" (1819-'26); "Episcopal Manual" (1815); and "Controversy with Baxter, a Jesuit Priest" (1818).—His son, Richard Hooker, P. E. bishop, b. in Alexandria, Va., 15 March, 1816, was graduated at Yale in 1836, and at the Theological seminary of Virginia in 1839, was ordained in the Monumental church, Richmond, Va., on Easter-day, 1840, and was rector of numerous churches, chiefly in Virginia, till 1864, when he was consecrated bishop of Alabama in St. Paul's church, Richmond, Va., 6 March, 1862.

He received the degree of D. D. from William and Mary college, Va., in 1850, and that of LL. D. from the University of Oxford, England, in 1867, and from the University of Alabama in 1880. At the close of the civil war Bishop Wilmer recommended to the clergy of his diocese the omission of the prayer "for the president and all in civil authority," on the ground that only military government existed in Alabama, whereupon Gen. George H. Thomas suspended him and his clergy from their functions; but the order was afterward set aside by President Johnson. He is the author of "The Recent Past, from a Southern Standpoint: Reminiscences of a Grandfather" (New York, 1887).—William Holland's nephew, Joseph Pere Bell, P. E. bishop, b. in Kent county, Md., 11 Feb., 1812; d. in New Orleans, La., 2 Dec., 1878, was educated at Kenyon college, and the Protestant Episcopal theological seminary, Alexandria, Va. He was ordered deacon in July, 1834, and ordained priest in May, 1838, and, after serving for a few months as chaplain at the University of Virginia, was appointed in 1839 a chaplain in the U. S. army. He resigned his commission in 1843, was in charge successively of Hungar's parish, Northampton co., and St. Paul's parish, Goochland co., Va., became rector of St. Mark's church, Philadelphia, in 1848, continuing there till the beginning of the civil war, when he resigned, and settled on his plantation in Albemarle county, Va. He went to England in 1863 to purchase Bibles for the Confederate army, was captured on his return voyage, and for a short time confined in the old Capitol prison, Washington, D. C. He became bishop of Louisiana in 1866. The diocese at that time was in a disorganized condition, but he devoted himself with great energy to reconstructing churches that had been burned, and supplying vacant pulpits, and was successful in restoring the affairs of the diocese to a prosperous condition.

Rich H Wilmer

Bishop Wilmer was popularly classed with the high church party. He was noted as an eloquent speaker, and a popular pulpit orator.

WILMOT, David, jurist, b. in Bethany, Pa., 20 Jan., 1814; d. in Towanda, Pa., 16 March, 1868. He received an academical education at Bethany and at Aurora, N. Y., was admitted to the bar at Wilkesbarre, Pa., in 1834, and soon began practice at Towanda, where he afterward resided. His support of Martin Van Buren in the presidential canvass of 1836 brought him into public notice, and he was subsequently sent to congress as a Democrat, serving from 1 Dec., 1845, to 3 March, 1851. During the session of 1846, while a bill was pending to appropriate $2,000,000 for the purchase of a part of Mexico, he moved an amendment "that neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall ever exist in any part of said territory." This, which became known as the "Wilmot proviso," passed the house, but was rejected by the senate, and gave rise to the free-soil movement. Mr. Wilmot was president-judge of the 13th district of Pennsylvania in 1853-'61, a delegate to the National Republican conventions of 1856 and 1860, acting as temporary chairman of the latter, was defeated as the Republican candidate for governor of Pennsylvania in 1857, and elected to the U. S. senate as a Republican, in place of Simon Cameron, who resigned to become secretary of war in President Lincoln's cabinet, serving from 18 March, 1861, to 3 March, 1863. In that body he was a member of the committees on pensions, claims, and foreign affairs. He was appointed by President Lincoln judge of the U. S. court of claims in 1863, and died in office.

WILMOT, Lemuel Allan, Canadian statesman, b. in the county of Sunbury, New Brunswick, 31 Jan., 1809; d. in Fredericton, 20 May, 1878. He was educated at New Brunswick university, Fredericton, became an attorney in 1830, and two years later was called to the bar of New Brunswick. In 1834 he was elected to parliament by acclamation for the county of York. From the first he espoused the side of the Liberals, opposing the Family compact party, and advocating the principles of responsible government. He soon became the ac-knowledgeable leader of the Reformers of his province. In 1836 Mr. Wilmot went to England as a delegate with William Crane on the subject of crown revenues and the civil list. The colonial secretary, Lord Glenelg, received the delegates cordially and drafted a bill granting the reforms that they asked; but the lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick, Sir Archibald Campbell, withheld his approval, and tendered his resignation. The delegates were again despatched to England, with an address to the king, by whom they were favorably received. Sir Archibald Campbell's resignation was accepted, the civil-list bill became law, and a vote of thanks to the diplomats was passed by the legislature. Mr. Crane was called to the executive council, and Mr. Wilmot became a queen's counsel. In 1844 he accepted a seat in the executive council, without portfolio; but when the lieutenant-governor, Sir William Colebrooke, without consulting his advisers, appointed his son-in-law to the office of provincial secretary, Mr. Wilmot, with three colleagues, resigned his place in the cabinet. In 1847 Earl Grey, the colonial secretary, declared that the members of the executive council should hold office only while they possessed the confidence of a majority of the people. In 1848 the New Brunswick house of assembly passed a resolution approving of Earl Grey's despatch, after a long and spirited debate. Mr. Wilmot, who made the great speech of the occasion, was called on to form a government. He accepted the task, and his cabinet became a coalition ministry, with Liberal tendencies. As premier and attorney-general he became identified with the consolidation of the criminal laws and the municipal law. In 1850 he attended the International railway convention at Portland, Me. In the same year he visited Washington in a similar capacity, on the subject of reciprocity. In 1851-'68 he was a puisne judge of the supreme court of New Brunswick, during which time he employed the interval of leisure at his command in lecturing and in forwarding the cause of education, and benevolent and religious institutions. He was elected a member of the senate of the University of New Brunswick, which gave him the degree of D. C. L. When the question of union arose in 1865, Judge Wilmot was ready to espouse the side of the Unionists, but took no very active part in the contest. After the confederation was consummated he was selected to preside over his province as the first native governor. This office he held from 27 July, 1868, until 14 Nov., 1873, when he received a pension as a retired judge. In 1875 he became second commissioner under the Prince Edward island purchase act of that year, and he was also named one of the arbitrators in the Ontario and northwest boundary commission, but death prevented him from serving in the latter capacity.—His cousin, Robert Duncan, Canadian statesman, b. in Fredericton, New Brunswick, 16 Oct., 1809, is the son of John M. Wilmot, for several years a member of the provincial assembly. The son, at the age of five years, left his native town with his father to reside at St. John, where he attended school. On reaching manhood he engaged in shipping and milling. Afterward he went to Liverpool, England, where he resided until 1840, when he returned to St. John. He entered the parliament of his province in 1846, and held his seat for fifteen years. He was a strong Protectionist, and an uncompromising advocate of the greenback system of banking. In 1849 he was mayor of St. John. In 1851 he was asked to enter the New Brunswick government, and he filled the office of surveyor-general from that year until 1854. In 1856-'7 he held the office of provincial secretary in the Wilmot-Grey administration. In 1865 Mr. Wilmot opposed the scheme of union, and with his colleagues he succeeded in defeating the administration; in the new government he held his old portfolio. He attended the Colonial conference in London, England, on the union question in 1866-'7, and when, in 1867, the union was consummated, Mr. Wilmot was called to the senate of Canada by royal proclamation. He holds a patent of rank and precedence from the queen as an ex-councillor of New Brunswick. On 8 Nov., 1878, on the formation of Sir John Macdonald's ministry, he was sworn a member of the privy council of Canada, without portfolio. On the same day he succeeded David Christie as speaker of the senate. This government adopted the policy of protection to Canadian industries, which Mr. Wilmot aided in formulating. In February, 1880, he resigned the presidency of the senate to accept the lieutenant-governorship of New Brunswick, which post he held until 1885.

WILMOT, Samuel, Canadian pisciculturist, b. in Clarke, West Durham co., Ont., 22 Aug., 1822. He was educated at Upper Canada college, Toronto, and became a farmer. Mr. Wilmot has been warden of the united counties of Durham and Northumberland, a member of the agricultural and art associations of Ontario, and presided over the first Dominion exposition of agriculture, arts, and manufactures, at Ottawa in 1879. For many years he has given great attention to the subject of fish-culture, and in 1873 received through the French government a medal from the Société d'acclimatation for the services he had rendered in that department of practical science. He also obtained the gold medal for excellence in piscicultural exhibits in the Dominion exposition of agriculture and arts at Ottawa in 1879. Mr. Wilmot is superintendent of fish-culture operations for the Dominion government, and collected the exhibit of the fishery products of the Dominion for the World's fishery exposition in London in 1883, where he acted as chairman of the Canadian commission, and obtained by his system of fish-breeding the gold medal for "the best and most complete fish-breeding establishment in the great International fisheries exposition."

WILMSHURST, Zavarr, author, b. in Tunbridge Wells, England, 25 Nov., 1824; d. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 27 Jan., 1887. His name was William Bennett, but he early adopted by legal right the name he afterward bore. In youth he was one of the literary associates of the Countess of Blessington, and at that time attracted special attention by his translations of Norse poems. He was subsequently a clergyman for several years. On coming to the United States, he became connected with the New York press, and was associated editorially for many years with "The Atlas," "The Industrial Monitor," and "The Insurance Times," while for a short time he edited the "New York Weekly Review." He wrote for the stage, and also contributed stories and religious poetry to periodicals. Many of his hymns are much admired. Among his plays are a drama on Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter," and "Nitocria," a tragedy. His other writings are "The Viking," an epic (London, 1849); "The Winter of the Heart, and other Poems" (New York, 1874); "The Siren" (San Francisco, 1876); and "Ralph and Rose," a poem (New York, 1879).

WILSON, Sir Adam, Canadian jurist, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, 22 Sept., 1814. He emigrated to Canada in 1830, and during the succeeding three years was employed in the mills and store of his uncle, George Chalmers, in Trafalgar, Halton co. In 1834 he began to study law under Robert Baldwin Sullivan in Toronto, and in 1839 he was admitted to the bar of Upper Canada. In 1840 he entered into partnership with Robert Baldwin, leader of the Reform party, and on 28 Nov., 1850, was appointed a queen's counsel, being the same year elected a bencher of the Law society of Upper Canada. He was appointed in 1856 a commissioner for revising the statutes of Canada and of Upper Canada, elected mayor of Toronto in 1859 and 1860, and was the first to hold that office by popular election. He was in the Canada assembly for North York in 1859, and from May, 1862, till May, 1863, was solicitor-general in the Sandfield-Macdonald government, with a seat in the executive. On 11 May, 1863, he was appointed puisne judge of the court of queen's bench. Three months afterward he was transferred to the common pleas. He was reappointed to the queen's bench in 1868, became chief justice of the court of common pleas in 1878, and in 1884 was made chief justice of the court of queen's bench. In 1871 he was appointed a member of the law reform commission. He was knighted, 20 Dec., 1887. As a judge he has been noted for his learning and his mastery of the principles of law. He has published "A Sketch of the Office of Constable" (Toronto, 1861).

WILSON, Alexander, ornithologist, b. in Paisley, Renfrewshire, Scotland, 6 July, 1766; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 23 Aug., 1813. His father, a master weaver, had intended that Alexander should be a minister, but family cares and altered circumstances interfered. He attended the grammar-school, and his father imbued his mind with a passion for reading and a love for the beauties of nature, which clung to him for life. In 1779, when thirteen years of age, he was bound apprentice as a weaver to his brother-in-law, and after serving his time he continued working at the loom as a journeyman for four years more. During leisure hours he continued his studious habits, and indulged in solitary rambles, giving utterance to his thoughts in verse. Many of his early effusions appeared in the Glasgow "Advertiser" (now the "Herald"). His brother-in-law, Duncan, finding the weaving-trade inadequate for the support of his family, now resolved to try that of a peddler. He continued this wandering life for about three years, at the end of which he had accumulated as much material in verse as would make a volume. He accordingly returned to Paisley and published it (1790). Taking copies of his book with him, he again set out with his pack, but met with so little success that he resumed weaving. A second edition of his poems appeared in 1791, but its sale was still very limited. In 1792 Wilson's admirable narrative poem, "Watty and Meg," was published anonymously as a penny chapbook, and had an enormous circulation. Its authorship was generally ascribed to Burns. Wilson, however, is greater as an ornithologist than as a poet, but his poems entitle him to a respectable place among the minor bards of Scotland. His verse is mostly descriptive—terse and true, without being of a high or imaginative order. In Paisley, a dispute having arisen between the manufacturers and weavers, Wilson joined in the fray by writing some stinging personal lampoons, for which he was prosecuted and imprisoned. This induced him to leave the country. He walked to Port Patrick, crossed to Belfast, and there embarked in a vessel bound for New Castle, Del., sleeping on the deck of the crowded vessel during the voyage. He landed, with his fowling-piece in his hand and only a few shillings in his pocket, on 14 July, 1794, and set out at once to walk to Philadelphia. There he found employment from a copper-plate printer for a few weeks, then took to weaving for about a year, and, having saved a little money, resumed his pack, and so traversed the greater part of New Jersey, successfully disposing of his wares. Then he became a school-master, teaching successively at Frankfort, Pa., Millstone, Pa., Bloomfield, N. J., and lastly, in 1802, at Kingessing, near Philadelphia. Here he was welcomed by William Bartram, the botanist, and by Alexander Lawson, the engraver. The former gave him access to his garden and library, and the latter gave him practical instructions in drawing, coloring, and etching. After trying to draw various objects with indifferent success, he began to delineate birds, and in this walk he rapidly attained such a degree of proficiency that he far outstripped his teacher. This marked success seems to have fortified, if it did not suggest, his resolution to make a collection of birds. In October, 1804, accompanied by his nephew and another friend, he set out on a walking expedition to Niagara, which he satisfactorily accomplished. His companions left him, but he persevered, and reached home after an absence of fifty-nine days and a walk of 1,260 miles. He graphically described this journey in a long poem called "The Foresters." On his return he set about making preparations for his great work, and with his own hands etched two plates from his drawings, coloring them from nature. At this time he was employed in editing a new edition of Rees's "Cyclopædia," by Thomas Bradford, who cordially entered into his scheme and undertook to issue his "American Ornithology," the first volume of which made its appearance in 1808. On its publication Wilson set out with a copy to obtain subscribers, but the cost—$120 for the completed work—was a serious barrier. In 1810 the second volume was published, and Wilson again set out on a journey, this time lasting for six months, both to obtain subscribers and to collect material for succeeding volumes. On his way to New Orleans he had sailed 720 miles down the Ohio alone in a little open skiff, walked long distances, and ridden through wildernesses well-nigh impassable, slept for weeks in the woods, subsisting the while on biscuits and dried beef, and drinking water. His reputation was now spreading over the world. In 1812 he was elected a member of the American philosophical society, and similar honors were conferred on him by other learned bodies. In 1813 the seventh volume of the "Ornithology" was published, and the eighth was also nearly ready, but kept back by the want of proper assistants to color the plates. In this emergency Wilson himself undertook the work of this department, in addition to all his numerous other duties. Intense application and excessive labor weakened his constitution. In 1813 he swam a river with his clothes on, in pursuit of a rare bird, which he succeeded in capturing; but he took cold. Dysentery seized him, and he died after an illness of ten days. He was buried in the cemetery of the Swedish church, Philadelphia, with public honors, and a simple marble monument was placed over his grave. In personal appearance Wilson was tall and handsome, his dark-brown hair hung over his shoulders, his countenance was thoughtful and expressive, his eye full of intelligence and fire, and his conversation remarkable for vividness and originality. The plates for the ninth volume of the "Ornithology" had all been completed under Wilson's own eye, and the letter-press was supplied by Mr. George Ord, who had been Wilson's companion in several expeditions. Ord also furnished a memoir of the deceased naturalist. Three supplementary volumes of the "Ornithology," containing American birds not described by Wilson, were added by Charles Lucien Bonaparte. An edition in three volumes, with illustrative notes, and a life of Wilson by Sir William Jardine, was afterward published (3 vols., London, 1832). Numerous lives of Wilson have appeared, including one by William B. O. Peabody, in Sparks's "American Biography"; an anonymous one prefixed to the Belfast edition of Wilson's poems (1857); those by C. Lucy Brightwell (London, 1860), and Allan Park Paton (1863); and the memoir prefixed to the latest collected edition of "Wilson's Miscellaneous Prose Works and Poems," by the Rev. Alexander B. Grosart, LL. D. (2 vols., London, 1876).

WILSON, Allen Benjamin, inventor, b. in Willet, N. Y., 18 Oct., 1824; d. in Woodmont, Conn., 29 April, 1888. He was a cabinet-maker, and in 1849, while in Pittsfield, Mass., invented a sewing-machine without ever having seen one before. It used a double-pointed shuttle in combination with the needle, which made a stitch at each forward and backward movement of the shuttle, instead of one at each throw of the shuttle, as in Elias Howe's machine. His first patent bears the date of 12 Nov., 1850, and is the fifteenth on the patent-office record for an improved sewing-machine. This included the double-pointed shuttle and the two-motion feed-bar. In 1851 he secured a patent for the rotating hook, which was designed to supersede the shuttle, and to make the lock-stitch with greater rapidity, neatness, and economy of power. A year later he devised the four-motion feed, which was subsequently adopted in all machines. In his device the hook seizes the loop of thread in the needle when it has descended to its lowest point, opens it out, and carries it around the bobbin, so that the thread is then passed through the loop of the stitch. This is then drawn up with the thread in the needle, so that the two are looped together about half way through the cloth, forming the strongest possible seam, showing the stitching exactly even upon both sides, with no threads above the surface to wear off and allow the seam to rip. On the completion of his machine, Mr. Wilson entered into partnership with Nathaniel Wheeler, a practical manufacturer, and they began to make their machines in a small shop in Watertown. Their first machine, completed early in 1851, was sold for $125, and for a time this output was limited to eight or ten machines a week, but the demand soon increased, and they removed to Bridgeport, where they established the largest factory of its kind in the world, making 600 machines a day. In 1852 the firm was organized as the Wheeler and Wilson sewing-machine company, and Mr. Wilson withdrew from the business and settled in Waterbury, where he engaged in other enterprises.

WILSON, Alpheus Waters, M. E. bishop, b. in Baltimore, Md., in 1834. His father, Rev. Norval Wilson, was a well-known minister of the Methodist Episcopal church in Maryland and Virginia. The son was educated in Baltimore and Washington, and pursued the study of medicine, but left it for the ministry. When he was about nineteen years old he united with the Baltimore conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, and rose rapidly, taking some of the best appointments in Baltimore and other parts of the conference. His labors having impaired his health, he pursued the study of law, but as soon as his physical condition improved resumed the ministry. During the civil war the Baltimore conference of the Methodist Episcopal church, south, was organized, and he identified himself with it, and has been elected four times to its general conference. In 1878 he became secretary of the Board of missions, and a great change took place under his administration. In 1881 he attended as a delegate the ecumenical conference in London, reading a paper on the "Influence of Methodism on other Denominations," which was published in the transactions of the conference, and gave great satisfaction. He has also written a work on "Missions" (Nashville, 1882). In 1882 he was elected to the episcopacy, being chosen on the first ballot. Bishop Wilson is a remarkable preacher, and, except when compelled by sickness to suspend his labors, has been attentive and successful in every work committed to his care. In 1888 he set out on an episcopal tour around the world.

WILSON, Sir Daniel, Canadian educator, b. in Edinburgh, Scotland, 5 Jan., 1816. His brother, Dr. George Wilson, was the famous chemist and professor of technology in the University of Edinburgh. Daniel received his education at the high-school of his native city and at Edinburgh university, where he won high encomiums.

Dan. Wilson

At the age of twenty-one he left college and removed to London, where he adopted literature and journalism as his means of support. A few years afterward he returned to Edinburgh, where he resumed his pen, pursued the science of archæology, became the secretary of the Scottish society of antiquaries, and undertook the editorship of the proceedings of that institution. He also devoted himself to art with much skill and became proficient as a draughtsman. Wilson was offered the post of professor of history and English literature in University college, Toronto, in 1853. He had held the post but a short time when the authorities of McGill university, Montreal, offered him the principalship of that institution, but he declined to leave Toronto. In addition to his regular work, he continued to devote himself to archæology and ethnology. These he prosecuted with untiring industry, and always with excellent results, his lectures and discourses on those subjects, as well as on history and literature, being characterized by breadth of view and ripeness of scholarship and thought. As an examiner his tact and discernment served him well, and as a teacher he at once took a high place. In his capacity of lecturer he spoke with great clearness and vigor, and his public addresses always attracted large audiences. His plea before the committee of the Canadian parliament in behalf of University college and non-sectarian endowments is remembered as one of the most effective addresses ever heard before a public body. In 1880 he was called to the presidency of Toronto university, which post he still holds. In 1882, on the formation of the Royal society of Canada by the Marquis of Lorne, Dr. Wilson was selected by the governor-general to preside over the second section of that body, the department devoted to history, archæology, and English literature. In 1885 he succeeded to the presidency of the society. He has contributed many valuable papers on ethnology and archæology to the annual volumes of the "Proceedings" of that society, which have attracted attention abroad. Dr. Wilson is a fellow of the Royal societies of Edinburgh, Italy, and Copenhagen, and member of the Royal historical society of Great Britain, and many other learned bodies in both hemispheres. In 1885 McGill university conferred on him the degree of LL.D. Other colleges have honored him in a similar way before and since that date. In 1888 the same degree was conferred on him by Princeton. In 1888 the queen offered him the dignity of knighthood, which he declined for personal reasons. This act her majesty declined to entertain, and on 1 Aug. she issued letters-patent declaring him a knight of the United Kingdom. For many years he has been president of the Young men's Christian association of Toronto, and all schemes of a benevolent and charitable nature have ever found in him a devoted advocate. The Newsboys' home of Toronto was founded by him. For several years he has been chairman of the Ontario teachers' association, and twice he was elected by the high-school masters as their representative in the old council of public instruction. Besides voluminous contributions to periodical literature, and the proceedings of societies of which he is a member, he is the author of "Memorials of Edinburgh in the Olden Time," illustrated by himself (2 vols., Edinburgh, 1846-'8); "Oliver Cromwell and the Protectorate" (London, 1848); "The Archæology and Prehistoric Annals of Scotland," with illustrations by the author, which established his reputation as an archæologist of the first rank (Edinburgh, 1851; revised ed., entitled "Prehistoric Annals of Scotland," 2 vols., London, 1863); "Prehistoric Man" (2 vols., 1862; revised ed., 1865); "Chatterton: a Biographical Study" (London, 1869); "Caliban: the Missing Link" (1873); and "Reminiscences of Old Edinburgh" (2 vols., 1878). He has also published two volumes of poems, the second entitled "Spring Wild Flowers" (London, 1873), and has written many of the important articles on Canadian topics in the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

WILSON, David, author, b. in West Hebron, Washington co., N. Y., 17 Sept., 1818; d. in Albany, N. Y., 9 June, 1887. He was graduated at Union in 1840, studied law, was admitted to the bar in 1843, and practised at Whitehall, N. Y., until his health failed and he was compelled to relinquish his profession, after which he devoted himself largely to literary employments. He was a member of the assembly in 1852, and in 1854 declined a nomination for congress. He removed to Albany in 1857 on being appointed deputy state treasurer, and in the following year was elected clerk of the assembly. He was deputy clerk of the court of appeals in 1861-'4, and afterward engaged in the brewing and malting business. Mr. Wilson published "Life in Whitehall: a Tale of Ship-Fever Times" (Auburn, 1850); "Solomon Northrup, or Twelve Years a Slave," a narrative of the abduction and enslavement of a free negro of Washington county (1853); "Life of Jane McCrea," including an account of Gen. John Burgoyne's campaign (1854); "Life of Henrietta Robinson, the Veiled Murderess" (1855); and "A Narrative of Nelson Lee, a Captive among the Comanches" (1859). He collected materials for a history of the Six Nations, but did not live to complete the work.

WILSON, Ephraim King, senator b. in Snow Hill, Md., 22 Dec., 1821. He was graduated at Jefferson college in 1841, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and in 1847 was elected to the legislature. He established himself at Snow Hill, and practised with success in the Maryland courts till 1868. In 1852 he was a presidential elector on the Democratic ticket. Four years after retiring from legal practice he was elected to the National house of representatives, serving from 1 Dec., 1873, till 3 March, 1875. He was a judge of the Maryland circuit court from 1878 till 1884, when he was elected United States senator for the term ending 3 March, 1891, and was re-elected in 1890.

WILSON, Franklin, clergyman, b. in Baltimore, Md., 8 Dec., 1822. He was graduated at Brown in 1841, studied theology in Newton theological seminary, and was ordained to the Baptist ministry in 1846, but has held no pastorate, and has preached irregularly, on account of physical infirmities. He has served various worthy causes gratuitously, besides giving to them large sums of money. For many years, beginning with 1851, he was the editor of "The True Union," a Baptist weekly paper published in Baltimore, and he has long been a trustee of Columbian university, Washington, D. C. He is the author of a prize essay on "The Duties of Churches to their Pastors," and of several essays and tracts. In 1865 Columbian university conferred on him the degree of D. D.

WILSON, George Francis, manufacturer, b. in Uxbridge, Mass., 7 Dec., 1818; d. in East Providence, R. I., 19 Jan., 1883. He was apprenticed to the trade of wool-sorting at the age of seventeen, and at the end of three years became an expert in the business and familiar with all the machinery in the mill. Being ambitious of obtaining a better education, he entered the academy at Shelburne Falls, Mass., where he subsequently became a teacher. In 1844 he removed to Chicago, where he opened an academy that soon became a flourishing institution. He returned to the east in 1848 and settled in Providence, where he devoted himself to the manufacturing business. In 1855, with Eben N. Horsford, he began the manufacture of chemicals, under the style of George F. Wilson and Co., and two years later their establishment became known as the Rumford chemical works. The direct management of the works was controlled by him, and by his knowledge of mechanics he was able to devise various improvements in the machinery, resulting in the more economical manufacture of the goods. He also invented an improvement in the manufacture of steel, a revolving boiler for paper manufacture, and several improvements in illuminating apparatus for light-houses. Mr. Wilson devoted considerable attention to agriculture, to methods of fertilization of soils, and to the breeding of stock, while the range of his scientific knowledge was unusual for one whose life was almost entirely devoted to business pursuits. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Brown in 1872. He was a member of the city school committee, and was twice elected to represent Providence in the general assembly. During his residence in East Providence, whither he removed in 1861, he was for many years associated with the management of municipal affairs. He left $100,000 to Brown university, and $50,000 to Dartmouth college, to be used for scientific purposes.

WILSON, George Henry, musical writer, b. in Lawrence, Mass., 18 Feb., 1854. He was educated at the Lawrence high-school, and since 1874 has been a clerk in the custom-house at Boston. He is also the musical critic of the Boston "Traveller," and in 1883 began the "Boston Musical Year-Book," the title of which was changed in 1886 to the "Musical Year-Book of the United States." Since 1885 he has prepared annually an analytical and historical programme of the concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra.

WILSON, Henry, statesman, b. in Farmington, N. H., 16 Feb., 1812; d. in Washington, D. C., 22 Nov., 1875. He was the son of a farm-laborer, whose ancestors were from the north of Ireland, and at the age of ten was apprenticed to a farmer till the age of twenty-one. During those eleven years of service he received not more than twelve months' schooling altogether, but read more than a thousand volumes. When his apprenticeship terminated in December, 1833, he set out from Farmington on foot in search of work, which he found at Natick, Mass., in the house of a shoemaker. On attaining his majority he had his name, which was originally Jeremiah Jones Colbath, changed by legislative enactment to the simpler one of Henry Wilson. He learned the trade of his employer and followed it for two years, earning enough money to return to New Hampshire and study in the academies at Stafford, Wolfborough, and Concord. At the same time he made his appearance in public life as an ardent Abolitionist during the attempts that were made in 1835 to stop the discussion of the slavery question by violent means. The person to whom he had intrusted his savings became insolvent, and in 1838, after a visit to Washington, where his repugnance to slavery was intensified by the observation of its conditions, he was compelled to relinquish his studies and resume shoemaking at Natick. In 1840 he appeared in the political canvass as a supporter of William Henry Harrison, addressing more than sixty Whig meetings, in which he was introduced as the "Natick cobbler." In that year and the next he was elected to the Massachusetts house of representatives, and then after a year's intermission served three annual terms in the state senate.

He was active in organizing in 1845 a convention in Massachusetts to oppose the admission of Texas into the Union as a slave state, and was made, with John Greenleaf Whittier, the bearer of a petition to congress against the proposed annexation, which was signed by many thousands of Massachusetts people. In the following year he presented in the legislature a resolution condemnatory of slavery, supporting it with a comprehensive and vigorous speech. In 1848 he went as a delegate to the Whig national convention in Philadelphia; and on the rejection of anti-slavery resolutions spoke in protest and withdrew. On his return he defended his action before his constituents, and soon afterward bought the Boston "Republican" newspaper, which he edited for two years, making it the leading organ of the Free-soil party. He was chairman of the Free-soil state committee in 1849-'52. In 1850 he returned to the state senate, and in the two following years he was elected president of that body. He presided over the Free-soil national convention at Pittsburg in 1852, and in the ensuing canvass acted as chairman of the national committee of the party. As chairman of the state committee he had arranged a coalition with the Democrats by which George S. Boutwell was elected governor in 1851 and Charles Sumner and Robert Rantoul were sent to the U. S. senate. He was a candidate for congress in 1852, and failed of election by only ninety-three votes, although in his district the majority against the Free-soilers was more than 7,500. In 1853 he was a member of the State constitutional convention and proposed a provision to admit colored men into the militia organization. In the same year he was defeated as the Free-soil candidate for governor. He acted with the American party in 1855, with the aid of which he was chosen to succeed Edward Everett in the U. S. senate. He was a delegate to the American national convention in Philadelphia in that year, but, when it adopted a platform that countenanced slavery, he and other Abolitionists withdrew. He had delivered a speech in advocacy of the repeal of the fugitive-slave law and the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia shortly after taking his seat in the senate in February, 1855. On the disruption of the American organization through the secession of himself and his friends, he took an active part in the formation of the Republican party, with the programme of opposition to the extension of slavery. On 23 May, 1856, the morning after his colleague in the senate, Charles Sumner, was assaulted by Preston S. Brooks, Mr. Wilson denounced the act as "brutal, murderous, and cowardly." For this language he was challenged to a duel by Brooks; but he declined on the ground that the practice of duelling was barbarous and unlawful, at the same time announcing that he believed in the right of self-defence.

During the next four years he took part in all the important debates in the senate, delivering elaborate speeches on the admission of Kansas, the treasury-note bill, the expenditures of the government, the Pacific railroad project, and many other topics. His speeches bore the impress of practical, clear-sighted statesmanship, and if the grace of oratory and polished diction was wanting, they always commanded attention and respect. The congressional records during his long term of service in the senate show that he was one of the most industrious and efficient members of that body, and that his name stands connected with nearly all the important acts and resolves. Strong in his convictions, he was fearless in their expression, but he was scrupulously careful in his statements, and the facts he adduced were never successfully disputed. In March, 1859, he made a notable reply to James H. Hammond, of South Carolina, in defence of free labor, which was printed and widely circulated through the northern states. He had been continued in the senate for a full term by an almost unanimous vote of the Massachusetts legislature in the preceding January. In March, 1861, he was made chairman of the committee on military affairs, of which he had been a member during the preceding four years. He induced congress to authorize the enlistment of 500,000 volunteers at the beginning of hostilities between the states, and during the entire period of the war he remained at the head of the committee, and devised and carried measures of the first importance in regard to the organization of the army and the raising and equipment of troops, as well as attending to the many details that came before the committee. He had been connected with the state militia as major, colonel, and brigadier-general from 1840 till 1851, and in 1861 he raised the 22d regiment of Massachusetts volunteers, and marched to the field as its colonel, serving there as an aide to Gen. George B. McClellan till the reassembling of congress.

During the session of 1861-'2 he introduced the laws that abolished slavery in the District of Columbia, put an end to the "black code," allowed the enrolment of blacks in the militia, and granted freedom to slaves who entered the service of the United States and to their families. During the civil war he made many patriotic speeches before popular assemblages. He took a prominent part in the legislation for the reduction of the army after the war and for the reconstruction of the southern state governments, advocating the policy of granting full political and civil rights to the emancipated slaves, joined with measures of conciliation toward the people who had lately borne arms against the United States government. He was continued as senator for the term that ended in March, 1871, and near its close was re-elected for six years more. He was nominated for the office of vice-president of the United States in June, 1872, on the ticket with Ulysses S. Grant, and was elected in the following November, receiving 286 out of 354 electoral votes. On 3 March, 1873, he resigned his place on the floor of the senate, of which he had been a member for eighteen years, in order to enter on his functions as president of that body. The same year he was stricken with paralysis, and continued infirm till his death, which was caused by apoplexy.

It is but just to say of Henry Wilson that with exceptional opportunities which a less honest statesman might have found for enriching himself at the government's expense, or of taking advantage of his knowledge of public affairs and the tendency of legislation upon matters of finance and business, he died at his post of duty, as he had lived, rich only in his integrity and self-respect. Among his many published speeches may be mentioned "Personalities and Aggressions of Mr. Butler" (1856); "Defence of the Republican Party" (1856); "Are Workingmen Slaves?" (1858); "The Pacific Railroad" (1859); and "The Death of Slavery is the Life of the Nation" (1864). He was the author of a volume entitled "History of the Anti-Slavery Measures of the Thirty-seventh and Thirty-eighth United States Congresses," in which he relates the progress of the bills relating to slavery and cites the speeches of their friends and opponents (Boston, 1865); of a history of legislation on the army during the civil war, with the title of "Military Measures of the United States Congress" (1866); of a small volume called "Testimonies of American Statesmen and Jurists to the Truths of Christianity," being an address that he gave before the Young men's Christian association at Natick (1867); of a "History of the Reconstruction Measures of the Thirty-ninth and Fortieth Congresses, 1865-'8" (1868); of a series of articles on Edwin M. Stanton that were reprinted from a magazine, with those of Jeremiah S. Black, with the title of "A Contribution to History" (Easton, Pa., 1868); of a published oration on "The Republican and Democratic Parties" (Boston, 1868); and of a great work bearing the title of "History of the Rise and Fall of the Slave Power in America," on which he labored indefatigably during his last illness, yet was not quite able to complete (3 vols., Boston, 1872-'5). See his "Life and Public Services," which was written by his friend, Thomas Russell, and Rev. Elias Nason, who was his pastor for many years (1872). Congress directed to be printed a volume of "Obituary Addresses," that were delivered in both houses, on 21 Jan., 1876 (Washington, 1876).

WILSON, Henry Parke Custis, physician, b. in Workington, Somerset co., Md., 5 March, 1827. His Scotch-Irish ancestors emigrated to this country in 1700 from Ireland, being driven out by religious persecution, and founded the first Presbyterian church in this country at Rehoboth, Somerset co., Md. Henry was graduated at Princeton in 1848, studied medicine at the University of Virginia and the University of Maryland, and settled in Baltimore. Dr. Wilson has contributed numerous articles on gynecology and obstetrics to the medical journals and the transactions of medical societies, and has invented important and useful gynecological instruments. In 1856-'7 he was physician to the Baltimore county and city almshouse. He is president and one of the founders of the Baltimore gynecological and obstetrical society, has been president of the medical and surgical faculty of Maryland and the Baltimore academy of medicine, vice-president and one of the founders of the American gynecological society, and vice-president of the American medical association. He is a fellow of the British gynecological society and the British medical association, and of numerous other local and national medical societies.

WILSON, James, signer of the Declaration of Independence, b. near St. Andrew's, Scotland, 14 Sept., 1742; d. in Edenton, N. C., 28 Aug., 1798. After receiving a university education at St. Andrew's, Glasgow, and Edinburgh, he emigrated to this country about 1763, remained for some time in New York city, and in 1766 went to Philadelphia, Pa., where he was for several months tutor in Latin at the City college, which was afterward merged in the University of Pennsylvania. He left this employment to study law with John Dickinson, was admitted to the bar in 1767, began practice in

James Wilson

Reading, but soon removed to Carlisle, and was established in his profession before the Revolution, having made his reputation by an argument in an important land case against the proprietors of Pennsylvania. He espoused the popular cause from the beginning of the difficulties with the British government, contributing many essays to the controversy. He was a member of the Provincial meeting of deputies of 15 July, 1774, and a delegate to the Provincial convention of 23 Jan., 1775. When three representatives were added to the Pennsylvania delegation on 6 May, 1775, he was selected with Benjamin Franklin and Thomas Willing, and was present at the opening of congress on 10 May. He was successively re-elected on 3 Nov., 1775, 20 July, 1776, and 10 March, 1777, but was superseded at the election of 14 Sept., 1777, because he had hesitated to declare for independence while there remained a prospect of obtaining justice from parliament. He had resisted separation on 8 June, 1776, after the legislature of Pennsylvania had withdrawn its restrictions on the votes of its representatives; yet on 1 July he and John Morton were the first of the Pennsylvania delegates to vote for independence, and they were the only ones, except Benjamin Franklin, who voted for the adoption of the declaration on 4 July. He took an important part in the discussion of military and commercial questions, and opposed the views of the southern delegates on questions of slavery and taxation, believing it to be the duty of congress to discourage slave-holding. In July, 1775, when the Indians were divided into three departments, he was appointed by congress commissioner and superintendent of Indian affairs for the middle department. He was a member of committees to consider the state of the colonies and measures for their defence, to supply the treasury, to investigate the condition of the army, to suppress internal enemies, to re-enforce Washington's army, and to strengthen the American cause in Canada: was one of the authors of an appeal to the assembly of Jamaica, a letter to the people of Canada, and an address to the United colonies, and served on the standing committees for Indian affairs and for hearing appeals on libels from the decisions of the state admiralty courts, as well as on the first board of war. When hostilities began, Wilson was chosen colonel of a battalion of militia that was raised in Cumberland county, with which he took part in the New Jersey campaign of 1776, but afterward he took no part in active operations, owing to his civil appointments. When party spirit caused his removal from the Pennsylvania delegation in congress, he went to Annapolis, Md., and practised there for a year, at the end of which he settled permanently in Philadelphia. On 5 June, 1779, he was appointed advocate-general for the French government in the United States, the appointment being confirmed by letters-patent from the king on 18 Feb., 1781. On 31 Dec., 1781, he was appointed by congress a director of the Bank of North America. He made himself obnoxious to the democracy by denying the right of the town council to regulate the price of food, opposing the more liberal provisions of the constitution, and acting as counsel for Tories who were prosecuted for treason, and when he and other citizens of conservative views were threatened, they gathered in his house, where, on 4 Oct., 1779, they were attacked by the mob and militia, and, after many shots were exchanged, were rescued by the city troop. There was loss of life on both sides, and the feeling against Wilson was such that he absented himself from the city for a time. On 23 May, 1782, he was appointed a brigadier-general of militia. He acted as counsel for Pennsylvania before the court of arbitration that in November, 1782, decided against the claims of Connecticut to the lands of the Wyoming settlement. On 12 Nov. of that year he was re-elected to congress, taking his seat on 2 Jan., 1783. He proposed the plan of general taxation which was adopted on 12 Feb., 1783. He was not a member of congress in 1784, but was returned in 1785, and continued by re-election till the adoption of the present constitution. He was a member of the Federal convention, and in its debates supported direct popular suffrage and a single executive. He exercised much influence in determining the character of the constitution, and was appointed on the committee of detail. He explained and defended the constitution, as finally framed, in the Pennsylvania convention for its ratification. Having been the chief of the Republican party in Pennsylvania, which approved a firmer government than the Federation, and was bitterly opposed by the Constitutional party, Mr. Wilson now became a leader of the Federalists. In the convention of 1789-'90 for framing a new state constitution he successfully advocated the plan of the direct election of state senators. He was appointed on the drafting committee, and prepared the form of the instrument. In October, 1789, President Washington appointed him an associate justice of the U. S. supreme court, and he remained in this office till his death. In 1790 he was appointed professor of law in Philadelphia college, which conferred on him the degree of LL. D. in that year, and in the two following winters he delivered lectures. In March, 1791, he was appointed by the state house of representatives to revise and digest the laws of Pennsylvania, and after the senate had refused to concur he continued the work as a private undertaking, but died before completing the digest. He published, besides other pamphlets, an "Address to the Citizens of Philadelphia" (Philadelphia, 1784), and, with Thomas McKean, "Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States" (London, 1792). His "Works," comprising law lectures, speeches, and legal disquisitions, were published under the direction of Bird Wilson (3 vols., Philadelphia, 1803-'4). —His son, Bird, clergyman, b. in Carlisle, Pa., 8 Jan., 1777; d. in New York city, 14 April, 1859, was graduated in 1792 at the College of Philadelphia, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in Philadelphia in 1797. He was appointed commissioner of bankrupt law, and in 1802 was made president-judge of the court of common pleas in the counties of Chester, Delaware, Montgomery, and Bucks. He resigned his post in 1818, studied theology under Bishop White, and was ordained deacon in Christ church, Philadelphia, 12 March, 1829, and priest a year later, by the same bishop. Mr. Wilson was rector of St. John's church, Norristown, and St. Thomas's church, Whitemarsh, Pa., in 1819-'21. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of Pennsylvania in 1821, and that of LL. D. from Columbia in 1845. He was elected professor of systematic divinity in the Episcopal general theological seminary in 1821, which post he held for nearly thirty years. He was secretary of the house of bishops in 1829-'41. The last few years of his life were passed in retirement in New York city. Dr. Wilson was an able theologian of the school of Hooker, Tillotson, Waterland, and other like divines of the Church of England, and prepared numerous valuable tractates for the classes under his charge. His chief publications were "Abridgment of the Law by Matthew Bacon" (7 vols., Philadelphia, 1811-'13), and "Memoir of the Life of the Right Rev. William White, D. D., Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State of Pennsylvania" (1839). See a "Memorial of the Rev. Bird Wilson, D. D., LL. D.," by W. White Bronson (1864). —James's kinsman, William, poet, b. in Perthshire, Scotland, 25 Dec., 1801; d. in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., 25 Aug., 1860. At an early age he was imbued with a passionate love of poetry, derived from his mother, who sang with great beauty the Jacobite songs and ballads of her native land. While a school-boy he lost his father, the generous merchant's death being preceded by his failure in business, and a bachelor brother's fortune in Jamaica was in some way lost to his children, for whom it was intended, so that Wilson's early life was accompanied by many deprivations, including the completion of his education. At twenty-two he became the editor of the Dundee "Literary Olio," a large proportion of which, both in prose and verse, was from his pen. In 1826 he was induced by influential friends to remove to Edinburgh, where he established himself in business. In the same year he lost his young wife, and he sought relief from his great sorrow in composition. His contributions were welcomed in the "Edinburgh Literary Journal" and other leading periodicals. In 1830 Wilson married Miss Sibbald, of Borthaugh, a descendant of Sir Andrew Sibbald and a niece of James Sibbald, the literary antiquary and editor of the "Chronicle of Scottish Poetry," also the friend of Robert Burns. At this period the young poet's charming conversation and manners made him a welcome guest in the literary circles of Edinburgh. At the house of Mrs. Grant, of Laggan, he was a constant visitor, and she claimed the privilege of possessing his portrait by Sir John Watson Gordon, from which the accompanying vignette is copied. When thirty-two years of age Wilson removed to the United States and settled at Poughkeepsie, on the Hudson, where he engaged in book-selling and publishing, which he continued till his death, a portion of the time in partnership with the elder brother of Bishops Alonzo and Horatio Potter, and later with his son, James Grant. In the New World, Wilson occasionally contributed in prose and verse—generally anonymously—to various American periodicals, and sometimes sent a contribution to "Blackwood" or "Chambers's Journal." Selections of his poems appeared in "The Cabinet," "Modern Scottish Minstrel," and Longfellow's "Poems of Places," but he never issued them in a volume, or even collected them, and it was not till 1869 that a portion of his poems were published in Poughkeepsie with a memoir by Benson J. Lossing. A second edition, with additional poems, appeared in 1875, and has since been followed by a third. Willis pronounced one of Wilson's poems "the best modern imitation of the old ballad style that he had ever met with," and Bryant said "the song in which the writer personates Richard the Lion-hearted during his imprisonment is more spirited than any of the ballads of Aytoun." All of Wilson's sons by his second marriage served in the civil war, the eldest, with whom the idea of this work originated in 1879, attaining the rank of brigadier-general; the second fell at the head of his company at Fredericksburg, and the youngest, leaving his studies at sixteen, volunteered with several of his classmates and went to the front. —His son, James Grant, b. in Edinburgh, 28 April, 1832, was educated at College Hill, Poughkeepsie, continuing his studies in the languages, music, and drawing, under private teachers, joined his father in business, later becoming his partner. In 1855 he went abroad, and soon after his return established in Chicago the first literary paper published in the northwest, and became known as a public speaker. In 1862 he disposed of his journal and was commissioned major of the 15th Illinois cavalry, becoming soon after acting colonel of the regiment, and taking part in many engagements, and in the Vicksburg campaign. In August, 1863, he accompanied Gen. Ulysses S. Grant to New Orleans, and there accepted, by his advice, the colonelcy of the 4th regiment, United States colored cavalry, and was assigned to duty as aide-de-camp to the commanding general of the Department of the Gulf, with whom he remained till April, 1865, taking part in the Teche, Texas, and Red River campaigns, and in the latter aiding Lieut.-Col. Joseph Bailey in the construction of the Red River dam. During the same period of nearly two years he acted as military agent in Louisiana for the state of New York. When Gen. Banks was relieved, Col. Wilson was brevetted brigadier-general and sent to Port Hudson, where for a time he was in command, and in July he resigned and returned to New York city, where he has since resided, pursuing a literary career, with the exception of several years spent with his family in Europe. Since 1874 he has been a delegate from St. James's church to the New York diocesan conventions, and he was a member of the General convention that met in Richmond, Va. In 1879 he was appointed a member of the board of visitors to the U. S. naval academy, and the following year he was a visitor to the U. S. military academy, delivering the address to the cadets, and preparing the reports of both boards. Gen. Wilson was appointed in 1882, by the governor, chairman of the committee to collect $40,000 as the state's contribution to the Garfield monument. (See vol. ii., p. 604.) Since 1885 he has been president of the New York genealogical and biographical society, is a vice-president of the Association for the reform and codification of the law of nations, a member of the executive committee of the Society for the prevention of cruelty to animals, and an honorary member of many American and foreign historical and other societies. He was instrumental in erecting a monument over the grave of Fitz-Greene Halleck at Guilford, Conn., and a statue in Central park, New York, the first in honor of an American poet, and is active in the movement for the New York statue of Columbus. (See vol. i., p. 698.) He has published numerous addresses, including those on Col. John Bayard, Com. Isaac Hull, Chief-Justice Kirkpatrick, and Bishop Samuel Provoost, and contributed upward of a hundred articles to "Harper's" and other American and English magazines. Among the principal works that he has written or edited are "Biographical Sketches of Illinois Officers" (Chicago, 1862; 3d ed., 1863); "Love in Letters: Illustrated in the Correspondence of Eminent Persons" (New York, 1867); "Life of Gen. U. S. Grant" (1868; 3d ed., enlarged, 1885); "Life and Letters of Fitz-Greene Halleck" (1869); "Sketches of Illustrious Soldiers" (1874); "Poets and Poetry of Scotland, from the Earliest to the Present Time" (2 vols., London and New York, 1876); "Centennial History of the Diocese of New York, 1785-1885" (New York, 1886); "Bryant and his Friends: Some Reminiscences of the Knickerbocker Writers" (12mo; illustrated ed., 8vo, 1886); "Appletons' Cyclopædia of American Biography" (6 vols., 1886-'9); and "Com. Isaac Hull and the Frigate 'Constitution'" (1889).

WILSON, James F., senator, b. in Newark, Ohio, 19 Oct., 1828. He received a classical education, studied law, and in 1853 began practice in Iowa, making Fairfield his residence. He was a member of the State constitutional convention in 1856, and in the following year entered the legislature. He passed into the state senate in 1859, was chosen its president in 1861, and in the same year was elected to congress to fill the vacancy that was caused by the resignation of Samuel R. Curtis, taking his seat on 2 Dec. He was re-elected for the following term, serving as chairman of the judiciary committee, and on his second and third re-election was placed at the head of the same committee, and of that on unfinished business. In 1868 he was one of the managers of the impeachment trial of President Andrew Johnson. In 1869 he was made a commissioner for the Pacific railroad. He was elected a senator from Iowa for the term that will expire on 4 March, 1889, and was appointed on the committee on foreign affairs.

WILSON, James Harrison, soldier, b. near Shawneetown, Ill., 2 Sept., 1837. His grandfather, Alexander, a Virginian by birth, was one of the founders of Illinois, and his father, Harrison, was an ensign in the war of 1812, and captain during the Black Hawk war. The son was educated at the common schools, at McKendree college, and at the U. S. military academy, where he was graduated in 1860 and assigned to the corps of topographical engineers. He served at the headquarters of the Department of Oregon until June, 1861, when he became 2d lieutenant, and on 19 Sept., 1861, he was made 1st lieutenant. He was on duty as chief topographical engineer of the Port Royal expedition till March, 1862, then served in the Department of the South, including the bombardment of Fort Pulaski, and was an acting aide-de-camp to Gen. George B. McClellan in September, 1862, being present at the battles of South Mountain and Antietam. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel in the volunteer staff of the army in November, 1862, and served as chief engineer and inspector-general of the Army of the Tennessee till October, 1863, being active in the operations before and during the siege of Vicksburg. He became captain of engineers in May, 1863, and brigadier-general of volunteers, 31 Oct., 1863, and was engaged in the operations near Chattanooga, the battle of Missionary Ridge, and the relief of Knoxville, constructing bridges till December, 1863. Gen. Wilson, after a short tour of duty at Washington in charge of the cavalry bureau, was placed in command of the 3d division of the cavalry corps in the Army of the Potomac, and bore a conspicuous part in the operations under Gen. Philip H. Sheridan from May till August, 1864, including the Richmond raid and combats near Petersburg. He also led his division during the Shenandoah campaign, including the battle of the Opequan, till October, 1864, when he was assigned to the command of the cavalry corps of the military division of the Mississippi, organizing a body of 15,000 mounted men, and contributing largely to the success that attended the armies in the west under Gen. George H. Thomas and Gen. William T. Sherman, particularly by the assault and capture of Selma, Ga., Montgomery, Ala., and Columbus and Macon, Ga., on 20 April, 1865, the date of his promotion as major-general of volunteers. In twenty-eight days he captured five fortified cities, twenty-three stand of colors, 288 guns, and 6,820 prisoners, among whom was Jefferson Davis. Having been mustered out of the volunteer service in January, 1866, Gen. Wilson was for four years engaged in the improvement of Mississippi river. He was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the 35th infantry, 28 July, 1866, and brevetted to the grade of major-general, U. S. army, "for gallant and meritorious services" in the capture of Fort Pulaski, the battles of Chattanooga, the Wilderness, and Nashville, and capture of Selma, respectively. He was honorably discharged, at his own request, 31 Dec., 1870. He has been largely engaged in railroad and engineering operations since his retirement from the army. He is the author of "China: Travels and Investigations in the Middle Kingdom" and "Life of Andrew J. Alexander" (New York, 1887); also, in conjunction with Charles A. Dana, "Life of Gen. U. S. Grant" (Springfield, Mass., 1868).—His brother, BLUFORD, served during the civil war as assistant adjutant-general of volunteers, and afterward was solicitor of the U. S. treasury during the "whiskey-ring" prosecutions.

WILSON, James Jefferson, senator, b. in Essex county, N. J., in 1775; d. in Trenton, N. J., 28 July, 1824. He received a common-school education, was for many years clerk of the New Jersey legislature, of which he was a member in 1809-'11, and edited the "True American" at Trenton. He was also adjutant-general of the state in 1810-'12 and 1814, and captain of a company of infantry in service on the coast of New Jersey during the war of 1812-'15. He was elected to the U. S. senate, and served from 4 Dec., 1815, till 1821, when he resigned on being appointed postmaster at Trenton. He sat in the legislature in 1822, and in December of that year he sustained severe injuries while he was delirious from illness.

WILSON, John, clergyman. b. in Windsor, England, in 1588; d. in Boston, Mass., 7 Aug., 1667. He was the son of Dr. William Wilson, prebendary of St. Paul's, of Rochester and of Windsor, who had been chaplain to Edmund Grindall, archbishop of Canterbury, and grandnephew of Sir Thomas Wilson, secretary of state to Queen Elizabeth. Young Wilson was educated at Eton and at Cambridge, where he was graduated about 1606. He studied law three years at one of the inns of court, and took orders in the Church of England, but soon became conspicuous for his Puritanical leanings. He preached at Mortlake, Henley, Bumstead, Stoke, Clare, and Candish, and for several years was minister of Sudbury, Essex, where he was repeatedly suspended or silenced by the bishop's court for his opinions, but was befriended by Robert Rich, Earl of Warwick. Becoming interested in the colonization of Massachusetts, he and many of his neighbors embarked on 8 April, 1630, in the great fleet with John Winthrop and his associates of the Massachusetts company. He landed at Salem on 12 June, and soon afterward removed to Charlestown, where he preached under a tree, and on 30 July organized what was subsequently the 1st church in Boston, to which place the majority of the members soon removed. He was ordained teacher of the church on 27 Aug. by imposition of hands by the several communicants. In 1631 he sailed for England, where he remained until May, 1632, and was ordained pastor in November of the latter year. He again visited England in the autumn of 1634, and remained absent a year. Soon after his return the Antinomian controversy arose in his congregation, and Gov. Winthrop and Wilson fought stoutly against the faction that was led by Anne Hutchinson. While this discussion was pending, an expedition was sent against the Pequots, and Mr. Wilson was selected by lot as its chaplain. For this service he received a grant of 1,000 acres of land in what is now Quincy. He also accompanied the Indian apostle, John Eliot, in his visit to the native settlements, and labored among the savages. He outlived two colleagues in the ministry, John Cotton and John Norton, and was left at the age of seventy-six with the entire charge of his congregation on his hands. He continued in the active discharge of his duties until finally disabled by a fatal disease. Of his character Cotton Mather has said: "Indeed, if the picture of this good and therein great man were to be exactly given, great zeal with great love would be the two principal strokes that, joined with orthodoxy, should make up his portraiture." Besides many occasional productions, the titles of which are unknown, Mr. Wilson published "Some Helps to Faith," a theological treatise (London, 1625); "Famous Deliverances of the English Nation," a poem (1626; new ed., Boston, 1680); a Latin poem to the memory of John Harvard; and a tract, "The Day Breaking, if not the Sun Rising, of the Gospel with the Indians in New England" (1647; new ed., New York, 1865).

WILSON, John, printer, b. in Glasgow, Scotland, 16 April, 1802; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 3 Aug., 1868. Although of humble birth and enjoying but meagre educational advantages, he became later in life a learned man, having mastered Hebrew, Greek, Latin, French, German, and other languages. He was apprenticed to a printer, and in 1846 removed to Boston, Mass., where he established himself in business, and became widely known for his excellent work. He subsequently removed to Cambridge, Mass., and was the founder of the present firm of John Wilson and Son, that, for several years, has had charge of the University press. Wilson was also a sturdy champion of Unitarianism, and wrote several books in its defence that have been highly commended. His principal publication is connected with his art, being a "Treatise on Grammatical Punctuation" (Belfast, 1826; new ed., entitled "A Treatise on English Punctuation," Boston, 1850). Of this work, of which over twenty editions have been issued, it has been said that it "places punctuation on a clear and intelligible grammatical basis, and so completely exhausts the subject as to leave nothing to be desired." He received the degree of A. M. from Harvard in 1866. He also prefixed an "Essay on the Character and Writings of Robert Burns" to an edition of that poet's works (Belfast, 1837), and delivered an "Address on Burns," which is contained in the "Report of the Burns Centenary Meeting" (Boston, 1859). His other publications comprise "Scripture Proofs and Scripture Illustrations of Unitarianism" (1833; 3d ed., London and Manchester, 1846; abridged, Boston, part i.: new ed., New York, 1847); "The Concessions of Trinitarians" (Manchester, 1842; Boston, 1845); "Unitarian Principles Confirmed by Trinitarian Testimonies" (Boston, 1855-'7); and "The Elements of Punctuation," an abridgment of the first-named work (1856).

WILSON, John Allston, civil engineer, b. in Phoenixville, Pa., 24 April, 1837. He was graduated at the Rensselaer polytechnic institute in 1856, and in 1857-'8 served as topographer on surveys in Central America for the Honduras interoceanic railway. In 1858 he entered the service of the Pennsylvania railroad as assistant engineer, and in 1861-'4 he was principal assistant engineer in charge of construction, after which he was chief engineer for the Pennsylvania railroad company on their main line or on affiliated roads until 1875.

Meanwhile, in 1863, he served as aide on the staff of Gen. Darius N. Couch (then in command of the Department of the Susquehanna), and had charge of the construction of fortifications at Harrisburg and vicinity. In 1875 he was engaged as consulting engineer on the construction of the buildings for the World's fair in Philadelphia, and since January, 1876, he has been a partner in the firm of Wilson Brothers and Company, civil engineers and architects. Mr. Wilson has been chief engineer for various railroads in Pennsylvania and New York; also has been connected with lumber-manufacturing and coal-mining interests in Pennsylvania. A large number of railway structures, including bridges, have been built by him, especially along the lines of the roads with which he has been connected. He is a member of the Franklin institute, the American institute of mining engineers, the American society of civil engineers, and other technical societies.—His brother, Joseph Miller, civil engineer, b. in Phoenixville, Pa., 20 June, 1838, was graduated at the Rensselaer polytechnic institute in 1858, and studied chemistry. He entered the service of the Pennsylvania railroad in March, 1860, as assistant engineer, and in 1867 was given jurisdiction as engineer of bridges and building over all lines that were controlled by the Pennsylvania company from New York on the east to Pittsburgh on the west, and from Canandaigua, N. Y., on the north to Quantico, Va., on the south. This office he resigned in 1886. In 1874-'6 he was joint engineer and architect with Henry Pettit for the main exhibition building and machinery hall of the World's fair in Philadelphia, and in January, 1876, in association with his brother, he organized the firm of Wilson Brothers and Company, with which he is still connected. Among the important structures that he has built are the Susquehanna bridge at Harrisburg, the Schuylkill river bridge of the Filbert street line in Philadelphia, and bridges at Trenton, and New Brunswick, N. J. Mr. Wilson designed the Drexel bank and the Drexel building in Philadelphia, the St. Francis de Sales industrial school in Eddington, Pa., and other buildings. He received medals and awards for his plans of bridges and buildings at the World's fair in 1876, and the degree of A. M. was conferred on him by the University of Pennsylvania in 1877. He is a member of the London institution of civil engineers, of the American society of civil engineers, and other societies, and was president of the Franklin institute in 1887-'8, and of the Engineers' club of Philadelphia in 1888. In addition to various technical papers in scientific journals, he wrote the mechanical, scientific, and historical parts of the "Illustrated Catalogue of the International Exhibition of 1876" (Philadelphia, 1876-'8).

WILSON, John Grover, clergyman, b. in Middletown, New Castle co., Del., in 1810; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 20 Feb., 1885. He was educated at Delaware college, and became a minister of the Methodist Protestant church. This connection he severed in 1855, but while affiliating with the sect called Christians, or Campbellites, he never formally joined them. On the contrary, he and the church to which he ministered in Philadelphia continued until his death to be free from any denominational associations. The society still exists, and is known as the "Ebenezer Independent Christian church." Mr. Wilson never used the prefix "Rev." in writing his name, but instead preferred the initials V. D. M., a contraction for "Verbi Dei Minister"—minister of the word of God. He expounded his peculiar views in various periodicals, and especially in the "Homiletic Magazine and Repository of Pastoral Theology" (1843-'4), which was founded by him. From 1842 till 1845 he was secretary of the Baltimore annual conference of the Methodist Protestant church. He published, among other works, "Discourses on Prophecy" (Philadelphia, 1850); "A Vindication of the Scheme of Redemption" (1858); "Writings in Prose and Verse" (1860); "The Gospel of the Epiphany" and "The Branch of David" (1867); "The Sabbath and its Law"; "Lyre of my Youth"; and "God, All in All," a prize poem.

WILSON, John Henry, Canadian educator, b. near Ottawa, 14 Feb., 1833. He was educated at the Grammar-school, St. Thomas, and at the University of the city of New York, and was graduated as a physician at Victoria university, Cobourg, Ont., in 1858. He subsequently became professor of anatomy in Victoria university, and was a member of the legislative assembly of Ontario from 1871 till 1879. He was elected to the Dominion parliament in 1882, and re-elected in February, 1887.

WILSON, John Laird, journalist, b. in Croft-head, Bridge of Weir, Renfrewshire, Scotland, 20 Sept., 1832. He is the eldest son of Alexander Wilson, an architect and surveyor. He was graduated at the University of Glasgow in 1852, studied at the Theological hall of the United Presbyterian church in Edinburgh, and was licensed as a preacher of the gospel in 1857. In the same year he accepted a call to the west of Scotland. After several years' successful work he resigned this charge, on account of feeble health, and went to Egypt, where he regained his strength. In the summer of 1866 Mr. Wilson came to this country, and was on the editorial staff of the New York "Herald" before the close of the year. In 1874 he retired from the "Herald," and, at the head of a joint-stock company, established the New York "Scotsman," but the following year he abandoned the enterprise. He has contributed largely to periodicals, and has published "The Battles of the Civil War" (2 vols., New York, 1878), and "John Wycliffe, Patriot and Reformer—a Biography" (1884). He is now preparing a history of the Huguenots.

WILSON, John Leighton, missionary, b. in Sumter county, S. C., 25 March, 1809; d. near Mayesville, S. C., 13 July, 1886. He was graduated at Union college in 1829, and at the Columbia (S. C.) theological seminary in 1833, being a member of the first class that was educated in that institution. He was ordained as a missionary the same year, and, after studying Arabic at Andover seminary, sailed in November on a voyage of exploration to western Africa, returning in the following spring. As a result of his investigations, he decided that Cape Palmas was a promising field for missionary work. In May, 1834, he was married, and returned with his wife to Africa before the close of that year. Here they labored until 1841, during which period they organized a church of forty members, educated more than one hundred native youth, and reduced the Grebo language to writing, publishing a grammar and dictionary, and translating the gospels of Matthew and John, together with several small volumes, into the native tongue. In 1842 Mr. and Mrs. Wilson removed to the Gaboon river, 1,200 miles southeast of Cape Palmas, and began a new mission among the Mpongwe people. Here again the language was reduced to writing for the first time, and a grammar, a vocabulary, parts of the Bible, and several small volumes were published. In the spring of 1853, owing to failing health, he and his wife returned to the United States. The following autumn he became secretary of the board of foreign missions of the Presbyterian church, and continued to discharge his duties until the beginning of the civil war, when he returned to his home in the south. On the organization of the Southern Presbyterian church, Dr. Wilson was appointed secretary of foreign missions, and continued to act as such until 1885, when he was made secretary emeritus. For seven years during this period the home mission work was combined with that of foreign missions, he taking charge of both. In 1852 a strong effort was made in the British parliament to withdraw the British squadron from the African coast, under the impression that the foreign slave-trade could not be suppressed. To prove that this view was erroneous, Dr. Wilson wrote a pamphlet, and pointed out what was necessary to make the crusade against the traffic successful. The pamphlet, falling into the hands of Lord Palmerston, was republished in the "United Service Journal," and also in the parliamentary "Blue Book," an edition of 10,000 copies being circulated throughout the United Kingdom. Lord Palmerston subsequently informed Dr. Wilson that his protest had silenced all opposition to the squadron's remaining on the coast, and in less than five years the trade itself was brought to an end. Dr. Wilson edited "The Foreign Record" (New York, 1853-'61), which gave an account of the progress of work in the foreign missionary field, and "The Missionary" (Baltimore, 1861-'85). He received the degree of D. D. from Lafayette college in 1854. While in Africa he sent to the Boston society of natural history the first specimen of the gorilla that was sent from there. He contributed to the "Southern Presbyterian Review" and other periodicals. He also published "Western Africa: its History, Condition, and Prospects" (New York, 1857).

WILSON, John Lyde, lawyer, b. in Marlborough district, S. C., 24 May, 1784; d. in Charleston, S. C., 12 Feb., 1849. He received a good academic education, studied law, and was admitted to the bar in Columbia, S. C., in 1807. He began to practise in Georgetown, and in 1808 he was returned to the South Carolina house of representatives from Prince George Winyaw. He was repeatedly re-elected and subsequently was chosen senator. In 1822 he was made president of the senate, and during the same year elected governor and commander-in-chief. Before his election as governor he published a severe attack on the court of appeals, which is believed to have contributed materially to the abolition of that tribunal. Gov. Wilson remained in office until 1824. In 1827 he was again elected to the senate. He was also a member of the Nullification convention of 1832, and advocated the most violent of the measures that were proposed then and during the session of 1833. In 1838 he published a "Code of Honor," which he affirmed was the means of saving life, but which seemed to be intended rather to regulate duels, in several of which he took part. Gov. Wilson's intellectual powers were remarkable, and his speeches, political and legal, were always prepared with the greatest care. He also possessed the art of extemporaneous speaking. His voice was good and his manner graceful. He published a "Speech on the Codification of the Laws of the State" (New York, 1827), and "Cupid and Psyche: from the 'Golden Ass' of Apuleius" (Charleston, 1842).

WILSON, Matthew, clergyman, b. in East Nottingham, Chester co., Pa., 15 Jan., 1731; d. in Lewes, Sussex co., Del., 30 March, 1790. He was licensed to preach in 1754, and in 1756 was installed pastor of the congregations at Lewes and Cool Spring, Del. By consent of his two congregations, he began, in 1767, to preach every third Sabbath at the neighboring town of Indian River. For this extensive parish he continued to minister until his death. As he had received a medical as well as a theological training, Dr. Wilson divided his time between the two professions, and few physicians of his day displayed more learning, skill, or achieved greater success. In the "Old Side" and "New Side" controversy that preceded the "Plan of Union," that restored peace to the Presbyterian church in 1758, he took part with the former, although his piety and amiable character made him esteemed by both parties. In the Revolutionary struggle he held decided views in favor of the independence of the colonies. He received the degree of D. D. from the University of Pennsylvania in 1786.—His son, James Patriot, clergyman, b. in Lewes, Sussex co., Del., 21 Feb., 1769; d. in Bucks county, Pa., 9 Dec., 1830, was graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1788, and was at once offered the chair of assistant professor of mathematics in that institution, but declined on account of feeble health. Subsequently, and after teaching in his native town, he studied law and was admitted to the bar of Sussex county, Del., in 1790. He also acted for some time as surveyor-general of the state. Although he rose to eminence in his profession, the sudden death of his wife and the murder of his brother combined to turn his attention to the subject of religion, and he abandoned his profession for the pulpit. He was licensed to preach in 1804, and the same year was installed as pastor of the three congregations over which his father had so long presided. In May, 1806, he was called to the charge of the 1st Presbyterian church in Philadelphia. Here he remained until May, 1828, when he retired to his farm, about twenty miles from that city, on account of failing health. He preached occasionally until 1830, when his resignation was accepted. Dr. Wilson was noted for eccentricities of character, but they were overlooked in view of his sterling worth. As a preacher he was deliberate and unimpassioned, and spoke without notes. He was probably the only clergyman of his country and time who had not only read all the volumes extant of Patristic theology, but literally lived among them. On a blank leaf of his copy of Henry Ware's tract on "Extemporaneous Preaching" he wrote: "I have preached twenty years, and have never written a full sermon in my life, and never read one word of a sermon from the pulpit, nor opened a note, nor committed a sentence, and have rarely wandered five minutes at a time from my mental arrangement previously made." "I heard him preach one sermon," says a writer, who knew Dr. Wilson, "and it was throughout as consecutive and condensed as the demonstration of a problem of Euclid." He received the degree of D. D. from the University of Pennsylvania in 1807. His publications include "Lectures upon Some of the Parables and Historical Passages of the New Testament" (Philadelphia, 1810); "An Easy Introduction to the Knowledge of the Hebrew Language" (1812); "Ridgely's 'Body of Divinity,' with Notes, Original and Selected" (1814); "An Essay on Grammar" (1817); "An Essay on the Probation of Fallen Men" (1827); "Common Objections to Christianity" and the "Hope of Immortality" (1829); and "A Free Conversation on the Unpardonable Sin" (1830).

WILSON, Matthew, artist, b. in London, England, 17 July, 1814. He came to this country in 1832, and for several years painted miniatures in Philadelphia. He then became a pupil of Henry Inman, and in 1835 went to Paris, where he studied with Edouard Dubufe. He was elected an associate of the National academy in 1843. Among his numerous portraits are those of Samuel J. Tilden; Gov. Thomas G. Pratt, of Maryland; Secretaries Gideon Welles, George M. Robeson, and William E. Chandler, for the U. S. navy department; Albert Gallatin, for the treasury department; Washington Irving; James Fenimore Cooper; Henry Wilson; and Thaddeus Stevens. He also painted the last portrait of Abraham Lincoln two weeks before the president's death, and has since executed a full-length picture of Mrs. Washington for the White House.

WILSON, Oliver Morris, lawyer, b. in Logansport, Ind., 16 Aug., 1836. He was graduated at Hamilton college in 1858 and studied law. After serving in the civil war as captain and major of Indiana volunteers, he was secretary of the Indiana senate in 1865-'9, assistant U. S. attorney for the state in 1869-'71, and member of the legislature in the latter year. He was adjutant-general of the Grand army of the republic for Indiana in 1866-'8, and organized the first department in that order. Maj. Wilson has published "Digest of Parliamentary Law" (Philadelphia, 1869), and "Indiana Superior Court Reports" (1875).

WILSON, Peter, educator, b. in Ordiquhill, Banff, Scotland, 23 Nov., 1746; d. in New Barbadoes, N. J., 1 Aug., 1825. He was educated at the University of Aberdeen, where he paid particular attention to classical studies. Removing to New York city in 1763, he soon found employment as a teacher, and was called to be the principal of Hackensack (N. J.) academy, where, over the front windows of his residence, his own and his wife's name are still to be seen cut in the stone. In 1775 he threw himself with great zeal into the political movements that preceded the Revolution, and from 1777 till 1783 he served in the New Jersey legislature. In the latter year he was appointed to revise and codify the laws of that state. In 1789 he was elected professor of Greek and Latin in Columbia, and he held the office until 1792, when he resigned to become principal of Erasmus Hall, Flatbush, L. I. In 1797 he was recalled to Columbia as professor of Greek and Latin and of Grecian and Roman antiquities, which chair he filled until 1820, when he was retired with a pension by the trustees. He received the degree of LL. D. from Union in 1798. He published "Rules of Latin Prosody, for the Use of Schools" (New York, 1810); "Introduction to Greek Prosody" and "Compendium of Greek Prosody" (1817); together with editions of Sallust, Longinus, the Greek Testament, and revised Dr. Alexander Adams' "Roman Antiquities" (1826).

WILSON, Samuel Farmer, journalist, b. in Connecticut in 1805; d. in New Orleans, La., 11 March, 1870. He was graduated at Columbia in 1822, studied law in New York city, was admitted to the bar there in 1826, and at Raleigh, N. C., in 1828, removed from that place to New Berne, and from there to Mobile, Ala., in 1832, where he abandoned law to become joint editor of the "Register." He went to New Orleans in 1849, and joined the staff of the "Crescent," connected himself with the "Picayune" in the following year, and became a joint owner and the chief editorial writer of that newspaper. For several terms he was a member of the Louisiana legislature. He was the author of a "History of the American Revolution," which passed through several editions (Baltimore, 1834).

WILSON, Theodore Delavan, naval constructor, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 11 May, 1840. He served an apprenticeship as a shipwright at the Brooklyn navy-yard, and at the beginning of the civil war was a non-commissioned officer in the 13th New York militia regiment for three months. Upon his return he was appointed a carpenter in the navy, 3 Aug., 1861, and he served in the steamer "Cambridge," of the North Atlantic blockading squadron, in 1861-'4, and with Rear-Admiral Gregory as inspector of vessels in the private establishments near New York city. After passing the required examination he was commissioned as an assistant naval constructor, 17 May, 1866. He served at the Pensacola navy-yard in 1866-'7, and at Philadelphia in 1867-'9, and was instructor in naval architecture and ship-building at the U. S. naval academy in 1869-'73. He was commissioned naval constructor, 1 July, 1873, and served at the Portsmouth navy-yard in 1873-'82. He was elected a member of the Institute of naval architects of England, being the first American member of that scientific body. He was appointed chief of the bureau of construction and repair, 3 March, 1872, and reappointed for a second term of four years, 15 Dec.,

1886. In 1870 he received a patent for "air-ports," which have been adopted in the naval service and merchant-ships, and in 1880 he patented a bolt-extractor, which is in general use. While chief of the bureau of construction and repair he has designed several of the modern ships that have been recently built and are now building. He designed the "Chicago," "Boston," and "Atlanta," to meet the requirements of the advisory board, and the cruisers "Newark," "San Francisco," "Concord," "Yorktown," "Bennington," "Petrel," and "Maine," the latter of which is shown in the illustration. He is the author of "Ship-Building, Theoretical and Practical," which is used as a text-book at the naval academy and by the profession generally (New York, 1873).

WILSON, Thomas, clergyman, b. in England in 1761; d. in Washington county, Ky., in 1824. He was a member of the Dominican order, and was president of its college at Bornheim, Belgium, in 1803, when the building was attacked and plundered by the French troops. He escaped to England, where he petitioned the general of the order to be allowed to establish a house in the United States. He was employed, for several years after his arrival in this country, on missions in Maryland and the neighboring states, and it was not till 1808 that the first Dominican convent in the United States, that of St. Rose, was founded in Washington county, Ky. Shortly afterward, Father Wilson was appointed provincial of his order, and superior of the convent and college. In 1809 he established a novitiate, in which he trained a large number of priests for the Kentucky mission. He continued at the head of these institutions until the close of his life.

WILSON, Thomas, author, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., about 1768; d. there about 1828. He learned the printer's trade, wrote extensively for the press, removed in 1811 to Baltimore, Md., and there conducted a newspaper, returning in 1816 to Philadelphia. He was the author of "The Biography of the Principal American Military and Naval Heroes" (New York, 1821); and "The Picture of Philadelphia in 1824" (Philadelphia, 1824).

WILSON, Thomas, merchant, b. in Harford County, Md., 5 Feb., 1789; d. in Baltimore, 2 Sept., 1879. His parents were members of the Society of Friends, and removed to Baltimore in 1798. The son received a plain education, and at the age of seventeen was apprenticed to Thorndick Chase, a merchant of Baltimore, trading with the West Indies and the Spanish Main. He was advanced by Mr. Chase to the post of chief clerk before he was nineteen, and upon attaining his majority became a partner in the firm of Brown and Wilson. He spent much of his time from 1811 till 1816 at La Guayra, Venezuela, as resident partner of his firm; but during the war of 1812 he returned to Baltimore and organized a line of small vessels to run from Boston to Folly Landing, Va., whence their cargoes were transported overland to Onancock, and thence by boats to Baltimore. While engaged in these ventures he narrowly escaped capture by the British on several occasions. In 1857 he retired from mercantile business, and confined his operations to dealing in securities. He was identified with many of the manufacturing interests of Maryland and Pennsylvania, was a member of the Maryland colonization society, and for many years president of the Baltimore manual labor school, in which charity he took great interest. During the civil war of 1861-'5 he was a firm supporter of the National cause. By his will he devoted $625,000 to various charities, endowing the Thomas Wilson sanitarium for children—an institution designed to take care of sick children during the summer months—with $500,000; and a fuel-saving society—to aid deserving poor people to purchase their fuel cheaply, and sewing-women to obtain sewing-machines at low cost—with $100,000.

WILSON, Thomas, jurist, b. in County Tyrone, Ireland, 16 May, 1827. He was brought to the United States in 1839, was graduated at Allegheny college in 1852, studied law, was admitted to the bar in Meadville, Pa., in 1855, and settled in Winona, Minn. He was a member of the Constitutional convention of Minnesota in 1857, was elected a district judge, and took his seat on the bench in 1858, on the organization of the state government. In the spring of 1864 he was appointed a judge of the supreme court, and in the autumn of the same year he was elected chief justice for the term of seven years. In 1869 he resigned, and has since followed the practice of his profession. He was elected to the state house of representatives in 1880, and in 1882, after declining a nomination for congress, was elected to the state senate, and served till 1885. In the latter year he was the Democratic candidate for a seat in the United States senate, and in 1886 he was elected to the National house of representatives, taking his seat on 5 Dec., 1887.

WILSON, Thomas Bellerby, physician, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 17 Jan., 1807; d. in Newark, Del., 15 March, 1865. He was educated at the Friends' school in Philadelphia, and then studied medicine, which he practised in his native city with considerable success. Subsequently he devoted himself to natural history, and paid special attention to birds, of which he made a remarkable collection. In 1832 he was elected to the Academy of natural sciences of Philadelphia, and at once took an active part in its proceedings. Its library was largely created through his liberality, and his collection of birds, which then ranked as the third in the world, was presented by him to the academy, of which he was president in 1863-'4.

WILSON, William, physician, b. in Scotland in 1755; d. in Clermont, Columbia co., N. Y., in December, 1828. He was the brother of Sir Alexander Wilson, bart., of Bath, England. He was educated at the University of Glasgow, where he received the degrees of A. B. and M. D., and came to the United States in 1784, bringing letters of introduction to Chancellor Robert R. Livingston and other citizens. The chancellor, feeling the need of a skilled medical man in his part of the country, induced Dr. Wilson to take up his residence at Clermont, N. Y., where he remained until his death. When Mr. Livingston went to Europe in 1800 as minister to France he left his extensive estates in the care of Dr. Wilson, and afterward appointed him one of his executors. On the organization of the County medical society, he was made its president, and subsequently held the same post in the Medical association of the state of New York. In 1804 Dr. Wilson was named first judge of Columbia county, being the second incumbent of that office, the duties of which he continued to discharge until he was disqualified by age. The latter part of his life was spent in agricultural pursuits, and he was mainly instrumental in organizing the Farmers' club of Dutchess and Columbia counties, N. Y., which is believed to have been the first purely agricultural association in the state.—His son, Stephen Bayard, naval officer, b. in Clermont, Columbia co., N. Y., 18 Aug., 1796; d. in Hudson, N. Y., 15 March, 1863, entered the navy as a midshipman, 1 Jan., 1812, and served at Norfolk for a short time, and then on the lakes during the war until 1816. In 1817 he was attached to the ship "Independence" at Boston. He cruised on the Mediterranean station in the frigate "Guerrière" and the ship "Washington" in 1818-'21, was stationed at Sackett's Harbor, N. Y., in 1822, and served in the Musquito fleet in 1823-'7 for the suppression of piracy in the West Indies. He was commissioned a lieutenant, 13 Jan., 1825, served at the naval rendezvous at Baltimore in 1827-'30, cruised in the frigate "Potomac," of the Pacific squadron, in 1831-'4, in the "John Adams" on the Mediterranean station in 1835-'7, in the ship "Macedonian," in the West Indies in 1838-'40. He was promoted to commander, 8 Sept., 1841, and had the frigate "Columbus," of the Brazil station, in 1843-'4. He served at the Boston navy-yard in 1845-'7, commanded the sloop "John Adams," in 1847-'8, during the latter part of the Mexican war, and after the war continued cruising for some time on the Gulf coast of Mexico. He participated in the expedition that captured Tuspan. He served at the New York navy-yard in command of the receiving-ship in 1850-'1. On 14 Sept., 1855, he was promoted to captain, and commanded the frigate "Columbia" on the home station for a few months after his promotion. His health failed, and he was on waiting orders until he was retired by operation of law, 21 Dec., 1861, because of his age. He saw no service during the civil war, on account of his feeble health.

WILSON, William Dexter, clergyman, b. in Stoddard, N. H., 28 Feb., 1816. He was graduated at Walpole academy, where he became teacher of mathematics, entered the Harvard divinity-school in 1835, and was graduated in 1838. Becoming dissatisfied with Unitarianism, he took orders in the Protestant Episcopal church, was ordained deacon in St. Anne's church, Lowell, Mass., 7 April, 1842, by Bishop Griswold, and priest in Trinity church, Rutland, Vt., 21 Sept., 1847, by Bishop Hopkins. He was minister of Christ church, Sherburne, N. Y., from 1842 till 1850, when he was elected professor of moral and intellectual philosophy in Geneva (now Hobart) college. On the opening of Cornell university in 1868, he became professor of philosophy in that institution, which post he held until 1886, when he was retired as emeritus professor. He now resides in Syracuse, N. Y., and is deacon of St. Andrew's divinity-school in that city. He received the degree of D. D. from Geneva college in 1849, that of LL. D. from Bedford university, Tenn., in 1868, and that of L. H. D. from the regents of the University of the state of New York in 1872. Dr. Wilson has been active in the affairs of the church in various ways, and has contributed to reviews and magazines during forty years. His chief publications are "The Church Identified" (Utica, 1848); "Elementary Treatise on Logic" (New York, 1856); "Psychology, Comparative and Human" (1871); "Text-Book of Logic" (1872); "Introduction to the Study of the History of Philosophy" (1872); "Live Questions in Psychology and Metaphysics" (1877); and "The Foundations of Religious Belief," Paddock lectures (1883).

WILSON, William Lyne, congressman, b. in Jefferson county, Va., 3 May, 1843. He was graduated at Columbian college in 1860, afterward studied in the University of Virginia, served in the Confederate army, was professor of Latin in Columbian college from 1865 till 1871, studying law at the same time, and on being admitted to the bar in the latter year engaged in practice at Charlestown, W. Va. He was a delegate to the Democratic national convention and a presidential elector in 1880. In 1882 he became president of West Virginia university, but he resigned in order to take his seat in congress on 1 Dec., 1883. He was re-elected for the three following terms, and served on the ways and means committee that prepared the Mills tariff bill, taking an active part in the debates on that measure in 1888. He was a regent of the Smithsonian institution in 1883-'7, and received the degree of LL. D. from Columbian university in 1883.

WILSON, Woodrow, educator, b. in Staunton, Va., 28 Dec., 1856. He is a son of the Rev. Joseph R. Wilson, D. D., and nephew of the Rev. James Woodrow, D. D., of Columbia, S. C. He was graduated at Princeton in 1879, studied law at the University of Virginia, and practised at Atlanta, Ga., in 1882-'3. Preferring to devote himself to special studies, he abandoned the legal profession and took a post-graduate course in history and politics at Johns Hopkins university in 1883-'5, receiving the degree of Ph. D. from that institution in 1886, and that of LL. D. from Wake Forest college, N. C., in 1887. He was associate in history at Bryn Mawr college, Pa., in 1885-'6, and associate professor of history and political science in the same college in 1886-'8. In the latter year he was elected to the chair of history and political economy in Wesleyan university. Prof. Wilson has published "Congressional Government: a Study in American Politics" (Boston, 1885). This work has attracted attention in England, Belgium, and Germany. In England it has been accepted as an authority on American institutions. It has also been epitomized by Prof. Émile de Laveleye in the "Revue des Deux-Mondes." He has contributed to a collection of essays by American economists, entitled "The National Revenues" (Chicago, 1888), and articles on political and administrative subjects to periodicals.

WILSTACH, John Augustine (wil'-stack), author, b. in Washington, D. C., 14 July, 1824. He was educated in a military and academical institute that was taught by Ormsby M. Mitchel, and in Cincinnati college, studied law, and began practice in 1850. From 1852 till 1862 he was a master in chancery. In 1867 he was sent to the Paris universal exposition as commissioner for Indiana, and from that year till 1872 he was commissioner of immigration for the same state. He has devoted his attention to philological studies, and has made the only complete translation of the works of Virgil into English verse, with various readings and notes (Boston, 1884). He also published a review of the literature relating to Virgil under the title of "The Virgilians" (1884). More recently he has prepared a poetical translation of the "Divine Comedy" of Dante Alighieri, with notes and illustrations (1888), and a volume of criticism entitled "Dante, the Danteans, and Things Dantean" (1889). Mr. Wilstach has invented a new character (a) to represent the Greek diphthong eu, which was first used in typography in his translation of the "Divina Commedia." He has almost completed a free translation of the entire Bible from the original languages.—His son, Joseph Walter, author, b. in Lafayette, Ind., 28 June, 1857, was educated at St. John's college, Fordham, N. Y., studied law, and established himself in practice at Lafayette, Ind. He has made a translation of some of the "Odes" of Horace (printed privately, New York, 1883), and, besides review articles, has published a "Biography of Count Charles d'Alembert" (1885).

WIMAN, Erastus, capitalist, b. in Churchville, Peel co., Ont., 21 April, 1834. He received a scanty education in a country school, removed to Toronto, and, after working four years as a printer, became a reporter on the Toronto "Globe," and in 1854-'7 was commercial editor of that paper. He edited the Montreal "Trade Review" in 1864-'5. In 1856 he entered the service of R. G. Dun and Co.'s mercantile agency, and in 1867 became a partner in its New York house, and subsequently its principal manager. He became president of the Great Northwestern telegraph company of Canada in 1881, is a director of the Western Union telegraph company, and president of the Staten Island Rapid Transit railway company in 1884, and succeeded in carrying through congress the authorization of the Arthur Kill bridge between New Jersey and Staten island, which makes ten miles of water front in New York harbor accessible to trunk railroads. Mr. Wiman was mainly instrumental in establishing the Canadian club of New York in 1885, and was its first president. Through his influence chiefly the project of the commercial union of Canada with the United States assumed public importance in the former country, and was finally adopted in the winter of 1888 as the main clause in the platform of the Canadian Liberals, under its changed name of unrestricted reciprocity. He was instrumental in securing in 1886 the abolition of imprisonment for debt in New York state.

WIMMER, Boniface, R. C. prelate, b. in Thalmassing, Bavaria, 9 Jan., 1809; d. in Westmoreland county, Pa., 8 Dec., 1887. He received a classical education, took an academic course at Ratisbon, and entered the Munich university with the intention of studying law, but, changing his mind, pursued a theological course in the Ratisbon seminary. On 31 July, 1831, he was ordained priest; and in the following year he was admitted to the Benedictine monastery in Metten, Bavaria, changing his baptismal name Sebastian to Boniface. During 1833-'6 he labored as professor and priest in Edenstetler, Augsburg, in 1840 became professor in the Louis gymnasium, Munich, and in 1846 arrived in the United States with four theological students and fifteen artisans, for the purpose of establishing an abbey for the education of German youth for the Roman Catholic priesthood. He settled near Beatty, Westmoreland co., Pa., and on 28 Sept., 1848, laid the foundation of the present St. Vincent's abbey. Two years afterward he founded St. Mary's priory in Elk county, Pa. Pope Pius IX. raised his original settlement to the dignity first of a monastery, then of an abbey, and appointed him superior of St. Vincent's, 21 May, 1852, abbot ad triennium, 17 Sept., 1855, and abbot for life and president of the American congregation, 27 July, 1866. When the parent abbey was fully established and provided with a variety of manufacturing industries for its support, he set about founding branches in the south, and organized colonies in Louisiana, North Carolina, Alabama, and Georgia in 1876-'7, and in southern Illinois in 1881. On 29 Dec., 1883, he celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his Benedictine profession amid ceremonies in which members of the order from all parts of the world participated, and on that occasion Pope Leo XIII. elevated him to the dignity of arch-abbot. He was a man of attractive manner, fine business ability, and large scholarship.

WIMPFEN-BERNEBURG, Alexander Stanislas, explorer, b. in Deux-Ponts in 1748; d. in Paris in 1819. He was a younger brother of the two French generals, François Louis and Félix, received his education in his native city, entered the French army, and served in this country as a captain under Count Rochambeau in 1781-'2. He was afterward employed in the West Indies, but resigned in 1788, and visited the West Indies and Mexico. In 1804 he secured an employment in the military household of Napoleon I., which he retained till 1814, when he retired to private life. He wrote "Voyage à Saint Domingue dans les années 1788, 1789, and 1790" (2 vols., Paris, 1797), which was translated into German as "Reisen nach St. Domingo" (Erfurt, 1798), and into English (London, 1797); "Voyage dans les Antilles Françaises et Espagnoles" (Paris, 1799); "Impressions de voyage et essai sur le royaume de la Nouvelle Espagne" (1802); and "Histoire naturelle du Cacao et du Sucre" (1805).

WINANS, Ross, inventor, b. in Vernon, N. J., in October, 1796; d. in Baltimore, Md., 11 April, 1877. He began life as a farmer, and exhibited at an early age great inventive genius. One of his first devices was a plough. Afterward he invented the friction-wheel for cars, and the outside bearing on axles, now almost indispensable to the use of railways. He was also the inventor of the eight-wheeled car system. He was sent to England by the Baltimore and Ohio railroad company to study the English systems, and spent a year in making observations that proved of great value to the company. He built the first successful locomotive used on this railroad, and also invented the camel-back locomotive. He established in Baltimore the largest railway machine-shops in the country, and his sons were associated in their management. Mr. Winans was solicited by the Russian government, through the agency of George W. Whistler, to go to Russia and build rolling-stock for the railroad between Moscow and St. Petersburg, but declined to go himself, and sent his two sons. During the civil war he took an active part in politics, and was chosen to represent Baltimore in the extra session of the Maryland legislature in 1861; but he was arrested and imprisoned in Fort McHenry. He made numerous compilations of gleanings from the works of eminent writers, upon philosophical subjects, and was himself the author of various pamphlets on religious subjects, and of "One Religion, Many Creeds" (Baltimore, 1870).—His son, Thomas De Kay, engineer, b. in Vernon, N. J., 6 Dec., 1820; d. in Newport, R. I., 11 June, 1878, showed when a child great fondness for mechanical toys, which taste his father encouraged, and apprenticed him in his youth to a machinist. On reaching his majority, he became associated in business with his father, and, with his brother William Lewis, was sent to Russia to arrange the contracts for furnishing and managing the equipment of the railroad between Moscow and St. Petersburg. In 1843, with Andrew M. Eastwick and Joseph Harrison, they concluded a contract with the Russian government for $3,000,000, and subsequently they held other contracts, from which the profits were very large. With his father and brother he invented a system of steam navigation commonly called the "cigar-ship," and for many years conducted elaborate, expensive, and successful experiments, principally in European waters. After his return to the United States, he devoted his attention to the study of new inventions of the most diverse kinds. He devised a great improvement in the construction of organs, invented a tubular adjustment by which young trout could be more readily fed, and built a chimney 100 feet high to ventilate his residence in Baltimore.

WINANS, William, clergyman, b. in Pennsylvania, 3 Nov., 1788; d. in Amite county, Miss., 31 Aug., 1857. He entered the Western conference of the Methodist Episcopal church in 1808, went to Mississippi as a missionary in 1812, was a pioneer of his church in that state and Louisiana, and took a conspicuous part in the organization of the Methodist Episcopal church, south. He exerted a wide influence in his denomination, and took part in the discussion of political questions. He published "Discourses on Fundamental Religious Subjects," edited by the Rev. Thomas O. Summers, D. D. (Nashville).

WINCHELL, James Manning, clergyman, b. in North East, Dutchess co., N. Y., 8 Sept., 1791; d. in Boston, Mass., 22 Feb., 1820. He entered Union college in 1808, but, deciding to become a minister, preferred to finish at a Baptist institution, and was graduated at Brown in 1812. Mr. Winchell was licensed by the Baptist church in North East on 4 Oct., 1812, and accepted an invitation to supply the pulpit in Bristol, R. I., for a year. He was then called to the 1st Baptist church in Boston, and was publicly recognized in that place on 14 March, 1814. Here he remained until his death, and won a high reputation for eloquence, and suavity and grace of manner. Mr. Winchell was one of the editors of the "American Baptist Magazine," and published "Jubilee Sermons: Two Discourses, exhibiting an Historical Sketch of the First Baptist Church in Boston from 1665 to 1818" (Boston, 1819), and "Watts's Psalms and Hymns, with a Supplement" (1820). The latter, known as "Winchell's Watts," was long used by the Baptist churches in this country.—His nephew, Alexander, geologist, b. in North East, Dutchess co., N. Y., 31 Dec., 1824, was graduated at Wesleyan in 1847, and spent the following year in teaching natural science in Pennington seminary, N. J. In 1848 he became teacher of natural science in the Amenia (N. Y.) seminary, but in 1850 he removed to Alabama, and had charge successively of several institutions. He was called to the chair of physics and civil engineering in the University of Michigan in 1854, and a year later was transferred to the chair of geology, zoölogy, and botany, which he then held until 1873. In 1866-'9 he filled a similar professorship in the University of Kentucky. Meanwhile he made a survey of a railroad from Ann Arbor to Manchester, and was appointed in 1859 director of the geological survey of Michigan. The beginning of the civil war practically brought the survey to a close, although Prof. Winchell made palæontological researches in the material that it had accumulated, and in his publications established seven new genera and 304 new species, most of which were fossil. In 1869 the geological survey resumed its work, and he was designated as its director, but he resigned in 1871. He accepted the chancellorship of Syracuse university in 1873, but at the end of the year retired from this office to become professor of geology, zoölogy, and botany. In 1875 he was invited to fill a similar chair in Vanderbilt university, and thereafter until 1878 continued to divide his time between the two institutions. As he had contributed by editorial request certain articles to the "Northern Christian Advocate," in which he defended a belief in the existence of a preadamite race, and as he was understood to hold the doctrine of evolution, his resignation from the professorship at Vanderbilt was asked by Bishop Holland N. McTyeire, president of the board of trustees of that university. Prof. Winchell refused, and his lectureship was declared abolished by the college authorities. In 1879 he was recalled to the chair of geology and palæontology in the University of Michigan, which he still retains. He was actively connected in 1886-'7 with the geological survey of Minnesota. The degree of LL. D. was conferred on him by Wesleyan in 1867, and his name has been assigned to fourteen new species. Prof. Winchell has lectured extensively on geology, and contributed to numerous periodicals. By his investigations he has established the Marshall group in American geology. His bibliography includes about 200 titles. In addition to his reports on geology, he has published "Genealogy of the Family of Winchell in America" (Ann Arbor, 1869); "Sketches of Creation" (New York, 1870); "A Geological Chart" (1870); "Michigan," being condensed popular sketches of the topography, climate, and geology of the state (1873); "The Doctrine of Evolution" (1874); "Reconciliation of Science and Religion" (1877); "Preadamites, or a Demonstration of Existence of Men before Adam" (Chicago, 1880); "Sparks from a Geologist's Hammer" (1881); "World Life, or Comparative Geology" (1883); "Geological Excursions, or the Rudiments of Geology for Young Learners" (1884); "Geological Studies, or Elements of Geology" (1886); and "Walks and Talks in the Geological Field" (1886).—Alexander's brother, Newton Horace, geologist, b. in North East, Dutchess co., N. Y., 17 Dec., 1839, was graduated at the University of Michigan in 1866. In 1860 he had been assistant on the geological survey of Michigan, for which he reported a complete "Catalogue of the Plants of the State of Michigan." In 1866 he became superintendent of public schools in Adrian, Mich., but resigned in July, 1869, to accept the office of assistant state geologist of Michigan. A year later he joined the geological survey of Ohio, where he remained until 1872, when he became state geologist of Minnesota, in connection with which he is also professor of mineralogy and geology in the University of Minnesota. Prof. Winchell is president of the Minnesota academy of natural sciences. In 1887 he was appointed a member of the U. S. assay commission, and he is managing editor of "The American Geologist," issued at Minneapolis. His bibliography includes nearly fifty titles, and comprises "Annual Reports on the Geology and Natural History Survey of Minnesota" (15 vols., Minneapolis, 1872-'88), and "Geology of Minnesota" (2 vols., 1884-'8).

WINCHESTER, Elhanan, clergyman, b. in Brookline, Mass., 30 Sept., 1751; d. in Hartford, Conn., 18 April, 1797. He began to preach about 1769, and in 1771 was ordained pastor of an open-communion church at Rehoboth, Mass. About a year later, adopting the views of the close-unionists, he was excommunicated by his church, and after residing in Charleston, S. C., in 1774-'80, he became pastor of the 1st Baptist church in Philadelphia. In 1781, with the majority of his congregation, he founded a Universalist church there. In 1787-'94 he preached successfully in England. Among his numerous publications are "New Book of Poems on Several Occasions" (Boston, 1773); "Hymns" (1776); "The Universal Restoration, Exhibited in Four Dialogues" (London, 1788; 4th ed., with notes by William Vidler, 1799); "Course of Lectures on the Prophecies that Remain to be Fulfilled" (4 vols., 1789; American ed., 2 vols., 1800); "Oration on the Discovery of America," delivered in London (1792); "The Three Woe Trumpets" (1793); "The Progress and Empire of Christ," a poem (1793); and "Plain Political Catechism for Schools" (1795). A sketch of his life and review of his writings was issued after his death by William Vidler (1797), and his life was also written by Edwin M. Stone (Boston, 1836).

WINCHESTER, James, soldier, b. in White Level (now Westminster), Md., 6 Feb., 1752; d. near Gallatin, Tenn., 27 July, 1826. He served in the Revolution, being commissioned lieutenant in the 3d Maryland regiment, 27 May, 1778, was captured by the British, and exchanged, 22 Dec., 1780. He then settled in Sumner county, Tenn., where he married and resided on a large estate. On 27 March, 1812, he was appointed a brigadier-general in the regular army, and on 18 Sept. he relieved Gen. William Henry Harrison of his command at Fort Wayne, much to the dissatisfaction of the soldiers, some of whom refused at first to serve under the new commander. On 24 Sept., Harrison was given command of the Northwestern army, including the force under Winchester. The latter had already set out, on 22 Sept., for Maumee rapids with 2,000 men. He was opposed by about 1,200 British and Indians under Maj. Muir; but Muir, alarmed by exaggerated reports of Winchester's strength, fled without offering battle. Winchester was afterward joined at Fort Defiance by Harrison, who, having quelled a mutiny among the troops, left him there in command of the left wing of the army, with which he intended to move on Detroit. Winchester now moved on Maumee rapids as he had been ordered, and though Harrison soon afterward recommended the abandonment of the movement, in view of reports that Tecumseh was in position to cut off his supplies, the march was continued, and the rapids were occupied and fortified on 10 Jan., 1813. On 17 Jan. he sent forward a detachment of about 700 men, who drove a party of British and Indians from Frenchtown (now Monroe, Mich.), on Raisin river, with a loss of only 12 killed and 55 wounded. On the 20th Winchester followed with 300 men, and encamped outside the town. Col. Henry Proctor, who was then at Fort Malden, eighteen miles distant, now approached secretly with 1,500 British and Indians; but, though the American commander was informed of their advance, he refused to believe it. His camp was surprised on the evening of the 22d, and after a bloody conflict he surrendered his force, including those in the town who had repelled the enemy and seemed likely to hold their position. Proctor agreed to make provision for the protection of the prisoners against savage barbarity; but this was not done, and the surrender was followed by a massacre of the sick and wounded who had been left in the town. This outrage was keenly felt in Kentucky, where most of the victims resided, and excited great indignation throughout the United States. The battle-cry of the Kentucky soldiers during the remainder of the war was "Remember the River Raisin!" The American loss was 934 men out of an army of about 1,000, while that of the British was 180. Those British writers that make any mention of the massacre at Frenchtown try to shield Proctor by affirming that he neither accepted the surrender on any conditions, nor agreed to protect the wounded: but their statements are controverted by the testimony of many witnesses, and by the report of Gen. Winchester, which was written at Malden on the day after the battle. Gen. Winchester was taken as a prisoner to Quebec, and confined at Beauport, near that city, till his exchange in 1814. On 21 March, 1815, he resigned his commission in the army, and he afterward resided on his Tennessee estate.

WINCHESTER, Oliver Fisher, manufacturer, b. in Boston, Mass., 30 Nov., 1810; d. in New Haven, Conn., 10 Dec., 1880. After receiving a limited education, he was apprenticed to a carpenter, and in 1830 became a master-builder in Baltimore, Md., but left his trade in 1833, entered business in that city, and in the following year established the first men's furnishing-store in Maryland. About 1848 he removed to New Haven, Conn., and began the manufacture of shirts, which he was probably the earliest to undertake in this country. The business, in which he was associated with John M. Davies, grew to be one of the largest in the United States. About 1856 he became interested in fire-arms, and in 1857 he was a large stockholder in the Volcanic arms company, which had just been formed to manufacture the repeating rifle of Benjamin T. Henry, one of the earliest magazine arms in this country. The company was unsuccessful, and in 1860 Mr. Winchester bought it out and organized the New Haven arms company, of which he became president. In 1865 the company was reorganized as the Winchester repeating arms company, and, selling his interest in the shirt-factory, Mr. Winchester gave the former his entire attention. The Henry rifle was improved more and more, until its name was changed to the Winchester repeating arm, and in 1872 the company also began to make metallic cartridges, of which its plant can produce half a million a day. The buildings of the company in New Haven cover an area of four acres. They furnished many rifles for the French government during the war with Germany, and for Turkey in the Russo-Turkish war. Mr.

Winchester was a Republican presidential elector in 1864, and in 1866 was chosen lieutenant-governor of Connecticut. He took a deep interest in religious and educational affairs, which he aided liberally. Besides large donations to the scientific and theological departments of Yale, he gave to the university property whose value at the time was about $100,000, and will increase to many times that amount, for the foundation of the Yale observatory. Though this was called at first the Winchester observatory, Gov. Winchester specially requested that his name should not be used in the title. One of the chief features of the observatory is its heliometer, which is the only one in the country, and at the time of its purchase was the largest in the world. The institution is also known for its horological and thermometric bureaus, by which many hundreds of watches and thermometers are examined yearly, and their peculiarities certified. Gov. Winchester was also much interested in horticulture, and his residence and grounds in New Haven were among the finest in the city.

WINCHESTER, Samuel Gover, clergyman, b. in Rock Run, Harford co., Md., 17 Feb., 1805; d. in New York city, 31 Aug., 1841. He attended school at Bel Air and Baltimore, Md., and began the study of law in the University of Maryland in 1825, but abandoned it for theology, studied in Princeton seminary, and in 1830-'7 was pastor of a Presbyterian church in Philadelphia. From the latter year till his death he had charge of a congregation in Natchez, Miss. Besides frequently contributing to current religious literature, he published "Companion for the Sick" (1833); "Christian Counsel to the Sick" (1836); "Family Religion" (1841); and "The Theatre" (1841).

WINDER, Levin, governor of Maryland, b. in 1756; d. in Baltimore, Md., 7 July, 1819. He was appointed major of the 4th Maryland regiment, and before the close of the Revolutionary war attained the rank of lieutenant-colonel. Subsequently he became a brigadier-general of the Maryland militia. He also was speaker of the house of delegates, and in 1816 was a member of the state senate.

WINDER, William Henry, soldier, b. in Somerset county, Md., 18 Feb., 1775; d. in Baltimore, Md., 24 May, 1824. He was educated at the University of Pennsylvania, studied law, and settled in Baltimore, where he continued from 1798 until the war with Great Britain. In March, 1812, he was appointed lieutenant-colonel of the 14th U. S. infantry, and on 6 July was given command of that regiment. He had charge of a successful expedition sent from Black Rock to the Canada shore below Fort Erie on 28 Nov., 1812, and was made brigadier-general on 12 March, 1813. At the battle of Stony Creek, 1 June, 1813, his command repelled the British attack, but he was captured. In May, 1814, he was appointed adjutant and inspector-general, and commanded at the battle of Bladensburg. He was unable to prevent the occupation of Washington, and on the reduction of the army in June, 1815, he was retired. He returned to his profession and served in the Maryland senate.—His son, John Henry, soldier, b. in Maryland in 1800; d. in Branchville, S. C., 9 Feb., 1865, was graduated at the U. S. military academy in 1820, and after various services became captain in the 1st artillery on 7 Oct., 1842. He took part in the war with Mexico, and was at the battles of Contreras and Churubusco, the storming of Chapultepec, and the capture of Mexico, gaining for his gallantry the brevets of major and lieutenant-colonel. On 23 Nov., 1860, he was promoted major, but he resigned on 27 April, 1861, and entered the Confederate service. He was made brigadier-general and given command of Richmond, where he had charge of Libby prison and Belle Isle. Subsequently he was sent to command the prison-pen at Andersonville, Ga., where his cruelties to the prisoners made his name a reproach.

WINDOM, William, cabinet officer. b. in Belmont county, Ohio, 10 May, 1827; died in New York, 29 Jan., 1891. He studied law at Mount Vernon, Ohio, and was admitted to the bar in 1850. In 1852 he became prosecuting attorney for Knox county, but in 1855 he removed to Minnesota, and soon afterward he was chosen to congress from that state as a Republican, serving from 1859 till 1869. In that body he served two terms as chairman of the committee on Indian affairs and also was at the head of the special committee to visit the western tribes in 1865, and of that on the conduct of the commissioner of Indian affairs in 1867. In 1870 he was appointed to the U. S. senate to fill the unexpired term of Daniel S. Norton, deceased, and he was subsequently chosen for the term that ended in 1877. He was re-elected for the one that closed in 1883, and resigned in 1881 to enter the cabinet of President Garfield as secretary of the treasury, but retired on the accession of President Arthur in the same year, and was elected by the Minnesota legislature to serve the remainder of his term in the senate. He was secretary of the treasury under Harrison, and died suddenly at Delmonico's, after concluding an important speech.

WINDS, William, soldier, b. in Southold, Long Island, N. Y., in 1727; d. in Rockaway, Morris co., N. J., 12 Oct., 1789. While yet a young man he fixed his residence in New Jersey, purchasing a large tract of land in Morris county, where, by reason of his wealth and natural abilities, he became a leader of the people. Hundreds of traditions are still repeated in relation to him, many of which are doubtless true, and all of which represent him as a man of great courage, as well as of rare physical and mental powers. He first became prominent at the age of thirty when he served as a captain in the brigade that was raised in New Jersey, in 1758, to aid in the conquest of Canada. Many stories are related of his exploits in the old French war, but they are not so fully authenticated as to give them a place in history. In 1765 he was one of the king's justices of the peace for Morris county, and it is said that in his official transactions he boldly resisted the enforcement of the stamp-act, substituting the bark of the white birch for the stamped paper, no one daring to call in question the validity of any legal instrument that he prepared on no matter what kind of material. In 1772 and 1775 he represented Morris county in the general assembly of New Jersey, and he was also chosen a delegate to the Provincial congress that assembled in New Brunswick in 1776. Under the first call for troops from New Jersey by this congress, he was made lieutenant-colonel of the 1st battalion, 7 Nov., 1775, Lord Stirling being colonel. On 7 March, 1776, he was promoted colonel of the same, and on 4 March, 1777, he was made brigadier-general of militia. Under his first appointment he was stationed at Perth Amboy, N. J., and while there held in his custody, as a prisoner, Gov. William Franklin, the last of the royal governors of New Jersey. On being made brigadier-general, he was ordered to the north on the expedition against Canada, and was among the few that survived that campaign. Subsequently he served in New Jersey.

WINDSHIP, George Barker, athlete, b. in Roxbury, Mass., 3 Jan., 1834; d. there, 14 Sept., 1876. His father, grandfather, and great-grandfather were all physicians; the last-named, Dr. Amos Windship, was surgeon on the "Alliance," under John Paul Jones. George entered Harvard in 1850, and in his freshman year was induced to pay special attention to physical training by ridicule of his weakness and small stature. He was graduated in 1854, and at the medical department in 1857, and while engaged in active practice kept himself in training and gave particular attention to lifting, devising a harness with which, by constantly increasing his load, he finally succeeded in raising from the ground 2,600 pounds, a greater weight than any one else had ever lifted. He gave public lectures on "Physical Culture" illustrating them with feats of strength, and thus attained a wide reputation. Out of his experiments has grown the modern system of health-lifting; but he carried them too far, and was attacked by a paralytic affection, which resulted in his death. Besides his lifting-apparatus, Dr. Windship invented a system of graduated dumb-bells.

WINEBRENNER, John, founder of a sect, b. in Frederick county, Md., 24 March, 1797; d. in Harrisburg, Pa., 12 Sept., 1860. He was partly educated at Dickinson college, Carlisle, Pa., studied theology in Philadelphia, and was ordained by the synod of the German Reformed church in September, 1820, at Hagerstown, Md. The same year he was called to the Salem church at Harrisburg, Pa., and at the same time he ministered to churches in the neighborhood. He retained his connection with the Harrisburg charge till 1827, when, owing to his religious views on revivals, Sunday-schools, and the early temperance and anti-slavery movements, and to his allowing non-ordained persons to preach in his pulpit, he became obnoxious to his congregation, and a separation took place. His connection with the Reformed church ceased by the action of the synod in September, 1828. In several pamphlets that he subsequently issued he defended his principles from the attacks of his opponents and continued active as a preacher. In October, 1830, he established a new denomination that he called the "Church of God," whose members were at that time known as Winebrennerians. They hold that there are three positive ordinances of perpetual standing: baptism by immersion, the washing of feet, and the Lord's supper. Baptism, however, they do not regard as necessarily preceding church fellowship, faith in Christ being considered the prerequisite to admission into their communion. Washing the feet of disciples they hold as being obligatory on all Christians, and they also approve of fasts, experience-meetings, and camp-meetings. Mr. Winebrenner met with remarkable success as the founder of a new sect. The ministers of that denomination now (1889) number about 500, and the membership probably 65,000. They have a foreign and domestic missionary society, a book depository, and a printing establishment at Harrisburg, Pa., where a weekly paper, the "Church Advocate," and a Sunday-school paper, "The Gem," are published. For several years he edited the "Gospel Publisher" (now the "Church Advocate"), and with Isaac Daniel Rupp, issued "The History of all the Religious Denominations in the United States" (Hartford, 1844). He also published "Pronouncing Testament and Gazetteer" (Harrisburg, 1836); "Brief Views of the Church of God" (1840); "A Treatise on Regeneration" (1844); "The Seraphina," a music-book (1853); "Practical and Doctrinal Sermons" (1860); and pamphlets and separate sermons. He was the compiler and editor of the "Church Hymn-Book."

WINES, Enoch Cobb, philanthropist, b. in Hanover, N. J., 17 Feb., 1806; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 10 Dec., 1879. He was graduated at Middlebury in 1827, and in 1829 was commissioned teacher of midshipmen in the U. S. navy. In 1832 he purchased Edgehill school, at Princeton, N. J. Afterward he removed to Philadelphia, where he was a professor in the City high-school, and subsequently he purchased a classical school at Burlington, N. J. He then studied theology, and was pastor of Congregational churches in Cornwall, Vt., and East Hampton, Long Island, N. Y. In 1853 he was chosen to the chair of ancient languages in Washington college, Pa., and in 1859 to the presidency of the City university of St. Louis, Mo. He accepted, in 1862, the secretaryship of the New York prison association, and from that date until his death his talents and energy were devoted to the study of penology, and to the promotion of reform in the administration of criminal law, and in the conduct of penal institutions throughout the world. In 1866, in conjunction with Dr. Theodore W. Dwight, of Columbia law-school, he made a tour of inspection of the prisons and reformatories of the United States, of which they submitted a report, in 1867, to the legislature of New York. In 1870, through his personal efforts, the first National prison congress assembled at Cincinnati, at which was formed the National prison association, of which Dr. Wines was unanimously chosen secretary, which post he filled until the close of his life. Similar National congresses were organized by him at Baltimore in 1872, at St. Louis in 1874, and in New York in 1876. In 1871 the New York legislature authorized the appointment of three commissioners, to investigate the question of the relations between prison and free labor. Dr. Wines was appointed a member of this commission, and wrote its report, which was pronounced in its opposition to maintaining convicts in idleness. In this same year Dr. Wines was appointed by President Grant, under authority of a joint resolution of congress, U. S. commissioner to organize an International penitentiary congress at London, and he was sent abroad for the purpose of making the necessary diplomatic representations to foreign governments. When the congress assembled, 4 July, 1872, delegates were present from twenty-six nations, Dr. Wines representing both the United States and Mexico. At the second congress, at Stockholm, in 1878, he was chosen honorary president. At the International penitentiary congress which assembled in Rome in November, 1885, Count di Foresta, an Italian senator, said of him: "It is to him more than to any other individual that we owe the initiation of the movement for the reformation of prisoners, which is the glory of the latter half of the 19th century." Middlebury gave him the degree of D. D. in 1853 and Washington that of LL. D. in 1857. His works include "Two Years and a Half in the Navy" (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1832); "A Trip to China" (Boston, 1832); "Hints on Popular Education," believed to be the first systematic treatise on this subject published in the United States (Philadelphia, 1838); "How shall I govern my School?" (1838); "Commentaries on the Laws of the Ancient Hebrews" (New York, 1852); "Adam and Christ" (1855); "Historical and Farewell Discourses" (1859); "The True Penitent" (Philadelphia, 1862); "Treatise on Regeneration" (1863); "An Essay on Temptation" (1865); "The Prisons and Reformatories of the United States and Canada" (1867); "The Promises of God" (1868); and "State of Prisons and Child-saving Institutions" (Cambridge, 1880).—His son, Frederick Howard, clergyman, b. in Philadelphia, Pa., 9 April, 1838, was graduated at Washington college, Pa., in 1857, served as tutor there, and afterward studied at Princeton theological seminary, but left because of weakness of the eyes. He was licensed by the presbytery of St. Louis in 1860, and in 1862 was commissioned hospital chaplain in the National army. He was on duty at Springfield, Mo., till 1864, and participated in the battle of Springfield, 8 Jan., 1863, being mentioned by name in the official report for bravery on the field. He was graduated at Princeton seminary in 1865, and called to the 1st Presbyterian church of Springfield, Ill., where he remained four years. In 1869 he became secretary of the newly created board of State commissioners of public charities for the state of Illinois, which post he still holds. Mr. Wines was active in effecting an organization of similar boards throughout the country, under the name of the National conference of charities and correction, of which at Louisville, in 1883, he was the president. In 1879 he conducted the investigations as to the number and condition of the defective, dependent, and delinquent classes in the United States, and his report constitutes a separate volume of the "Tenth Census." In 1886 he established a monthly journal entitled "The International Record of Charities and Correction," which is published in New York and London. He represented Illinois in the International penitentiary congress at Stockholm, in 1878. The result of his observations there was embodied in a report to the legislature, and he recommended the construction of the new Hospital for the insane, at Kankakee, Ill., on the "detached ward" or "village" system, an event which marks an era in the history of the care of the insane in this country. In 1887 Mr. Wines was elected secretary of the National prison association, and succeeded to the post that was formerly held by his father. His writings, apart from reports, have been chiefly pamphlets. Among them are "The County Jail System, an Argument for its Abolition," read at the New York prison congress (1878); "The Kankakee Hospital" (1882); "Provision for the Insane in the United States," an historical sketch (1885); "Conditional Liberation, or the Paroling of Prisoners," written for the Atlanta prison congress (1886); and "American Prisons in the Tenth Census" (1888).

WING, Conway Phelps, clergyman, b. near Marietta, Ohio, 12 Feb., 1809; d. in Carlisle, Pa., 7 May, 1889. He was graduated at Auburn theological seminary in 1831, and was ordained and installed pastor of the church at Sodus, Wayne co., N. Y., by the presbytery of Geneva in 1832, remaining there till 1836. He was afterward pastor at Ogden, N. Y., at Monroe, Mich., where he was pastor emeritus, at Huntsville, Ala., and at Carlisle, Pa. Mr. Wing took an active part in the revivals of 1832-'5, and in the anti-slavery agitation in western New York, and was zealous in his opposition to slavery in Tennessee and Alabama. He received the degree of D. D. from Dickinson college in 1857. He was an adherent to the new-school branch of the Presbyterian church, but an earnest supporter of the reunion in 1869 and 1870, and was a member of the joint committee of reconstruction for the church in the latter year. He translated from the German "A History of the Christian Church," by Dr. Charles Hase, with Dr. Charles E. Blumenthal (New York, 1856); and published "History of the Presbyteries of Donegal and Carlisle" (Carlisle, 1876); "History of the First Presbyterian Church of Carlisle" (1877); "History of Cumberland County, Pa." (1879); and "Historical and Genealogical Register of the Descendants of John Wing, of Sandwich" (New York, 1885; 2d ed., 1888).

WINGATE, George Wood, lawyer, b. in New York city, 1 July, 1840. He was educated in New York, and at the age of thirteen entered a law-office, where he continued until his admission to the bar in 1861. During the civil war he served with the 22d New York National guards, which he entered as a private, and was promoted until he became captain. His experience in the field impressed him with the necessity of greater training in marksmanship, and he specially instructed his company in that subject. After the war he wrote frequently on rifle-practice, and his efforts resulted in the formation of the National rifle association in 1871, of which he became secretary. In that capacity he drafted its regulations and aided largely in the establishment and management of the Creedmoor rifle-range. Subsequently he became president of the association, and held that office until 1888. In 1874 he was appointed general inspector of rifle-practice of New York state, with the rank of brigadier-general, but resigned in 1879. In this office he organized and carried into successful operation the system of instruction in rifle-practice that has since been followed by the National guard, as well as by the U. S. army. He was the first president of the Amateur rifle-club in 1872, and captain of the first American rifle-team in 1874, and has been connected with all the International rifle-matches. From the part he took in these matters he has been frequently called "the father of rifle-practice in America." He was president of the National guard association of the United States since 1879, and has been active in his profession. Gen. Wingate is the author of the "Last Campaign of the Twenty-second Regiment" (New York, 1864); a "Manual of Rifle-Practice," of which seven editions have been issued (1872); and "On Horseback through the Yellowstone" (1886).—His brother, Charles Frederick, sanitary engineer, b. in New York city, 5 March, 1847, was educated in the public schools, and early devoted his attention to journalism. For five years he was New York correspondent of the Springfield "Republican," under the signature of "Carlfrid." From 1874 till 1882 he edited successively the "Paper-Trade Journal," the "American Stationer," "The Housekeeper," and "The Sanitary Engineer." Since that time he has followed the profession of a sanitary engineer, and has paid special attention to the problem of working-men's homes in cities, on which he has written voluminously in the New York daily press. In 1887 he was instrumental in securing the passage of a bill to amend the tenement-house law and the small-parks bill. He organized the Twilight club in 1883, and has since been its secretary. Mr. Wingate contributed articles on the "History of the Tweed Ring" to the "North American Review" in 1874, and has edited "Views and Interviews on Journalism" (New York, 1875), and "Twilight Tracts" (1886).

WINGATE, Paine, senator, b. in Amesbury, Mass., 14 May, 1739; d. in Stratham, N. H., 7 March, 1838. He was a great-grandson of John Wingate, of Dover (1660), grandson of Col. Joshua, who was at the capture of Louisburg, and son of Rev. Paine Wingate, minister of Amesbury. The son was graduated at Harvard in 1759, studied theology, and was ordained a minister of the Congregational church at Hampton Falls, N. H., 14 Dec., 1763, where he preached till his dismissal, 18 March, 1776. He then removed to Stratham, N. H., and became a farmer. He was a member of the New Hampshire legislature, a delegate from that state to the Continental congress in 1787-'8, and was U. S. senator from New Hampshire from 4 March, 1789, till 2 March, 1793. He served in congress from New Hampshire in 1793-'5, and was a judge of the state superior court from 1798 till 1809. He was the last survivor of the original members of the U. S. senate, and was for several years the oldest graduate of Harvard.

WINGFIELD, Edwin Maria, English merchant, b. in England about 1570; the date of his death is unknown. He was of a family of wealth and distinction, became a merchant in London, and took an active part in colonizing Virginia, under the patent of 10 April, 1606. He sailed with the first company of emigrants, 19 Dec., 1606, and was named first president of the colony in the sealed instructions that were opened on the passage. Having quarrelled with his associates, especially with Capt. John Smith, he was deposed, and returned to England, after which no further details of his life are known. Charles Deane edited, with notes and an introduction, "A Discourse of Virginia," by Wingfield, from the original manuscript in the Lambeth library (Boston, 1860).

WINGFIELD, John Henry Ducachet, P. E. bishop, b. in Portsmouth, Va., 24 Sept., 1833. At the age of thirteen he entered St. Timothy's college, Maryland, where he was graduated in 1850. He served as tutor there for two years, joined the senior class of William and Mary college, Va., in 1852, and was graduated in 1853. Returning to St. Timothy's, he spent another year in teaching, and in the autumn of 1854 removed to New York and became a tutor in the Churchill military academy at Sing Sing. In 1855 he entered the Theological seminary of Virginia, where he remained only one year, removing to Arkansas, and accepting the office of principal of Ashley institute, at Little Rock. He was ordained priest, in the chapel of the Theological seminary of Virginia, 1 July, 1859, by Bishop Johns. In July, 1858, he became assistant to his father, who was rector of Trinity church, Portsmouth, Va. He was rector of Christ church, Rock Spring, Harford co., Md., in 1864, but returned to Portsmouth to his old post in 1866. Two years afterward he became rector of St. Paul's church, Petersburg, Va., where, in 1871, he founded St. Paul's school for young ladies. The degree of D. D. was conferred upon him by William and Mary college in 1869, and that of LL. D. by the same college in 1874. In that year he removed to California, and was rector of Trinity church, San Francisco. During the session of the general convention at New York in 1874 he was elected missionary bishop of northern California, and he was consecrated in St. Paul's church, Petersburg, Va., on 2 Dec., 1874, but remained in charge of his parish until April, 1875. He became president of the missionary college of St. Augustine, Benicia, and in 1876 head of St. Mary's of the Pacific, a school for girls, and rector of St. Paul's church in that city. He was elected bishop of Louisiana in 1879, but declined.

WINKLER, Edwin Theodore, clergyman, b. in Savannah, Ga., 13 Nov., 1823; d. in Marion, Ala., 10 Nov., 1883. He was graduated at Brown in 1843, and received his theological education at Newton theological seminary. Having been ordained to the Baptist ministry, he preached in Columbus and Albany, Ga., and in Gillisonville, S. C. In 1852 he became corresponding secretary of the Southern Baptist publication society, and editor of the "Southern Baptist," residing in Charleston, S. C. In 1854 he was called to the pastorate of the 1st Baptist church in that city. Subsequently he was pastor of the Citadel square church. In 1872 he took charge of the Baptist church in Marion, Ala., and in 1874 he was made editor-in-chief of the "Alabama Baptist." In 1858 he received the degree of D. D. from Furman university. Dr. Winkler was the author of a catechism for the instruction of colored people, and of several published sermons, addresses, and essays.

WINKLEY, Henry, donor, b. in Barrington, N. H., 9 Nov., 1803; d. in Philadelphia, Pa., 9 Aug., 1888. He was educated at district schools and at Pembroke academy. On the completion of his studies he went to Boston, Mass., and was employed in a crockery-store. Subsequently he engaged in that business for himself, and was an importer of china-ware in New York and Philadelphia from 1831 till 1852. In the latter year he retired from business, and thereafter devoted himself to the study of religious, social, and political economy, in the pursuit of which he travelled throughout the world. He was not married, and divided his fortune among such educational institutions as he considered orthodox. Mr. Winkley gave to Williams college, $50,000; to Phillips Exeter academy, $30,000; to Bowdoin college, $70,000; to the Theological seminary at Bangor, Me., $30,000; to that at Andover, $45,000; and to the one at Yale, 50,000; to Dartmouth college, $80,000; and to Amherst college, $30,000. All these bequests are directed by the will to constitute permanent funds, the income of which is to be applied for the benefit and purposes of the institutions as the trustees may think best. Mr. Winkley left to the American Bible society $20,000, and to the Young men's Christian association of Philadelphia $20,000. His remains were interred in Mount Auburn, where he had built a granite mausoleum in a lot that was the only piece of real estate he ever owned.

WINLOCK, Joseph, astronomer, b. in Shelby county, Ky., 6 Feb., 1826; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 11 June, 1875. He was graduated at Shelby college, Ky., in 1845, where he was appointed professor of mathematics and astronomy. In 1852-'7 he was one of the computers in the office of the "American Ephemeris and Nautical Almanac" in Cambridge, Mass., and then he was appointed professor of mathematics at the U. S. naval academy, Annapolis, Md., but he soon returned to Cambridge as superintendent of the "Nautical Almanac." In 1859 he relinquished this office to take charge of the mathematical department of the U. S. naval academy; but on the removal of that institution to Newport, R. I., at the beginning of the civil war, he resumed charge of the "Almanac." He was appointed in 1866 professor of astronomy in Harvard, and director of the observatory, and subsequently he was professor of geodesy in the Lawrence scientific and mining schools of the university. His first work after taking charge of this observatory was the reduction and publication of the unfinished work of his predecessors, thus completing the volume on sun-spots, the catalogue of zone stars, and of polar and clock stars that has since been published. Meanwhile the instrumental appliances were carefully studied and largely increased, not only by the accumulation of new forms, but by the introduction of improved apparatus of his own device. The meridian circle was procured through his influence at a cost of $12,000. In 1870, when the new instrument was ready for use, it was directed upon the zone of stars between 50° and 55° of north declination, which was the field assigned to the Harvard observatory by the Astronomische Gesellschaft. His other work included a catalogue of new double stars and much labor on stellar photometry. He was further active in the efforts that have resulted in furnishing standard time to Boston. In 1872 he began the preparation of a series of astronomical engravings to represent the most interesting objects in the heavens as they appeared in the powerful instrument of the observatory. Thirty-five plates were completed at the time of his death, and included representations of the planets, sun-spots, protuberances, and corona; the moon's craters and geography, seven of the most famous clusters and nebulae, the Donati comet of 1858 and Coggia's comet of 1874. He held the office of consulting astronomer of the U. S. coast survey, and in 1874 was appointed chairman of the commission that was established by act of congress for making inquiries into the causes of steam-boiler explosions. Prof. Winlock had charge of the party that was sent by the U. S. coast survey to Kentucky to observe the total solar eclipse of August, 1869, and conducted the expedition to Spain, under the same auspices, to observe the eclipse in December, 1870. The degree of A. M. was conferred on him by Harvard in 1868, and he was a member of various scientific societies, including the American academy of arts and sciences. In 1863 he was named by act of congress as one of the corporate members of the National academy of sciences. His published works consist chiefly of a set of "Tables of Mercury," of other publications from the office of the "American Ephemeris," and of brief papers in astronomical journals and in the proceedings of scientific societies of which he was a member.

WINSER, Henry Jacob, journalist, b. in the island of Bermuda, 23 Nov., 1833. His father, Francis J. Winsor, was an officer in the British navy. He attended the Springfield academy, Bermuda, came to New York in 1851, entered a printing-office as proof-reader, and later became a reporter on the "Times." At the opening of the civil war he accompanied Col. Ephraim E. Ellsworth as military secretary, and afterward was war-correspondent of the New York "Times." After the war he served for a period as city and night editor of the New York "Times," and then as day-manager of the editorial department. In 1867 he attended the French exposition at Paris as regular correspondent for the "Times," and made the trip to Cherbourg in the iron-clad "Dunderberg." In May, 1869, Mr. Winsor was appointed U. S. consul at Sonneberg, Germany, and during his twelve years' service he made several valuable reports to the state department, including one on forest-culture. In 1882 he was made chief of the bureau of information of the Northern Pacific railway company, but on the retirement of Henry Villard he returned to journalism, first as assistant editor of the New York "Commercial Advertiser" and afterward as managing editor of the Newark "Advertiser," with which he is still associated.

WINSLOW, Benjamin Davis, clergyman, b. in Boston, Mass., 13 Feb., 1815; d. in Burlington, N. J., 21 Nov., 1839. He was graduated at Harvard in 1835 and at the Episcopal general theological seminary, New York, in 1838, and the same year became assistant to his uncle, Rev. Dr. (afterward Bishop) George W. Doane, in the pastorate of St. Mary's church, Burlington, N. J. He was ordained deacon in May, 1838, and priest in March, 1839. Mr. Winslow was a graceful writer and accomplished preacher. His "Sermons and Poetical Remains" were edited by Bishop Doane, who prefixed a notice entitled "The True Catholic Churchman in his Life and Death" (New York, 1841).

WINSLOW, Charles Frederick, physician, b. in Nantucket, Mass., in 1811. He was graduated as a physician at Harvard in 1834. Dr. Winslow was appointed U. S. consul at Payta, Peru, in 1862, served for several years, visited the Sandwich islands and other countries, and was for many years a resident of California. He contributed to periodicals, and published "Cosmography, or Philosophical View of the Universe" (Boston, 1853); "Preparation of the Earth for the Intellectual Races," a lecture (1854); "The Cooling Globe" (1865); and "Force and Nature: Attraction and Repulsion, etc.," (Philadelphia, 1869).

WINSLOW, Edward, governor of Plymouth colony, b. in Droitwich, near Worcester, England, 18 Oct., 1595; d. at sea, 8 May, 1655. He was descended from an ancient English family. When he was a traveller on the continent he met Rev. John Robinson, of Leyden, with whose church he united in 1617. He sailed in the "Mayflower" with the band of first settlers at Plymouth, and on 22 March, 1621, he was deputed to negotiate with Massasoit, making a treaty that remained intact till it was broken by King Philip in 1675. In July, 1621, Winslow conducted the first embassy to the Indians, which was also the first attempt of the English to explore the interior. When, in March, 1623, Massasoit was likely to die, he was sent to the sachem, and by his skilful treatment saved the life of the valuable ally, who in his gratitude informed Winslow's guide of the plots among the surrounding tribes to cut off Thomas Weston's colony. He sailed, 10 Sept., 1623, for England, where he prepared for publication the following year his "Good Newes from New England," which drew much attention to the colony. On 16 March, 1624, he imported the first neat-cattle brought into New England. At the election that year he was chosen an assistant governor, in which office he was continued till 1647, excepting 1633, 1636, and 1644, when he was chosen governor. Contrary to the advice of Winslow, the adventurers in London had sent John Lyford, a preacher, to Plymouth, who wrote letters full of slander and falsehood to people in England. He therefore sailed that summer (1624) for England, presented the matter at a meeting, and returned to Plymouth with the evidence against Lyford, who, with John Oldham, was promptly banished. The principal oversight of the commercial transactions of the colony was in his keeping during its period of development. Upon coming to the chief magistracy in 1633, he found that disputes had arisen with the Dutch in New York respecting the trade with the Connecticut-river Indians. The Massachusetts colony declining to unite in establishing a trading-fort on the river, Gov. Winslow despatched a vessel, which went a mile beyond the Dutch fort, on the site of Hartford, and erected the first house in Connecticut. In 1635 he sailed for England to defend the Plymouth and Massachusetts colonies against the accusations of Thomas Morton, and to represent to the government the encroachments of the French on the east and the Dutch on the west. Archbishop Laud, then at the head of the special commission established in 1634, secured his imprisonment on a frivolous pretence; but, after seventeen weeks of confinement, obtaining his release by the privy council, he addressed an able paper to that body upon the object of his mission to the government. Under Winslow as governor, the court of associates, in November, 1636, enacted the elaborate code of laws and statutes that placed the government on a stable foundation. About 1 April, 1637, in behalf of the government, he replied to Winthrop's letter for advice in the conduct of the proposed Pequot war, and was selected to meet the authorities in Boston on 12 May, to whom he declared the war was none of Plymouth's quarrel. In the establishment of the confederation known by the name of the United Colonies of New England, he was commissioner from his colony. This act of 1643 he seems to have anticipated in 1631, when he petitioned the royal commission for a warrant to the colonies to defend themselves unitedly against all foes. The Massachusetts government intrusted him in 1646 with the mission to answer the charges of Samuel Gorton and others in England, and to defend the colony from the accusation of religious intolerance. His book, "Hypocrisie Unmasked," was considered a complete vindication. Winslow advocated the civilization and conversion of the Indians, and published an address to parliament and council, with intelligence from New England upon the subject; and by his influence an act was passed, 19 July, 1649, incorporating the Society for propagating the gospel in New England. The government appointed him one of three commissioners in 1654 to adjust the claims against Denmark for losses to English shipping. Much light is thrown upon the important service in which he was engaged on behalf of the colonies, during his sojourn in England (1646-'54), by the recent publication of the "Calendar of State Papers, Colonial Series, 1574-1660," edited by W. Noël Sainsbury (5 vols., London, 1860-'80). When Cromwell planned an expedition against the Spaniards in the West Indies under Gen. Venables and Admiral Penn, he appointed Winslow head commissioner at a salary of £1,000. The general and admiral disagreed in their tempers and views, the control of the commission was of no avail, and the army was defeated at Santo Domingo. The fleet sailed for Jamaica, but on the passage Winslow died of a fever, and his body was committed to the deep with the honors of war. Among his accomplishments was a consummate address, which never failed him as the diplomatist of the colony. His piety was fervent, and for a day of intoleration he was often singularly tolerant to those who differed with him in matters of belief. Gov. Winslow married at Leyden, 16 May, 1618, Elizabeth Barker, who died, 24 March, 1621, at Plymouth. He married, 12 May, 1621, Mrs. Susanna White, who had given birth to the first white child born in New England, was now the first bride, and destined to be the wife of a governor and mother of another governor. By her he had two children, Elizabeth and Josiah. His brothers, John, Kenelm, and Josiah, identified with the early history of the colony, are the ancestors of a numerous family. His family-seat was established in 1636-'7 at Greenharbor (now Marshfield), afterward the estate of Daniel Webster. The engraving of Gov. Winslow is from the only authentic portrait of any of the Pilgrims. It was executed in London in 1651 and is now preserved at Plymouth. The engraving above represents the monument in Plymouth to the memory of the pilgrims. Gov. Winslow's pen has left some valuable and substantial writings to indicate his versatility in narration and argument. What is called "Bradford's and Winslow's Journal," or by others "A Diary of Occurrences" (London, 1622), covering the first year of the colony, is admirably supplemented by "Winslow's Relation," which brings down the history to 10 Sept., 1623. This work, also known as "Good Newes from New England," appeared complete in Alexander Young's "Chronicles of the Pilgrims" (Boston, 1841). His letter to George Morton as advisory for such as proposed voyaging to Plymouth, the letters to John Winthrop, in Thomas Hutchinson's "Collection of Papers," and those to Sec. Thurlow ("State Papers," iii.) from the Barbadoes, 1654-'5, are among the most valuable of his briefer remains. His "Brief Narration," or "Hypocrisie Unmasked," in opposition to Samuel Gorton (1646), appears, in part, in Young's "Chronicles." This trenchant book was followed by another, under the title of "New England's Salamander," as an answer to aspersions cast upon New England (1647). "The Glorious Progress of the Gospel amongst the Indians in New England" (1649), dedicated to parliament, contained also letters from John Eliot and Thomas Mayhew. "A Platform of Church Discipline in New England" (1653) is his last publication extant or of which we have knowledge. See Moore's "Governors of New Plymouth"; Baylies's "New Plymouth": "The Winslow Memorial," by David P. and Frances K. Holton (New York, 1877); Samuel G. Drake's "History of Boston" (Boston, 1856); and John G. Palfrey's "History of New England" (3 vols., 1858-'64).—His son, Josiah, governor of Plymouth colony, b. in Plymouth in 1629; d. at Marshfield, Mass., 18 Dec., 1680, was chosen deputy to the general court from Marshfield in 1643. In 1657, two years after the death of his father, he was made an assistant governor, which post he filled till his election as governor in 1673. This last office he held till his death. In 1658 he was chosen one of the commissioners of the United Colonies, and re-elected for fourteen years. On 5 Sept., 1672, he was one of the six signers of the new articles of confederation of the New England colonies, and on 9 Sept., 1675, he signed the declaration of war against King Philip, made by the commissioners. In 1652 he commanded the military company of Marshfield, in 1659 he was appointed military commander of the colony, and in 1675 he was elected general-in-chief of the whole military forces of the United Colonies, being the first native-born general as well as governor in New England. During his chief magistracy in 1674-'5 the first public school of the colony was established, and in 1680 the first lieutenant-governor was elected. The general court ordered in 1675 that four halberdiers should attend the governor and magistrates at elections, and two during the court sessions. The government now maintained a state that was hitherto unknown in the colony. Gov. Winslow lived at Careswell, the family-seat in Marshfield, where he enjoyed the distinction of being the most accomplished gentleman in the colony. His hospitality was generous, and the attractions of the festive and social board were not a little heightened by the charms of his beautiful wife. In 1657 James Cudworth was displaced by the colony from his official post for refusing to sign, as a commissioner, the proceedings against the Quakers. When first a commissioner, in 1658, Winslow refused to sanction the "horrible recommendation" of that year against the Quakers, and in 1674, by his active friendship and powerful influence as governor, Cudworth was rescued from the disgrace to which Gov. Prince and others had subjected him. He showed that he had a just spirit in the active part he bore in the preliminaries to the war against Philip, in which he was afterward commander-in-chief. On 1 May, 1676, he wrote to the commissioners in Boston that the land in his colony had all been honestly purchased of the Indians, and, to protect the natives from wrong, no settler was allowed to receive land except by permission of the court. His capture of Alexander in 1662, the brother of Philip, and for two years sachem after Massasoit's death, illustrates his courage and personal daring as a soldier. His last public act, on 5 Sept., 1680, was to solicit a charter for Plymouth from the crown, Cudworth being appointed to present the address to the king. Gov. Winslow celebrated the memory of Gov. Bradford in a poem that is published in George Morton's "Memoriall." He married, in 1657, Penelope Pelham, daughter of Herbert Pelham, who came to Boston in 1645, and was first treasurer of Harvard college, and assistant governor in 1646-'9. The portrait of

Josiah Winslow

Gov. Winslow given herewith is from a painting probably executed during his visit to London in 1651, which, with the portrait of his wife, is preserved in Pilgrim hall, Plymouth. A son and a daughter survived him.—The former, Isaac, b. in 1670; d. at Careswell, 6 Dec., 1738, was military commander of the colony, a member of the council more than twenty years, some of the time its president, judge of probate, and chief justice the latter part of his life.—Isaac's son, John, soldier, b. in Plymouth, Mass., 27 May, 1702; d. in Hingham, Mass., 17 April, 1774, with the exception of Sir William Pepperell, was the most distinguished military leader in New England at that period. The council appointed him, on 14 Aug., 1740, captain of the company that was raised in Boston to serve in the expedition against Cuba. He went as a commissioner in 1752 to Fort St. George, Me., to adjust territorial and other disputes with the Indians. While a major-general of militia and captain in the British army in 1755, he was directed by Gov. William Shirley, who was advised by Gov. Lawrence, of Nova Scotia, to proceed to that province to remove the Acadians. The most responsible persons for the manner in which that act was accomplished appear to have been Lawrence and his council, and Admirals Boscawen and Moysteyn. Winslow acted under written and positive instructions, and he said to the Acadians, before reading the decree, that it was "very disagreeable to his natural temper and make," but that it was not his business to "animadvert, but to obey such orders as he should receive." The following year he took the field with about 8,000 men to serve against the French. Receiving from Gov. Hardy, of New York, in July, a commission as major-general and commander-in-chief, he established himself at Fort William Henry on Lake George; but Montcalm, fearing to risk the encounter, turned aside to capture Oswego. That general then returned to Canada, and the army of Winslow to Massachusetts. He served again as major-general against the French in the expedition of 1758-'9 to the Kennebec. In 1762 he was appointed chief justice of the court of common pleas in Plymouth county. He participated as a commissioner in the first effort that was made to solve the vexed question—Which is the true river St. Croix?—in determining the easterly line of Maine with James Otis and William Brattle, in 1762. During the stamp-act troubles he was a councillor of the province in the legislature, and was associated on various occasions with Samuel Adams and others in preparing documents upon that controversy. The town of Winslow in Maine was named, in 1771, in his honor. His house in Plymouth is still standing, and in Pilgrim Hall are his sword and a portrait of him in military dress.—Edward, loyalist, brother of Gen. John, b. 7 June, 1714; d. in Halifax, Nova Scotia, 8 June, 1784, was graduated at Harvard college in 1736, was successively clerk of the courts, registrar of probate, and collector of the port, at Plymouth, and removed to Halifax at the evacuation of Boston.—Edward's son, Edward, governor of New Brunswick, b. in Plymouth in 1746; d. in Fredericton, New Brunswick, in 1815, was graduated at Harvard in 1765, and served as clerk of the county court in his native place. In 1775 he was appointed colonel in the royal army at Boston, and in 1782 he became muster-master-general for North America of the American forces in the service of the crown. After the war he settled in New Brunswick, was a member of the first council of that colony, and, successively, surrogate-general, judge of the supreme court, and governor of the province. He was a founder and eminent spirit of the Old Colony club, under whose auspices the long line of celebrations began, and he delivered the first anniversary oration, 22 Dec., 1770.

WINSLOW, Edward Francis, soldier, b. in Augusta, Me., 28 Sept., 1837. He was educated at the Augusta high-school, removed in 1856 to Mount Pleasant, Henry co., Iowa, and soon afterward became interested in the construction of railways. He was a captain in the 4th Iowa cavalry in 1861, and was promoted major, 3 Jan., 1863, and colonel on the day that Vicksburg fell. He then took part in the campaign against Gen. Joseph E. Johnston, and soon afterward was appointed by Gen. Sherman chief of cavalry, and placed in command of the cavalry forces of the 15th corps, which posts he held till March, 1864. In February, 1864, he commanded the cavalry of Gen. Sherman's army in the campaign against Gen. Leonidas Polk, and successfully attacked the Confederate cavalry near Jackson. He was in command of a brigade of cavalry in the engagement at Guntown, Miss., in 1864, and after the defeat of the National forces covered the retreat. In October, 1864, Col. Winslow's brigade formed part of Gen. Alfred Pleasonton's force in pursuit of Gen. Sterling Price. He was severely wounded at Big Blue river on 22 Oct., and was unable to resume his command till November. He was brevetted brigadier-general of volunteers, 12 Dec., 1864, with his brigade participated in the expedition against Selma, Montgomery, Columbus, and Macon in the spring of 1865, and on 16 April took Columbus, Ga., by assault. Soon after retiring to civil life he engaged in the construction of railways. On 1 Nov., 1879, as vice-president and general manager of the Manhattan elevated railway in New York city, he took charge of that property and unified the system of control and management of its lines; but, having been elected president of the St. Louis and San Francisco railway company and vice-president of the Atlantic and Pacific railway company, he severed his connection with the Manhattan company, 31 March, 1880. He was also for several years president of the New York, Ontario, and Western railway company, and formed an association for the purpose of building the West Shore railway, which he completed in about three years.

WINSLOW, James, banker, b. in Connecticut in 1816; d. in New York city, 18 July, 1874. After having been employed in the hardware-store of Erastus Corning in Albany, he removed to New York and, after following the hardware business for several years, entered the banking-firm of Winslow, Lanier and Co., which had been established by his brother and his father-in-law, and which rendered important services to the government during the administration of President Lincoln in connection with war loans. He was subsequently identified with the rise of national banks, and was connected as an officer with several.

WINSLOW, Jens Olaus, Danish explorer, b. in Fünen island in 1739; d. in Copenhagen in 1794. He was a lieutenant in the navy when he was appointed in 1780 to the command of the Danish colonies in Africa. In 1784 he was sent on a voyage around the world, visiting the West Indies, Brazil, and the Spanish possessions on the Pacific coast, Manila, India, and returned to Copenhagen in June, 1787, with valuable charts and rich collections in natural history. After his promotion as post-captain he again explored the West Indies in 1788-'90, and in particular studied the condition of the negroes and the African slave-trade. He wrote "Reise omkring Verden" (3 vols., Copenhagen, 1787, illustrated); "Journal holden i skibet Christianstad paa reisen til Cuba, Puerto Rico og Vest Indien" (2 vols., 1790); and presented to the Academy of sciences of Copenhagen a memoir on the condition of the negroes in the West Indies as compared with the life of the negroes on the west coast of Africa, which was published in Olaus

Gyldendal's collection (Copenhagen, 1792), and translated into French under the title "État, condition, et usages des nègres des Antilles, comparé avec la condition des nègres de la côte d'or" (Amsterdam, 1795).

WINSLOW, John, soldier, b. in Boston, Mass., 29 Oct., 1753; d. there, 29 Nov., 1819. He saved the communion-plate of the Old South church from the British by burying it, and from its steeple witnessed the battle of Bunker Hill. Upon going to the battle-field he was the first person to discover the body of Gen. Joseph Warren. Disguising himself in sailor's clothes, he shipped on a British man-of-war bound to Newport, where he escaped, entered the American army, and shortly received the appointment of deputy paymaster-general. He saved the public chest and important papers at the defeat of the army under Montgomery at Quebec and at the battle of Ticonderoga; in charge also of a battery in the campaign against Burgoyne, at his surrender he took account of the captured stores, being subsequently stationed at West Point and White Plains. On 21 March, 1799, he was elected brigadier-general of the Boston brigade, and in 1809 chosen by the legislature major-general of the militia. In 1788 he was lieutenant, and in 1792 and 1798 captain, of the Ancient and honorable artillery company. An infantry company was formed and named the "Winslow blues." He was an original member of the Society of the Cincinnati and its treasurer, and was also treasurer of Suffolk county the last seven years of his life.

WINSLOW, John Ancrum, naval officer, b. in Wilmington, N. C., 19 Nov., 1811; d. in Boston, Mass., 29 Sept., 1873. He was descended from a brother of Gov. Edward Winslow, of Plymouth colony. He entered the navy as a midshipman, 1 Feb., 1827, became a passed midshipman, 10 June, 1833, and was commissioned a lieutenant, 9 Feb., 1839. During the Mexican war he took part in the expeditions against Tabasco, Tampico, and Tusan, and was present at the fall of Vera Cruz. For his gallantry in action he was allowed to have command of the schooner "Union," which had been captured at Tampico, and was taken into service and named the "Morris"; but she was poorly equipped, and was lost on a reef off Vera Cruz, 16 Dec., 1846. He was executive of the sloop "Saratoga" in the Gulf of Mexico in 1848-'9, at the Boston navy-yard in 1849-'50, and in the frigate "St. Lawrence," of the Pacific station, in 1851-'5. He was promoted to commander, 14 Sept., 1855, and joined the Mississippi river flotilla in 1861, but was not able to remain on duty because of a serious accident which disabled him. He was commissioned captain, 16 July, 1862, and commanded the steamer "Kearsarge" on special service in 1863-'4 in pursuit of the "Alabama." Capt. Winslow arrived off Cherbourg, 14 June, 1864, where he found the "Alabama" and blockaded her in the harbor. The "Alabama" made preparations for fight, and Capt. Raphael Semmes caused Winslow to be informed of this intention through the U. S. consul. On Sunday, 19 June, 1864, he was lying three miles off the eastern entrance of the harbor when the "Alabama" came out, escorted by a French iron-clad and the English yacht "Deerhound." Winslow steamed off seven miles from the shore so as to be beyond the neutral ground, and then steamed toward the "Alabama." The armament of the "Kearsarge" was seven guns, and that of the "Alabama" eight guns, including a 100-pound Blakely rifle. The "Kearsarge" was slightly faster, and had 163 men, while the "Alabama" had 149. When Winslow turned to approach, the "Alabama" opened fire from a raking position at a distance of one mile at 10.57 A. M. He kept on at full speed, receiving a second broadside and part of a third, when he sheered off and returned the fire from his star-board battery. Both vessels circled around a common centre, and neared each other to within 600 yards. The sides of the "Alabama" were torn out by the shells, and at noon, after the action had continued for one hour, she headed for the shore to get into neutral waters, then five miles distant. This exposed her port side, and she could only bring two guns to bear. The ship was filling, and Winslow approached so rapidly that Semmes hauled down his flag. Winslow stopped the ship, but continued to fire, uncertain whether the "Alabama" had surrendered or the flag had been shot away. A white flag was then shown, and Winslow ceased firing. The "Alabama" again renewed her firing, and Winslow also opened and fired three or four times, though the white flag was still flying. A boat from the "Alabama" then came alongside to announce the surrender, and was allowed to go back to bring off the "Alabama's" officers and crew, but she did not return. The yacht "Deerhound" then came up, and Winslow asked her to assist in rescuing the officers and crew of the "Alabama," which was then sinking fast. The "Deerhound" picked up thirty-nine persons, including Semmes and fourteen of his officers, after which she went off and sailed to Southampton. Winslow's officers begged him to throw a shell at the "Deerhound," but he refused. The engagement lasted an hour and twenty minutes. After the last shot was fired the "Alabama" sank out of sight. She had about forty killed, and seventy were made prisoners, so that thirty-nine escaped. Only three men were wounded in the "Kearsarge," one of whom died. Only twenty-eight projectiles struck the "Kearsarge" out of the 370 that were fired by the "Alabama," and none of these did any material damage. One 100-pound shell exploded in the smoke-stack, and one lodged in the stern-post of the "Kearsarge," but did not explode. The "Kearsarge" fired 173 projectiles, and few failed to do some injury. This was the only important sea-fight of the war between two ships. Honors were showered upon Winslow throughout the country for his victory. He received a vote of thanks from congress, and was promoted to commodore with his commission dated 19 June, 1864, the date of the victory. He commanded the Gulf squadron in 1866-'7, was a member of the board of examiners in 1868-'9, and commander-in-chief of the Pacific squadron in 1870-'2. He was promoted to rear-admiral, 2 March, 1870, and after his return from the cruise in the Pacific resided temporarily at San Francisco, after which he removed to Boston, Mass., where he resided until his death.

Gen. A. Winslow

WINSLOW, John Flack, manufacturer, b. in Bennington, Vt., 5 Nov., 1810. He was educated at select schools of Albany, was a clerk in commercial houses in New York from 1827 till 1831, and in the latter year became agent of the New Jersey iron company. In 1833 he engaged in the production of pig-iron in Bergen and Sussex counties, N. J., and in 1837 he formed a connection with Erastus Corning, of Albany, which lasted under various firm-names for thirty years. The firm, controlling the Albany and Rensselaer iron-works, was one of the largest producers of railroad and other iron in the United States. During his visits to Europe, Mr. Winslow purchased the right to manufacture and sell Bessemer steel in this country. The U. S. government contracted with his firm for the construction of the "Monitor," which was begun in October, 1861, at Greenpoint, Long Island, was launched, 30 Jan., 1862, and delivered to the government, 5 March, 1862. In 1867 Mr. Winslow retired from active business. In 1863-'7 he was president of Rensselaer polytechnic institute. He has been president of the Poughkeepsie and Eastern railway, and of the company for constructing the Poughkeepsie bridge over Hudson river.

WINSLOW, Joshua, British soldier, b. in Boston, Mass., 23 Jan., 1727; d. in Quebec in 1801. He served with distinction in the capture of Louisburg in 1745, and was commissary-general in the expedition to Acadia in 1755. His diary of the expedition to Nova Scotia in 1750 is to appear in Holton's "Genealogy of John Winslow's Descendants." At the beginning of the Revolution he removed to Halifax, became paymaster-general of the British forces in North America, and subsequently resided in Quebec. His widow returned to the United States, and died at Medford, Mass., 16 April, 1816. Two portraits, by John S. Copley, of Gen. Winslow (one taken in 1755, in the undress uniform of a British officer) are now in the possession of J. F. Trott, Esq., of Niagara Falls. The journal of his daughter, Anna Green, b. 29 Nov., 1759; d. in 1779, during 1771-'3, in Boston, is a curiosity in its description of the customs and doings of that day. Most of it appeared in the "Bulletin of Pilgrim Record," Nos. 3, 4, and 5 (1877).

WINSLOW, Miron, missionary, b. in Williston, Vt., 11 Dec., 1789; d. at Cape of Good Hope, 22 Oct., 1864. He was descended from a brother of Gov. Edward Winslow. After graduation at Middlebury in 1815,

M. Winslow

and at Andover theological seminary in 1818, he sailed in 1819 for Ceylon, where he established a mission and afterward a seminary at Oodooville. In 1836 he founded the mission at Madras, where he spent the remainder of his life establishing seven vernacular schools and a native college. Harvard conferred the degree of D. D. on him in 1858. His chief books are "Sketch of the Missions" (Andover, 1819); "Memoir of Harriet Lathrop Winslow," his wife (New York, 1835; republished in London, France, and Turkey); "Hints on Missions to India" (New York, 1856); a translation of the Bible into Tamil; and a "Comprehensive Tamil and English Dictionary," in part from manuscript materials of the late Rev. Joseph Knight (Madras, 1862). This great work, costing $20,000 and more than twenty years of toil, averaging three hours a day, contains 68,000 words and definitions, of which about half owe their lexicographic birth and position to the author.—His first wife, Harriet Lathrop, b. in Norwich, Conn., 9 April, 1796; d. in Oodooville, Ceylon, 14 Jan., 1833, married, 11 Jan., 1819, and sailed for Ceylon, 8 June, 1819, where she was distinguished for her educational labors in connection with her husband's work.—Their son, Charles Lathrop, b. in Oodooville, Ceylon, 12 Jan., 1821; d. in New York, 24 May, 1832. His memoir, first published by the American tract society (1834), was republished in Europe. It contains the well-known lines of Mrs. Sigourney on his death.—Catherine Waterbury Carman, Miron's second wife, b. in 1799; d. near Madras, 23 Sept., 1837, married Mr. Winslow, 23 April, 1835. She was one of the most accomplished women and extensive travellers in Europe in her day. The "Remains of Mrs. Winslow," edited by Rev. Jared B. Waterbury, were published (Boston, 1851).—His brother, Hubbard, author, b. in Williston, Vt., 30 Oct., 1799; d. there, 13 Aug., 1864, was graduated at Yale in 1825, studied two years at Andover, and completed his theological course at Yale. He was settled over churches at Dover, N. H., Boston, Mass., and Geneva, N. Y. At Boston he was Lyman Beecher's successor in the Bowdoin street church. From 1844 till 1853 he conducted the Mount Vernon institute in Boston, devoting himself during this period and for much of his life to the advancement of higher education in Boston and among the colleges. His published volumes are "History of the First Church, Dover, N. H." (Dover, 1831); "Doctrine of the Trinity" (1831); "Controversial Theology" (Boston, 1832); "Philosophical Papers" (1833); "Christianity applied to our Civil and Social Relations" (1835); "Young Man's Aid to Knowledge" (1836); "Aids to Self-Examination" (1837); "Mental Cultivation" (1839); "Lectures to Sunday-School Teachers" (1839); "The Appropriate Sphere of Woman" (1840); "Natural Science and Revelation" (1841); "Design and Mode of Baptism" (1842); "Christian Doctrines" (1844); "Intellectual Philosophy" (1852); "Moral Philosophy" (New York, 1856); and "Hidden Life" (1863). The "Young Man's Aid," published in England also, had a sale of 100,000 copies, and more than 250,000 copies of his tract, "Are You a Christian?" were issued. Among Dr. Winslow's minor publications are his eulogy on Daniel Webster (1853) and "History of the Presbyterian Church, Geneva, N. Y." (1858). With Jacob Abbott and Ethan A. Andrews he edited the "Religious Magazine" (Boston, 1837-'8).—Another brother, Gordon, clergyman, b. in Williston, Vt., 12 Sept., 1803; d. in Potomac river, 7 June, 1864, entered the ministry of the Protestant Episcopal church, and was settled successively at Troy and Elmira, N. Y., Annapolis, Md., and Staten island. He enlisted as chaplain of the 5th New York regiment, of which his son Cleveland afterward became colonel, and was instrumental with Dr. Henry W. Bellows and others in establishing the sanitary commission, holding the post of its inspector for the Army of the Potomac. He was a member of scientific bodies and contributor to their published proceedings, and active in philanthropic work. New York university gave him in 1863 the honorary degree of M. D., both because of his distinguished service in the sanitary commission and his capabilities in caring for the sick and wounded.—His son, Cleveland, soldier, b. in Medford, Mass., in 1836; d. in Alexandria, Va., 7

July, 1864, was an officer in the 71st New York regiment when the civil war opened. He raised a company, and was with the 5th New York in all its engagements, beginning with Big Bethel, till he received his mortal wound, which terminated his life before his nomination as brigadier-general for gallant conduct and efficient service could be acted upon. He died from a wound that he received at Mechanicsville, while leading his regiment, as its colonel, into battle.—His brother, GORDON, b. in 1839, a captain in the same regiment, is now a captain in the regular army. Their mother, Catherine Fish Winslow, was a cousin of Hamilton Fish.—Hubbard's son, William Copley, archæologist, b. in Boston, Mass., 13 Jan., 1840, was graduated at Hamilton college in 1862, and at the Protestant Episcopal general theological seminary, New York city, in 1865. He has since been engaged in preaching, lecturing, and writing for the press, and was assistant editor of the New York "World" in 1862-'3, and of the "Christian Union" in 1864. Since 1870 he has resided in Boston, and has had temporary charge of churches there and in Taunton and Weymouth. He is vice-president and honorary treasurer of the Egypt exploration fund for America, and by his efforts has created a widespread interest in its work. He has written numerous articles for the reviews and journals on exploration and cognate subjects, and is regarded as an authority on biblical, and particularly Egyptological, explorations. Through his efforts the Boston museum of fine arts has received a colossal statue of Ramses II., the Pharaoh of the oppression, discovered in the suburbs of the site of the biblical Zoan. He is actively connected with various learned societies, and received the degree of Ph. D. from Hamilton college in 1866, that of LL. D. from St. Andrew's, Scotland, in 1886, L. H. D. from Columbia in 1887, and D. D. from Amherst in 1887.

WINSLOW, Stephen Noyes, journalist, b. in Hartland, Vt., 14 April, 1826. He was graduated in 1843 at the high-school in Philadelphia, where he had already been a reporter for newspapers since 1841. He has been for forty-seven years commercial editor of the "Inquirer," occupied the same editorial chair on the "Bulletin" for thirty-five, was connected also with the "Evening Telegraph" for fifteen, and has long been the editor and proprietor of the "Commercial List and Price Current." Mr. Winslow is the author of "Biographies of Successful Philadelphia Merchants" (Philadelphia, 1864).

WINSLOW, Warren, member of congress, b. in Fayetteville, N. C., 1 Jan., 1810; d. there, 11 June, 1862. He was graduated at the University of North Carolina in 1827, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and practised at Fayetteville. In 1854 he was appointed by President Pierce a confidential agent to Madrid, and bore despatches regarding "The Black Warrior" difficulty. He was elected to the state senate during his absence, was chosen speaker of that body after his return, and became acting governor of North Carolina in 1854, when Gov. David S. Reid was elected to the U. S. senate. He served in congress by successive re-elections from 3 Dec., 1855, till 3 March, 1861.

WINSOR, Justin, librarian, b. in Boston, Mass., 2 Jan., 1831. He studied at Harvard during 1853, and then at Heidelberg, Germany. In 1868 he became superintendent of the Boston public library, where he remained until 1877. He then became librarian of Harvard, which post he still holds. He was the first president, in 1876-'86, of the American library association, and has also held the office of president in the American historical association, and that of secretary in the Massachusetts historical society. The University of Michigan gave him the degree of LL. D. in 1886. Besides numerous magazine articles and addresses, mostly on subjects connected with American history, he has written "History of Duxbury, Massachusetts" (Boston, 1849); "Songs of Unity," compiled with Rev. George H. Hepworth (1859); "Bibliography of the Original Quartos and Folios of Shakespeare, with Particular Reference to Copies in America" (1876); "Reader's Hand-Book of the American Revolution, 1761-'83" (1880); "Was Shakespeare Shapleigh? A Correspondence in Two Entanglements" (1887); and several pamphlets, including "Gov. Bradford's Manuscript History of Plymouth Plantation" (Cambridge, 1881); "Arnold's Expedition against Quebec, 1775-1776 . . ." (1886); "The Manuscript Sources of American History" (New York, 1887); and "Notes on the Spurious Letters of Montcalm" (Cambridge, 1887). He edited the "Memorial History of Boston" (4 vols., Boston, 1880-'1); "Narrative and Critical History of America," of which vols. i. to viii. have been issued (1886-'9); "Harvard University Bulletin" (since 1877); and "Library of Harvard University: Bibliographical Contributions" (begun in 1887). To the last he has contributed "Shakespeare's Poems: Bibliography of the Earlier Editions" (1878-'9); "Pietas et Gratulatio: Inquiry into the Authorship of the Several Pieces" (1879); "Halliwelliana: a Bibliography of the Publications of J. O. Halliwell-Phillips" (1881); "Bibliography of Ptolemy's Geography" (1884); "The Kohl Collection of Early Maps" (1886); and a "Calendar of the Sparks Manuscripts in Harvard College Library" (1888). He also edited the "Record of the 250th Anniversary of the Founding of Harvard College" (1887).

WINSTON, John Anthony, governor of Alabama, b. in Madison county, Ala., 4 Sept., 1812; d. in Mobile, Ala., 21 Dec., 1871. He was educated at La Grange college, Ala., and Nashville university, Tenn., and became a cotton-planter and commission-merchant. In 1840 and 1842 he was chosen to the lower branch of the legislature, and in 1845 he was elected to the state senate, of which he was president for several years. In 1846 he raised two companies of troops for the Mexican war, and was elected colonel of the first Alabama volunteers; but on account of some technicality the regiment was not accepted. In 1853 he was chosen governor of Alabama, and, by opposing state aid to railroads and the reissue of state bank-notes as a loan to railroad companies, gained the name of the "veto governor." Bills for both purposes were passed over his vetoes; but the attorney-general gave an opinion that they were unconstitutional, and the governor ordered the state treasurer to pay out no money for such purposes. He was re-elected in 1855, and the legislature of that year approved his course. In 1860 Gov. Winston was a candidate for presidential elector on the Douglas ticket. Though he had opposed secession, he entered the Confederate army in 1861 as colonel of the 8th Alabama regiment, and commanded a brigade in the peninsular campaign. Soon afterward he resigned his commission on account of physical disability, and devoted himself to aiding the poor and destitute. He was a delegate to the State constitutional convention of 1866, and was afterward chosen to the U. S. senate, but was refused a seat. After this he repeatedly declined to be a candidate for governor, and lived in retirement. Gov. Winston was tall and thin, and in early years erect and active, but his later life was a long struggle with disease. He had few equals as a debater, being gifted with great powers of satire and possessing much readiness and boldness in controversy. In his power over his friends and his hostility to his enemies he has been compared to Andrew Jackson.

WINSTON, Joseph, soldier, b. in Louisa county, Va., 17 June, 1746; d. near Germantown, N. C., 21 April, 1815. His ancestor was one of five brothers from Winston Hall, Yorkshire, England, who came to Hanover county, Va., in the 17th century. Joseph received a fair education, and at the age of seventeen joined a company of rangers. While pursuing a party of hostile Indians they fell into an ambuscade, and young Winston was twice wounded, one of the balls remaining in his body till his death. The savages put the rangers to flight, but Winston escaped and was carried on a comrade's back for three days, till they reached a frontier cabin. He was afterward pensioned by the legislature, and in 1766 removed to Surry county, N. C. In 1775 he was a member of the Hillsborough convention, and in February, 1776, he was in the expedition against the Scotch Tories. In the same year he was made ranger of Surry county and major of militia, serving against the Cherokees, and in 1777 he was a member of the legislature and of the commission that made a treaty with that tribe on Holston river. In 1780 he took part again in partisan warfare with the Tories, and at King's Mountain he led the right wing, and was conspicuous for his bravery, contributing greatly toward the victory. For his services on this day the legislature afterward gave him a sword. After defeating a band of loyalists in a running fight in February, 1781, he took part in the battle of Guilford in March. He represented Surry county in the state senate for three terms, and when Stokes county was formed became the first senator from that county, serving five times between 1790 and 1812. In 1793-'5, and again in 1803-'7, he was a member of congress. The county-seat of Forsyth county, N. C., is named for him.—His son, JOSEPH (1788–1840), served in the war of 1812, was many years in the legislature, and was a major-general of militia. William Winston Seaton, the journalist, was the elder Joseph's nephew.

WINTER, William, author, b. in Gloucester, Mass., 15 July, 1836. He was graduated at the Harvard law-school, but began his career as a journalist and literary and dramatic reviewer. As such he wrote for the New York journals, and contributed literary articles to various magazines. Since August, 1865, Mr. Winter has been attached to the New York "Tribune" as dramatic reviewer, and as such has secured for himself a high reputation. Within that time he has also written and delivered poems on numerous public occasions. Partly in the interest of his profession, Mr. Winter has made several visits to Europe. In 1886, in commemoration of the death of his son, he founded a library at the academy in Stapleton, Staten island, N. Y. Mr. Winter's publications include "The Convent, and other Poems" (Boston, 1854); "The Queen's Domain, and other Poems" (1858); "My Witness: a Book of Verse" (1871); "Sketch of the Life of Edwin Booth" (1871); "Thistle-down: a Book of Lyrics" (1878); "The Trip to England" (1879); "Poems: Complete Edition" (1881); "The Jeffersons" (1881); "Henry Irving" (New York, 1885); "The Stage-Life of Mary Anderson" (1886); "English Rambles and other Fugitive Pieces" (Boston, 1884); and "Shakespeare's England" (Edinburgh, 1886). He has edited, with memoirs and notes, "The Poems of George Arnold" (Boston, 1866); "Life, Stories, and Poems of John Brougham" (1881); and "The Poems and Stories of Fitz-James O'Brien" (1881).

WINTHROP, John, governor of Massachusetts, b. in Edwardston, near Groton, Suffolk, England, 22 Jan., 1588; d. in Boston, Mass., 26 March, 1649. The manor of Groton had been purchased in 1544 by his grandfather, Adam Winthrop, a rich clothier of Suffolk, who had also a city home in St. Michael's, Cornhill, and who was for several years master of the famous Cloth-workers' company of London. A portrait of him, ascribed to Hans Holbein, indicates a man of culture, decision, and great strength of character. One of his daughters became the wife of Sir Thomas Mildmay, nephew of the founder of Emmanuel college; and another was the mother of Dr. William Alabaster, who is styled, in "Fuller's Worthies," "a most rare poet as any our age or nation has produced: witness his Tragedy of Roxana." Of this Adam Winthrop the third son, also named Adam, was a lawyer by profession, a graduate of Magdalen college, Cambridge, and for many years the auditor of Trinity and St. John's colleges. His first wife was a sister of Dr. John Still, bishop of Bath and Wells, but she died early without offspring. His second wife was Anne Browne, of Edwardston, and of this marriage John Winthrop, the subject of this notice, was the only son. His parents lived until within a few years of his coming to this country, his mother dying only one year before he embarked. Of the school or schools which he attended as a boy there is no record, but we find him admitted to Trinity college, Cambridge, on 18 Dec., 1602, when he was not quite fourteen years of age, and he remained there for more than two years. But his college life was brought prematurely to a close, before he was entitled to a degree, by his early engagement and marriage. On 26 April, 1605, he married Mary Forth, daughter and sole heir of John Forth, of Great Stambridge, in Essex. She was of a wealthy family, one of whom was knighted in 1604, and is said to have brought to her husband "a large portion of outward estate." It is matter of tradition that he was made a justice of the peace on arriving at eighteen years of age, and that "he was exemplary for his grave and Christian deportment." As early as 1609, when he had just attained his majority, he is recorded in his father's diary as holding "his first court in Groton Hall." The wife of his youth was taken away within eleven years after their marriage, having borne him six children, of whom two had died in their earliest infancy; and a second wife, of the old Clopton family, had been buried, with her infant, only a year and a day after wedlock. He was sorely oppressed by such successive bereavements, and found consolation only in a more earnest cultivation of the Christian hope and faith which he had cherished from his childhood. There is reason for thinking that he had contemplated becoming a clergyman at this period, and his "Experiences," as written at the time and still extant, evince a deep susceptibility to religious impressions, not without a tinge of superstition. But he gradually gave himself up to the profession of his father, engaged actively in the practice of the law and in the discharge of his duties as a magistrate, and in 1626 was appointed by Sir Robert Naunton one of the attorneys in the court of wards and liveries, over which Sir Robert presided. His professional services brought him also into connection with the parliamentary proceedings of the time, in preparing bills for legislative committees; and as late as 1628 we find record of his special admission to the Inner Temple, of which his eldest son had been admitted a member four years previously. Meantime he was once more established in domestic life, having married in 1618 Margaret, daughter of Sir John Tyndal, knight, of Great Mapleston, in Essex, who was happily spared to him for nearly thirty years, and who was to be his companion and support for seventeen of those years in the New World.

The coming over of John Winthrop to America seems not to have been the result of any long previous deliberation. The earliest intimation of such a step is found in a letter dated 15 May, 1629, in which he says: "My dear wife, I am verily persuaded God will bringe some heavy Affliction upon this lande, and that speedilye: but be of good comfort, the hardest that can come shall be a meanes to mortifie this bodye of corruption, which is a thousand tymes more dangerous to us than any outward tribulation, and to bring us into nearer communion with our Lord Jesus Christ, and more assurance of his kingdom. If the Lord seeth it will be good for us, he will provide a shelter and a hidinge place for us and others, as a Zoar for Lott, Sareptah for his prophet," etc. At this moment he was privately preparing a careful statement of the "Reasons to be considered for justifying the undertakeres of the intended Plantation in New England, and for encouraginge such whose hartes God shall move to joyne with them in it." This is the paper that he communicated for consideration to his eldest son (afterward governor of Connecticut) in August of the same year, and which elicited from him the memorable response: "For the business of New England I can say no other thing but that I believe confidently that the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord, who disposeth all alterations by his blessed will, to his own glory and the good of his; and therefore do assure myself that all things shall work together for the best therein. . . . The Conclusions which you sent down I showed my uncle and aunt, who liked them well. I think they are unanswerable." In less than a year from the date of that letter John Winthrop, the father, was established in New England, having been elected governor of Massachusetts by the company in London, on 30 Oct., 1629, and having arrived at Salem, with the charter and company, in a fleet of eleven ships, of which the "Arbella" was "the admiral," on 22 June, 1630. A few days later he went to what is now called Charlestown, and soon afterward to the site and settlement of Boston.

Both the religious and the political condition of Old England at that period were repulsive to minds like those of Winthrop and his associates. The king was systematically assuming and asserting despotic authority, and reducing the power of parliament to a nullity. Indeed, from March, 1629, no parliament was convoked for eleven years. It was the period of high commission, star chamber, tonnage and poundage, forced loans, and taxation without representation. Not a few distinguished men who opposed such a policy and resisted such exactions were seized and imprisoned. Sir John Eliot, to whom Winthrop was no stranger, was sent to the Tower for free speech in parliament, to die there after several years of suffering. The Puritan spirit, with which Winthrop strongly sympathized, was sternly repressed. Laud, as bishop of London, was already manifesting the bigoted and proscriptive policy which he displayed a few years later as archbishop of Canterbury, and which at last brought him to the block. Meantime the New World was open to freedom, and the little pioneer Pilgrim band was already sending over tidings of religious liberty from Plymouth Rock. All this will sufficiently explain the great Suffolk emigration, of which Winthrop was the chosen leader. The Massachusetts company had already established a plantation at Salem, and John Endicott had been deputed by them to govern the little colony in subordination to the governor and company in London. But they now solemnly resolved to transfer the whole government to the American soil, and Winthrop was made the leader and governor to effect and carry out that transfer, the company "having received, as the record says, extraordinary great commendations of his integrity and sufficiency." Nineteen years intervened between the arrival of Gov. Winthrop at Salem and his death in Boston in 1649, during twelve of which he was the governor of the colony, and during every year of which he was actively engaged in its affairs. He was annually elected governor till 1634, and held the office again in 1637-'40, 1642-'4, and from 1646 till his death. In 1636, when Sir Harry Vane was chosen governor, Winthrop was deputy, and he led the opposition to Vane in the Anne Hutchinson controversy, on which issue he was elected over Vane in 1637. He was an earnest opponent of the new Antinomian doctrines, and was active in the banishment of Mrs. Hutchinson and her followers. In 1644-'5 he was again deputy governor. During that year he was virtually impeached, but his acquittal and the speech which followed it, with his celebrated definition of liberty, are among his most memorable triumphs. Winthrop lived to see Boston, which he had founded, a thriving and prosperous capital; and the state, of which he brought over the charter, extended by successive settlements over a wide territory, and represented, in its little legislature, by deputies from nearly thirty separate towns. Other colonies had planted themselves around Massachusetts, and a New England confederation had been formed under his auspices, of which he was the first president. Free schools had been established, and a college incorporated and organized. Above all, religion had taken deep root in all the settlements, and churches were gathered wherever there was an adequate population. Although he was a member of the Church of England as long as he resided in the mother country, and had united in an affectionate farewell to that church on his departure, he was a man who held Christianity to be above all churches. He soon saw clearly that Congregationalism was the best and only mode of planting and propagating Christianity in this part of the country and in those old Puritan times, and he was henceforth a Congregationalist until his death. Bancroft says of him: "It was principally the calm decision of Winthrop which sustained the courage of his companions." Palfrey concludes a notice of him, in his "History of New England," as follows: "Certain it is that, among the millions of living men descended from those whom he ruled, there is not one who does not, through efficient influences, transmitted in society and in thought along the intervening generations, owe much of what is best within him and in the circumstances about him to the benevolent and courageous wisdom of John Winthrop."

He kept a careful journal of all that was done by himself and others, which he designed to have revised and perfected at his leisure; but no leisure ever came to him. The first volume was published from family manuscripts (Hartford, 1790). The continuation was discovered in 1816 in the tower of the Old South church in Boston, and placed in the hands of James Savage, who published the whole journal as "The History of New England from 1630 to 1649, by John Winthrop," with notes (2 vols., Boston, 1825-'6; 2d ed., with additions, 1853). It furnishes the most authentic record of the early days of Massachusetts. Among other writings is an essay entitled "Arbitrary Government described; and the Government of the Massachusetts vindicated from that Aspersions." It was written by him in 1644, but it saw the light only in 1869. His "Modell of Christian Charity," written on board the "Arbella," on his way to this country, is printed in the "Massachusetts Historical Collections." His "Life and Letters" were published by Robert C. Winthrop (2 vols., Boston, 1864-'7). There is a portrait of him, ascribed to Vandyck, in the senate-chamber of Massachusetts, and reproduced in the accompanying steel engraving; a statue by Richard Greenough in the U. S. capitol at Washington, another in Boston and one in the chapel at Mount Auburn cemetery, seen in the illustration on page 573.—His eldest son, John, known as John Winthrop the younger, b. in Groton Manor, 12 Feb., 1606; d. in Boston, Mass., 5 April, 1676, after being educated at Bury St. Edmunds school and Trinity college, Dublin, entered the Inner Temple, but, finding the study of law little to his taste, obtained temporary employment in the naval service and sailed under the Duke of Buckingham in the unfortunate expedition for the relief of the Protestants of Rochelle. A little later he made a prolonged tour of Europe, passed some time in Padua, Venice, and Constantinople, returning home in

1629, to find his friends busy with the great Massachusetts enterprise, in which he was soon actively enlisted. In 1631 he followed his father to New England, and he was shortly afterward elected an assistant of the Massachusetts colony, which post he retained for eighteen successive years. In 1633 he took the chief part in the settlement of Ipswich, Mass., where he acquired a considerable estate. In 1634 he went to England on public business, and he returned, in 1635, with a commission from Lords Say, Brooke, and others, empowering him to build a fort at the mouth of Connecticut river, and constituting him governor of that region for one year from his arrival. At the expiration of this term he preferred to return to Massachusetts, where he busied himself in scientific researches, in trying to develop the mineral resources of the colony, and in building salt-works. The journal of Gov. Winthrop the elder speaks of his son John at this period as possessing in Boston a library of more than 1,000 volumes, several hundred of which are still preserved, and bear testimony to the learning and broad intellectual tastes of their original owner. In 1640 he obtained a grant of Fisher's island, which was subsequently confirmed by royal patent. In 1641 he went again to England on a long absence, bringing back with him, in 1643, workmen and machinery with which he established iron-works at Lynn and Braintree. In 1646 he began the plantation at Pequot, better known as New London, and, having gradually acquired much landed property in that neighborhood, he transferred thither his principal residence in 1650, exchanging the duties of a Massachusetts for those of a Connecticut magistrate. In 1657 he was elected governor of Connecticut, and, with a single year's exception, he held that office till his death, nineteen years later. From the autumn of 1661 till the spring of 1663 he was chiefly in London on business of the colony, where he became widely known as an accomplished scholar, one of the earliest and most active members of the Royal society, and the personal friend of many of the chief natural philosophers of Europe, his correspondence with whom is in print. The ability and tact that he displayed at the court of Charles II. resulted in his obtaining from that monarch a charter uniting the colonies of Connecticut and New Haven, with the most ample privileges, under which the freemen of that colony became entitled to all the rights and immunities of Englishmen. In this charter Winthrop was named first governor, and in the administration of it he passed his remaining years. His death occurred in Boston, where he had gone to attend a meeting of the commissioners of the united colonies and where he was buried in his father's tomb. He had not the latter's heroic cast of character, and his tastes were rather those of a student than a statesman; but he was a man of singularly winning qualities and great moderation, whose Puritanism was devoid of bigotry or asceticism, and who knew how to retain the esteem of those from whom he differed most widely in opinion. By Indians he was revered for his justice, and by Quakers gratefully remembered for his lenity. In chemistry and medicine he was particularly skilled, and in the dearth of medical practitioners in the colony his advice was sought far and wide. He married, in 1631, his cousin Martha, daughter of Thomas Fones, of London, and step-daughter of Rev. Henry Painter; she died in Ipswich, without surviving issue, in 1634. He married, in 1635, Elizabeth, daughter of Edmund Reade, of Wickford in Essex, and step-daughter of the famous Hugh Peters; this lady, so lovingly alluded to in the letters of Roger Williams, died in Hartford in 1672, leaving two sons and five daughters. Much of the correspondence of her husband and sons is printed in the publications of the Massachusetts historical society.—The second John's

elder son, John, known as FITZ-JOHN, b. in Ipswich, Mass., 19 March, 1639; d. in Boston, Mass., 27 Nov., 1707, left Harvard without taking a degree in order to accept a commission in the parliamentary army, in which his father's brother, Stephen, and his mother's brother, Thomas Reade, were colonels. After seeing active service in Scotland, where he was for some time in command at Cardross, he accompanied Gen. George Monk on his famous march to London; but his regiment was disbanded at the Restoration, and he returned to New England in 1663, and passed the remainder of his life in the military and civil employment of Connecticut. He served with distinction in the Indian wars, sat in the council of Sir Edmund Andros, and was appointed in 1690 major-general commanding the joint expedition against Canada. The lukewarm support of the New York government and the bad faith of its Indian allies made this campaign a failure, but Fitz-John received a vote of thanks from Connecticut, and in 1693 was made agent of that colony in London, where he passed four years at the court of William III. His services in this capacity were so highly appreciated that, soon after his return in 1698, he was elected governor of Connecticut, continuing in office till his death nearly ten years later, while on a visit to his brother in Boston. His own principal residence was at New London, where he was noted for his hospitality. He was neither a great scholar like his father, nor a great statesman like his grandfather, but he was deservedly respected as a gallant soldier, a skilful administrator, and a man of conspicuous integrity and patriotism. He married, somewhat late in life, Elizabeth, daughter of George Tongue, of New London, and left an only child, Mary, who married Col. John Livingston, of Albany, but died without issue.—Another son of the second John, Wait Still, jurist, b. in Boston, 27 Feb., 1643; d. there, 7 Nov., 1717, was early in the military service of Connecticut, and took part in Indian wars; but after his father's death he resided chiefly in Massachusetts, where he was for about thirty years a member of the executive council and major-general of the provincial forces, besides holding, for shorter periods, the offices of judge of admiralty, judge of the superior court, and chief justice. He took an active part in the overthrow of Sir Edmund Andros, and an effort was made by the popular party to have him appointed governor, in place of Joseph Dudley. Judge Sewall speaks of him as "the great stay and ornament of the council, a very pious, prudent, courageous New England man; for parentage, piety, prudence, philosophy, love to New England ways and people very eminent." In the intervals of public duty he devoted himself to agriculture and the study of medicine, often practising gratuitously among his neighbors.—Wait Still's son, JOHN (1681-1747), was graduated at Harvard in 1700, served for some time as a magistrate of Connecticut, and was afterward a fellow of the Royal society of London, to whose "Transactions" he was a contributor, and one of whose volumes was dedicated to him.—John, physicist, b. in Boston, Mass., 19 Dec., 1714; d. in Cambridge, Mass., 3 May, 1779, was the son of Chief-Justice Adam Winthrop. He was graduated at Harvard in 1732, and from 1738 till his death was professor of mathematics and natural philosophy there. The range of his acquirements was great, and he did good original work in several departments of science. It seems likely that we owe in part to his influence the attention of Benjamin Franklin and of Benjamin Thompson, Count Rumford, to physical science. He was in the 18th century the foremost teacher of science in this country. In 1740 he observed the first of the transits of Mercury that took place in that century. In 1761 he observed the second transit, making a journey to Newfoundland for this purpose. The voyage was made in a vessel in the provincial service and the expenses were defrayed by the colonial government. This is believed to have been the earliest purely scientific expedition sent out by any American state. In the development of astronomy Prof. Winthrop made other important observations in the matter of comets, the results of which were published by means of two printed lectures (1759). He had an opportunity to observe the facts connected with the great earthquake that occurred in New England on 18 Nov., 1755. It was his habit to publish the more popular and interesting parts of his work in public lectures in the college chapel. His observations on this phenomenon were contained in a discourse printed in Boston within a month after the catastrophe. The observations recorded in this memoir and the scientific considerations that he based on them show that Winthrop had a clearer conception of earthquake movements than any of his predecessors. He recognized the fact that the movement was essentially a wave in the earth's crust, and perceived that the buildings affected by the shock took on a pendulum movement. Observing that the bricks were thrown from the chimney of his house, which had a height of thirty-two feet, so that they fell at a point thirty feet from the column, he computed the speed of their motion, and ascertained it to be twenty-one feet a second. He also perceived the fact that the shorter the vibrations the quicker they performed the movement. He saw also the analogy between the vibrations of the earth and those of the chord of a musical instrument. In this and many other observations he showed a capacity for observation and for the application of computative methods to this class of phenomena that was unusual in the scientists of his time. It appears probable that he was the first person to apply computations to earthquake phenomena. If this be the case, it may be claimed for him that he laid the foundations of the important science of seismology. Prof. Joseph Lovering, in his account of "Boston and Science" in the "Memorial History of Boston," says that "Prof. Winthrop's views of the nature of heat were greatly in advance of the science of his day." We find in his lecture on earthquakes that he looked to the action of heat for an explanation of seismic disturbances. He had a considerable share in the public life of the colony where he lived. He was several years judge of probate for Middlesex county, a member of the governor's council in 1773-'4, and in the Revolution threw his influence with the patriots. The University of Edinburgh gave him the honorary degree of LL. D. in 1771, and the Royal society of London made him a member. Although Prof. Winthrop has left no work of any importance to modern physicists, his influence in determining a scientific spirit in New England was great. He laid the foundations of scientific inquiry in Harvard. Though not the earliest of the Massachusetts men of science—for he was preceded by Thomas Brattle, Zabdiel Boylston, and others—he deserves the first place among the pioneers of natural science in New England. His publications include "Lecture on Earthquakes" (1755); "Answer to Mr. Prince's Letter on Earthquakes" (1756); "Account of some Fiery Meteors" (1765); and "Two Lectures on the Parallax" (1769). His paper "Cogitata de Cometes" was communicated to the Royal society by Benjamin Franklin (London, 1766).—Prof. Winthrop's son, James, jurist, b. in Cambridge, Mass., in 1752; d. there, 26 Sept., 1821, was graduated at Harvard in 1769, and was wounded at Bunker Hill. He was librarian of Harvard from 1772 till 1787; for several years a judge of the court of common pleas; and long register of probate. He bequeathed his valuable library to Alleghany college, Meadville, Pa. He published "Attempt to translate the Prophetic Part of the Apocalypse of St. John into Familiar Language" (Boston, 1794); "Systematic Arrangement of Several Scripture Prophecies relating to Antichrist" (1795); "Attempt to arrange, in the Order of Time, Scripture Prophecies yet to be Fulfilled" (Cambridge, 1803); and scientific and literary contributions to current literature.—John Winthrop the younger's great-grandson, Thomas Lindall, merchant, b. in New London, Conn., 6 March, 1760; d. in Boston, Mass., 22 Feb., 1841, was graduated at Harvard in 1780, and in 1786 married Elizabeth Bowdoin Temple, a granddaughter of Gov. James Bowdoin and the daughter of Sir John Temple, British consul-general in the United States. In early life he was an active Federalist, but he joined the Republicans at the beginning of the war of 1812-'15, and was successively a state senator, lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts in 1826-'32, and a presidential elector. Few men of his time were so widely esteemed throughout New England for integrity, public spirit, and unostentatious hospitality. Among his many posts of public usefulness were those of president of the Massachusetts agricultural society, the Massachusetts historical society, and the American antiquarian society.—Thomas Lindall's youngest son, Robert Charles, statesman, b. in Boston, 12 May, 1809, was graduated at Harvard in 1828, studied law with Daniel Webster, was admitted to the bar in 1831, but after a brief professional career became active in local politics as a Henry Clay Whig. From 1834 till 1840 he was a member of the lower house of the Massachusetts legislature, of which he was chosen speaker in 1838, 1839, and 1840. In the last-named year he was elected to congress, where he served ten years with much distinction, maintaining the reputation he had already acquired as a ready debater and accomplished parliamentarian, and adding to it by a series of impressive speeches upon public questions, many of which are still consulted as authorities. The earliest resolution in favor of international arbitration by a commission of civilians was offered by him. In 1847-'9 he was speaker of the house, but he was defeated for a second term by a plurality of two, after a contest that lasted three weeks. In 1850 he was appointed by the governor of Massachusetts to Daniel

1851 he was defeated for election to the senate by a coalition of Democrats and Free-soilers, after a struggle of six weeks. In the same year he was Whig candidate for governor of the state, and received a large plurality; but the constitution then required a majority, and the election was thrown into the legislature, where the same coalition defeated him. This occasioned a change in the state constitution, which now requires merely a plurality, but Mr. Winthrop declined to be a candidate again, and successively refused various other candidacies and appointments, preferring gradually to retire from political life and devote himself to literary, historical, and philanthropic occupations. From time to time, however, his voice was still heard in presidential elections, and he gave active and influential support to Gen. Winfield Scott in 1852, to Millard Fillmore in 1856, to John Bell in 1860, and to Gen. McClellan in 1864, when a speech of his at New London was the last, but not the least memorable, of his political addresses. Of the Boston provident association he was the laborious president for twenty-five years, of the Massachusetts historical society for thirty years, of the Alumni of Harvard for eight years, besides serving as chairman of the overseers of the poor of Boston, and in many other posts of dignity and usefulness. He was the chosen counsellor of George Peabody in several of his munificent benefactions, and has been from the outset at the head of the latter's important trust for southern education. It is as the favorite orator of great historical anniversaries that Mr. Winthrop has long been chiefly associated in the popular mind, and he has uniformly received the commendation of the best judges, not merely for the scholarship and finish of these productions, but for the manifestation in them of a fervid eloquence that the weight of years has failed to quench. They may be found scattered through four volumes of "Addresses and Speeches," the first of which was published in 1852 and the last in 1886. Among the most admired of them have been an "Address on laying the Corner-Stone of the National Monument to Washington" in 1848, and one on the completion of that monument in 1885, the latter prepared at the request of congress; an "Address to the Alumni of Harvard," in 1857; an "Oration on the 250th Anniversary of the Landing of the Pilgrims," in 1870; the "Boston Centennial Oration," 4 July, 1876; an address on unveiling the statue of Col. Prescott on Bunker Hill, in 1881; and, in the same year, an oration on the hundredth anniversary of the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown, delivered by invitation of congress. He has been thought equally to excel in shorter and less formal utterances. Several speeches of his on Boston common during the civil war excited much enthusiasm by their patriotic ring; while his brief tributes to John Quincy Adams, John C. Calhoun, Edward Everett, Daniel Webster, Abraham Lincoln, and many other eminent men with whom he had been associated at different periods, are models of graceful and discriminating eulogy. Besides the collected works already cited, he is the author of the "Life and Letters of John Winthrop" (2 vols., Boston, 1864), and "Washington, Bowdoin, and Franklin" (1876). A portrait of him, in the capitol at Washington, presented by citizens of Massachusetts, commemorates at once his speakership and his Yorktown oration; while another, in the hall of the Massachusetts historical society, is a fit reminder of his services to New England history.—Thomas Lindall's nephew, Benjamin Robert, capitalist, b. in New York city, 18 Jan., 1804; d. in London, England, 26 July, 1879, was in early life a clerk in the banking-house of Jacob Barker, but afterward devoted himself to the care of a large inherited estate and to furthering the interests of public institutions of education, charity, and religion in his native city. He was a trustee of the old Public school society, and on its dissolution in 1853 became a school commissioner and member of the board of education; was an earnest friend of the New York hospital, the Lying-in hospital, and other similar institutions; and by his care and liberality did much to advance the prosperity of the Institution for the deaf and dumb. He was recording secretary and vice-president of the New York historical society, and for many years a vestryman of Trinity church, as a member of whose cemetery committee he originated the plan of displaying plants in the church-yards of the parish. Among his publications is an address on "Old New York," which he read before the Historical society (New York, 1862). —The second John's descendant, Theodore, author, b. in New Haven, Conn., 22 Sept., 1828; d.

near Great Bethel, Va., 10 June, 1861, was the son of Francis Bayard Winthrop. His mother was Elizabeth Woolsey, a niece of President Timothy Dwight, and sister of President Theodore Woolsey, for whom Theodore was named. He was graduated at Yale in 1848, with the Clark scholarship, on which he continued there a year, studying mental science, languages, and history. In 1849 he went to recruit his health in Europe, where he remained until January, 1851. There he became acquainted with William H. Aspinwall, whose children he taught for some time, and through him Winthrop entered the employ of the Pacific mail steamship company, to whose offices in Panama he was transferred in 1852. In the following year he visited California and Oregon, and thence he returned overland to New York. In December, 1853, he joined, as a volunteer, the expedition under Lieut. Isaac G. Strain to survey a canal-route across the Isthmus of Panama, and soon after his return in March, 1854, he began to study law with Charles Tracy. He was admitted to the bar in 1855, and in the following year, during a vacation-trip in Maine, made political speeches there in advocacy of John C. Frémont. After this he spent most of his time in literary pursuits, for which he had always had a fondness. The first of his writings that appeared in print was a description of his friend Frederic E. Church's painting, "The Heart of the Andes," whose progress he had watched at the easel. For several years Winthrop worked carefully on his novels, recasting them after each rejection by a publisher. One, "Cecil Dreeme" was finally accepted, but the opening of the civil war delayed its appearance. Another, "John Brent," was also accepted on condition that the author should omit the episode of the death of the horse Don Fulano, which he refused to do. At the opening of the civil war Winthrop enlisted in the 7th New York regiment, which he accompanied to Washington. Soon afterward he went with Gen. Benjamin F. Butler to Fort Monroe as military secretary, with the rank of major, and with his commanding officer he planned the attack on Little and Great Bethel, in which he took part. During the action at the latter place he sprang upon a log to rally his men, and received a bullet in his heart. Shortly before his departure for the seat of war his tale "Love and Skates" had been accepted for the "Atlantic Monthly" by its editor, James Russell Lowell, who then asked the author to furnish an account of his march to Washington for the magazine. This he did in two articles, which attracted much attention, and made Winthrop so well known that the sudden end of his career soon afterward occasioned wide-spread sorrow. Immediately after his death his novels appeared in quick succession, and were very favorably received. They have held their place in American literature, and it is probable that had Winthrop lived he would have taken high rank as a writer. Prof. John Nichol, of Glasgow, says of "Cecil Dreeme": "With all its defects of irregular construction, this novel is marked by a more distinct vein of original genius than any American work of fiction known to us that has appeared since the author's death." His books include the three novels "Cecil Dreeme" (Boston, October, 1861), "John Brent" (January, 1862), and "Edwin Brothertoft" (July, 1862); and the collections of sketches "The Canoe and the Saddle" (November, 1862), and "Life in the Open Air, and other Papers" (May, 1863). These have passed through many editions, and were reprinted in the "Leisure-Hour Series," with the addition of his "Life and Poems," edited by his sister, Laura Winthrop Johnson (New York, 1884). See also a memoir by George William Curtis, prefixed to the earlier editions of "Cecil Dreeme." —Theodore's brother, William Woolsey, soldier, b. in New Haven, Conn., 3 Aug., 1831, was graduated at Yale in 1851, and at the law-school in 1853, and afterward continued his legal studies at Harvard. He was admitted to the Massachusetts bar in 1854, and practised until April, 1861, when he entered the 7th New York regiment as a private. He was commissioned 1st lieutenant of sharpshooters, 1 Oct., 1861, became captain, 22 Sept., 1862, was made major and judge-advocate, 19 Sept., 1864, and at the close of the war brevetted colonel for meritorious service. On 25 Feb., 1867, he was commissioned major in the regular army, and on 5 July, 1884, he became lieutenant-colonel and deputy judge-advocate-general. He is now professor of law in the U. S. military academy. Col. Winthrop is the author of "Digest of Opinions of the Judge-Advocates-General of the Army" (Washington, 1865; enlarged eds., 1866 and 1868; greatly enlarged and annotated, 1880); and "Treatise on Military Law" (2 vols., 1886; condensed into one volume for the use of the cadets at the military academy as "Abridgment of Military Law," 1887). He has also translated the "Military Penal Code of the German Empire" (1873). —Their sister, Laura, author, b. in New Haven, Conn., 13 Sept., 1825, was educated at private schools in her native place, and in 1846 married W. Templeton Johnson. Besides the above-mentioned "Life and Poems" of her brother Theodore, she has published "Little Blossom's Reward," a book for children, under the pen-name of "Emily Hare" (Boston, 1854); "Poems of Twenty Years" (New York, 1874); a "Longfellow Prose Birth-day Book" (Boston, 1888);

and various articles in magazines.—Theodore's cousin, Frederick, soldier, b. in New York city, 3 Aug., 1839; d. near Five Forks, Va., 1 April, 1865, was the son of Thomas C. Winthrop. He was commissioned a captain in the 12th U. S. infantry, 26 Oct., 1861, and received the brevet of brigadier-general of volunteers on 1 Aug., 1864. He was killed at the battle of Five Forks, where he commanded a brigade in the 5th corps. In 1867 the brevet of major-general of volunteers was conferred on him, among the few brevets that were given after death. It was dated back to 1 April, 1865, the day of the battle in which he fell.

WIRT, William, lawyer, b. in Bladensburg, Md., 8 Nov., 1772; d. in Washington, D. C., 18 Feb., 1834. His father was a Swiss, his mother a German. Both parents having died before he was eight years old, Jasper Wirt, his uncle, became his guardian. Between his seventh and his eleventh year the boy was sent to several classical schools, and finally to one kept by the Rev. James Hunt, in Montgomery county, where, under an accomplished and sympathetic teacher, he received during four years the chief part of his education. For two years he boarded with Mr. Hunt, in whose library he spent much of his time, reading with a keen and indiscriminate appetite. In his fifteenth year the school was disbanded, and his patrimony nearly exhausted. Among his fellow-pupils was Ninian Edwards (afterward governor of Illinois), whose father, Benjamin Edwards (afterward member of congress from Maryland), discovering, as he thought, in young Wirt signs of more than ordinary natural ability, invited him to reside in his family as tutor to Ninian and two nephews, and offered him also the use of his library for the prosecution of his own studies, an invitation which was joyfully accepted. Under Mr. Edwards's roof Wirt stayed twenty months, spending his time in teaching, in classical and historical studies, in writing, and in preparation for the bar, which he had chosen as his future profession. With the advantages of a vigorous constitution and a good person and carriage, but with the drawbacks of a meagre legal equipment, a constitutional shyness and timidity, and an over-rapid, brusque, and indistinct utterance, he began his legal career at Culpeper Court-House, Va. In 1795 he married Mildred, daughter of Dr. George Gilmer, and removed to Pen Park, the seat of that gentleman, near Charlottesville. This change introduced him to the acquaintance of many persons of eminence, including Thomas Jefferson and James Monroe. The boundless hospitality of the country gentlemen and the convivial habits of the members of the bar at that time had for a season a dangerous fascination for Wirt, who was regarded by his legal brethren rather as a bon vivant and gay, fascinating companion, than as an ambitious lawyer. Fortunately he saw his peril, and with quick resolve forsook the seductive path he was treading.

In 1799 his wife died, and he removed to Richmond, where he became clerk of the house of delegates. Three years later, at the early age of thirty, he was elected chancellor of the eastern district of Virginia, which office he resigned after performing its duties for six months. In the winter of 1803-'4 Wirt removed to Norfolk, but in 1806, wishing for a wider field of practice, returned to Richmond, where he speedily took rank with the leaders of the bar. In 1807 he was retained to aid the U. S. attorney in the prosecution of Aaron Burr for treason. His principal speech, occupying four hours, and which was characterized by eloquent appeal, polished wit, and logical reasoning, greatly extended his fame. The passage in which he depicted in glowing colors the home of Harman Blennerhassett, and "the wife of his bosom, whom he lately permitted not the winds of summer 'to visit too roughly,'" as "shivering at midnight on the wintry banks of the Ohio, and mingling her tears with the torrents that froze as they fell," was for many years a favorite piece for academic declamation; and the fact that, though worn to shreds by continual repetition, it still has power to charm the reader, is proof of its real though somewhat florid beauty. In 1808 Wirt was elected to the Virginia house of delegates, the only time he consented to serve the state as a legislator. In 1816 he was appointed a district attorney, and in 1817 he became attorney-general, of the United States. He soon afterward removed to Washington. After twelve years, during which he was often pitted with signal honor against the most eminent counsel in the land, he resigned his office and removed to Baltimore. In 1832 Wirt accepted a nomination by the anti-Masons as their candidate for the presidency of the United States, and in the election that followed he received the seven electoral votes of Vermont, and a popular vote of 33,108. He died at Washington of erysipelas, after an illness of two days, caused by a severe cold.

The most striking characteristic of Mr. Wirt was his devotion to his profession. From the beginning to the end of his legal career he kept before him a lofty ideal, which, except for a brief interval, he strained every nerve to attain. To this end all his studies, literary, historical, and scientific, as well as legal, were made to converge. In his early legal addresses he was tempted to aim less at argumentative strength than at the qualities that captivate the multitude. The reputation that he thus acquired for excelling in the ornate rather than in the severe qualities of oratory adhered to him long after it had ceased to be well founded. The consciousness of his early fault appears to have haunted him during a large part of his career, for we find him not only perpetually denouncing "the florid and Asiatic style of oratory" in his letters, and characterizing wit and fancy as "dangerous allies," but laboring with indefatigable perseverance to attain a better reputation for himself. That he succeeded is well known. While he never ceased to relieve the stress and weariness of argument with playful sallies of humor, it was in logical power—the faculty of close, cogent reasoning—that he mainly excelled. His power of analysis was remarkable and his discrimination keen. He excelled in clearness of statement, in discernment of vital points, and in the vigorous presentation of principles. Bestowing great labor on his cases, he often anticipated and answered his opponent's arguments, and swept the whole field of discussion, so as to leave little for his associates to glean. In meeting the unforeseen points that come up suddenly for discussion.

he was remarkably prompt and effective. His ablest arguments were those he delivered on the trial of Aaron Burr, in the case of McCulloch vs. the State of Maryland, in the Dartmouth college case (see WHELOCK, JOHN, and WEBSTER, DANIEL), in the great New York steamboat case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, in the Cherokee case, and especially in the defence of Judge Peck, impeached before the U. S. senate. Mr. Wirt was conspicuous for his personal beauty, both in youth and manhood. His manly, striking figure, intellectual face, clear, musical voice, and graceful gesture won the favor of his hearer in advance. In his public addresses he was usually calm, self-possessed, and deliberate. His memory was very retentive, and he excelled in felicity of quotation, sometimes retorting upon an adversary with telling effect a passage inaptly cited by him from an English or Latin poet. A pocket edition of Horace was often thumbed in his journeys; but Seneca was his favorite classic author. Wirt's conversation, enriched by multifarious reading, yet easy, playful, and sparkling with wit and humor, was full of interest and charm. Similar qualities pervade his letters. He was a member of the Presbyterian church, and in his last years took great interest in missionary societies, and was president of the Maryland Bible society.

Wirt's earliest work was the noted "Letters of the British Spy," which he first contributed to the Richmond "Argus" in 1803, and which won immediate popularity. They are chiefly studies of eloquence and eloquent men, are written in a vivid and luxuriant style, and may be regarded, in spite of the exceptional excellence of "The Blind Preacher," as rather a prophecy of literary skill than its fulfilment. They were soon afterward issued in book-form (Richmond, 1803; 10th ed., with a biographical sketch of the author by Peter H. Cruse, New York, 1832). In 1808 Wirt wrote for the Richmond "Enquirer" essays entitled "The Rainbow," and in 1810, with Dabney Carr, George Tucker, and others, a series of didactic and ethical essays, entitled "The Old Bachelor," which, collected, passed through several editions (2 vols., 1812). These papers were modelled after those of the "Spectator," and treat of female education, Virginian manners, the fine arts, and especially oratory—a favorite theme of the author. The best of the essays, that on the "Eloquence of the Pulpit," is a vigorous and passionate protest against the coldness that so often reigns there. In October, 1826, he delivered before the citizens of Washington a discourse on the lives and characters of the ex-presidents, Adams and Jefferson, who had died on 4 July of the same year (Washington, 1826), which the London "Quarterly Review," in a paper on American oratory, several years afterward, pronounced "the best which this remarkable coincidence has called forth." In 1830 Wirt delivered an address to the literary societies of Rutgers college, which, after its publication by the students (New Brunswick, 1830), was republished in England, and translated into French and German. His other publications are "The Two Principal Arguments in the Trial of Aaron Burr" (Richmond, 1808); "Sketches of the Life and Character of Patrick Henry," which has been severely criticised both for its hero-worship and its style, the subject of the biography having been regarded by many as a creation of the rhetorician rather than an actual personage (Philadelphia, 1817); "Address on the Triumph of Liberty in France" (Baltimore, 1830); and "Letters by John Q. Adams and William Wirt to the Anti-Masonic Committee for York County" (Boston, 1831). Wirt's "Life" has been written by John Pendleton Kennedy (2 vols., Philadelphia, 1849).—His second wife, Elizabeth Washington, b. in Richmond, Va., 30 Jan., 1784; d. in Annapolis, Md., 24 Jan., 1857, was the daughter of Col. Robert Gamble, of Richmond, Va. She was carefully educated in her native city and in 1802 married Mr. Wirt. She published an illustrated quarto volume entitled "Flora's Dictionary," which was the first book of its kind in this country, and is described as "at once a course of botany, a complete flower letter-writer, and a dictionary of quotations" (Baltimore, 1829).

WISE, Daniel, clergyman, b. in Portsmouth, England, 10 Jan., 1813. He was educated at Portsmouth grammar-school, came to the United States in 1833, and, entering the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church, was pastor of various churches in 1837-'52, and then editor of "Zion's Herald" in Boston till 1856. From that time till 1872 he was editor of the Sunday-school publications of his denomination, and from 1860 till 1872 he was also editor of the tract publications. Since 1872 he has been engaged chiefly in literary work. Wesleyan university gave him the degree of D. D. in 1859. Dr. Wise published and edited in 1838-'44 the first Methodist Sunday-school paper in this country. Among his many works, which are chiefly for youth, are "Life of Lorenzo Dow" (Lowell, Mass., 1840); "History of London" (1841); "Personal Effort" (Boston, 1841); "The Cottage on the Moor" (New York, 1845); "The McGregor Family" (1845); "Lovest Thou Me?" (Boston, 1846); "Guide to the Saviour" (New York, 1847); "Bridal Greetings" (1850); "Life of Ulric Zwingle" (1850); "Aunt Effie" (1852); "My Uncle Toby's Library" (12 vols., Boston, 1853); "Popular Objections to Methodism Considered and Answered" (1856); "The Squire of Walton Hall: a Life of Waterton, the Naturalist" (1874); "The Story of a Wonderful Life: Pen Pictures from the Life of John Wesley" (Cincinnati, 1874); "Vanquished Victors" (Cincinnati, 1876); "Lights and Shadows of Human Life" (New York, 1878); "Heroic Methodists" (1882); "Sketches and Anecdotes of American Methodists" (1883); "Our Missionary Heroes and Heroines" (1884); "Boy Travellers in Arabia" (1885); "Men of Renown" (Cincinnati, 1886); and "Some Remarkable Women" (1887). He has used the pen-names of "Francis Forrester, Esq.," and "Lawrence Lancewood."

WISE, Henry Alexander, governor of Virginia, b. in Drummondtown, Accomack co., Va., 3 Dec., 1806; d. in Richmond, Va., 12 Sept., 1876. He was graduated at Washington college, Pa., in 1825, studied law, was admitted to the bar in Winchester, Va., in 1828, and settled in that year in Nashville, Tenn., but in 1830 returned to Accomack. In 1833 he was elected to congress by the Jackson party, and after the election fought a duel with his competitor for the office. He was twice re-elected. In congress he went over to the opposition on the development of Jackson's bank policy, and took strong ground in favor of slavery. In 1837 he was second to William J. Graves, of Kentucky, in his duel with Jonathan Cilley, of Maine, in which the latter was killed. He was a man of undoubted ability, and had great influence in John Tyler's administration, and, says John W. Forney, "Standing between the two great parties in the house, he delighted in his isolation and rioted in the eccentricities of his genius." In 1842 the senate rejected the nomination of Mr. Wise as minister to France, but he was subsequently appointed minister to Brazil, and resided at Rio Janeiro from May, 1844, till October, 1847. In 1848 and 1852 he supported the Democratic candidates for president. He was elected governor of Virginia in 1855, after a very vigorous canvass, directed especially against the "Know-Nothings," whose progress he did much to check by his vigorous oratory. His success, which overturned the calculations of many political prophets, was due in part to his accusation that the "Know-Nothings" were Abolitionists in disguise. Toward the close of his term occurred the seizure of Harper's Ferry by John Brown, whose execution on 2 Dec., 1859, was one of the last acts of his administration. (See BROWN, JOHN.) In February, 1861, he was a member of the State convention, in which, from the committee on Federal relations, he made a report that aimed at compromise and a peaceable adjustment with the seceded states. After the secession of Virginia he was appointed brigadier-general in the Confederate army. His force was driven out of Kanawha valley by the National troops under Gen. Jacob D. Cox, and at Gauley Bridge lost a large quantity of arms and stores. Subsequently he commanded at Roanoke island, N. C., where his forces were defeated by Gen. Ambrose E. Burnside's expedition, his son, Obadiah J. Wise, being among the killed. After the war he resumed the practice of his profession. He published "Seven Decades of the Union: Memoir of John Tyler" (Philadelphia, 1872).—Henry Alexander's son, John Sergeant, politician, b. in Rio Janeiro, Brazil, 25 Dec., 1846, was educated at Virginia military institute, and, while a cadet there, took part in the battle of Newmarket, Va., where he was wounded, afterward serving on staff duty till the end of the war. He studied law at the University of Virginia, was admitted to the bar in 1867, and has engaged in practice in Richmond. From 1882 till 1883 he was U. S. district attorney. He was chosen to congress in 1882 as a Readjuster, served one term, and in 1885 was the Republican candidate for governor of Virginia, but was defeated by Fitzhugh Lee.—Henry Alexander's nephew, George Douglas, congressman, b. in Accomack county, Va., 4 June, 1831, was educated at Indiana university, studied law at William and Mary, and practised at Richmond. He served in the Confederate army as a captain, was commonwealth's attorney of Richmond in 1870-'80, and in the latter year was chosen as a Democrat to congress, where he has since served.—Gov. Wise's cousin, Henry Augustus, naval officer, b. in Brooklyn, N. Y., 12 May, 1819; d. in Naples, Italy, 2 April, 1869, was a son of George Stuart Wise, of the U. S. navy. He entered the navy, 8 Feb., 1834, attended the naval school at Philadelphia in 1839-'40, and became a passed midshipman, 16 July, 1840. He served in the depot of charts, and on special duty in 1840-'3, and cruised in the "Plymouth," of the Mediterranean station, in 1844-'5. He was promoted to master, 31 Oct., 1846, and lieutenant, 25 Feb., 1847. During the Mexican war he was attached to the razee "Independence," on the Pacific station, and participated in the operations in the Gulf of California, at Mazatlan, and La Paz. In 1850-'2 he served in the coast survey, and then he cruised in the frigate "Cumberland," of the Mediterranean station, in 1852-'4. He was on ordnance duty at Boston and Washington during the following years until 1860. When the civil war began he was attached to the steam frigate "Niagara" in the first blockading squadron off Charleston, S. C., in 1861. He was promoted to commander, 16 July, 1862, and appointed assistant chief of the bureau of ordnance and hydrography, where he served throughout the remainder of the war and until January, 1869, and rendered valuable services. He was promoted to captain, 29 Dec., 1866, and was abroad on leave when he died. He married a daughter of Edward Everett in 1848. Capt. Wise was the author of "Los Gringos, or an Interior View of Mexico and California, with Wanderings in Peru, Chili, and Polynesia" (New York, 1849); "Tales for the Marines" (Boston, 1855); "Scampavias; from Gibel Tarak to Stamboul, by Harry Gringo" (New York, 1857); "The Story of the Gray African Parrot," for children (1859); and "Captain Brand of the 'Centipede'" (London, 1860; New York, 1864).

WISE, Isaac Mayer, clergyman, b. in Stein-grub, Bohemia, 3 April, 1819. After following the usual rabbinical training, and a course of secular instruction at Prague, he was graduated at the University of Vienna in 1843. In the same year he was appointed rabbi of Radnitz, Bohemia, where he remained three years. He then went to New York, and from 1846 till 1854 he officiated in Albany. In 1854 Dr. Wise was called to Cincinnati, Ohio, where he has remained. In 1854 he published the weekly, "The Israelite," and in 1855 a German supplement, "Die Deborah." He has also issued a special ritual called "Minhag America," which has been adopted by a large number of congregations, and he has been an industrious writer on Jewish and polemical topics. He has lectured throughout the country, and consecrated a large number of synagogues. He is identified with the reform movement in American Judaism, and his energy led to the union of American congregations and the Hebrew union college, of which he is president. Among his works are a "History of the Israelitish Nation" (Albany, 1854); "Essence of Judaism" (Cincinnati, 1860); "Judaism: its Doctrines and Duties" (1862); "The Martyrdom of Jesus of Nazareth," to prove that the Jews were not responsible for the crucifixion (1874); "The Cosmic God" (1876); and "History of the Hebrews' Second Commonwealth" (1880).

WISE, John, clergyman, b. in Roxbury, Mass., in August, 1652; d. in Ipswich, Mass., 8 April, 1725. He was the son of Joseph Wise, who, in his younger days, had been a serving-man. John attended Roxbury free school, was graduated at Harvard in 1673, and, after studying theology, was ordained pastor of Chebacco, a new parish of Ipswich, on 12 Aug., 1683, where he remained till his death. In 1688, for leading the citizens of Ipswich in their remonstrance against arbitrary taxation by Sir Edmund Andros, he was imprisoned, fined £50 and costs, and deprived of his ministerial office, but after the revolution of the following year he brought action against Chief-Justice Dudley for refusing him the benefit of the habeas corpus act, and is said to have recovered damages. The town had paid his fine and costs and sent him, as its representative, to Boston, where he took an active part in reorganizing the government. In 1690 he was a chaplain in the unfortunate expedition to Canada. When it was proposed, under the leadership of the Mathers, to establish associations of ministers in Massachusetts that should exercise authority that had belonged to the individual churches, Wise opposed the plan as being the first step toward a hierarchy, and published against it a pamphlet entitled "The Churches' Quarrel Espoused" (Boston, 1710; 2d ed., with the "Cambridge Platform," 1715). In this he attacked the scheme with keen satire, utterly defeating it. Dr. Henry M. Dexter, in his "Congregationalism as Seen in its Literature," says the essay is unsurpassed "for density, for clearness, for largeness of vision, for conclusiveness, and for general ability and beauty of style." Later Mr. Wise amplified his views in his "Vindication of the Government of New England Churches," which was bound together with another edition of the former pamphlet (1717). This is a remarkable exposition of the general principles of civil government, and became, says a biographer, "the text-book of liberty for our Revolutionary fathers, containing some of the notable expressions that are used in the Declaration of Independence." The two essays were reprinted in a volume by the Congregational board of publication, with an historical introductory notice by the Rev. Joseph S. Clark, D. D. (1860). See, also, funeral sermon, by John White (1725).
